The stipulation to pay a fine of one hundred dollars for each violation of the contract, is, in the very language of the parties, a penal obligation. Its very object and purpose is to enforce the primary obligation, which each of the contracting parties assumed, to close his respective store on Sundays. It is a strained and unnatural construction to say that the contract was entered into with the view of making a donation to the plaintiffs, dependent upon the condition that any of the parties would not close their stores. This was a commutative contract with a penal clause, not a conditional donation.

It is, therefore, ordered and decreed, that the judgment of the Dis-

GORRELL v. GREENSBORO WATER-SUPPLY CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1899. 124 N. C. 328, 32 S. E. 720, 46 L. R. A. 513, 70 Am. St. Rep. 598.)

Action by Charlotte J. Gorrell an inhabitant, property owner, and tax payer of the City of Greensboro against the Greensboro Water-Supply Company, the predecessor of which had contracted with the city to furnish the city and its inhabitants with water for all domestic, sanitary and fire purposes, and in particular to keep at all times a specified pressure for use in the case of fires. The complaint alleged facts showing that the defendant through careless, wilful and wanton neglect failed to keep the fire pressure agreed upon and needed and in consequence the plaintiff's property was destroyed by fire when, if defendant had supplied the water at the agreed fire pressure, the property would have been saved. Defendant demurred. The demurrer was overruled and judgment entered for the plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

CLARK, J.* This cause is presented upon complaint and demurrer. * * * The demurrer, so far as it relates to the merits of the case, is, substantially, that the complaint has stated no cause of action (1) because the plaintiff, though a citizen and taxpayer of Greensboro (as alleged in the complaint), is neither a party nor privy to the contract, the breach of which is the foundation of the action; (2) the failure of the defendant to furnish water was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's loss. It is true, the plaintiff is neither a party nor privy to the contract, but it is impossible to read the same without seeing that, in warp and woof, in thread and filling, the object is the comfort, ease, and security from fire of the people, the citizens of Greensboro. This is alleged by the eleventh paragraph of the complaint, and is admitted by the demurrer. The benefit to the nominal contracting party, the city of Greensboro, as a corporation, is small in comparison, and, taken alone, would never have justified the grants, concessions, privileges,

¹³ "If the intention to create a right in a third party is indicated with reasonable certainty, an action by him should be maintainable, even though the intention to benefit him was only secondary and conditional, and irrespective of whether he is a donee or a creditor." benefits, and payments made to the water company. Upon the face of the contract, the principal beneficiaries of the contract in contemplation of both parties thereto were the water company on the one hand and the individual citizens of Greensboro on the other. The citizens were to pay the taxes to fulfill the money consideration named, and furnishing the individual citizens with adequate supply of water, and the protection of their property from fire, was the largest duty assumed by the company. One not a party or privy to a contract, but who is a beneficiary thereof, is entitled to maintain an action for its breach. This has been sustained by many decisions elsewhere. Ellis v. Harrison, 104 Mo. 270, 16 S. W. 198; Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268; Simson v. Brown, 68 N. Y. 355; Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280; Wright v. Terry, 23 Fla. 160, 2 South 6; Austin v. Seligman, 18 Fed. 519; Burton v. Larkin, 36 Kan. 246, 13 Pac. 398. And even when the beneficiary is only one of a class of persons, if the class is sufficiently designated. Johannes v. Insurance Co., 66 Wis. 50, 27 N. W. 414. It was considered, though without decision, by this court, in Haun v. Burrell, 119 N. C. 544, 548, 29 S. E. 111, and Sams v. Price, 119 N. C. 572, 29 S. E. 170. Especially is this so when the beneficiaries are the citizens of a municipality whose votes authorized the contract, and whose taxes discharge the financial burdens the contract entails. The officials who execute the contract are technically the agents of the corporation, but the corporation itself is the agent of the people, who are thus effectively principals in the contract. The acceptance of the contract by the water company carries with it the duty of supplying all persons along its mains. Griffin v. Water Co. 122 N. C. 206, 30 S. E. 319; Haugen v. Water Co. (Or.) 28 Pac. 244. In Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water-Supply Co. (1889) 89 Ky. 340, 12 S. W. 554, and 13 S. W. 249, it is held: "If a water company enter into a contract with a municipal corporation whereby the former agrees, in consideration of the grant of a franchise and a promise to pay certain specified prices for the use of hydrants to construct waterworks of a specified character, force, and capacity, and to keep a supply of water required for domestic, manufacturing, and fire protection purposes for all the inhabitants and property of the city, a taxpayer of the city may recover of the water company when, through a breach of its contract, he is left without means of extinguishing fire, and his property is on that account destroyed;" and it is therein further held: "Where a party undertakes to furnish water in such mode and quantity that it may be used to extinguish fires in the city in which it is to be supplied, damages sustained by the destruction of buildings by the failure to so furnish such water is a natural and proximate consequence of such breach of the undertaking." This opinion is based upon sound reason, and is adopted by us. It is conclusive of both points raised as to the merits of the controversy by the demurrer. Indeed, it could not be doubted that, if the city buildings were destroyed by fire through failure of the defendant to furnish water for their protection, as provided by the contract, the city could recover. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Meridian Waterworks Co., 18 C. C. A. 519, 72 Fed. 227.¹⁴ Besides, the complaint, in paragraphs 13 and 14, alleges that the defendant's failure to furnish water as per contract was the direct and sole cause of the loss, and this is admitted by the demurrer. Thus, the question really narrows down to the question whether the beneficiaries of a contract, who furnish the consideration money of the contract, can maintain an action for damages caused by its breach. The case of Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water-Supply Co. (Ky.) 12 S. W. 554, is exactly in point, was reaffirmed on a rehearing (13 S. W. 249), and is followed by Duncan v. Water Co. (Ky.) 12 S. W. 557, making three decisions altogether. The decisions, however (12 in number), in other states where the question has been presented, are the other way. But this is a case of the first impression in this state, and decisions in other states have only persuasive authority. They have only the consideration to which the reasoning therein is entitled. They are to be weighed, not counted.

We should adopt that line which is most consonant with justice and the "reason of the thing." Did the people of Greensboro have just cause to believe that by virtue of that contract they, as well as the corporation, were guaranteed a sufficient quantity of water to protect their property from fire; and did the water company understand it was agreeing, for the valuable considerations named, to furnish a sufficient quantity of water to protect private as well as public property from fire? The intent is to be drawn from the instrument itself, and on its face there can be no doubt it was contracted that the water supply should be sufficient to protect private as well as public property. If so, it follows that when, by breach of that contract, private property is destroyed, the owner thereof, one of the beneficiaries contemplated by the contract, is the party in interest, and he, and he alone, can maintain an action for his loss. As is said by Judge Freeman, the learned annotator of the American State Reports, in commenting on the fact (Briton v. Waterworks Co. [Wis.] 29 Am. St. Rep., at page 863; s. c. 51 N. W. 84), that the majority of decisions so far rendered were adverse to the position taken in the Kentucky case above cited, and approved by us: "As none of the courts have fairly faced what seems to be the logical result of these decisions, viz. that the injured person is left without any remedy at all, it must be admitted that the subject is left in an extremely unsatisfactory position. It seems to be universally agreed, and on the soundest reasoning, that the city itself is not liable for failing to protect the property of taxpayers from fire, unless made liable by express statutory provisions. Wright v. City Council of Augusta, 78 Ga. 241. And it seems equally clear that the city would have no right of action in such case in behalf of the taxpayer, for the basis of all the [adverse] decisions is that there is no privity of contract between the taxpayers and the water companies. If the contract is not made for the benefit of the taxpayers in such a sense that they can sue upon it, it can hardly be maintained that the same contract is made for one of those taxpayers in such a sense that the city can recover damages in his name. * * * If, then, neither the taxpayer himself nor the city on his behalf can sue the company, the conclusion seems to be that the loss by fire in these cases is regarded by the law as damage for which there is no redress." This is a complete reductio ad absurdum, and we prefer not to concur in cases, however numerous,—there are probably a dozen scattered through half a dozen states,—which lead to such conclusion. All these cases (when not based on reference to the others) rest upon the narrow technical basis that a citizen, because not a privy to the contract, cannot sue, whereas authorities are numerous that a beneficiary of a contract, though not a party or privy, may maintain an action for its breach. 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 105-106. Here the water company contracted with the city to furnish certain quantities of water for the protection of the property of the city as well as of the city, and received full consideration, a large part of which comes in the shape of taxation, paid annually by those citizens. On a breach of the contract, whereby the property of a citizen is destroyed, he, as a beneficiary of the contract, is entitled to sue; and under our Code requiring the party in interest to be plaintiff he is the only one who can. Whether there was a breach of the contract, and whether it was the proximate cause of the loss, regarded as matters of fact, will be determined by the jury, if, when the case goes back, the defendant shall file an answer, as it has a right to do (Code, § 272), raising those issues. But in overruling the demurrer to the complaint there was no error. As was said by the supreme court of Kentucky, when affirming, on a petition to rehear, the decision in the Paducah Case, supra: "The water company did not covenant to prevent occurrence of fires, nor that the quantity of water agreed to be furnished would be a certain and effectual protection against every fire, and consequently does not in any sense occupy the attitude of an insurer; but it did undertake to perform the plain and simple duty of keeping water up to a designated height in the standpipe, and, if it failed or refused to comply with that undertaking, and such breach was the proximate cause of destruction of the plaintiff's property, which involves issues of fact for determination by a jury, there exists no reason for its escape from answering in damages that would not equally avail in case of any other breach of contract."

*Affirmed.*¹⁵

WILLIAM J. FLYNN v. NORTH AMERICAN LIFE INS. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1874. 115 Mass. 449.)

GRAY, C. J. This action is brought by William J. Flynn upon a policy of insurance on the life of Garrett Royle, his father-in-law. The application states, and the policy shows, that the insurance was obtained for the benefit of Flynn; and the application was signed "Garrett Royle for William J. Flynn." The original premium was paid by Flynn for Royle, and a receipt therefor given by the insurance company to Flynn in his own name; the annual premiums were paid by Flynn; part only of the first premium, and none of the subsequent ones, were repaid to him by Royle. By the policy, the insurers promise and agree to pay the sum insured to Flynn and his representatives. But this promise and agreement is expressed to be made to and with Royle and his representatives; and the policy is under seal. Royle and not Flynn is the covenantee. It is well settled that upon an agreement under seal, none but the party to it can maintain an action at law. Sanders v. Filley, 12 Pick. 554; Johnson v. Foster, 12 Met. 167; Millard v. Baldwin, 3 Gray, 484; Northampton v. Elwell, 4 Gray, 81; Dacey on Parties, 101. Whatever, therefore, might have been Flynn's right of action if the agreement sued on had been a simple contract, there was not sufficient privity between him and the insurers to maintain an action in his name upon this policy; and it is unnecessary to consider the other grounds of defence.

CASE v. CASE.

Ann. Cas. 1913 B, 311.)

Action by Earl A. Case against Bert L. Case. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (137 App. Div. 393, 121 N. Y. Supp. 746) unanimously affirming a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

WERNER, J. The controlling question in this case is whether an action can be maintained upon a contract under seal by one who is not a party to the instrument. The action is brought by the plaintiff against his brother, upon a contract under seal, made by the latter with his mother for her support and maintenance. The contract recites that it was entered into by the defendant upon the consideration that the mother, who is the other party thereto, had united with the plaintiff in a deed of a farm to the defendant, and that by the contract, based upon the consideration, the defendant bound himself to support the mother in health and in sickness during her life. The complaint alleges that the defendant failed to keep the covenant thus entered into by him, and that by reason of such failure the plaintiff has been compelled to support and maintain the mother at an expense to him in the sum of $500, for which amount, with interest, he asks judgment. The case was tried and submitted to a jury with the result that the plaintiff was given a verdict for $392. From the judgment entered upon that verdict an appeal was taken to the Appellate Division, where there was a unanimous affirmance.

Before any evidence had been taken, counsel for the defendant moved to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that it does not state a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, and on the argument in support of the motion he directed the attention of the trial court to the specific objection that the contract, being a sealed instrument, was not between the plaintiff and the defendant, but between the defendant and his mother, and that the latter was not a party to the action. The motion to dismiss the complaint, thus made at the opening of the case, was denied, and to this ruling of the court the defendant's counsel duly excepted.

the beneficiary. See Johnston v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. (W. Va.), 100 S. E. 865, 866 (1919). In that case it was held that the personal representative of one who was murdered could not recover the amount of the insurance policy on the life of the deceased where the murder was committed by the party who was the sole distributee of the estate of the insured, and who, because of the murder, was denied a recovery as beneficiary of the policy. The court expressed no opinion as to the situation where the sole beneficiary of the policy is only one of several distributees of the estate of the insured. See also McDonald v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 178 Ia. 863 (1916); Supreme Lodge v. Menkhausen, 209 Ill. 277 (1904). See explanation of last case in Wall v. Pfanschmidt, 265 Ill. 180, 192 (1914).

Upon appeal to this court, such an exception survives the unanimous affirmance at the Appellate Division, and it is therefore our duty to determine whether the exception was well taken.

Nothing is more definitely settled in our law than that an instrument under seal cannot be enforced by or against one who is not a party to it. This is so elementary as to be axiomatic and needs no support in the citation of authorities. A different rule exists as to simple contracts which, for reasons adverted to in Briggs v. Partridge, 64 N. Y. 357, 362, 21 Am. Rep. 617, may be brought by or against the real principal although he is not named in the instrument. There are exceptions to the rigid rule that only the parties to a contract under seal can be parties to a litigation for its enforcement, such, for instance, as a suit to enforce an antenuptial agreement for a marriage settlement by the person for whose benefit it was made (Phalen v. U. S. Trust Co., 186 N. Y. 178, 187, 78 N. E. 943, L. R. A. [N. S.] 734); but even in such cases it is the rule, both in law and equity, that mere volunteers or strangers to the consideration have no standing in court (Borland v. Welch, 162 N. Y. 104, 56 N. E. 556).¹⁷

The case at bar is not within this or any other exception to the general rule, for the plaintiff is a mere volunteer who is not a party to the contract and who is an utter stranger to the consideration.

The learned justice who wrote for the Appellate Division, was impressed with the view that the contract was made for the benefit of the plaintiff, since he was under the legal and moral obligation to support his mother, and that the effect of the contract was to relieve him from that obligation. It was also deemed a circumstance of controlling weight that the conveyance to the defendant of the farm, the title to which appeared to have been in the plaintiff, furnished a consideration which invested the latter with the right to enforce the contract. We are unable to subscribe to that view, and we find direct authority against it in one of the cases cited to support the judgment below. In Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, 222, 32 N. E. 49, 50, the plaintiff sought to enforce a covenant in a deed made by her husband to the defendant, to the effect that the grantee would pay certain mortgages upon the premises conveyed. The wife had joined her husband in the execution of these mortgages, but had expressly reserved her dower right from the operation of the deed. In that case this court held that the wife's joinder in the mortgages was a voluntary surrender of her right for the benefit of her husband, and bound her interests to the extent necessary to protect the mortgagees. There, in short, the whole doctrine was summed up in one pregnant paragraph. "It is not sufficient," said Judge Andrews, "that the performance of the covenant may benefit a third person. It must have been entered into for his benefit, or at least such benefit must be the direct result of performance and so within the contemplation of the parties, and in addition the grantor must also have a legal interest that the covenant be performed in favor of the party claiming performance."¹⁸ In the case at bar the covenants of the agreement were made for the benefit of the mother, and she alone had a legal interest in their enforcement. Without going further into the by-paths of distinctions and refinements, it is enough to repeat that this is an action upon an agreement under seal to which the plaintiff is not a party. It can only be enforced by the mother, who is a party thereto, and for whose benefit it was made.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide event.

Judgment reversed, etc.

STAFF v. BEMIS REALTY CO. ET AL.

(Supreme Court of New York Special Term, New York County, 1920. 111 Misc. Rep. 635, 183 N. Y. Supp. 886.)

Action by John Staff against the Bemis Realty Company, David Rosensweig, and Abraham Finkenthal.

BIJUR, J.† These are cross-motions, one by plaintiff for judgment on the pleadings, and one by the defendant Finkenthal to sustain a demurrer to the complaint, interposed on the ground that the complaint does not set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and that there has been a misjoinder of causes of action. It appears from the complaint that plaintiff on December 21, 1915, rented from defendant corporation for the term of over five years a store in a block of buildings owned by the corporation. The lease contained the following provision:

"And the said party of the second part covenants and agrees to use the said rented premises only for the sale of dry goods and men's and boys' shirts, collars, ties, socks, and handkerchiefs, and the landlord hereby agrees that he will not rent any other store in the block, from Post to Sherman avenues, for the sale of any of the foregoing articles; but it is understood that the tenant takes this lease subject to the provision of the existing leases giving the other tenants the right to sell ladies' waists, dresses, infants' wear, cloaks, suits, ladies' gloves, corsets, and hosiery."

¹⁸ It would seem the sounder view that a wife who has mortgaged her inchoate dower right for her husband is entitled to exoneration by the payment by him of the incumbrance. Gore v. Townsend, 105 N. C. 228 (1890). See also Henagon v. Harlee, 10 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 285 (1858); McCord v. Wright, 97 Md. 34 (1884). Had the New York Court taken that view, it might not have found it difficult to conclude that the defendant's promise was exacted for her benefit as well as the husband's and that the fact that the promise was under seal should not stand in the way of her recovery. In Silver King Coalition Mines Co. of Nevada v. Silver King Consol. Min. Co. of Utah, 294 Fed. 166 (1913), it is said that a creditor beneficiary may recover in equity on a contract whether it was made for his benefit or not. That was said in reference to subrogation, but the right of exoneration conceivably might have been given as favorable a hearing.

This lease was recorded in the register's office January 15, 1916. On March 17, 1919, defendant Finkenthal rented a store from the same landlord in the same block for a term of two years; his lease containing the covenant:

"That the said party of the second part [tenant] further covenants and agrees to use said rented premises only for the sale of ladies' gloves, corsets, and hosiery."

The complaint, after the further allegation that defendant Finkenthal "is now selling goods, to wit, handkerchiefs, boudoir caps, and underwear, not expressly or impliedly permitted in his said lease," all of which articles are alleged to be dry goods, asks that by reason of the absence of an adequate remedy at law the defendants be enjoined from further violation of the exclusive privilege granted to plaintiff herein first above set forth.

First, that "the leases being under seal, no cause of action at law or in equity lies in favor of plaintiff against the defendant Finkenthal." Case v. Case, 203 N. Y. 263, 96 N. E. 440, Ann. Cas. 1913 B 311, is cited as authority for this proposition. The opinion in that case, however, indicates plainly, both by its language and by its reference to Briggs v. Partridge, 64 N. Y. 357, 21 Am. Rep. 617, that what was there decided was that an instrument under seal cannot be enforced by a stranger not mentioned in it on the theory that he is a party to it, as, for example, an undisclosed principal. Reference is made in the opinion, however, to the theory that the plaintiff might have enforced the contract as one "made for his benefit," and the distinction mentioned by Andrews, J., in Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, 32 N. E. 49, is emphasized to the effect that: "It is not sufficient that the performance of the covenant may benefit a third person. It must have been entered into for his benefit, or at least such benefit must be the direct result of performance and so within the contemplation of the parties," etc. The mere fact, therefore, that the lease of the defendant Finkenthal is under seal is no reason why a covenant therein may not be enforced by the plaintiff, provided it comes within the distinction pointed out by Judge Andrews of covenants so enforceable. There is ample authority for the application of the doctrine of Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, to instruments under seal as well as to unsealed instruments. Burr v. Beers, 24 N. Y. 180, 80 Am. Dec. 327, and the numerous cases which have followed it.¹⁹ It seems to me, however, that if he relied upon the doctrine announced in Burr v. Beers plaintiff must necessarily be impaled upon the other horn of the dilemma, namely, that he is joining the defendant Finkenthal in a cause of action upon the restrictive covenant in Finkenthal's lease with a cause of action against defendant Rosensweig upon a similar covenant in Rosensweig's lease which contains different terms made under different circumstances and at a different period (which, by the way, happens to be long before the execution of plaintiff's lease). Plaintiff does not satisfactorily meet this difficulty by urging that his cause of action depends upon his own lease, for, if the doctrine of Lawrence v. Fox be invoked by him at all, it can only be in reference to the respective leases of Finkenthal and Rosensweig. I think, however, that the plaintiff has an undoubted cause of action in equity to enforce an incumbrance placed by the landlord upon his own property for plaintiff's express benefit, or, as it is sometimes termed, to avail of an equitable servitude in his favor. This right has received conscious judicial recognition since Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774 (1884), and has been enforced in innumerable cases in this state, for example, Booth v. Knipe, 225 N. Y. 390, 122 N. E. 202; Korn v. Campbell, 192 N. Y. 490, 85 N. E. 687, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1, 127 Am. St. Rep. 925; Flynn v. New York, W. & B. R. Co., 218 N. Y. 140, 112 N. E. 913, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 599; Bull v. Burton, 227 N. Y. 101, 124 N. E. 111, and the cases there cited.

It is foreign to the present purpose to analyze the basis of the plaintiff's right, namely, whether it be contractual or founded upon the theory of a servitude enforceable in equity at the instance of the complainant. See article on the Progress of the Law, subtitle "Equitable Servitudes," by Prof. Roscoe Pound, in the Harvard Law Review for April, 1920, at page 813. Suffice it that the right is recognized and enforced in our courts, and has, indeed, been applied without question, or even discussion, in a case practically on all fours with the instant case, namely, Waldorf-Astoria Segar Co. v. Salomon, 109 App. Div. 65, 95 N. Y. Supp. 1053, affirmed on opinion below 184 N. Y. 584, 77 N. E. 1197. If, upon minute analysis, any point of distinction can be found between the two cases, it is only that, as the opinion there mentions, the real defendant, the Acker, Merrall & Condit Company, had actual notice of the plaintiff's privilege, namely, the restriction in the use of the premises as against all parties other than the plaintiff.

In the instant case—and passing by the question whether the recording of the plaintiff's lease was not constructive notice to the world of his peculiar rights and the resultant restriction upon others—it is to my mind decisive that plaintiff's equity against defendant is, if I may be permitted the term, even stronger than if the defendant had had actual notice, because the defendant has expressly covenanted to limit his use of the premises, so as not to invade plaintiff's right therein.

The basis of plaintiff's rights, as I have analyzed it, disposes of the second ground of demurrer; i.e., improper joinder of causes of action, because it is clear that plaintiff has but one cause of action to enforce a servitude in his favor against the landlord and all other persons who may be equitably held bound by or subject to it. * * *

Plaintiff's motion is granted, with $10 costs, and defendant's motion is denied, with $10 costs, with leave, however, to demur to withdraw his demurrer, if he be so advised, and answer over within 20 days, upon payment of said costs and the costs of action before trial.

*Ordered accordingly.*²⁰

GIFFORD, AS RECEIVER, ETC., RESPONDENT, v. CORRIGAN, AS EXECUTOR, ETC., APPELLANT.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1889. 117 N. Y. 257, 22 N. E. 756, 6 L. R. A. 610, 15 Am. St. Rep. 508.)

Appeal by defendant Corrigan, as executor of Cardinal John McCloskey, deceased, from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court in the second judicial department, entered upon an order made February 11th, 1889, which affirmed a judgment in favor of plaintiff, entered upon a decision of the court on trial at Special Term.

This action was brought to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendant, the Father Mathew Temperance Society. Defendant Corrigan, as executor, was sought to be charged for any deficiency on sale upon a covenant in a deed of the mortgaged premises executed to his testator by John McEvoy, by the terms of which the grantee assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage.

FINCH, J.²¹ * * * The finding of the Special Term that there was a delivery and acceptance [of the deed to the defendant's testator, McCloskey, by which the grantee assumed the payment of plaintiff's mortgage] * * * must conclude us on this appeal.

But another circumstance introduces an additional defence and raises a further question. Just after the issue of a summons in this action and the filing of a lis pendens, the executor of McEvoy formally released McCloskey from his covenant, and the latter pleads that release. * * * This release was executed after the knowledge of the deed of McCloskey and the covenant contained in it had reached the mortgagee; after the latter had accepted and adopted it as made for his benefit and communicated that fact to the debtor by a formal demand of payment; after the mortgagee had, for three years, permitted the grantee to absorb and appropriate the rents and profits in reliance upon the covenant; and after he had commenced an action for foreclosure by the issue of a summons and filing of a lis pendens, at a moment when the executor who released was aware that trouble was approaching, but before McCloskey was actually served or had appeared in the action.

²⁰But in University Club v. Deakin, 265 Ill. 257 (1914), there is a dictum contra to the right of the one lessee to sue the other on the latter's sealed contract with the landlord, under circumstances similar to those in the principal case. See 10 Ill. L. Rev. 61.

Is this release thus executed a defence to this action? I shall not undertake to decide, if, indeed, the question is open (Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. v. Nelson, 78 N. Y. 137; Comley v. Dazian, 114 N. Y. 161, 167), whether in the interval between the making of the contract and the acceptance and adoption of it by the mortgagee it was or was not revocable without his assent. However that may be, the only inquiry now presented is, whether it is so revocable after it has come to the knowledge of the creditor, and he has assented to it and adopted it as a security for his own benefit. My judgment leads me to answer that question in the negative.

Of course it is difficult, if not impossible, to reason about it without recurring to Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, and ascertaining the principle upon which its doctrine is founded. That is a difficult task, especially for one whose doubts are only dissipated by its authority, and becomes more difficult when the number and variety of its alleged foundations are considered. But whichever of them may ultimately prevail, I am convinced that they all involve, as a logical consequence, the irrevocable character of the contract after the creditor has accepted and adopted it, and in some manner acted upon it. The prevailing opinion in that case rested the creditor's right upon the broad proposition that the promise was made for his benefit, and, therefore, he might sue upon it, although privy neither to the contract or its consideration. That view of it necessarily involves an acquisition at some moment of time of the right of action which he is permitted to enforce. If it be possible to say that he does not acquire it at a moment when the promise for his benefit is made, it must be that he obtains it when it has come to his knowledge and he has assented to and acted upon it. For he may sue; that is decided and conceded. If he may sue, he must, at that moment, have a vested right of action. If it was not obtained earlier it must have vested in him at the moment when his action was commenced, so that the right and the remedy were born at the same instant. But there is no especial magic in a law suit. If it serves for the first time to originate the right which it seeks to enforce, it can only be because the act of bringing it shows unequivocally that the promise of the grantee has come to the knowledge of the plaintiff, that the latter has accepted and adopted it, that he intends to enforce it for his own benefit, and gives notice of that intention to the adversary. From that moment he must be assumed to act or omit to act in reliance upon it. But if all these things occur before a suit commenced, why do they not equally vest the right of action in the assignee? What more does the mere lawsuit accomplish? And so the contract between grantor and grantee, if revocable earlier, ceases to be so when by his assent to it and adoption of it the creditor brings himself into privity with it and elects to avail himself of it, and must be assumed to have governed his conduct accordingly. I see no escape from that conclusion.

But two of the judges who concurred in the decision of Lawrence v. Fox stood upon a different proposition. They held that the mortgagor granting the land accepted the grantee's covenant, as agent of the mortgagee who might ratify the act with the same effect as if he had originally authorized it. While I think the idea of such an agency is a legal fiction, having no warrant in the facts, yet the same result as to the power of revocation follows. While the agency remained unauthorized it might be possible to change the transaction, but after the ratification the promise necessarily becomes one made to the mortgagee, through his agent, the mortgagor, acting lawfully in his behalf, and from that moment cannot be altered or released without his sanction and consent.

But another basis for the action has been asserted, applicable however, only to cases like the present, where, on foreclosure of the mortgage, its owner seeks a judgment for a deficiency against the new covenantor. In Burr v. Beers, 24 N. Y. 179, and again in Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 242, it was pointed out that the liability of the grantee to the mortgagee rested upon the equitable right of subrogation, and had been recognized and enforced long before Lawrence v. Fox made its appearance. It was held that where the mortgagor acquired a new security for his indemnity against the debt which he owed to the mortgagee, the latter might, in equity, be subrogated to the right of his debtor, and, under the statute permitting any person liable for the mortgage debt to be made defendant and charged with a deficiency in the foreclosure, the new covenant became available to the mortgagee. It was so held in Halsey v. Reed, 9 Paige, 446, and the right of the mortgagee was put upon the equity of the statute. That, if a sound proposition, was all very well so long as there was supposed to be no equivalent remedy at law, but after the decision of Lawrence v. Fox that remedy existed. And so in Thorp v. Keokuk Coal Company, 48 N. Y. 258, the court said that it saw no reason for invoking the doctrine of equitable subrogation, or resting upon it in such a case. When the law has absorbed, in a broader equity, the narrow one enforced in chancery, the form and measure of the latter ceases to be of consequence. One does not seek to trace the river after it has lost itself in the lake. And so I think the suggestion is well founded. But if I am wrong about that, as, perhaps I may prove to be, and the right of the present plaintiff against the Cardinal's estate does stand upon the doctrine of equitable subrogation, still I think the same result follows. When does that equitable right arise and become vested in the creditor? It would seem that it must be when the situation is created out of which the equity is born. If it be possible to adjourn to a later period, it must certainly attach when the creditor asserts his right to it and notifies the other party of his intention to rely upon it. As a right, founded upon the equity of the statute, it must have come into being before the foreclosure suit was commenced, for the permission reads, "any person who is liable to the plaintiff for the payment of the debt secured by the mortgage may be made a defendant in the action." His liability must precede the commencement of the action. It must exist as a condition of his being sued at all; and so, assuming that this action can be maintained against him upon his promise, the right of action must have arisen at once upon the delivery of the deed, or at the latest when the promise came to the knowledge of the creditor, and he assented to and adopted it.

I have been quite favorably impressed with a fourth suggestion respecting the basis of these rights of action which appears in the opinion of Andrews, J., rendered when this case was before us on a previous appeal. "After all," he says, "does not the direct right of action rest upon the equity of the transaction?" If we discard the fictitious theory of an agency, what remains is the equitable right of subrogation swallowed up in the greater equity of the legal right founded on the theory of a promise made for the benefit of the creditor. It is no new thing for the law to borrow weapons from the arsenal of equity. The action for money had and received is a familiar illustration. May we not deem this another? If we do, and the door is thus opened wide to equitable considerations, I am quite sure it will follow that while no right of the mortgagee is invaded by a change of the contract before it is brought to his knowledge, and he has assented to it and acted upon it, yet to permit a change thereafter, while the creditor is relying upon it would be grossly inequitable and practically destroy the right which has maintained itself after so long a struggle.

It seems to me, therefore, that however we may reasonably differ as to the doctrine underlying the plaintiff's right of action, yet all the roads lead to the one result that upon the facts of this case the release to McCloskey was wholly ineffectual.

The judgment should be affirmed with costs.

All concur except DANFORTH and PECKHAM, JJ., dissenting.

*Judgment affirmed.*²²

²² "Cases are cited to the effect that the mortgagor may release his grantee from his promise to pay the debt of the mortgagee at any time before such mortgagee brings suit to enforce the promise. The cases referred to proceed upon the grounds that the promise of the grantee is made to his grantor, and not to the mortgagee, and that the latter has no interest in the promise until he assents to and relies upon the promise, and such acceptance is manifested by bringing suit to enforce the promise; or they proceed, in other cases, upon the theory that by relying on or accepting the promise of the grantee to the mortgagor, the mortgagee releases the mortgagor, and accepts his grantee as his debtor; and there is still another theory, and that is, that the promise by the grantee is in the nature of an indemnity to the mortgagor, and under either of these theories the mortgagor may surrender or release the indemnity, or release the grantee from his promise before it is accepted, or before the

TWEEDDALE v. TWEEDDALE ET AL.

Action by Edward Tweeddale against Daniel Tweeddale and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Action to foreclose a mortgage. The facts admitted by the pleadings and found by the court are as follows: October 21, 1896, Mary Tweeddale owned certain land constituting her homestead. She conveyed the same to her son, the defendant Daniel Tweeddale, taking therefor a bond for her support. Said parties thereafter united in conveying the land to one Perry. In consideration therefor, in part, he conveyed the land covered by the mortgage in suit, to Mr. Tweeddale. Such land was then incumbered by a mortgage, and a second mortgage was placed thereon by the grantee to the grantor. In lieu of the interest which Mary Tweeddale had in the land conveyed to Perry, her son gave to her a bond for support, and secured the same by the mortgage in suit upon the land conveyed by Perry to her. The indebtedness was $1,350. It was conditioned, among other things, that in case Tweeddale should at any time sell the land or any portion thereof covered by the mortgage, $1,200 should immediately become due from him to his mother, $50 should likewise become due his sister, Margaret Merverden, and $100 to his brother, Edward Tweeddale. The mortgage specified that it was given to secure all the obligations and conditions of the bond. It was executed and acknowledged so as to entitle it to be recorded under the registry laws mortgagor is released from the debt by the mortgagee. This court has never recognized either of these theories as the law. It has ever been held by this court that such a promise inures to the benefit of the person for whose benefit it is made, and the right to sue is vested in him by force of the agreement itself. It has never been held by this court that the express assent of the beneficiary is essential to his right to avail of its benefits; nor has it been held, to have force as an agreement to the person in whose favor it was made he must discharge his debtor, and accept the maker of the new promise as his debtor. On the contrary, it was held in Dean v. Walker [107 Ill. 540], supra, that the mortgagee might sue either the mortgagor or his grantee assuming to pay the debt. Nor has it been held that the promise of the grantee to the mortgagor is a mere indemnity of the latter against the payment of the mortgage. On the contrary, this court has uniformly held that the beneficiary may sue at law, which repudiates the doctrine of indemnity, as the person for whose benefit the promise is made can never reach an indemnity or security given to his debtor but in chancery, and then only when his debtor is insolvent, or on some other equitable grounds. The principle upon which this court has acted is that such a promise invests the person for whose use it is made with an immediate interest and right, as though the promise had been made to him. This being true, the person who procures the promise has no legal right to release or discharge the person who made the promise, from his liability to the beneficiary. Having the right, it is under the sole control of the person for whose benefit it is made—as much so as if made directly to him." Walker, J., in Bay v. Williams, 112 Ill. 91, 95-97 (1884).

of this state, and was duly recorded. The land covered by the mortgage passed under the control of Daniel Tweeddale, and the bond and mortgage, when executed, were delivered to his mother. Subsequently the condition mentioned in the bond, making operative the promise to pay $1,200 to Mrs. Tweeddale, $50 to her daughter and $100 to her son, who is the plaintiff in this action, was satisfied by Daniel Tweeddale selling the land covered by the mortgage, to John Paul. At the time of such sale the claim of Mary Tweeddale under the bond was settled and paid at $686. She thereupon, in form, fully satisfied the mortgage by signing the usual memorandum to that effect in the margin of the record thereof. Plaintiff did not give her any authority to satisfy the mortgage as to his interest therein. Being unable to obtain payment of the sum secured to him by the mortgage, he commenced this action to foreclose the same. Neither he nor his sister knew that the bond and mortgage made any provision for them till after the mortgage was discharged.

In the nature of conclusions of law, the court made findings to the effect that provisions in the bond and mortgage as to plaintiff and his sister, under the circumstances existing at the time the mortgage was discharged, were mere incomplete gifts, subject to be recalled by Mrs. Tweeddale, and that she then recalled them. All matters of fact not specifically mentioned, entitling plaintiff to the relief prayed for in his complaint if the interest in form secured to him by the bond and mortgage vested in him beyond the control of his mother upon the execution and delivery of the papers to her, were found by the court or admitted by the pleadings.

The court held as a matter of law that plaintiff had no cause of action, and ordered the complaint dismissed with costs. Judgment was entered accordingly.

MARSHALL, J.²³ The agreement by Daniel Tweeddale to pay plaintiff $100 and his sister $50, as part of the consideration for the property which came to him from his mother, stands upon the same footing as any promise made by one person to another, for a consideration, for the benefit of a third person. As soon as the title to the land was vested in Daniel Tweeddale and the bond and mortgage were delivered to his mother, he became obligated to pay to them that part of the consideration for the land represented by the sums secured to his brother and sister, if the principle controls that a grantor of land becomes obligated to pay the whole or a part of the consideration for the property conveyed to him to a stranger to the transaction if it is left in his hands for that purpose, and upon his promise to make such payment. We apprehend the trial court so viewed the matter. Notwithstanding the finding that the sum secured to appellant and that secured to his sister were mere gifts, the turning point in the case, in the mind of the circuit judge, we apprehend, was that the beneficiaries did not know of the agreement and did not accept the same or in any way become parties thereto till their mother, with the consent of Daniel Tweeddale, rescinded the transaction. An agreement by one person, upon a good consideration, to pay his debt to another by paying the same to a third person, is just as binding where there is no consideration for the promise between the immediate promisee and the third person as where there is such consideration. Whether the benefit secured to the third person is a gift, strictly so called, or one intended when realized, to discharge some liability of such promise to the third person does not change the situation. It is the exchange of promises between the immediate parties, and the operation of law thereon, that binds the promisor to the third person. The idea which ruled this case,—that where a person for a consideration paid to him by another agrees to pay a sum of money to a third person, a stranger to the transaction, the latter does not thereby become possessed of the absolute right to the benefit of the promise, nor until he accepts the same in some way; and that while he is ignorant of the promise, or thereafter, at any time before he assents to the transaction, it may be rescinded,—we must admit is well supported in the books. The authorities so holding, in the main, go upon the ground that privity between parties is absolutely essential to a liability of one to another of a contractual nature, and that until the third person brings himself into privity with the one who has promised to be his debtor by at least assenting thereto, he has at least no legal right to the benefit of the promise; and that, till then, the parties to the transaction may rescind it or change it as they see fit. There is also much authority to the effect that, while the element of privity between the promisor and the third person is essential to render the promise absolutely binding upon the former, no act of the latter is necessary thereto; that the law, operating upon the acts of the parties to the transaction, creates the privity immediately upon its being consummated between them, and that neither one nor both of them can thereafter, without the third person's consent, enforce the promise. The first class of authorities is well represented by the following: Trimble v. Strother, 25 Ohio St. 378; Brewer v. Maurer, 38 Ohio St. 543, 43 Am. Rep. 436; Crowell v. Hospital, 27 N. J. Eq. 650; Durham v. Bischof, 47 Ind. 211; Davis v. Calloway, 30 Ind. 112, 95 Am. Dec. 671; White v. Hunt, 64 N. C. 496. The second class of authorities is fairly well represented by the following: Bay v. Williams, 112 Ill. 91, 54 Am. Rep. 209; Dean v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 467; Hare v. Murphy, 45 Neb. 809, 64 N. W. 211, 29 L. R. A. 851; Graves v. Macfarland, 58 Neb. 802, 79 N. W. 707; Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. 337; Mallett v. Page, 8 Ind. 364; Henderson v. McDonald, 84 Ind. 149; Pruitt v. Pruitt, 91 Ind. 595; Rodenbarger v. Bramblett, 78 Ind. 213; Frank v. Railroad Co., 7 N. Y. St. Rep. 814; Esling v. Zantlinger, 13 Pa. 50.

It is useless to endeavor to review the authorities touching the subject before us with a view of harmonizing them upon any one single theory as to the principle upon which the liability to the third person is based, or as to what are the essential elements to effect it. There is as much confusion, probably, in the judicial holdings in respect to the matter, as on any question of law that can be mentioned. As indicated there are authorities to the effect that there is no absolute liability to the third person till in some way he is brought into privity with the promisor. Others are to the effect that such privity is entirely unnecessary. Others, as we have indicated, hold that while the element of privity is necessary, the law creates it, no act of the third party being necessary thereto. There are others to the effect that there is no liability at law without the element of privity between the promisor and the third person, hence if he has a right to enforce the promise the remedy is in equity unless he can show that he adopted the promise made for his benefit so as to become a party thereto. There are many other phases of the question that find support in the books. The liability is sustained in some cases under the doctrine of novation, and held not to exist in the absence of any of the elements necessary to satisfy the law on that subject. In other cases it is held that there is no principle of subrogation or novation involved in the liability; that it rests solely upon and is fixed absolutely by the transaction between the person making the promise and receiving the consideration and the person to whom the promise is made and from whom the consideration moves. There is confusion not only between different courts, but confusion in the decisions in many jurisdictions in the same court. The supreme court of Illinois, in Bay v. Williams, supra, speaking on the subject, correctly described the situation in the following language:

"The courts are not harmonious,—not even the courts in the same states,—and it may be added that the cases are not capable of being reconciled. * * * On the mere authority of adjudged cases in other tribunals, we would have to vacillate to keep in line."

The extent to which the first class of cases we have mentioned goes in one direction is indicated by the following from the syllabus of Trimble v. Strother, supra:

"In an action to recover a debt which the defendant agreed with a third party to pay the plaintiff, it is a good defense to show that before the plaintiff assented to or acted on the promise made in his favor, the agreement had been rescinded."

The sharp conflict between the two principal classes of cases is well indicated by reading in connection with that quotation the following from the syllabus of Bay v. Williams, supra:

"A purchaser of mortgaged premises from the mortgagor, who assumes payment of the mortgage debt, or who accepts a conveyance reciting his assumption of the same with a knowledge of such recital, will at once become personally liable to the mortgagee for the mortgage indebtedness; and he cannot defeat the mortgagee's right to hold him responsible, by procuring a release from the mortgagor."

It is believed that this court is committed to that doctrine, though it must be admitted that there are expressions in several opinions that may well be taken as indicating either a contrary view or that it is uncertain just what the rule here is on the subject. * * * Without further discussion of the matter we adhere to the doctrine that where one person, for a consideration moving to him from another, promises to pay to a third person a sum of money, the law immediately operates upon the acts of the parties, establishing the essential of privity between the promisor and the third person requisite to binding contractual relations between them, resulting in the immediate establishment of a new relation of debtor and creditor, regardless of the relations of the third person to the immediate promise in the transaction; that the liability is as binding between the promisor and the third person as it would be if the consideration for the promise moved from the latter to the former and such promisor made the promise directly to such third person, regardless of whether the latter has any knowledge of the transaction at the time of its occurrence; that the liability being once created by the acts of the immediate parties to the transaction and the operation of the law thereon, neither one nor both of such parties can thereafter change the situation as regards the third person without his consent. It is plainly illogical to hold that immediately upon the completion of the transaction between the immediate parties thereto, the law operates upon their acts and creates the element of privity between the promisor and the third person, and at the same time to hold that such third person's status as regards the promise may be changed thereafter without his consent. The idea that privity between the promisor and the third person is necessary to render the transaction between the original parties thereto beyond the reach of either of them to revoke it, or both acting together to rescind it, springs from the supposed necessity of contractual relations between the promisor and the third person, binding upon the promisor at law. The moment such essential is established, it seems clear that such third person's right accrues and becomes absolute.

True, the doctrine that the element of privity may be established without the knowledge or assent of the third person, other than that constructive assent arising from the operation of law upon the acts of the parties, is inconsistent with the rule prevailing here as to all but married women, that a mere beneficiary of a policy of life insurance has no vested rights therein; but so is the doctrine that mere assent by a third person to a promise made for his benefit will render it irrevocable, inconsistent therewith. Neither the assent of a mere beneficiary in a policy of life insurance, to the promise made for his benefit, nor such assent coupled with an independent promise by the insurance company to him to abide thereby, has any effect upon the power of the assured to control the policy by changing the beneficiary or disposing of the insurance fund by will. The doctrine here in that regard was established at an early day. It is contrary to the rule which prevails generally. It is adhered to under the rule of stare decisis, and the doctrine that rules of property established by judicial decisions long adhered to should not be disturbed even if a different decision would be rendered if the court were permitted to treat the subject from an original standpoint. The rule as to insurance contracts has not been applied by this court to any other class of contracts. The court is not disposed to treat it as a principle of general application or extend it beyond the special class of contracts to which it has been applied.

In view of what has been said we must hold that, upon the sale of the land to Paul, Daniel Tweeddale became absolutely indebted to plaintiff upon the bond and mortgage mentioned in the complaint for the sum of $100; that the satisfaction of the mortgage by Mary Tweeddale is void as regards such debt; that his interest in the bond and mortgage was sufficiently brought home to Daniel Tweeddale's grantee, Paul, by the record of the mortgage, to preclude him from being an innocent party to the void satisfaction and successfully invoking the registry laws for protection.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded with directions to render judgment in favor of plaintiff in accordance with this opinion.²⁴

²⁴ In Wetnutsche v. Wetnutsche, 158 Wis. 305 (1914) where somewhat similar facts existed and one of the plaintiffs recovered despite the attempted rescission, Timlin, J., in dissenting said: "In this case I dissent from the conclusion that the promisor and promisee, in a contract executory on the part of the promisor, but executed on the part of the promisee, which contract contains a promise to pay a sum of money to a third person who parted with no consideration, cannot, while the contract remains executory and unperformed on the part of the promisor, rescind that contract and return the consideration to the promisee without the assent of such third person and without the aid of a court. In Tweeddale v. Tweeddale, 116 Wis. 517, the contract had been executed according to its terms between the immediate parties thereto, and to say the least the rule of that case should not be extended. Suppose the rule of the majority opinion in this case were applied in a case like Dilger v. McQuade, post [158 Wis.] p. 328, [where the provision was to leave a legacy], if the immediate parties had attempted a rescission?"

Professor Williston is in favor of treating the case of the sole beneficiary as one where the beneficiary's right is irrevocable as soon as the contract for his benefit is made, subject only to disclaimer by him (1 Williston on Contracts § 396), but the case of the creditor beneficiary as one where the right is revocable except where the promisee's revocation of it as a gift to the promisor leaves him with insufficient means to pay his debts (Id., § 397). He concedes, however, that the cases in general do not distinguish between sole beneficiaries and creditor beneficiaries as regards this matter (Id. § 396b). At some stage each kind of beneficiary gets an irrevocable right, and the question is merely whether he gets it immediately upon the making of the contract, (Waterman v. Morgan, 114 Md. 237 (1887); Starbird v. Cranston, 24 Colo. 20 (1897); Bay v. Williams, 112 Ill. 91 (1884); Tweeddale v. Tweeddale, the principal case), or when he first hears of it and does not dissent (Hill v. Hoeldtke, 104 Tex. 594 (1912)), or when he expressly assents (Gifford v. Corrigan, ante, p. 627), or when he acts upon the promise made for his benefit, People's Bank and Trust

ROOKWOOD'S CASE.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1589-1590. Cro. Eliz. 164.)

Rookwood having issue three sons, had an intent to charge his land with four pounds per annum to each of his two youngest sons for their

Co. v. Weldinger, 73 N. J. L. 433 (1906); Crowell v. Hospital, 27 N. J. Eq. 152, 650 (1876); Wood v. Moriarty, reported post p. 639.

In Hartman v. Pistorius, 248 Ill. 568 (1911) plaintiff in a suit to foreclose a chattel mortgage on standing timber joined as defendants certain persons alleged to have assumed and agreed in writing, for a valuable consideration, to pay the mortgage debt, in order that plaintiff might hold those defendants for any deficiency. It was shown that those defendants made a contract with Brown & Osby, to whom the mortgaged timber had been conveyed and who had assumed the mortgage, that Brown & Osby would pay defendants $350 in cash and convey to them the mortgaged property, subject to the mortgage, which the defendants agreed to pay, and the defendants would convey to Brown & Osby certain other land, also subject to a mortgage which Brown & Osby assumed. Two months later, nothing having been done under the contract, it was abandoned by mutual consent of Brown & Osby and of the defendants, Brown & Osby, under a new agreement, paying $50.00 and defendants quitclaiming to Brown & Osby the property they were to convey. The plaintiff in the foreclosure suit did not change his position in any particular and did not even notify any of the parties of his willingness that the contract should be carried out. Cartwright, J., said that "the parties were as free to cancel and abandon the contract as they had been to enter into it. * * * The parties were not bargaining for promises but for conveyances (Tyler v. Young, 2 Scam. 444; Mason v. Wait, 4 id. 127; Davis v. McVickers, 11 Ill. 327; Thompson v. Shoemaker, 68 id. 256). The plaintiffs in error [defendants] were under no greater obligation to pay the mortgage debt than any other person would have been who had an option on the timber subject to the assumption of the mortgage debt" (p. 573).

It has been suggested that Hartman v. Pistorius cannot be supported if a creditor beneficiary is deemed to have "an irrevocable right either immediately or as soon as he knows of the promise." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 397, p. 744, n. 15. But that depends, in part, on the remedies to be allowed a beneficiary. In any case where the beneficiary proceeds in chancery for specific performance, a holding that the promisor may be discharged by the promisee without the consent of the beneficiary is of course a denial of the latter's irrevocable right; but in any case where the remedy resorted to by the beneficiary is an action at law for damages, the promisor may well have the defense to the beneficiary's action that his promise was conditioned on the performance to come from the promisee and, as that is not going to be forthcoming, as the rescission agreement shows, it is not fair or possible to make the promisor perform. The beneficiary cannot hold the defendant on the theory that he has prevented performance and thereby dispensed with the condition, if the obligation of the promisor to the promisee justifies such prevention. It is theoretically possible to deny the right of the promisee to discharge a promisor from an unconditional promise for the benefit of another and yet, as far as recovery at law is concerned, permit the promisee to arrange with the promisor not to perform some condition precedent or concurrent to the promisor's duty to pay the beneficiary. Probably, if equity is applied to, where a contract is specifically enforceable, it will nevertheless compel the promisee to perform the condition and the promisor to pay the beneficiary, but at law that need not be so. Hartman v.

lives; but the eldest desired him not to charge the land, and promised to pay to them duly the four pounds per annum; to which the two younger sons, being present, agreed; and he promised to them to pay it. And for non-payment after the death of the father, they brought an assumpsit. The whole court held clearly, that it was well brought, and that it was a good consideration; for otherwise his land had been charged with the rents.²⁵

Pistorius, supra, was similar to a decision at law, in that specific performance, which would have necessitated a payment of $300 more by the promisee to the promisor, was not asked, and it is by no means clear that the holding is not justified by National Bank v. Grand Lodge, reported ante p. 603. The question in a case like Hartman v. Pistorius is whether the defendant should be made to pay, even though he is not to get what was to be his recompense for paying, since the reason why he does not get that recompense is that he has consented not to receive it in return for a discharge by the promisee of his obligation to pay. In National Bank v. Grand Lodge, ante, of course, the breach of condition was not condoned; but still the question in both the cases is whether the plaintiff shall be paid, although express or implied conditions precedent or concurrent affecting such payment are not complied with. Compare 1 Williston on Contracts, § 395. May not the defendant in Hartman v. Pistorius well say, "The rescission of this contract by the promisee and myself was to be total and the beneficiary cannot set it aside in part. If it is to be set aside, my performance becomes again conditional and the beneficiary cannot recover except on that basis?" It certainly would seem as if, were specific performance sought, the chancellor would agree with the defendant, and would condition relief against the defendant accordingly. If he would, Hartman v. Pistorius may be justified on the ground that specific performance was not sought, without in the least impairing the doctrine that the creditor beneficiary's right is irrevocable. Even irrevocable rights may be subject to conditions precedent or concurrent to their enforcement and may be fully enforceable only by a resort to a special kind of procedure. While there is language in Hartman v. Pistorius (see quotation supra), denying that the right is irrevocable, the actual decision can be supported without subscribing to that language.

²⁵ In Preston v. Preston, (Mich.) 172 N. W. 371 (1919), reaffirmed on rehearing in 175 N. W. 266 (1919), where a daughter was suing a father on an agreement by the father with the mother, that as long as he lived he would support the daughter, who was blind and otherwise physically incapacitated to care for herself, the court in the original opinion allowed the plaintiff to recover as a beneficiary on the theory that a procedural statute had changed the Michigan rule that such a beneficiary could not recover; but on rehearing the court found that the promise of the father to the mother was made in the daughter's presence and hearing, that in effect the promise of the father was made directly to her, and that she was a party to the contract entitled as such to recover.

In Rector, etc., of St. Mark's Church v. Teed, 120 N. Y. 583 (1890), where one Thomas Wright abandoned a contest of a will in consideration of defendant's promise to pay St. Mark's Church $500 and gave St. Mark's Church a written promise to pay that sum, Vann, J., for the court, in holding in favor of plaintiff's right to recover, said:

"If the form of the promise had been to pay directly to Thomas Wright, no reason is perceived why it could not have been enforced. As the arrangement was made with him, and the consideration was furnished by him, the fact that the money was made payable by his direction to the plaintiff does

DURFEE, C. J.²⁶ This is assumpsit for the price of lumber furnished to one Joshua W. Tibbetts for use in the erection of two houses for the defendant, Tibbetts having entered into a written contract with the defend-not render the promise void. The plaintiff became his appointee, and upon receiving from him the written agreement, or evidence of the promise, it became his donee; and thus privity was established between the parties to the action. This is not the case of a mere stranger who attempts to intervene, and claim the benefit of a contract to which he is not a party, as in many of the authorities relied on by the appellant, because the promise was made directly to the plaintiff, and there was a clear intention on the part of the person furnishing the consideration to secure a benefit to the plaintiff. If the sum in question had been made payable to Thomas Wright, he could have given the claim to the plaintiff, whose title would thus have been perfect; and why could he not make the gift by causing the promise to be made directly to the plaintiff? The intention of the parties should not be defeated by releasing the defendant from his promise, after he had received the consideration therefor, simply on account of the form of the transaction, which violates no statute, nor any rule of public policy.

"If A sells a horse to B for $100, and B gives in payment therefor a note for that amount drawn payable to C at A's request, and A delivers the note to C, the latter can enforce it against the maker. The case supposed differs in no essential particular from that under consideration."

Massachusetts treats a contract made by a parent to name his child for the promisor in return for the latter's promise to provide for the child as a contract made between the child and the promisor through the agency of the parent, with consideration moving from the child. Gardner v. Denison, 217 Mass. 492 (1914). See Eaton v. Libby, 165 Mass. 218 (1896), where, however, the note given by the promisor was made payable to the infant.

But the English court is becoming committed to the doctrine—some say it is already committed to it—that even a party cannot recover on a contract unless consideration moved from him. West Yorkshire Darracq Agency, Ltd. v. Coleridge, [1911] 2 K. B. 326, indeed, took the view of Rookwood's Case, but Dunlop, etc. Co. v. Selfridge & Co. [1915] A. C. 847, though an undisclosed principal case and not strictly on all fours with these other cases, contains such emphatic language that it is generally taken as settling the English law. In that case, [1915] A. C. 847, at p. 853, Viscount Haldane, L. C., said:

"My Lords, in the law of England certain principles are fundamental. One is that only a person who is a party to a contract can sue on it. Our law knows nothing of a jus quaesitum tertio arising by way of contract. Such a right may be conferred by way of property, as for example, under a trust, but it cannot be conferred on a stranger to a contract as a right to enforce the contract in personam. A second principle is that if a person with whom a contract not under seal has been made is to be able to enforce it, consideration must have been given by him to the promisor or to some other person at the promisor's request. These two principles are not recognized in the same fashion by the jurisprudence of certain continental countries or of Scotland, but here ant to build the houses before the lumber was furnished. Tibbetts, after going on for a while in the execution of the contract, released it or assigned it to the defendant by an instrument under seal. * * * At the trial testimony was introduced, or offered, to prove the purchase of the lumber, the execution of the release or assignment; that the defendant, besides paying the consideration recited therein, agreed, by way of further consideration, to pay all bills incurred by Tibbetts on account of the contract released; that among these bills was the bill of the plaintiffs for lumber; and that notice of the arrangement between Tibbetts and the defendant was given by Tibbetts to the plaintiffs. The testimony as to the agreement to pay the bills incurred by Tibbetts was allowed to go in de bene esse, and at the close of the testimony for the plaintiffs the court directed a nonsuit. The plaintiffs petition for a new trial. The questions are whether the plaintiffs were entitled to prove by oral testimony that the defendant agreed to pay the bills incurred by Tibbetts under his contract, by way of further consideration for the release or assignment, and, if so, whether, upon proof thereof, the plaintiffs could maintain their action. * * *

The defendant contends that the agreement was within the statute of frauds, being an agreement not in writing to answer for the debt of another. But an agreement to answer for the debt of another, to come within the statute of frauds, must be an agreement with the creditor. A promise by A to B to pay a debt due from B to C is not within the statute of frauds. Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Adol. & E. 438; Browne, St. Frauds, § 188. The contract here, as made between Tibbetts and the defendant, was certainly not within the statute. The question therefore takes this form, namely, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to take advantage of the contract, and bring suit upon or under it; and, if so, whether to such suit the statute is not a good defense. Some of the cases cited for the plaintiffs cover both these points completely. Barker v. Bucklin, 2 Denio, 45; Johnson v. Knapp, 36 Iowa, 616; Barker v. Bradley, 42 N. Y. 316, 1 Amer. Rep. 521; Beasley v. Webster, 64 Ill. 458; Jordan v. White, 20 Minn. 91 (Gil. 77); Joslin v. New Jersey Car-Spring Co., 36 N. J. Law, 141; Townsend v. Long, 77 Pa. St. 143, 146. Similar citations they are well established. A third proposition is that a principal not named in the contract may sue upon it if the promisee really contracted as his agent. But again, in order to entitle him so to sue, he must have given consideration either personally or through the promisee, acting as his agent in giving it."

In Palmer Savings Bank v. Insurance Co. of North America, 166 Mass. 189, 195-6 (1896), Field, C. J., said: "While in this commonwealth the rule is held strictly that no one can sue or be sued on a simple contract who is not a party to it, either disclosed or undisclosed, yet it is not in all cases necessary that the consideration should move from the promisee to the promisor, in the ordinary sense of those words. In a novation, no consideration moves from the promisee directly to the promisor. An assignee of a non-negotiable debt must sue in the name of the assignor, unless the debtor has promised to pay it to the assignee; but if there is such a promise, the assignee can sue in his own name, although no consideration for this promise moves directly from the promisee to the promisor."

might be multiplied if we cared to load our opinion with them. See Browne, St. Frauds, § 166a, 166, and notes. On the other hand, the cases are numerous which hold that such an action is not maintainable for want of privity between the parties. Mr. Browne, in section 166a, says that this is the settled doctrine in England, Michigan, and Connecticut; that in North Carolina and Tennessee the question seems to remain open; and that in Massachusetts the English doctrine seems to be growing in favor contrary to the earlier cases; but that in the other states the creditor's right to sue has been generally recognized. The course of decisions in this state favors the creditor's right to sue, and in principle we think recognizes it, though it has not hitherto extended to a purely oral contract. Urquhart v. Brayton, 12 R. I. 169; Merriman v. Social Manuf'g Co., Id. 175. Courts that allow the action generally hold that it is not affected by the statute of frauds, though, as Mr. Browne remarks, they do not unite in the reasons which they give for so holding.²⁷ Mr. Browne himself suggests that the contract, as between the creditor and promisor, arises by implication out of the duty of the promisor under his contract with the debtor, and that being implied, it is not within the statute of frauds. Browne, St. Frauds, § 166b. The view accords with the doctrine of Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. 337, where the court remark (page 340) "that the law operating on the act of the parties creates the duty, establishes the privity, and implies the promise and obligation, on which the action is founded."

The diversity of decisions shows that the action cannot be maintained without resorting to implications or assumptions, which the courts do not always find it easy to allow, and which they sometimes refuse to allow. It seems to us that we shall best find the grounds, if there are any, on which the action can be maintained, by an analysis or explication of the contract with the debtor. The contract is this: A agrees with B, for a consideration moving from B, to pay to C the debt which B owes to C. The contract is absolute. If A does not pay the debt, and B has to pay, it is broken. It is therefore a contract by A to pay the debt in lieu of B, or in relief of B; to take it on himself, and become so far as he can, independently of C, the debtor of C in place of B. The contract, as between A and B, is not collateral but substitutional. But this being so, how does C, who is not a party to it, get the right to sue A upon or by reason of it? It has been held that he gets this right directly from the contract itself, because B, in making it with A, makes it for C, if C desires to accede to it, as well as for himself, so that C has only to ratify or assent to it, which he does unequivocally by suing on it, in order to become a party to it. But in this view, if C accepts the contract, he must accept it as made; that is, as a contract by which A agrees that he, instead of B, will pay the debt which B owes to C. C cannot at the same time assent to the contract and dissent from the terms of it. Accordingly, if he sues A on the contract, he must sue him instead of B, and cannot also sue B, and B is therefore released. But, as we have seen, another view has been taken. It has been held that the contract between A and B imposes a duty upon A to pay to C the debt which D owes to him, and that from this duty the law implies a promise by A in favor of C to pay B's debt to C. But if a promise is implied from the duty, the promise must correspond to the duty. The duty which the contract imposes upon A is that he, instead of B, shall pay the debt which B owes to C, and, accordingly, so must be the promise to be implied from it. If, therefore, C sues A upon the implied promise, he must sue him as liable, instead of B, for the debt of B to him, C; he cannot consistently sue both A and B, and consequently B is released. We do not claim that either of these views is free from difficulty. Either of them, however, is free from one difficulty which other views encounter, and which is a principal reason why the courts which refuse to allow the action refuse to do so. Other views give the creditor the benefit of the new contract for nothing, since they allow him still to retain his hold upon the original debtor; whereas, according to either of the views above set forth, the creditor cannot have the benefit of the new contract without assenting to the terms of it, thereby releasing the original debtor, so that the assent is in itself a consideration. As cases which support these views we will refer to Warren v. Batchelder, 16 N. H. 580; Bohanan v. Pope, 42 Me. 93.²⁸

Of Wood v. Moriarity and kindred cases, Professor Corbin has said: "The theory underlying these cases, though not expressed clearly, seems to be that the agreement between the promisor and the promisee operates as an offer of a novation to the beneficiary. The chief objection to this theory is that

See, also, Clough v. Giles, 5 Atl. Rep. 835. Of course, if either view be correct, the liability under the contract is not collateral, but direct and substitutional, and therefore not within the statute of frauds.

We do not think this case is distinguishable in principle from Urquhart v. Brayton, 12 R. I. 169. The doctrine of the latter case is not only just and convenient, but also consonant with the purposes of the parties, and we are not prepared to recede from it. As is remarked by the court, in Lehow v. Simonton, 3 Colo. 346, "it accords the remedy to the party who in most instances is chiefly interested to enforce the promise, and avoids multiplicity of actions." We think the declaration is proper in point of form, and we do not think the nonsuit is justifiable on the ground of variance.

In Warren v. Batchelder, 16 N. H. 580, the court held that a demand on the defendant was requisite before suit. Whether this is so we need not decide, for the evidence in this case shows a demand before suit.

Petition granted.

In fact the parties contemplate no such offer and the beneficiary has no reason to believe that in taking advantage of the new contract he is extinguishing his previous rights. * * * Where the beneficiary is not a creditor of the promisee he has no rights to discharge, and the novation theory is wholly inapplicable. Clearly also the better authority appears to be that the creditor beneficiary's right against the new promisor is an additional security. This carries out the real intention of the parties." Corbin's Anson on Contracts, pp. 347-348. See to the latter effect, Fischer v. Hope Mut. Life Ins. Co., 69 N. Y. 161 (1877); Stephany v. More, 82 N. J. L. 186 (1912); Johnson v. Shuey, 40 Wash. 22 (1905); Smith v. Pfuger, 126 Wis. 253 (1905). Professor Williston states that the more common doctrine "allows the creditor a right against both the original debtor and the new promisor. And in some states he is allowed to join both as defendants in the same action. Roberts v. Abney (Tex. Civ. App.), 189 S. W. 1101. He ought to be compelled to do so." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 393, pp. 736-7.

A more troublesome question is as to whether the promisee as well as the beneficiary may sue the promisor. The courts which are influenced by the novation theory deny the promisee a recovery. Where the beneficiary is a sole beneficiary, it would seem that the promisee's damages would necessarily be nominal, except in a jurisdiction allowing him to sue as trustee for the beneficiary, and except in such a jurisdiction no harm would result from denying the promisee a recovery. Compare Livet v. Hawes, Cro. Eliz. 619, 652 (1599), holding that a father could not maintain an action on a promise made to him to give a certain sum to his son in consideration of marriage. Where the beneficiary is a creditor to benefit as such, however, although there is occasional dissent (as in Burbank v. Gould, 15 Me. 118 (1838); Dye v. Mann, 10 Mich. 291 (1862), neither of which cases seems now to be followed in the state deciding it), the promisee whose debt is not paid is deemed damaged to the full extent of the debt even though he has not yet paid it (1 Sedgwick on Damages, 9 ed., § 789), and, in that view, must be allowed to sue. But, on the principle of preventing unnecessary vexation of the defendant, a recovery by either the promisee or the beneficiary will bar action by the other. 1 Williston on Contracts, § 392, p. 734, and cas. cit. If the promisee is the first to get judgment, such a result is inconsistent with the doctrine of those states which hold that the promisee has no power to release the promisor from his duty to the beneficiary.

SCHOOL DISTRICT OF KANSAS CITY EX REL. KOKEN IRON WORKS v. LIVERS ET AL., APPELLANTS.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, 1899. 147 Mo. 580, 49 S. W. 507.)

BURGESS, J. Upon the trial of this cause in the Circuit Court there was judgment for plaintiffs, from which defendant sureties appealed to the Kansas City Court of Appeals, where the judgment of the Circuit Court was reversed.

Plaintiffs then filed motion for rehearing which was overruled, and the cause certified to this court because one of the judges of that court was of the opinion that the decision rendered is in conflict with Board of President and Directors of the St. Louis Public Schools v. Woods et al., 77 Mo. 197.

The facts are as follows:

Defendants Livers and Pullman having acquired the contract at the price of $72,500 for erecting an addition to the Central High School in Kansas City, Missouri, were required to give and did execute bond in the sum of $54,000, conditioned that the bond was executed not only for the protection of the school district, but also for the benefit of all parties who might furnish materials used in the building, and that any such party, having unpaid bills therefor, might, in the name of the school district, maintain an action upon the bond to recover the amount of such bills.

Schmidt & Wible and David Pullman were securities on the bond. Pullman has since deceased and Anna A. Pullman, administratrix, represents his estate.

The decision rendered by the court of appeals is not only in conflict with the Board of President and Directors of the St. Louis Public Schools v. Woods et al., 77 Mo. 197, but is in conflict with the more recent decisions of this court in city of St. Louis to use of Glencoe Lime and Cement Co. v. Von Phul et al., 133 Mo. 561, and Devers v. Howard, 144 Mo. 671, in which it is held that a contract between persons made upon a valid consideration may be enforced by a third person, though not named in the contract, when the obligee owes to him some duty, legal or equitable, which would give him a just claim, and must therefore be overruled.

It is contended by defendants that the evidence showed that the school district paid Livers and Pullman, the contractors, in excess of eighty per cent of the amount due them on their contract, which was in violation of its terms, and as such payment was without the knowledge or consent of the securities, that the defendants, Anna Pullman, administratrix, and Schmidt and Wible, were thereby released. Defendants asked a declaration of law presenting this theory of the case which was refused, and as there was evidence tending to show such payment, we take it for granted that it was refused upon the ground, that, even if true, it did not have the effect to release defendants upon the bond, for causes of action, if there were such, which had accrued upon the bond before that time.

Plaintiff's rights are original and independent of the school district, the board being constituted under the bond the trustee of an express trust. Board v. Woods, supra. The bond is dual in its nature, being for the benefit and protection of the school district against loss or damage for the non-fulfilment of their contract by the contractors, and the payment by them of laborers for work done, and of materialmen for material furnished, rights which when once fixed could not be destroyed or taken away by any act of the school district.

In Doll v. Crume, 41 Neb. 655, a city let a contract for grading its streets to one Davis which McGavock and Doll signed as his securities. The contract provided among other things that Davis should be paid forty-five per cent of the cost of the work when two-thirds of it was completed; that he would pay for all labor and material furnished by him in executing the contract, and complete the work in one hundred and eighty days. The contract recited that "said parties of the third part (McGavock and Doll) hereby guaranty that said party of the second part (Davis) will well and truly perform the covenant hereinbefore contained to pay all laborers employed on said work; and if said laborers are not paid in full by said party of the second part, that said party of the third part hereby agrees to pay for said labor, or any part thereof, which shall not be paid by said second party within ten days after the money for said labor becomes due and payable." On completion of two-thirds of the work the city paid Davis ninety per cent of the estimated cost thereof. It also granted Davis an extension of time for the completion of his contract beyond the time fixed thereby. It was held "(1) That the contract between the city and Davis and his sureties and the promises and liabilities of the latter thereon, were of a dual nature,—a promise to the city that Davis should perform the work in the time and manner he had agreed, and a promise, in effect, to Crume to pay him for the labor he should perform for Davis; (2) that the city's overpaying Davis and extending the time of performance of his contract did not release the sureties from the contract to pay Davis' laborers; (3) that if the city had precluded itself from calling on the sureties to make good to it any default of Davis, its acts did not estop the laborers of Davis from enforcing against the sureties their contracts and promises."

Paraphrasing what is said in that case, the case stands just as if Livers and Pullman and their sureties had made the written promise directly to the Koken Iron Works instead of to the school district. Then how can it be said that any act of the school district in overpaying Livers and Pullman can release them or their sureties from their contract with the Koken Iron Works. It may be that the school district by its actions has precluded itself from recovering from the sureties of the contractors for any default of theirs in the premises, but it by no means follows that the school district's action estops the Koken Iron Works. In other words, there were two contracts with one consideration to support both. To the same effect is Lyman v. Lincoln, 38 Neb. 794.³⁰

Henricus v. Englert, 137 N. Y. 488, was an action upon a bond executed by defendant as surety for one Leonard Vogel. Plaintiffs were the original contractors. Thereafter they sub-let the carpenter's work upon the building to Vogel, who thereupon executed to them a bond in the penal sum of $5,000, conditional that Vogel, "shall perform all the obligations and agreements made and entered into with the said Henricus & Son, agents, and shall erect, work, make and complete a certain town hall and fire department building for the village of Brockport, New York, agreeable to the plans, and in perfect keeping with the revised carpenter's specifications prepared for the same by H. B. Gleason, architect." After the completion of the building the village claimed that it had not been erected according to contract, and claimed damages on account of defects in the work which were thereafter adjusted with Vogel at the sum of $550, which amount was deducted from the contract price payable to plaintiffs. Thereafter plaintiffs began suit on the bond, alleging breaches thereof and claiming damages in the sum of $5,000 the penalty of the bond. The defence was that at the time of the execution of the bond there was an arrangement between plaintiffs and

"In Missouri and Nebraska it has been held that a surety for the promise of a contractor to a district or municipality to pay for his labor and materials is liable to workmen and materialmen in spite of the fact that the promisee, the district or municipality, has paid the contractor during the progress of the work to an amount not allowed by the contract. The Missouri decision relies on the fact that the plaintiffs had become creditors on the faith of the defendant's suretyship before the promisee had committed any breach of duty. The Nebraska decisions make no such distinction." 1 Williston on Contracts, p. 739, note.

On the right of one furnishing labor or material to sue on the bond given by the contractor to the property owner, see Ann. Cas. 1916 A, 754, note.

Local statutes have a bearing on the problem and should be consulted. Some of the Missouri statutes are discussed in National Roofing Tile Co. v. McDonald (Conn.), 108 Atl. 726 (1919), which held, among other things, that a clause, in a bond given to a school district that the contractor would pay for material and labor, providing that the bond might "be assigned by the obligee to sub-contractors, materialmen, and laborers," etc., "neither supersedes nor subtracts from the [Missouri] statutory provision under which the materialman or workman is authorized to sue in the name of the obligee without an assignment" (108 Atl. at p. 727).

Of course, bonds may be so drawn as not to make it reasonable to construe them as making laborers or materialmen more than incidental beneficiaries. See Fosmire v. National Surety Co., 229 N. Y. 44 (1920); Morganton Mfg. & Trading Co. v. Anderson, 165 No. Car. 285 (1914). Moreover, where the state statute provides for a mechanics' lien on public buildings (Commissioners v. Fell, 52 N. J. Eq. 689 (1894)), such construction may normally be proper. Standard Gas Power Corp. v. New England Casualty Co., 90 N. J. L. 570 (1917).

Vogel by which he, Vogel, was to become the original contractor for the work done by him, and that thereupon his bond was assigned and delivered to the village as security for the work by him, and that after the work was completed all matters of difference between the plaintiffs and Vogel, and between Vogel and the village, or in any way growing out of his contract, or connected therewith, were adjusted and settled. It appeared that some changes and alterations were made in the plans between the architect, Vogel, and the village, without the consent of plaintiffs. It was held that the changes did not release defendant from, or affect his liability upon, the bond.

At the time of the payment of the eighty per cent the Koken Iron Works had already complied with its contract, and its right of action accrued, which the school district could by no act of its board take away, or deprive it of.

We therefore reverse the judgment of the Kansas City Court of Appeals, with directions to affirm the judgment of the Circuit Court.²⁰

Action by Edward Whitehead against William W. Burgess on a contract. Heard on demurrer to declaration. Demurrer overruled.

VAN SYCKEL, J.²¹ The first count of the declaration sets out that the defendant, being the owner of a stallion known as "Lynne Bel," published a certain circular, in which he offered the services of the said stallion for the sum of $100, and therein promised to pay the owner of the first one of the foals of said stallion that should trot a mile in 2

²⁰On the reasons why a municipality should be authorized to exact, and should exact, bonds for the benefit of laborers and materialmen, it has been said:

"Suppose we concede that there is no legal duty or moral obligation upon the city to see that the laborers who work for its contractors are paid. It may nevertheless be to the best interests of the city to have the payment of laborers and materialmen secured. In the first place, the certainty of securing their pay might induce them to work for a less wage, or furnish materials at a smaller cost, than if their pay was uncertain and they were obliged to look solely to a contractor whose honesty or solvency might be doubted. And the credit which such security gives the contractor might well be presumed to enable him to prosecute the work with diligence, and less danger of strikes or difficulty with his workmen. Public inconvenience and delays in public improvements are not infrequently occasioned by the failure of employees and laborers to secure prompt payment or adjustment of their claims. By avoiding such complications and making it certain that the laborer will receive his pay, it is to be presumed that the city is enabled to make a better contract and get its improvement constructed at less expense and in less time than would otherwise be possible." Reavis, J., in State v. Liebes, 19 Wash. 589, 595-596 (1898). Such reasons have a bearing on the attitude of the courts toward the problem in the principal case.

²¹Parts of the opinion are omitted.

minutes and 30 seconds, or less, the sum of $750. The declaration further sets out that one Pursell, being the owner of a mare called "Eva," bred the said mare to said stallion, and paid the said defendant the sum of $100 for the privilege of so doing; that the said defendant, in consideration of such payment, promised the said Pursell to pay the owner of the foal of the said mare the sum of $750 if such foal should prove to be the first one of the get of said stallion that should trot a mile in 2 minutes and 30 seconds; that the plaintiff, having knowledge of the said promise made to said Pursell, did purchase the foal of the said mare Eva by the said stallion, and while the said foal was owned by the plaintiff the said foal trotted a mile in less than 2 minutes and 30 seconds, and was the first one of the get of said stallion to make the said time. The second count is substantially like the first count, except that it avers that at the time the service money was paid the defendant repeated to said Pursell the promise and undertaking in said circular set forth. A separate demurrer is filed to each count of the declaration.

A further reason [relied upon by the defendant] to support the demurrer is that the promise as alleged was made to Pursell, and that there is no privity of contract between the plaintiff and defendant. The law of this state is that an action may be maintained on a promise made by the defendant to a third person for the benefit of the plaintiff without any consideration moving from the plaintiff to the defendant. Joslin v. Car-Spring Co., 36 N. J. Law, 141. The fact that the person to whose benefit the promise may inure is uncertain at the time it is made, and that it cannot be known until the happening of a contingency, cannot deprive the person who afterwards establishes his claim to be the beneficiary of the promise of the right to recover upon it. In the familiar case of a promise to give a reward for the arrest and conviction of a criminal, the right of the person who secures such conviction to recover the reward is well settled. Sergeant v. Stryker, 16 N. J. Law, 465; Furman v. Parke, 21 N. J. Law, 310. * * *

³³ See Gaffney v. Sederberg, 114 Minn. 319 (1911); Lenz v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 111 Wis. 198 (1901). See also popularity contest prize winner case, Smead v. Stearns, 173 Ia. 174 (1915).

But in the case of a sealed contract, it has been suggested that "there cannot be a floating covenant corresponding to a public or general offer of a simple contract. A promise under seal to such person as shall in the future fulfil a given description is therefore not a valid covenant when delivered, and does not later become so when the promisee becomes identified." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 215, p. 423. But query? The case cited to support the text is Saunders v. Saunders, 154 Mass. 337 (1891), which seems to be simply a decision that the beneficiary of a sealed contract cannot sue upon it. Contra to it is cited Nelson Coke & Gas Co. v. Pellatt, [1902] 4 Ontario 481, to be compared with Hudson Real Estate Co. v. Tower, 156 Mass. 82 (1892). As is suggested, ante, a state which permits the beneficiary of a sealed contract to sue upon it need not worry about the fact that the beneficiary is unascertained or unascertainable at the time of the contract. See ante, p. 42, note.

JOINT AND JOINT AND SEVERAL CONTRACTS.¹

ALPAUGH ET AL. v. WOOD ET AL.

23 Atl. 261.)

Suit by Spencer M. Alpaugh and others against William Wood and others on a contract. Judgment of nonsuit for defendants. Plaintiffs bring error. Reversed. For former reports, see 11 Atl. Rep. 469, and 16 Atl. Rep. 676.

The plaintiffs, Alpaugh & Magowan, brought suit in the supreme court against the defendants, Wood and Barlow, upon the following contract:

"Agreement made this seventh day of May, A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-three, between Spencer M. Alpaugh and Frank A. Magowan, of the city of Trenton, New Jersey, party of the first part, and William Wood, of the township of Lawrence, and James Barlow, of the city of Trenton, in the county of Mercer and state of New Jersey, parties of the second part. Witnesseth, that whereas the said party of the first part own and operate a pottery manufactory in the city of Trenton, heretofore known as the pottery of Coxon and Company; and whereas they have agreed to employ and have employed the said parties of the second part, respectively, to superintend and manage the manufacturing part of the business of said pottery, including the decorating department, taking entire charge of the works, employment of hands, and selection of materials; therefore it is agreed between the said parties as follows: That said Alpaugh and Magowan have agreed, and by these presents do agree, to employ, and do hereby employ, the said William Wood and said James Barlow to take the entire charge of the manufacturing department of their said pottery, including the decorating department, for the term of three years and two months from the date of this agreement. And the said parties of the second part do hereby agree to enter the employment of the said party of the first part as aforesaid, and to take the entire charge of the manufacturing department of said pottery, and to give their whole time, labor, and skill towards the proper management of said business during the term aforesaid. And the said party of the first part do agree that the said parties of the second part shall receive for their said services during the said period the salary of three thousand dollars a year each, payable in weekly payments, and do further agree that said Wood and Barlow shall also have and be entitled to ten per cent. of the net profits of said business during said period. And said party of the first part do guaranty that said profits shall bring in to said party of the second part a sum of at least two thousand dollars a year to each of them; and said salary and profits to begin on the twenty-first day of May, eighteen hundred and eighty-three.

+ "It is further understood that James Barlow gives his + entire knowledge and services in modeling to Alpaugh & Magowan, and renders no service or knowledge to + any one else. +

"In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

"Spencer M. Alpaugh, [L. s.]

"F. A. Magowan, [L. s.]

"William Wood, [L. s.]

"James Barlow, [L. s.]

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of [+ clauses between marks thus + inserted before signing].

"Geo. R. Cook.

"Trenton, N. J., May 7, '83."

The gravamen of the complaint is that the defendants did not exercise proper care and skill in the performance of their obligations, and that in consequence thereof losses were sustained by the plaintiffs. At the close of the plaintiffs' case a nonsuit was ordered by the trial judge. Upon exception to this ruling a writ of error was sued out from this court.

DIXON, J.* * * * It is urged by the defendants that the obligations imposed upon them by this contract are not joint, but several only. Whenever an obligation is undertaken by two or more persons, it is the general presumption of the law that it is a joint obligation. Words of express joinder are not necessary for this purpose; but, on the other hand, there should be words of severance in order to create a several responsibility. 1 Pars. Cont. *11; Chitty, Cont. 128. This presumption is corroborated when the promisors have undertaken to accomplish together a single result; for in such cases the promisee evidently relies upon a joint performance. The inference of a joint obligation is not defeated by the fact that it appears, either in the terms of the contract or from the circumstances of the transaction, that each promisor is to contribute separately to the entire result for which they bargain. Byers v. Dobey, 1 H. Bl. 236; Muzzy v. Whitney, 10 Johns, 226; Field v. Runk, 22 N. J. Law, 525.² Nor is the nature of the obligation, with respect to its being joint or several, to be determined by considering whether the remedies of the same parties under the contract would be joint or several; for their remedies depend largely, if not wholly, on the nature of their interest, from which, of course, their liability is entirely distinct. 1 Pars. Cont. *13. Under these principles, it is clear that the obligation of the defendants now in suit is joint. They are joined as the parties of the second part in the agreement; together they covenant to enter the employment of the party of the first part, to take the entire charge of the manufacturing department of the pottery, and to give their whole time, labor, and skill towards the proper management of the business. This covenant does not assign to each of the defendants his several duties, nor require from either the exercise of skill and diligence in any special department of the work, but binds both to the due management of the entire manufacturing business, leaving them to divide the charge between themselves according to their own discretion, and holding them responsible, not each for what he may arrange with his partner severally to assume, but both for the result to be jointly accomplished,—the skillful and careful management of the pottery. Even the last clause of the contract, which secures to the plaintiffs exclusively the knowledge and services of the defendant Barlow in modeling, is not cast in the form of a separate covenant by Barlow, but is expressed only as a part of the understanding agreed upon by the parties, viz., by the plaintiffs on the one part, and the defendants on the other. But even if this clause should be construed as Barlow's separate covenant, and as not involving Wood in responsibility for modeling, that would not affect the present question; for the plaintiffs' case does not rest upon defective modeling, or at least not upon that alone. The judgment of nonsuit should be reversed, and the record remitted for a venire de novo.⁴

JONATHAN ROBERTSON, APPELLANT v. EDWARD MARCH ET AL., APPELLEES.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1841. 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 198.)

TREAT, J.⁵ * * * The bill of exceptions shows that on the trial in the Circuit Court, the appellees, to support the action on their part, offered in evidence an instrument in writing as follows: "On or before the first day of January, 1841, we, the undersigned, promise to pay the Lord Kenyon said, that "this note beginning in the singular number is several as well as joint. * * * The letter I applies to each severally," and held the action maintainable.

The Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law so provides in § 17 (7).

sum annexed to each of our names, to William Hodgson, A. G. Phillips, Watson Sinclair, Samuel Smith, and Edward March, trustees, in trust of the Bethel Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in Morgan County, Illinois, for the purpose of building an addition to, and finishing, the church at the Bethel camp ground, as a more comfortable and spacious place of worship, and a school. August 24th, 1840." Which instrument is signed by some sixty persons, with the sums by them severally subscribed written opposite their names, among them the appellant, subscribing $50. * * * The jury found a verdict for the appellees for $40, and judgment was rendered thereon. * * *

It is insisted that the contract is joint, and that all of the subscribers should have been sued. If this objection could be now made, it would not be well taken.

The contract is manifestly in severalty. Each subscriber promises to pay a particular sum, and is not a surety for his co-subscribers.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

* In subscription contracts the usual presumption does not apply, but instead several obligations are presumed. Hail v. Thayer, 12 Met. (Mass.) 130 (1846); Davis v. Belford, 70 Mich. 120 (1888). See 22 L. R. A. 80, note.

In Colt v. Learned, 118 Mass. 380 (1875), the executors of Pollock sued Learned and Pomeroy on a contract signed by the three which recited that they jointly and severally guaranteed the repayment to Pollock of $15,000 loaned by him to a corporation. Gray, C. J., said for the court:

"The written contract between the parties cannot be construed as creating a joint liability, without making Pollock, jointly with the two defendants, of the one part, contract with himself individually, of the other part. The manifest intention and legal effect of the contract are that each of the three signers shall assume the liability of one third of the sum named, and that each of the defendants should guarantee to Pollock, upon his paying the whole sum, the repayment of one third thereof. Upon the facts stated in the declaration, therefore, there is no joint liability of the defendants, but each of them is severally liable for $5,000."

In Read v. Price, [1909] 1 K. B. 577, 586, in reply to a claim that the words of a bond: "We bind ourselves and each of us and the heirs, executors and administrators of us and each of us and of every of them jointly and severally by these presents" made the executors jointly liable, Channell, J., said: "Now these words purport, no doubt, to bind all the surviving debtors and the executors and administrators of deceased debtors in every possible way; as to the several liabilities there is no difficulty; but how can a man make his executor liable jointly with another? How can a person without his consent be made liable jointly with others for the payment of future sums? The difference between joint liability and several liability is that the latter devolves upon the executor of the debtor, while the former does not, but passes by survivorship to the surviving joint debtors. If all the obligors should die, would all their executors be jointly liable? That would do away with the survivorship of the joint liability. Therefore, it seems to me that, though the words of this bond show the strongest intention to bind everybody that can be bound, yet the way in which executors are intended to be bound, and the only way in which they can be bound, is by the several liability. Accordingly for the pur-

Action by the L. L. Satler Lumber Company against Joseph Exler. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

At the trial it appeared that the written guaranty upon which the suit was brought was as follows:

"Whereas the American Box Company of Etna, Pa., is indebted to the L. L. Satler Lumber Company for lumber furnished in amount of thirty hundred and forty-four ($3,044.00) dollars and also indebted to the American Lumber & Manufacturing Co. in amount of thirty-two hundred and forty-four ($3,244.00) dollars: The aforesaid lumber companies agree to accept in payment thereof the American Box Company's notes with Theodore Geiselhart's indorsement thereon as follows:

"One sixty days for $761.00 and $811.00.

"One eighty days for $761.00 and $811.00.

"One hundred days for $761.00 and $811.00.

"One four months $761.00 and $811.00.

"It is understood and agreed by the American Lumber & Mfg. Co. and the L. L. Satler Lumber Co. that, if requested by the American Box Company, they will renew either or all of these notes at maturity for one-half for a period of 30 or 60 days.

"In consideration of the above, also in consideration of the sum of $1.00, receipt for which is hereby acknowledged, and other valuable consideration, I, the undersigned, hereby agree to become guarantor on the above paper in the sum of $3,000.00 and no more.

MOSCHZISER, J.⁷ * * * We do not view the guaranty as a joint contract with the two lumber companies, and we cannot agree with the appellant's contention that any action thereon would have to be by the companies jointly. The court below reached the proper conclusion on this branch of the case when it stated: "The contract is several. * * * The sum of $3,000 is * * * the fixed limit of liability, and of this case there is no material distinction between the wording of this bond and that of a bond which makes the obligors jointly and severally liable in the common form."

On fixing the extent of liability of the several obligors to an agreement as making it joint, joint and several or several, see L. R. A. 1915 B, 221, note.

and means not to exceed $3,000." At the time of the execution of the guaranty each of the lumber companies held four notes of the box company; those of the plaintiff being drawn for $761 each, and those of the other company for $811 each. The plaintiff's notes were indorsed over to and held by it individually, and the four belonging to the American Company were indorsed to and held by that company individually. As we construe the contract, the intention was to guarantee this paper for the benefit of the several holders thereof in the proportions to which they might respectively be entitled; it was not in any sense for the benefit of the two companies jointly.

Whether a contract is joint or several depends upon the nature of the interest of the parties and the intention at the time it was made, and the rule is that, if the consideration moves from the promisees separately, a promise to them is prima facie several. 2 Page on Contracts, § 1142. The writings in the case consist of the notes and the contract of guaranty. The notes are specifically referred to in the contract, and the defendant therein agrees to become guarantor "on the above paper." When these writings are taken together, it is apparent that the contract was not intended as a joint one. Although the lumber companies had a common interest, because each held the notes of the box company, they were not connected in any way, and they had no joint interest to be protected. Neither company could have renewed the notes of the other, and there was nothing to suggest that it ever was the intention that they should. As already indicated, we are of opinion that the contract was properly held to be several;⁸ but we may ⁸ "There are not wanting cases in which it has been held that when the interests of the covenantees are several, they may sue severally, though the terms of the covenant upon which they sue are strictly joint. Even this, however, has been doubted." Strong, J., in City of Philadelphia v. Reeves & Cabot, 48 Pa. St. 472, 476 (1865).

In Anderson v. Nichols, 93 Vt. 262, 107 Atl. 116 (1919), the defendant, the owner of an electric light and power transmission line, agreed to extend the line to furnish electric current to the plaintiffs, who owned farms, and they severally promised to pay him $125 when the line should be constructed to a point opposite their buildings and $125 when their buildings should be by defendant properly wired and equipped. The defendant also promised to charge any person living on the line $250 for connection and to divide half of it between the plaintiffs. In this action brought for the half of sums so charged others, the defendant demurred to the declaration on the ground that the contract was as to plaintiffs several and not joint and so there was a misjoinder of plaintiffs. The demurrer was sustained and judgment entered for the defendant. In affirming that judgment, Powers, J., for the court said:

"If you contract with two or more jointly, and their interests are several only, your engagement, in the absence of controlling language, will be taken to be several, and each promisee should sue separately for his damages. Note, Saund. 154; Beckwith v. Talbot, 95 U. S. 239, 24 L. Ed. 496; Emmuleth v. Home Benefit Ass'n, 122 N. Y. 130, 25 N. E. 234, 9 L. R. A. 704. * * *

"When the promise is to pay a group of persons a stated sum to be divided among them in proportions named, the engagement, ordinarily, will be joint, add that actions were brought thereon by both the lumber companies, the two cases were tried together, and each company recovered a verdict for its proportion; hence no harm can come to the appellant through future suits growing out of the guaranty. * * *

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.⁹

STATE OF MAINE v. CHANDLER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1887. 79 Me. 172, 8 Atl. 553.)

FOSTER, J. The defendants as sureties, together with one Benjamin R. Condon as principal, entered into a joint and several recognizance upon an indictment found against the said Condon as a common seller of intoxicating liquors. Default having been entered against all the parties upon the recognizance, scire facias is brought against these two defendants, who file a general demurrer.

and not several. 1 Parsons, *13; Lane v. Drinkwater, 1 C., M. & R. 599; Byrne v. Fitzhugh, 1 C., M. & R. 613.

"On the other hand, when payment is to be made not to the group, but to its several members, each to receive from the promisor his own share, the engagement, ordinarily, will be several, and not joint. 1 Parsons, *19; Owings' Ex'rs v. Owings, 1 Har. & G. 484.

"When tested by the above rule, the complaint before us breaks down. The interests of these plaintiffs are several. The consideration for the defendant's promise moved from them not jointly, but severally; and this alone is enough to make that promise prima facie several. 2 Page, § 1142; Sattler Lumber Co. v. Exler, 239 Pa. 135, 86 Atl. 793. Moreover, the contract set up in this complaint does not require the defendant to pay the sum specified to the plaintiffs, but binds him to divide it between them. So the defendant's promise, though joint in form, is several in essence. In legal consequence, it is a group of separate promises; and gives rise to separate actions in favor of the several promisees."

⁹An interesting question, not settled even as to negotiable instruments by the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, which only makes instruments so drawn and otherwise in compliance with the law negotiable, is the effect of a promise to pay A or B. In Illinois early, before the Married Women's Separate Property Act, such a promise to pay to A or wife was treated as a promise to pay to A. Young v. Ward, 21 Ill. 223 (1859). But since that act it is treated as payable to the two jointly. Carr v. Bauer, 61 Ill. App. 504 (1895). Prior to the Negotiable Instruments Law a note drawn to A or B was not negotiable in Illinois because of uncertainty as to the payee. Musselman v. Oakes, 19 Ill. 81 (1857). Now that the question of negotiability is obviated in states adopting the Negotiable Instruments Law, the question is simply whether there are joint promisees or alternative promisees. They could be either, but the desirability of making them sue together, to prevent an unseemly race between them for a judgment, may lead a majority of the courts to hold, as a majority did before the Negotiable Instruments Law, that the promisees are joint. Passut v. Heubner, 142 N. Y. Supp. 546 (1913); Page v. Ford, 65 Ore. 450 (1913); Voris v. Schoonover, 91 Kan. 530 (1914).

The only question involved is whether the proper parties are joined as defendants in this action.

It is the general rule in actions ex contractu that objection to the non-joinder of a defendant can be taken only by plea in abatement, thereby giving the plaintiff a better writ, by therein disclosing the names of those who ought to be joined. Harwood v. Roberts, 5 Maine, 442; Reed v. Wilson, 39 Maine, 586; Richmond v. Toothaker, 69 Maine, 455. But to this rule there is an exception, as well settled as the rule itself—that if it appears from the face of the declaration or other pleading on the part of the plaintiff, that a person not made defendant was a joint contractor with those who are defendants in the suit, there being no averment of the death of such person, then such non-joinder is good ground for demurrer, as well as abatement. Harwood v. Roberts, supra; Richmond v. Toothaker, supra; Gould Pl. ch. 5, § 115; 1 Chit. Pl. 46; McGregor v. Balch, 17 Vt. 567.

It is likewise held to be ground for demurrer where there is a misjoinder of defendants, in actions upon contract, where too many persons are made defendants and the objection appears upon the face of the plaintiff's pleadings. Chitty states it thus: "If too many persons are made defendants, and the objection appear on the pleadings, either of the defendants may demur, move in arrest of judgment, or support a writ of error; and even if the objection do not appear upon the pleadings, the plaintiff may be non-suited upon the trial, if he fail in proving a joint contract." 1 Chitty Pl. 44; Gould Pl. ch. 5, § 104. "If it appears on the pleadings, it gives rise to a demurrer; if it appears at the trial, to an adverse verdict." Dicey on Parties, 507.

It is elementary law that where three or more parties contract jointly and severally, all are to be sued in one action, or each may be sued severally. It is improper, as all the authorities hold, to join two and omit the others, for in such case they are sued neither jointly nor severally, as they promised.¹⁰ And in case the plaintiff does not see fit

¹⁰ Similarly, in Sweigart v. Beck, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 308 (1822), where the bond was given to ten obligees and seven only sued, when all were living, Tilghman, C. J., said that the action was "neither joint nor several," and so not maintainable. He further said (p. 311):

"The action [in the name of all the obligees] may be supported, although some of the obligees have received their shares, because the bond is forfeited unless they have all been paid. It was objected that those who had been paid might refuse to join in the action, or might release the obligor. But the court would permit those who were unpaid, to make use of the names of the other obligees against their consent; neither would their release be suffered to be set up, in bar of the action. It may be resembled to the case of an assigned chase in action, where the action is brought in the name of the assignor, for the use of the assignee; there the release of the assignor would not be regarded."

But as to obligors, see, contra, Glasscock v. Hamilton, 62 Tex. 143, 169 (1884), where Walker, J., for the court, said, that "In this state the technical rule of the common law that upon a contract which is joint and several the plaintiff to proceed against them severally, it is the undoubted right of the defendants to have all their joint promisors or obligors joined with them in the suit. Harwood v. Roberts, supra; Bangor Bank v. Treat, 6 Maine, 207.

This action, then, must stand or fall like any other founded upon contract. It is brought against two only of the three parties who jointly and severally recognized to the state—now plaintiff in this suit. It is not brought against them in accordance with their obligation entered into by them. They are sued neither jointly nor severally. There are too many joined as defendants to correspond with their several obligation—too few to correspond with it as joint. This being so, the misjoinder in the one case, or on the non-joinder in the other, as we have said, is good ground of demurrer, since the fact appears upon the face of the plaintiff's declaration that there was a joint and several obligation entered into by three, all of whom are known as well to the plaintiff as to the defendants in this suit.

It makes no difference that one of the recognizers was the principal in the criminal process, and the other two were his sureties. The recognizance itself determines the liability of the parties, and, as appears from the record, that liability was joint and several in relation to the three parties who became bound by it. It was not a joint and several undertaking on the part of the sureties only; and the plaintiff cannot, by its pleading, change their liability from that which they assumed.

Exceptions sustained.

WILLIAM RICHARDSON AND THE EXECUTORS OF JOHN WALL v. EDMUND JONES ET AL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1840. 23 No. Car. 296.)

DANIEL, J. This was an action for debt on a specialty; plea non est factum. The plaintiffs declared on a bond dated, on the 16th of April, 1823, for the sum of £3,500, made and executed to William Richardson and John Wall, as obligees. On the trial, the plaintiffs, to support their declaration, offered in evidence a bond for the same sum and date, but executed by the defendants to the said William Richardson and John Wall, Esqrs: "and the rest of the justices assigned to keep the peace for Rutherford County," "to be paid to the said William Richardson and John Wall." The reading of this bond in evidence was objected to as it appeared to be a bond given to more joint obligees than the one declared on professed to be. The court rejected the evidence; and the plaintiffs were nonsuited and appealed.

must sue all or but one, and cannot sue two or more without suing all, has never been recognized in our practice."

If the obligors on a breach of the bond, had paid to Richardson and Wall, it would have been a good satisfaction and discharge. But if the obligors failed to pay as it is alleged they did, then the instrument offered in evidence informs us that the obligors have contracted, under their seal, with several other obligees besides Richardson and Wall. These other obligees are not made parties plaintiffs in the declaration; nor is there any averment in the declaration that they are dead, so as to enable Richardson and Wall to sue as survivors. In actions ex contractu, the omission to join as plaintiffs in the writ and declaration, of all those that ought to be joined, (viz. all the obligees who are alive) may be taken advantage of on the trial under the general issue. The contract and obligation were made to others besides Richardson and Wall. The words in the contract "to be paid to said Richardson and Wall," do not restrict the legal force of the deed to these two alone; but as the contract is made jointly with all the named obligees, all must join as plaintiffs in the action. The plaintiffs could have averred in their declaration, who were justices at the date of the bond and have made them parties plaintiff. And they could, and ought to have averred the death of any of the obligees, if any had died since the date of the bond, to enable the survivors to sue and maintain the action. The bond offered in evidence, was a different one from that described in the declaration, and it was properly rejected by the court. The judgment must be affirmed.

¹¹ "It is well settled that if a bond be given to several obligees, they must all join in the action, unless some be dead, in which case that fact should be averred in the declaration. And if it appear on the face of the pleadings that there are other obligees living, who have not joined in the action, it is fatal on demurrer or in arrest of judgment." Tilghman, C. J., in Sweigart v. Berk, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 308, 311 (1822).

In Jell v. Douglas, 4 B. & Ald. 374, 375 (1821), Abbott, C. J., said: "It was decided in Richards v. Heather, 1 B. & A. 29, that a party may maintain an action against a surviving partner without describing him as such; and the reason of that decision was this, that if the partners had been alive, and one only was sued, that circumstance could only be taken advantage of by plea in abatement, and was no defense upon the general issue. But if one of two joint-contractors sue, both being alive, that is a variance, and a good defense upon the general issue. It seems, therefore, to be reasonable, that where a surviving joint-contractor sues, the fact of his being survivor should appear in the declaration."

In Haworth v. Fisher, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 249 (1833), where A contracted with B and C to deliver a certain number of hogs to be paid for by B and C at an agreed price, part payment being made in advance, and where B purported to assign all his rights to C, it was held that as B could not divest himself of the character of obligor he could not divest himself of that of obligee and, accordingly C could not sue A without joining B, his co-obligee.

It has been pointed out that "the nature of a joint promise to two or more persons * * * excludes a promise to any apart from the others, which, therefore, cannot be declared on as a promise to any apart from the others,

MAY v. HANSON ET AL.

(Supreme Court of California, 1856. 6 Cal. 642.)

This was an action against George M. Hanson, John C. Fall and Samuel L. Dewey, administrator of the estate of B. B. Dewey, deceased, on an undertaking on appeal executed by G. M. Hanson, John C. Fall and B. B. Dewey. The complaint alleges the prosecution of the appeal in the action in which the bond was given, and final judgment against the appellant therein. It also avers the subsequent death of B. B. Dewey, and the appointment of S. L. Dewey as his administrator.

The defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground amongst others, "that the defendant Samuel L. Dewey, administrator of the estate of B. B. Dewey, deceased, is improperly joined in this action with the other obligors, to said bond, being the surviving obligors of B. B. Dewey, deceased.

The court below sustained the demurrer, though not on the ground above stated. Plaintiff appealed.

MURRAY, C. J.¹² The demurrer was properly sustained upon the second ground because the administrator of Dewey ought not to have been joined. In actions upon joint and several contracts or obligations, an administrator cannot be joined with the survivor, because one is joined de bonis testatoris, and the other de bonis propriis (Humphreys v. Yale, 5 Cal. 173). * * *

*Judgment affirmed.*¹³

and in an action upon which, therefore, all must join" in the absence of statutory change. W. H. Griffith, Joint Rights & Liabilities, p. 32.

There is, however, no logical difficulty in imagining promisees to be joint and several, though the courts in general say that they cannot be. Seemingly by inadvertence, one case has held a note payable to A or B to be joint and yet each payee to have a separate right of action. Collyer v. Cook, 28 Ind. App. 272, 62 N. E. 655 (1902). Even the author quoted above found some difficulties with the orthodox thesis, for he said:

"The most important rule * * * is that a promise made by two or more persons to perform an act is a promise that they or some or one of them will perform it; but a promise to two or more persons to perform an act is not a promise to them or some or one of them, but a promise to them all to perform it. * * *

"True, it seems to be the law that payment to one of three may be pleaded as payment to the three, even when made to the separate account of the one and in fraud of the others. The reason seems to be that the one who has been paid cannot sue again, and the others cannot recover without him." W. H. Griffith, Joint Rights and Liabilities, pp. 2-3.

¹³ See Eggleston v. Buck, 31 Ill. 254 (1863).

"The one sufficient reason for the rule of the common law that the surviving joint obligor and the representatives of the estate of the deceased could not be joined as defendants in an action at law was the inability of a court of law to render separate and different judgments in a single action,—against the survivor, to be satisfied de bonis propriis, and against the administrators of

MARTIN v. CRUMP.

(Court of King's Bench, 1698. 2 Salkeld, 444.)

Two joint merchants make B their factor; one dies, leaving an executor; this executor and the survivor cannot join,¹⁴ for the remedy survives, but not the duty; and therefore on recovery he must be accountable to the executor for that.

PICKERSGILL v. LAHENS.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1872. 15 Wall 140, 21 L. Ed. 119.)

A statute of the state of New York thus enacts:

"No injunction shall be issued to stay the trial of any personal action at issue in any court of law until the party applying therefor shall execute a bond, with one or more sufficient sureties, to the plaintiff in such action at law, in such sum as the chancellor or master allowing the injunction shall direct, conditioned for the payment to the said plaintiff, and his legal representatives, of all moneys which may be recovered by such plaintiff or his legal representatives * * * in such action at law, for debt, damage and for costs therein."

With this statute in force, Pickersgill sued Lahens at law in the Superior Court of New York, a common law court, on certain indorsements. Thereupon Lahens filed a bill in the Court of Chancery of the state, for relief against the indorsements; and having done so, applied, under the above quoted act, for an injunction to stay the trial at law. The court upon the filing of a bond meant to be such as the above quoted act required, granted a temporary injunction staying the suit at law till an answer to the bill in chancery should come in. The bond was the joint bond (not the joint and several bond) of Lahens and one Lafarge; this Lafarge not having been any party to the suits already mentioned, nor interested in them, and not deriving any benefit from the estate of the deceased, to be satisfied from such estate in due course of administration. From the same reason it followed that the survivor alone was liable in an action at law, and that if he were solvent, and the action thus available for the collection of the debt, the plaintiff need go no further and he was not permitted to do so. In the Code states this, the only reason for the rules of common law upon the subject, has entirely disappeared. There is no longer any objection to joining causes of action which were formerly distinguished as legal and equitable. Our courts are no longer hampered as to the form of the judgments they may render in one single form of action called a 'civil action.'" Conaway, J., in Fisher v. Hopkins, 4 Wyo. 379, 388-389 (1893).

his joining in the bonds. The bond recited the action at law against Lahens, the bill and injunction in chancery, and the condition of the instrument was that the obligors should pay all moneys which should be recovered in the suit at law. Answers to the bill for relief having come in, the action at law proceeded, and a judgment was rendered against Lahens for $129,000. Before this time Lafarge had died; and at the time Lahens had become insolvent. Thereupon Pickersgill filed a bill in equity against the executors of Lafarge to have his estate pay the amount of the bond, with interest from the recovery of the judgment against Lahens. The executors demurred; assigning among other grounds of demurrer that it appeared by the bill that Lafarge was not severally bound by the bond, but only jointly bound with Lahens; that Lafarge received no consideration for becoming an obligor; that he was not interested in any way in any of the matters in consequence whereof the bond was given, and was merely a surety therein, and that he departed this life before the filing of the present bill, leaving Lahens surviving him, who was still alive. The court below sustained the demurrer; acting doubtless on the ancient principle of equity announced with a clear mention of its grounds by Grier, J. for this court, in the United States v. Price, 9 How. 90, that after the death of one joint obligor (the other surviving) the estate of the one deceased cannot be pursued in equity unless there was "some moral obligation antecedent to the bond," the which obligation the court declared could not exist where the deceased obligor had been but a surety. To review the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer this appeal was taken.

DAVIS, J. It is very clear that the estate of Lafarge is discharged at law from the payment of the obligation in controversy, on the familiar principle that if one of two joint obligors die the debt is extinguished against his representative, and the surviving obligor is alone chargeable. It is equally clear that in this class of cases, where the remedy at law is gone, as a general rule a court of equity will not afford relief, for it is not a principle of equity that every joint covenant shall be treated as if it were joint and several. The court will not vary the legal effect of the instrument by making it several as well as joint, unless it can see, either by independent testimony, or from the nature of the transaction itself, that the parties concerned intended to create a separate as well as joint, liability. If through fraud, ignorance, or mistake, the joint obligation does not express the meaning of the parties, it will be reformed so as to conform to it. This has been done where there is a previous equity which gives the obligee the right to a several indemnity from each of the obligors, as in the case of money lent to both of them. There a court of equity will enforce the obligation against the representatives of the deceased obligor, although the bond be joint and not several, on the ground that the lending to both creates a moral obligation in both to pay, and that the reasonable presumption is that the parties intended their contract to be joint and several, but through fraud, ignorance, mistake, or want of skill, failed to accomplish their object. This presumption is never indulged in the case of a mere surety, whose duty is measured alone by the legal force of the bond, and who is under no moral obligation whatever to pay the obligee, independent of his covenant, and consequently there is nothing on which to found an equity for the interposition of a court of chancery. If the surety should die before his principal, his representatives cannot be sued at law; nor will they be charged in equity.¹⁵ These general doctrines on this subject were presented at large in this court in the case of the United States v. Price, [9 How. 90] and they are sustained by the text writers and books of reports in this country and England. [Citations.]

The authority of the decisions on this subject we do not understand the appellant as questioning in a proper case; but he insists they are not applicable here. His position is, that a statutory obligation like the bond in question, is different in principle, and should be interpreted differently from a contract made by private parties between themselves, as the obligors in such a bond cannot direct the form it shall take, nor elect whether to accept or refuse it. The bond, which is the foundation of this suit, was given in 1846, under the order of the Court of Chancery of New York, to stay the proceedings in an action at law then pending in the Superior Court of the city, and it is argued, as the statute does not require bonds of this character to be "joint and several," in legal intendment they must be joint in form, and all the obligors, therefore, should be regarded as principals. It is undoubtedly true, as words of severalty are not employed, that a joint bond is a compliance with the law, but it by no means follows that a joint and several obligation is

"The reasoning upon which the exemption of the deceased surety's estate from liability is founded, though sanctioned by numerous cases, is not very convincing, and has not always been viewed by judges and jurists with favor.

"It is difficult to perceive why the estate of a surety who was a joint obligor, upon whose credit and responsibility, mainly, the obligee loaned his money, should be discharged by the death of the surety. It would seem that in good conscience and sound morals, and upon principles of natural justice, it should respond, and bear the loss, if any, rather than the obligee who trusted the surety. But it has been quite uniformly held that the mere joint obligation of the deceased surety is not sufficient to create an equity against his estate.

"In all the cases which have come under my observation where it has been held that death discharged the obligation of a joint surety, it appeared that the joint obligor was a mere surety, who received no benefit whatever from the joint obligation. The cases to be found in the books are generally those of joint accommodation indorsers of notes, joint sureties upon official bonds, or upon undertakings given on appeal, or mere sureties upon other instruments of a similar nature." Earl, J., in Richardson v. Draper, 87 N. Y. 337, 344, 346 (1882).

Local statutes should be consulted.

not an equal compliance with its terms. It is certainly not forbidden, and as the statute is silent on the subject, the fair intendment is that either was authorized to be given. If this be so, then it cannot properly be said that the party enjoined had no voice in the nature or sufficiency of the security to be taken, for the discretion of the chancellor was, necessarily, to be exercised in relation to both these matters, if his attention was directed to them, after both sides were heard. It is quite apparent, if this distinction had been invoked, that the instrument of security might have been different; and equally apparent that Lafarge, in case this had been done, might have been unwilling to assume the additional risks which a separate liability imposed on him. We must suppose, in the absence of any evidence on the subject, that he knew the legal differences between the different kinds of obligations, and became bound in the way he did because a joint liability was more advantageous to him. If this was his intention, it would be manifestly unjust for a court of equity, after the legal status was fixed by his death, to change the nature of the obligation which he executed in order to charge his estate. In the cases in which equity has treated the obligation as joint and several, though in form joint, the surety participated in the consideration. In this case Lafarge had no pecuniary interest in the litigation which was enjoined, and derived no personal benefit from the instrument of writing which he signed, and, therefore, no good reason can be furnished why his standing in a court of equity, is not as favorable as if he were surety without advantage to himself, in the borrowing of money. In neither case is there any obligation to pay independent of the covenant. In the one there is a liability for a debt; in the other, for the result of an action at law. Both are cases of contract, for, indeed, suretyship can exist in no other way; and we know of no principle of equity by which a contract of indemnity is to be construed so as to charge an estate, and an engagement to pay money to receive a contrary construction. The equities in both are clearly equal, and as the estate of Lafarge is not liable at law, it will not be held liable in equity.

The demurrer to the bill was, therefore, properly sustained, and the decree is accordingly

¹⁶ "In England unless the joint obligation is that of a partnership the creditor has no relief against the estate of a deceased joint obligor, even though he was not a surety and [though] the claim cannot be collected from the survivor. By modern statutes it is sometimes broadly provided that all contracts, which by the common law are joint shall be construed as joint and several." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 344, p. 665.

HENRY J. B. KENDALL AND OTHERS, APPELLANTS v.
PETER HAMILTON, RESPONDENT.

(House of Lords, 1879. 4 App. Cas. 504.)

LORD BLACKBURN.¹⁷ My Lords, in this case the plaintiffs entered into transactions with the firm of Wilson, McLay & Co., then consisting of two persons, Matthew Wilson and Joseph Corrie Shutters McLay. They, at the request of that firm, and in consequence of contracts made with that firm, accepted bills and entered into other transactions, the result of which was that a large sum was owing to the plaintiffs for which they might have maintained an action for money lent against those two persons.

The plaintiffs did not, at the time when they entered into the contracts which resulted in this cause of action, know that any other person was interested in the contracts; they dealt with Wilson & McLay, and with them alone, and gave credit to them alone. But afterwards (in the view which I take of the case, it is immaterial when) the plaintiffs discovered that the defendant Hamilton had agreed to share with Wilson & McLay in certain adventures which would require the advance of money, and that "the financial arrangements should be managed" by Wilson & McLay.

This amounted to an authority to Wilson & McLay to borrow money for the joint account of Wilson, McLay & Hamilton, who were the undisclosed principals of Wilson & McLay in the contract of loan. And it is, I think, now firmly established as law that a person entering into a contract with one to whom, and to whom alone he trusted, may, on discovering that the contractor really had a principal, though he neither trusted to him nor gave credit to him, nor even knew of his existence, charge that principal, unless something has happened to prevent his doing so. He is not bound to do so. In the present case Wilson & McLay could not, if sued before the Judicature Acts, have pleaded in abatement the non-joinder of Hamilton; nor if Wilson & McLay had sued the plaintiffs could they have resisted a set-off of the money lent to them, on the ground that in borrowing it they were agents for a concealed principal.

I will consider how this case would have stood at law before the Judicature Acts, and then inquire what difference these acts make. I take it, for the reasons I have given, to be clear that, under such circumstances as exist in the present case, the now plaintiffs might have maintained an action for money lent against Hamilton, on the ground that he, jointly with Wilson & McLay, being undisclosed principals to Wilson & McLay, was, as such, liable to the plaintiffs. But the facts are such that Hamilton could have proved a plea that the contract, on which he was sued, was made by the plaintiffs with the defendant and Wilson & McLay, jointly, and not with the defendant alone, and that the plaintiffs, before action, had recovered judgment against Wilson & McLay for the same loan upon the same contract. And then the question would have arisen, whether a judgment recovered against one or more of several joint contractors was (without satisfaction) a bar to an action against another joint contractor sued alone. The decision in King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494, was that it is a bar.

I have already said that, in my view of the matter, it was immaterial when the plaintiffs first discovered that they had a right to have this recourse against Hamilton, which they had never bargained for and which was to them a piece of pure good luck. If the principle on which King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494, was decided had been that, by suing some he had elected to take them as his debtors to the exclusion of those whom he had not joined in the action, it would be material; for I assent to the argument that there cannot be election until there is knowledge of the right to elect. But King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494, proceeded on the ground that the judgment being for the same cause of action, that cause of action was gone. Transivit in rem judicatam, which was a bar, partly on positive decision, and partly on the ground of public policy, that there should be an end of litigation, and there should not be a vexatious succession of suits for the same cause of action. The basis of the judgment was that an action against one on a joint contract was an action on the same cause of action as that in an action against another of the joint contractors, or in an action against all the joint contractors on the same contract.¹⁸

¹⁸ In King v. Hoare (1844), cited supra, Parke, B., said: "If there be a breach of contract or wrong done, or any other cause of action by one against another, and judgment be recovered in a court of record, the judgment is a bar to the original cause of action, because it is thereby reduced to a certainty, and the object of the suit attained, so far as it can be at that stage; and it would be useless and vexatious to subject the defendant to another suit for the purpose of obtaining the same result. Hence the legal maxim, transit in rem judicatam,—the cause of action is changed into matter of record, which is of a higher nature, and the inferior remedy is merged in the higher. This appears to be equally true where there is but one cause of action, whether it be against a single person or many. The judgment of a court of record changes the nature of that cause of action, and prevents its being the subject of another suit, and the cause of action being single cannot afterward be divided into two. * * *

"It is argued that each party to a joint contract is severally liable, and so he is in one sense, that if sued severally and he does not plead in abatement, he is liable to pay the entire debt; but he is not severally liable in the same sense as he is on a joint and several bond, which instrument, though on one piece of parchment or paper, in effect comprises the joint bond of all, and the several bonds of each of the obligors, and gives different remedies to the obligee. * * *

"If there be a judgment against one of two joint contractors, and the other is sued afterward, can he plead in abatement or not? If he cannot, he would be deprived of a right by the act of the plaintiff, without his privity or concurrence, in suing and obtaining judgment against the other. If he can, then he

From very early times it was the law that a contract was an entire thing, and that, therefore, all who were parties to the contract must, if alive, join as plaintiffs, and must be joined as defendants. If this was not done there must be a plea in abatement (Com. Dig. Abatement, E. 12, F. 8). That very learned lawyer cites 7 Hen. 4, 6, and 20 Hen. 6, 11, as authorities for this, and probably earlier authorities might be found, but I think it unnecessary to search for them, as it has never, as far as I know, been doubted that the defendant might plead the non-joinder of his joint contractors in abatement, and in that way compel the plaintiff to join as defendants all who were parties to the joint contract and were still alive. But there was long a controversy as to whether the plea in abatement was the only way in which the objection could be raised. If on the evidence it was proved that the contract was joint, it was thought that there was a variance between the proof of a joint contract with the parties to the action, and some one not a party to the action, and still alive, and the allegation in the declaration which, it was thought, must be taken to be allegation of a contract between the parties to the action and no others, and consequently that there should be a nonsuit or verdict for the defendant on the ground of variance. This, it has now been settled, is the law in cases where the objection is the non-joinder of a plaintiff; and consequently the non-joinder of a co-contractor as plaintiff was never in modern times pleaded in abatement. And it was long thought by many that the same course was open to a defendant. Such was the decision of Lord Holt and the Court of King's Bench in Boson v. Sandford, 2 Salk. 440. My Lords, I need hardly point out that if this had been still followed as law, it would have made it clear that the cause of action against the one was the same as that against all; or rather that there was no cause of action at all against the one alone, and never could be judgment against one alone; and so the point could never have risen. But it was established by a series of cases, which may be found collected in Serjeant Williams' may plead in bar the judgment against himself; and if that be not a bar, the plaintiff might go on, either to obtain a joint judgment against himself and his co-contractor, so that he would be twice troubled for the same cause, or the plaintiff might obtain another judgment against the co-contractor, so that there would be two separate judgments for the same debt. Further, the case would form another exception to the general rule, that an action on a joint debt, barred against one, is barred altogether; the only exception now being where one has pleaded matter of personal discharge, as bankruptcy and certificate. It is quite clear, indeed, and was hardly disputed, that if there were a plea in abatement, both must be joined, and that if they were, the judgment pleaded by one would be a bar for both; and it is impossible to hold that the legal effect of a judgment against one of two is to depend on the contingency of both being sued, or the one against whom judgment is not obtained being sued singly and not pleading in abatement. These considerations lead us, quite satisfactorily to our own minds, to the conclusion that where judgment has been obtained for a debt, as well as a tort, the right given by the record merges the inferior remedy by action for the same debt or tort against another party."

note to Cabell v. Vaughan, 1 Wms. Saund. 290 a, that though all the joint contractors must be joined as co-defendants, the only way of taking advantage of the non-joinder was by a plea in abatement. The first case, in which I find this decided was Rice v. Shute, 5 Burr. 2611. The last in which I find it controverted, though unsuccessfully, was Evans v. Lewis, 1 Wms. Saund. 291 (d), in 1794. But though the mode of enforcing the joinder of all was thus cut down, it still remained the law that all ought to be joined. And consequently I cannot doubt that the judges in King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494, were accurate in holding that the two actions were upon the same cause of action. I cannot agree in what seems to be the opinion of the noble and learned Lord on my left (Lord Penzance) that the Judicature Act has taken away the right of the joint contractor to have the other joint contractors joined as defendants, or made it a mere matter of discretion in the court to permit it. With great deference I think that the right remains, though the mode of enforcing it is changed.

I do not think the defence a meritorious one; but I think in the present case there is no great hardship. The plaintiffs had a right of recourse against Hamilton, for which they never bargained; but they did nothing inequitable in taking advantage of that which the law gave them. They have destroyed that remedy by taking a judgment against persons who turn out to be insolvent. I do not see that Hamilton does anything inequitable in taking advantage of the defence which the law gives him. The plaintiffs got a right by operation of law, without any merits of their own, by what, as far as regards them, was pure good luck. They have lost it by what was no fault of theirs, but was, as far as they were concerned, pure bad luck. If the plaintiffs were willing to take advantage of their good luck against defendant, it seems no hardship that he should take advantage of their bad luck against them.

But in such a case as King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494, where the plaintiff had contracted with the provisional committee of a company, and consequently was very uncertain how many were joint contractors, it did operate harshly. He dared not join many in the first action, for, as the law then stood, if he failed as to any one he failed as to all; and it does seem hard that a judgment obtained under such circumstances, against one should be, without satisfaction, a bar as to all the others. This hardship is very much removed by the provisions of the existing law, by which the plaintiff recovers judgment against those whom he proves to be his debtors, though he has joined others as defendants; he has only to pay the costs of those improperly joined. But I think that the hardness of the law even if it exist, is a reason for altering it, not for refusing to act upon it; and I think no doubt has ever been expressed, unless perhaps in Ex parte Waterfall, 4 De G. & Sm. 199, that King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494, does truly state the law as it existed before the Judicature Acts, and it was not doubted in the courts below, or I think seriously questioned at the bar, that it did so.

But since the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, law and equity are to be concurrently administered. And, therefore, if before the passing of those acts the plaintiffs could have sued in equity on these facts, or if they could have successfully applied for an injunction to prevent the defendant from pleading this defence, they may raise the same point in this suit in the Common Pleas Division. But the Judicature Acts do not create any equity applicable to this case which did not exist before. They only enable the court to administer the equities already existing without the delay and expense formerly required.

On the first argument at your Lordship's Bar, Mr. Rigby, in a very excellent argument, convinced me that in cases of joint contracts there was no difference between law and equity, except in the single case of the death of one of the parties to a joint contract, where the contract was such that the maxim Inter mercatores jus accrescendi locum non habet applied; but I was diffident of my opinion on a question of such pure, and I might say, technical equity; and was therefore very willing that the case should be re-argued.

I have now heard the opinion of the noble and learned Lords who are conversant with the proceedings in the Courts of Equity, and have no diffidence in saying that I am of the same opinion.¹⁹

WEGG PROSSER v. EVANS.

(Court of Appeal, 1894. [1895] 1 Q. B. 108.)

LORD ESHER, M. R.²⁰ In this case the plaintiff was the owner of a farm which he had let, and, being doubtful of the tenant's ability to pay his rent, he took a guarantee from the defendant and one Thomas that the rent would be paid. The guarantee was joint, not joint and ¹⁹ In Hammond v. Schofield, [1891] 1 Q. B. 453, a defendant against whom, after service of summons, a consent judgment had been entered, consented to having the judgment set aside and the writ amended to join another defendant whom the plaintiff discovered to have contracted jointly with the defendant, but the court refused to set the judgment aside because of the rule that judgment recovered against one of two joint contractors is a bar to an action against the other.

In Coles v. McKenna, 80 N. J. L. 48 (1910), the rule of Kendall v. Hamilton was applied to successive judgments in the same action. There the plaintiff took final judgment by default against two defendants and, the cause of action being single, was held to have lost it by merger as against the defendants who did not default.

several. The tenant did not pay rent that was due; and thereupon the guarantee became effective, and the plaintiff had a right of action upon it. That action ought, no doubt, to be a joint action against both of the guarantors. If in such a case an action were brought against one of the two joint contractors only, he might, under the old system, have pleaded in abatement, and so enforced the joinder of the other; and since the Judicature Act, pleas in abatement having been abolished, the same result could be brought about by an application for an order to enforce joinder of the other joint contractor. The plaintiff, however, did not at that time bring an action against the guarantors or either of them. He took a check for the amount of the rent due from Thomas. By so doing he did not give time to the principal debtor, or do any injury to the present defendant. The check was not by itself a satisfaction of the debt. It was given way of what has been styled a conditional payment. If the check had been paid, it would have been payment of the debt on the guarantee, and that payment would have no doubt prevented the plaintiff from suing the defendant. The defendant would thereupon have become liable to an action by Thomas for contribution; but no additional expense would be occasioned to him through the giving and payment of the check, and his position would not be altered thereby in any way. But the check was dishonored, and Thomas did not pay it. Thereupon the plaintiff sued him upon the check. The cause of action in that action was the dishonor of the check, and upon that the plaintiff recovered judgment. If that judgment had been satisfied, and the plaintiff had obtained the fruits of it by execution, that would have been equivalent to payment of the debt on the guarantee; but it has not been satisfied. The present defendant has not been in any way injured by the transaction with regard to the check. He would not be liable to bear any of the costs of the action upon it, nor is his position altered for the worse in the smallest degree. All that has happened, so far as he is concerned, appears to be that probably he has not been called upon to pay under the guarantee so soon as he otherwise might have been. It is contended, nevertheless, that the rule of law on the subject is that by reason of this transaction with regard to the check which took place between the plaintiff and Thomas, and which did not prejudicially affect the defendant in any way, the plaintiff cannot now sue the defendant on the guarantee. To my mind, if the rule were as alleged, it would be a technicality of the most stringent kind and one which would make the law on the subject contrary to the justice and truth of the matter. I for one object to such a technicality, and, and will not act upon it, unless I am obliged to do so by authority. If I were bound by the authority of decided cases, of course, I should bow to that authority; but we ought, I think, to look very closely at the cases on the subject to see whether we are bound by authority to hold that there is such a technical rule as is suggested. It is no doubt the law that, if the plaintiff had sued Thomas alone on the guarantee and not on the check, and had recovered judgment against him, he could not afterward have sued the present defendant. If that had been the case here, I should have been bound by a technical rule of law which has existed so long that I must bow to it. But in the present case the plaintiff did not sue Thomas on the guarantee, but on the check. Is there any case which decides that, where a judgment is recovered against one of two joint contractors, not on the original contract, but on a check given by him as this was, the action against the other joint contractor is barred? The case of Drake v. Mitchell, 3 East 251, appears to me to be absolutely to the contrary effect. That was decided by four judges who were eminently well acquainted with the common law of England and with business. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said in that case: "I have always understood the principle of transit in rem judicatam to relate only to the particular cause of action in which the judgment is recovered operating as a change of remedy from its being of a higher nature than before. But a judgment recovered in any form of action is still but a security for the original cause of action, until it be made productive in satisfaction to the party; and therefore till then it cannot operate to change any other collateral concurrent remedy which the party may have." Anything plainer than these expressions there cannot be. In this case no judgment had been recovered against Thomas in respect of the particular cause of action on which the defendant is sued, viz., the breach of the guarantee. Thomas was not sued upon that cause of action, but on another, viz., non-payment of the check. But it was said that Cambefort v. Chapman, 19 Q. B. D. 229, was to the contrary effect. I do not think it can be denied that that case conflicts with Drake v. Mitchell. That being so, the question is which we ought to follow. The decision in Drake v. Mitchell was given in 1803, and has stood from that time till 1887, when Cambefort v. Chapman was decided. I think that that alone is a ground for giving a preference to the older decision; but from what I have said it will be obvious that my judgment goes with that decision and not with the later one. Therefore, I think we should follow the decision in Drake v. Mitchell, unless there is some authority binding upon this court by which it has been overruled. I do not think there is any such authority. I do not think that the House of Lords intended by their judgment in Kendall v. Hamilton, 4 App. Cas. 504, to overrule the decision in Drake v. Mitchell.

The defendant not being prejudiced in any way by what took place with regard to the check, in my view of the case it could only be some mere technical rule of law that could produce what to my mind would be the unjust result of releasing the defendant from liability upon his contract; and there is, in my opinion, no authority which obliges me to say that there is such a rule of law. It was said that the defendant had a right to have Thomas joined as a co-defendant in the action, and that he could not have him joined because of what took place with regard to the check. But it appears to me that the hypothesis on which this argument is based is incorrect. It follows from what I have said that the defendant, if he thought it worth his while, had a right to call on the plaintiff to join Thomas; and Thomas could have made no valid objection to being joined, nor the plaintiff to joining him.

I think that this case is governed by the decision in Drake v. Mitchell and that Cambefort v. Chapman was wrongly decided. For these reasons I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

*Appeal dismissed.*²¹

DENNETT ET AL EX'RS V. CHICK ET AL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1823. 2 Greenl. 191, 11 Am. Dec. 59.)

Assumpsit on a joint promissory note, made by the defendants to the plaintiffs' testatrix. The defendant Ham not being to be found in this state, and having no domicile here, no service was made on him. The Defendant Chick appeared, and pleaded in bar a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Strafford county in the state of New Hampshire, recovered by the testatrix against Ham, in an action on the same note, Chick having no domicil nor property in that state; on which judgment a writ of execution had been issued and returned without satisfaction. To this plea the plaintiff demurred.

MELLEN, C. J.²² * * * If one of two joint promisors be sued, it is well known that unless he plead the non-joinder of his co-promisor in abatement, he is liable to a several judgment in the action. The judgment in New Hampshire was rendered on default; and if that action had been sued in this state, and against Ham only, such a judgment would have been regular. In those cases where the promisors in a joint note live in different states, no joint action can be maintained and pursued to a judgment; and unless a suit can be sustained against one of the ²¹ In concurring, Lopes, L. J., said: "The question, therefore, is whether the cause of action in respect of the check was the same as that in respect of the guarantee. It seems obvious that the two causes of action are entirely different. The pleadings would be different and different questions of law and fact might arise and have to be determined, in the two actions respectively. It is to be observed that in the action on the check Thomas could not have claimed that the defendant should be joined as a co-defendant, whereas in an action on the guarantee he could" (pp. 114-115), and Rigby, L. J., said: "In order that the doctrine of merger may apply, the causes of action must be the same in each case, i. e., not only must they be concerned with the same subject-matter, but the parties to them must be the same. On the question of merger, therefore, I entertain no doubt that the joint cause of action against the guarantors was not merged in the judgment on the separate cause of action against one of them in respect of the check" (pp. 116-117).

promisors alone, no remedy can be had by the promisee. These inconveniences are considered in the case of Tappan v. Bruen, 5 Mass. 193, and seem to be the basis of that decision. It is there decided that in such a case according to immemorial usage an action may be maintained against the promisor who lives in the state, where no service could be made on the other living without the state. The same principle is recognized in a note to the case of Call v. Hagger et al. 8 Mass. 423. It is true that in Ward v. Johnson, 13 Mass. 143, the court decided that, as the plaintiff had in a former action recovered a judgment against one of the defendants, such judgment disproved the joint promise on which the plaintiff relied, and formed a bar to the action. In two respects, however, that action differs from this. There, the former judgment was recovered in Massachusetts against one of the promisors; and the writ in the latter was served on both the promisors, and they both joined in pleading the several judgment in bar. In the case before us, the writ was served on Chick only, and he only appears and pleads the New Hampshire judgment. Can he avail himself of a judgment recovered against another person, merely because he was a joint promisor? It is a general rule that no person is bound by a judgment or can avail himself of it, unless he be a party or privy to it. In this case the plea does not contain any averment that the former judgment has been satisfied. The justice of the case is so clearly with the plaintiffs, that unless some unquestioned principle sanctions the defense, we are disposed to render judgment in their favor. * * *

We do not perceive any technical rule of law by which the plea in this action can be considered a good bar; and for the reasons given we are of opinion that the plea in bar is insufficient.

²³ For a decision under a Massachusetts statute, see Odom v. Denny, 16 Gray (Mass.) 114 (1860).

"It is a well settled rule, that in actions for the breach of a contract, whether in assumpsit, covenant, debt, or case, a verdict or judgment cannot generally be given in a joint action against one defendant without the other. 1 Chit. Pl. 31; 1 Bos. & Pul. 73; 12 East 93; and it is said that where three contract jointly and separately, and the plaintiff sues two, without objection to judgment, he cannot afterwards sue the other, having elected to consider the agreement a joint one. Hammond on Parties to Actions, 230; also, if judgment is obtained against one of two or more persons, jointly liable, on a separate action against him on said contract, the plaintiff cannot afterwards proceed against the parties omitted, but must lose their security. 1 Ch. Pl. 29; 4 Com. Dig. Action K, 4; 13 Mass. 148, Ward v. Johnson, et al.

"But these cases are all subject to exceptions wherever the necessity of the case requires a separate suit to be brought. In the present instance a sufficient excuse * * * arises from the fact that but one of the defendants was within the jurisdiction of the government when the first suit was brought." Upham, J., in Olcott v. Little, 9 N. H. 259, 261-262 (1838).

But contra, see Fleming v. Ross, 225 Ill. 149 (1907).

THE PRESIDENT & C. OF THE BANGOR BANK, v. TREAT ET AL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1829. 6 Greenl. 207, 19 Am. Dec. 210.)

MELLEN, C. J. This is an action of assumpsit, and the declaration states that the note was signed by the defendants and Allen Gilman, jointly and severally; and that a judgment had been recovered on the note against Gilman in a several action against him. The defendants have moved in arrest of judgment on account of the joinder of them in the present suit. When three persons by bond, covenant or note jointly and severally contract, the creditor may treat the contract as joint or several at his election; and may join all in the same action or sue each one severally; but he cannot, except in one case, sue two of the three, because that is treating the contract neither as joint or several. But if one of the three be dead, and that fact be averred in the declaration, the surviving two may be joined. In the present case, Gilman is living. The plaintiffs contend that as judgment had been recovered against him, such judgment entitled them to join the other two in the same manner as though he was dead. This is not so. When they sued Gilman alone, they elected to consider the promise or contract as several; and having obtained a judgment they are bound by such election. In case of death, the act of God has deprived the party of the power of joining all the contractors; but he may still consider the contract as joint, and sue the surviving two. The plaintiffs have disabled themselves from maintaining this action by their former one. 1 Saund. 291, e. The objection is good in arrest of judgment, where the fact relied on by the defendants appears on the record, as in the present case.

²⁴ But in In re Davison, 13 Q. B. D. 50, 53-54 (1884), Cave, J., said: "Is the separate cause of action merged in the joint judgment? Take the illustration of a joint and several note against A, B and C, which is usually comprised in one document. The result is the same as if three separate notes were given as well as the joint note. If A is sued to judgment on his separate note, is the joint note of A, B and C merged in the judgment? On principle, why should it be? The object of taking a joint and several note is to have the separate liability of each promisor as well as the joint liability of all, and why should the fact that the separate liability of one promisor has merged in a separate judgment against his prove a bar to an action on the joint note?"

And in People v. Harrison, 82 Ill. 84 (1876), though the argument was not necessary for the actual decision, Craig, J., said:

"Contracts which are joint and several may be regarded as furnishing two distinct remedies: one by a joint action against all the obligors, the other by a several action against each. Freeman on Judgments, § 335. If this be correct, an action against all the obligors on the joint liability would not be a bar to an action against each one on the several liability.

"As was held in Moore v. Rogers, [29 Ill. 347] supra, where the contract is joint and several, its legal effect is double, equivalent to independent contracts founded upon one consideration, for performance severally and also for performance jointly; and distinct remedies upon the same instrument, treating HAWLEY, J.²⁵ This is an action at law, brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendants in error upon a joint bond given by E. Oldendorff & Co., as principal, and Frank Botefuhr and John Brendle, as sureties, for the faithful performance of the duties of the principal in the bond as the agent of the plaintiff in error for Multnomah county, Or. The defendants Mary Tynan and August Stoldt are the personal representatives of John Brendle, deceased. E. Oldendorff, the principal it as a joint contract and as a several contract, may be pursued until satisfaction is fully obtained." See also Turner v. Whitmore, 63 Me. 526 (1874).

CONNECTICUT FIRE INS. CO. v. OLDENDORFF ET AL.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 1896. 73 Fed. 88, 19 C. C. A. 379.)

In line with the decision in the principal case, however, it has been said: "That a judgment for or against one of the makers of a joint obligation, is a bar to an action afterwards brought against another, was settled upon a full review of all the authorities, in Sloc v. Lea, 18 Ohio 279. The reasons upon which the doctrine rests are somewhat technical; but the decision seems to have been the necessary consequence of the common law rules of pleading applicable to the question, and the legal effect of the contract upon which the action was brought.

"But the case is entirely different when the obligation is, in terms, joint and several. In such case the creditor has the election to treat the obligation as joint or several, and he may sue and recover against each one of the makers separately, or all jointly; but he can not do both, and hence the recovery of a joint judgment is a bar to separate actions, and separate judgments equally so to a joint action.

"This, we think, is the fair result of the teachings of the elementary books and adjudged cases, from the earliest times. Indeed, we know not where it has ever been doubted, except in the case of The United States v. Cushman, 2 Sum. 436, where Judge Story has labored at much length to establish the position, that a joint judgment is no bar to a separate suit against one of the obligors, on a joint and several bond; that the joint judgment only bars the joint remedy and in nowise affects the several remedy, and that the two may be consequently pursued. The whole of the reasoning of the learned judge is based upon what he considers the legal effect of the contract; by which, he insists, each of the obligors has agreed 'that he will be liable to a joint action, and to a several action, for the debt'; and that the supposition, that the obligee has an election only of the one remedy, or the other, and that by electing a joint suit he waives his right to maintain a several suit, 'is not a sound legal interpretation of the contract.' If this reasoning is sound, then all that is said in the books about an election of remedies, is wholly unmeaning. It is very true, that each obligor has bound himself to submit to either form of remedy; but it is equally true, that he bound himself but by one instrument, and for one debt; and whenever, by the pursuit of either remedy, the debt is carried into judgment, the instrument is necessarily extinguished, or merged in the higher security, and is no longer capable of laying the foundation for another recovery. This seems to us quite conclusive of the strictly legal aspects of the question; but when viewed in a broader light, and as a matter of governmental policy in furnishing adequate remedies for the enforcement of rights, no possible reason can be given for vexing the defendant with two suits, when one judgment, in either form, is just as effective for reaching all his property, whether held jointly or severally, as the two could be. We are therefore of the opinion that the creditor, in such a contract, is put to his election which in the bond, made default but no judgment has been entered against him. The case was regularly tried before a jury as to the other defendants, and a verdict rendered in their favor. Separate judgments for costs were entered in favor of defendant Botefuhr on the 27th day of June, 1894, and for defendants Mary Tynan and August Stoldt on July 11, 1894. On January 5, 1895, a petition for a writ of error was filed, setting forth the judgment in favor of defendants Mary Tynan and August Stoldt, and praying for the issuance of a writ of error therefrom to this court. The writ of error was, on the same day, allowed as prayed for in the petition.

The defendant Botefuhr moves to dismiss the writ of error upon several grounds, among others, that he is not a party named in the petition for writ of error, that he is not a party to the judgment certified to this court, that a judgment was entered in his favor on June 27, 1894, and that the writ of error herein was not sued out within six months after the entry of said judgment in the circuit court. It is therefore perfectly clear that there is no writ of error as against the judgment rendered in favor of Frank Botefuhr. None could have been sued out against said judgment upon the date when the petition for the writ was presented, because more than six months had elapsed after the entry of said judgment. * * * The motion to dismiss as to Botefuhr is well taken, and must be allowed.

The granting of this motion as to Botefuhr necessitates like action as to the motion of defendants Tynan and Stoldt, which is based upon the ground, among others, that a release as to one of the joint obligors upon the bond releases all. The failure of the plaintiff to sue out its writ of error within six months after the entry of the judgment against Botefuhr makes that judgment final, and operates as a release to Botefuhr from all liability upon the bond. If the plaintiff had brought all the defendants before the court, to correct the judgments which were adjudged in favor of defendants severally, within the time allowed by statute, the action of the court below could have been reviewed; but the writ of error seeks only to review the judgment as to two of the defendants. The action being joint as to all, the defendants before the court have the right to object to any review of the case on the merits, upon the ground that their co-defendant has not been brought before the court to share in the costs, if any were to be adjudged against them. The objection here made stands substantially upon the same plane, and is based upon the same reason, as if, though the action had been originally of the remedies, that the law provides him, he will pursue. But the question still remains: What acts of the creditor will determine his election?" Ranney, J., in Clinton Bank of Columbus v. Hart, 5 Oh. St. 34, 34-36 (1855). The case holds that election is not final until judgment upon the merits on one remedy.

But is not the difficulty that the talk is of election and of merger, when the public policy against unnecessary double vexation can operate to present the needless extra litigation without having the operation classed as either?

brought against the two defendants, or had been brought against all, and a judgment had thereafter been rendered against one of the joint obligors. In either event, objections based upon the ground that all the joint obligors must be proceeded against jointly would have to be sustained. * * *

In the present case, the plaintiff, by its own act, has released one of the joint obligors of all liability, and is now seeking to enforce its rights against the others after the cause of action has been released as to one "by operation of law, and at the instance and by the act of the creditor." The general rule that a release of one of several joint obligors operates as a release of all is well settled. 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 751, and authorities there cited. There are several exceptions to this general rule, which need not be noticed, as this case does not come within any of the recognized exceptions of the adjudged cases.

The motion of Tynan and Stoldt is sustained. The writ of error is dismissed.²⁶

BAYLY v. GARFORD.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1642. March N. C. 125.)

Bayly brought an action of debt upon a bond against Garford, executor of another; the defendant pleaded non est factum of the testator, ²⁶ In Cowley v. Patch, Executor, 120 Mass. 137, 138-139 (1876), Gray, C. J., said: "In order to maintain an action on a joint contract, whether the action is brought against one or against both of the joint contractors, it is necessary to prove the liability of both; for if one only is or ever was liable, there is not a joint, but only a several liability, and a variance from the cause of action declared on. For example, if one joint contractor is sued alone, and does not plead in abatement the non-joinder of the other, and judgment is rendered against the one sued, it merges the cause of action against him, and (unless otherwise provided by statute) as the two are no longer jointly liable, prevents a subsequent recovery against the other joint contractor. Ward v. Johnson, 13 Mass. 148; King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494; Mason v. Eldred, 6 Wall. 231. So if, in such an action, the judgment is for the defendant, upon the ground that there is no joint liability, it is a bar to a subsequent action against the other contractor upon the joint contract. Phillips v. Ward, 2 H. & C. 717," and that the same rule must be applied, although by reason of the death of one joint contractor, and the provision of the state statute, "enabling an action to be maintained against his administrator as if the contract had been originally joint and several, the plaintiff might maintain one action against the survivor, and another against the administrator of the deceased," for "the severance is merely for purposes of remedy, and the plaintiff must still, in either action, prove that the original liability was joint, and that, so far as concerns that question, both the survivor and the administrator of the deceased are liable."

In Kirkpatrick v. Stingley, 2 Ind. 269 (1850), there was a joint and several obligation claimed by plaintiff against Kirkpatrick, Bush and Patton and a upon which a special verdict was given, viz., that the testator was bound in that bond with two others jointly and severally, and that afterwards the seals of the two others were eaten with mice and rats; and whether now that were the bond of the testator or not was the question which the jury referred to the court.

Note, the court, viz., Foster, Reeve, Crawley and Bankes Chief Justice did strongly incline that judgment ought to be given for the defendant; and their reason was, that if the obligee by his act or own laches discharge one of the obligors where they are jointly and severally bound, that the same discharges them all; but gave day for the further debating of the case, for that this was the first time it was argued.⁸⁷

PETTIGREW MACHINE CO. v. HARMON.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas, 1885. 45 Ark. 290.)

COCKRILL, C. J. The appellant sued Reynolds, Doughty, Chase, Owens and Harmon on a promissory note executed by Reynolds, Doughty & Co., alleging that the parties sued were partners doing business under that style when the note was executed. The court tried the case without the intervention of a jury, after the issues were made, and found the facts to be that Reynolds, Doughty and Harmon, alone, composed the firm of Reynolds, Doughty & Co., and that they had executed the note sued on; that afterwards Reynolds and Doughty failed in business and judgment that Kirkpatrick and Patton were not jointly liable with Bush. Then this action was brought against Kirkpatrick and the judgment for defendants in the former action was pleaded in bar. The court held that the former judgment simply determined that there was no joint liability and left the question of several liability open, for the defendant "might be liable alone and yet not jointly. The judgment is not, in a legal sense, between the same parties nor upon the same contract" (p. 274).

⁸⁷ See Seaton v. Henson, 2 Lev. 220 (1679), where it was held that an obligation wherein three were jointly and severally bound was made void as to all by the seal of one being torn off.

But in Mathewson's Case, 5 Co. 22b (1597), it was held that where covenants were joint as to some and several as to others, the fact that the seal of one of those covenanting severally "was broke from the deed" did not avoid the deed against any except him. See Collins v. Prosser, 1 B. & C. 682 (1823). And where a seal on a bond was eaten by mice after issue joined on a plea of non est factum in debt on the bond, judgment on the bond was not denied in Nichols v. Haywood, 1 Dyer 59a (1545). A deed of conveyance, having passed title, was held in Argoll v. Cheney, Palmer 402, 403 (1624) not to lose its effect because a little boy tore off the seals.

In England decisions as to spoliation still go on the ground that "a party who has the custody of an instrument made for his benefit is bound to preserve it in its original state" (Davidson v. Cooper, reported, post, p. 1454), but except under § 124 of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, that is not true in general in the United States.

made an assignment to one Hunt for the benefit of their creditors; that Hunt accepted the trust, and while acting as assignee, and also as agent for Reynolds and Doughty, to obtain their discharge from appellant's claim, he paid the appellant twenty cents in the dollar on their debt out of the assets held by him as assignee, and took from them the following instrument in writing, viz:

"Received of J. B. Hunt, assignee of Reynolds and Doughty, thirty-three and 87-100 dollars ($33.87) in full of my claim against them for one hundred and sixty-nine and 37-100 dollars, principal and interest. This receipt is not to be construed as releasing any other party whomsoever, responsible on the said note as partners or otherwise."

The court declared the effect of this to be a release to Reynolds and Doughty of the debt, and that the release of them inured to the benefit of their co-obligor, Harmon, and accordingly gave judgment for the appellees.

It is very clear that the mere payment by a debtor to his creditor of a less sum than the amount of the debt due, though received as full satisfaction, is not an extinguishment of the demand. An agreement to accept from a third person in behalf of the debtor, however, a less amount for the whole, is binding upon the creditor, and will discharge the debt, Gordon v. Moore, 44 Ark. 349.

In the case before us the payment was made at the instance of Reynolds and Doughty, but by a third person, and out of a fund over which they had no control. The assignment to Hunt vested the title to their assets in him, subject to the trust, and placed the same beyond their reach. There was no hope of a surplus remaining after the debts were paid, and until that was done they had no legal or equitable interest in the proceeds, that they could control or dispose of in any manner. Bartlett, et al. v. Tea, 1 McCrea 176. The assignment had not been closed, and it was not known what percentage of their debts the creditors would receive. It was not believed that it would exceed twenty per cent on a final distribution. The appellant accepted this percentage before the distribution was made. It is immaterial that the assignee may have exceeded his authority in making the payment. No one has complained of this; the appellant enjoys the benefit and must stand to his agreement to discharge Reynolds and Doughty. Does this also relieve Harmon, the third partner?

The general rule is, that the release by a creditor of one of several persons who are jointly, or jointly and severally bound to him, is a discharge of all. Vandever v. Clark, 16 Ark. 331; Gordon v. Moore, 44 Ark. 356. And a release to one partner is a release to all.

The reasons given for the rule are, that there is but one debt, and that being once received by the party entitled to it, he has no further claim; or that the debtors have the right of contribution among themselves, and that the releasing creditor ought not to be allowed to enforce his claim against one whose remedy he has taken away.²² A release to have this effect, however, must contain a plain and distinct remission of the claim, and in that event parol testimony cannot be heard to show a contrary intention. Shaw v. Pratt, 22 Pick. 205; Burk v. Noble, 48 Penn. St. 168; Ellis v. Essen, 50 Wis. 138.

If the parties to the instrument cannot reasonably be supposed to have intended a release it will be construed only as an agreement not to charge the person to whom the release is given, and will not be permitted to have the effect of a technical release, 1 Pars. Cont. 23, 162; 1 Whart. Cont. § 1037; Lindley Part. 433-4; Addison on Cont. 1076; McAllister v. Sprague, 34 Me. 296; Bonney v. Bonney, 29 Ia. 448.²³

It is manifest from the terms of the instrument relied upon as a release here that the appellant did not intend to discharge the debt. It expressly reserves the right of the appellant to proceed against any other person whose liability for its payment could be shown. Reynolds and Doughty accepted the discharge subject to this qualification. Their assent to the reservation of the creditor's rights against their co-debtor, raises an implied agreement on their part that the right of the co-debtor to contribution against them, if it existed at all, should remain unimpaired. Bennett v. Pardieu, 63 Cal. 155; Parmelee v. Lawrence, 44 Ill. 405; Solly v. Forbes, 6 Eng. Com. Law 27; North v. Wakefield, 13 Q. B. 541.

Since the instrument does not release the debt or impair the obligation of the co-obligors among themselves, the reason of the rule, that a discharge of one is a discharge of all, fails and the rule itself ceases. The instrument, in effect, is only a covenant to discharge the parties

²² But of course the creditor could not deprive one debtor of the latter's right to contribution from another by releasing that other.

²³ See Samuel Williston, Releases and Covenants Not to Sue Joint, or Joint and Several, Debtors, 25 Harv. L. Rev. 203.

As to the release of one joint obligor releasing the others, it has been said: "The reason why a simple release of the principal debtor discharges the surety is that it would be a fraud on the principal debtor to profess to release him, and then to sue the surety, who in turn would sue him." Mellish, L. J., in In re Natal Investment Co., Nevill's Case, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 43, 47 (1870).

As to the release of one joint and several obligor releasing the others, the holding the same way, is harder to understand. However, "It is too late now to question the law that where the obligation is joint and several, the release of one of two joint debtors has the effect of releasing the others." Collins, L. J., in In re E. W. A. [1901] 2 K. B. 642, 643.

A similar problem exists as to torts. On some of the reasons for the rule that a release or discharge of one or more joint tort feorsors for a consideration is a release of all, see Dwy v. Connecticut Co., 39 Conn. 74, 77-80 (1915). In some states a release to one tort feorsor reserving rights against the others operates as a release of all. Flynn v. Manson, 19 Cal. App. 400, 126 Pac. 181 (1912); Ducey v. Patterson, 37 Col. 216 (1906); McBride v. Scott, 132 Mich. 176 (1903). For reasons for that minority view see Matheson v. O'Kane, 211 Mass. 91 (1912) and 1 Williston on Contracts § 338a.

named, and the general rule again is that this does not release their co-obligors. Bozeman v. State Bank, 7 Ark. 328; 2 Whart. Cont. § 1033.

The following cases are authority to the effect that a discharge of one partner is not a release of others when the instrument of discharge was not so intended. Bennett v. Pardieu, 63 Cal. sup; Parmelee v. Lawrence, 44 Ill. 405; Seymour v. Butler, 8 Ia. 304; Solly v. Forbes, 6 Eng. Com. 27; See 1 Lindl. Part. 434-5.

The payment made by Reynolds and Doughty inured, of course, to the benefit of Harmon, because the debt, to that extent was extinguished, but he can take no other benefit from the transaction.

Let the judgment be affirmed as to all the appellees except Harmon; as to him let the judgment be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.³⁰

OSBORN v. MARTHA'S VINEYARD RAILROAD CO.

GARDNER, J. This action was originally commenced by Samuel Osborn, Jr., one of the plaintiffs. After the trial of the case, Osborn moved to amend his writ by adding, as joint plaintiffs with him, Shubael L. Norton and Nathaniel M. Jernegan, which motion was allowed. The action then proceeded upon the allegation in their declaration, that the defendant owed the three plaintiffs $600, according to the account annexed, which was for 20 tons of iron rails at $30 per ton, giving credit for $400, paid to Norton and Jarnegan.

The first question which arises is whether the contract made by the plaintiffs with the defendant was joint or several. The report finds that the three plaintiffs purchased 20 tons of iron rails in their own names, giving a promissory note, signed by the three, to the vendor thereof. In this purchase, there was no reference to any separate interest of the purchasers in the iron rails, and they became joint owners thereof. They then sold the rails to the defendant, making no reservation of any single interest in any one of the vendors. The defendant promised jointly, not separately, to pay the three plaintiffs the price therefor. This contract was joint, the several payees having therein a joint interest, so that no one could sue for his proportion. When they jointly undertook to sell the rails in one mass to the defendant, they held themselves out to be joint owners, voluntarily assuming that relation to the property sold to the defendant. The contract became a joint contract, the plaintiffs being joint creditors, not several, of the defendant. 2 Chit. Cont. (11th Am. Ed.) 1340. The three owners represented, in effect, that they had a common interest in the property, without any difference in their respective interest and possessions, and that payment was to be made of the entire sum.

The two plaintiffs, Norton and Jarnegan, in behalf of themselves and of Osborn, settled with the defendant for the amount due, in full payment and satisfaction of their demand, receiving as payment in part money and in part shares of stock in the defendant corporation. The plaintiff Osborn insists that he is not bound by this settlement; and that, in the name of the three vendors, he can recover in money that portion of the original indebtedness to which, as between himself and his associates, he was entitled.

The interest of the three plaintiffs in their joint claim against the defendant was such that each had an interest in the entire claim. One of them had not only an interest in the third which might be his share, but also in the two-thirds belonging to the others. It has been settled in this action that one cannot maintain an action for his share; the three must join in the suit, because each one has a joint interest in the entire amount due them, and in every part thereof. Osborn is debarred from bringing suit for his third part, because Norton and Jernegan own that third as fully as does Osborn. Each having such an interest in the debt due, one being unable to sue for the whole or his share thereof, it follows that each one, being interested in the entire claim, can settle it with the defendant. Each of the three, by the manner of their dealing with the defendant and with the property, has effectually authorized his partners in the contract to dispose of his interest by payment, settlement, or accord and satisfaction, and to release the defendant from its obligation under the contract. 1 Pars. Cont. 25.

In this case, there was no formal release by writing under seal. The plaintiffs Norton and Jarnegan, upon the settlement, "gave to the defendant a receipted bill of the demand for the price of the rails and interest." The delivery of the shares of stock by the defendant to the plaintiffs, and the payment of the money, were accepted in satisfaction and payment of the debt. It was an accord and satisfaction unconditional, actually executed, and accepted. This operates to release the defendant from further liability upon the contract. No particular form of words is necessary to constitute a valid release. "Any words which show an evident intention to renounce the claim upon, or to discharge, the debtor are sufficient." 2 Chit. Cont. (11th Am. Ed.) 1146. The plaintiff Osborn in his argument has not urged that this settlement was not in effect a release. If this transaction between the parties, if assented to by all who participated in it, was such as to release the defendant from all liability to Norton and Jernegan, of which there is no contention, then it follows that the release of two was the release of all. When there is such a unity of interest as to require a joinder of all the parties interested in a personal action, the release of one is as effectual as the release of all. Austin v. Hall, 13 Johns. 286; Decker v. Livingston, 15 Johns. 479.

In this case, fraud is not set up, nor is there any suggestion of fraud in the transaction. The settlement was in effect an accord and satisfaction, which operates as a release. Wallace v. Kelsall, 7 M. & W. 264, 272.

The settlement made by Norton and Jernegan with the defendant released the defendant from further liability upon its contract with the plaintiffs, and the action cannot be maintained. By the terms of the report, there must be.

³¹ See Lyman v. Gedney, 114 Ill. 388 (1885).

Conversely, where there are joint and several debtors, an accord and satisfaction with one has been held to prevent proof of the claim in bankruptcy against another. In re E. W. A., [1901] 2 K. B. 642.

"But although an agreement to pay a sum of money to two or more persons cannot be enforced at the suit of one or another of them, it seems nevertheless to be the law that a release or an accord and satisfaction by one of these creditors is a bar to an action on the promise by the others. [Wallace v. Kelsall, 7 M. & W. 264]. It is suggested, with deference, that this is not in accordance with principle. The reasons given for the decision are that the other creditors cannot sue without making the releasing creditor co-plaintiff, and he cannot undo his own act by becoming one." W. H. Griffith, Joint Rights and Liabilities, p. 34.

On the chancery attitude, see Steeds v. Steeds, reported, post, p. 1424.

In Buster v. Fletcher, 22 Ida. 172 (1912) where 44 persons employed the plaintiff to build, construct and equip a butter factory and feed mill for them, each of those employing agreeing to pay the plaintiff $100 of the $4,000 to be paid him on the completion of the work, the court held that the employment was joint and the payments were to be several, and the joint employment could not be terminated and the contract canceled or rescinded by a majority or any number less than all of the 44. See also Gibbons v. Bente, 51 Minn. 499 (1892). The same thing would have been held, presumably, of an accord and satisfaction with a majority only.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS. Despite Lord Mansfield's opinion in Whitcomb v. Whiting, 2 Doug. 652 (1781), the great weight of authority is that a new promise or part payment by one joint or joint and several debtor, not actually or ostensibly authorized to act for the others, will not raise the bar of the statute as to the others if it has fallen. State Loan, etc. Co. v. Cochran, 130 Cal. 245 (1900); Kallenbach v. Dickinson, 100 Ill. 427 (1881); Bottles v. Miller, 112 Ind. 584 (1887); Omaha Sav. Bank v. Simeral, 61 Neb. 741 (1901). Local statutes should be consulted, as they fix the rule in some states. By statute the rule of Whitcomb v. Whiting, supra, has ceased to be law in England except so far as the new promise or the part payment is by authority of the one to be affected. Re Tucker [1894] 3 Ch. 429. See 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) at 278, N. If the bar of the statute has not fallen at the time of the new promise or part payment by one, the jurisdictions divide on the question whether a new statutory period starts as to all. That a new period starts as to all see Fendley v. Shults (Ark.), 218 S. W. 197 (1920); Van Staden v. Kline, 64 Ia. 180 (1884); Hayman v. Lambden, 97 Md. 33 (1903); Clinton County v. Smith, 238 Mo. 118 (1911). That a new period starts for only the one promising or paying, see Rogers v. Burr, 105 Ga. 432 (1898); Boynton v. Spafford, 162 Ill. 113 (1896); Mosingo v. Ross, 150 Ind. 688 (1898); Hoover v. Hubbard, 202 N. Y. 289 (1911); Cowhick v. Shingle, 5 Wyo. 87 (1894).

CHAPTER VII.

THE PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACTS.

Section 1. The Classification and History of Conditions Relating to Performance.¹

NICHOLS v. RAYNBRED.

(Courts of Common Pleas and King's Bench, 1615. Hobart, 88.)

Nichols brought an assumpsit against Raynbred, declaring that, in consideration that Nichols promised to deliver the defendant to his own use a cow, the defendant promised to deliver him fifty shillings. Adjudged for the plaintiff in both courts, that the plaintiff need not to aver the delivery of the cow, because it is promise for promise.² Note,

"Where a written instrument, though in form it is a complete contract, and though possession of it is given or exchanged by the parties who sign it, is, when it is signed and possession of it is given, by agreement of the parties, made to depend, as to its going into operation, on an event thereafter to occur, it is not effective or binding as a contract prior to the occurrence of such event, and the fact that the parties who signed a written instrument so agreed may be proved by parol evidence. Ware v. Allen, 128 U. S. 590; Burke v. Delaney, 153 U. S. 228; 3 Jones, Commentaries on Evidence, § 471." Walker, J., in Gateway Produce Co. v. Farrier Bros., 268 Fed. 513, 515 (1920).

In the case of insurance contracts, where an oral contract of insurance may precede the formal policy which displaces it, conditions precedent to the existence of the contract are quite common.

"The rule is not, therefore, that every contract of insurance will authorize recovery in case of loss in the absence of a policy, independent of other agreements or conditions. The agreement itself, or the application, may show that the contract was not one for present insurance but for insurance to take effect in the future, depending upon some condition, such as the acceptance of the application, or delivery of the policy, or upon the performance of some act, such as the payment of premium." Potter, J., in Summers v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 12 Wyo. 369, 384 (1903).

See Arthur L. Corbin, Conditions in the Law of Contracts, 28 Yale L. J. 739.

² Originally in the common law there were no conditions except express ones. This seems to have remained true until after simple bilateral contracts here the promises must be at one instant, for else they will be both nuda pacta.

CONSTABLE v. CLOBERIE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1626. Palmer, 397, as translated in Langdell's Cases on Contracts, 1st ed., 853.)

Covenant upon a charter party. The plaintiff covenanted that his ship should go a voyage to Cadiz with the next wind; and the defendant covenanted that if the ship went the intended voyage, and returned to the Downs, the plaintiff should have so much for the voyage. The defendant traversed that the ship went with the next wind, and upon demurrer the traverse was overruled; for the substance of the covenant was that the ship should go, and not that she should go with the next wind, for that may change every hour; and this is proved by the covenant of the defendant, viz., "if the ship went the intended voyage;" and this was the primary intention of the parties, and not that she should go with the next wind. But, per Justice Jones, if the defendant had covenanted that if the plaintiff went to Cadiz with the next wind, he would pay, &c., there the plaintiff ought to aver that he went with the next wind.* * *

were enforced. But as justice demanded the finding of conditions, the courts would scrutinize contracts under seal containing mutual covenants for express conditions, and they did so even before simple bilateral contracts were recognized. "This gave great importance to the precise terms in which mutual covenants were expressed and it not infrequently happened that a single word turned the scale. Thus if A covenanted with B to give or do something for something else which B covenanted to give or do in return, it was commonly held that the word 'for' made A's covenant dependent upon B's." Langdell's Summary of Contracts, sec. 140. This undue emphasis on such a word as "for" as importing an express condition was the result of the feeling of the judges that performance should be conditional on performance at a time when the judges had not yet reached the conception of conditions as capable of implication. When simple bilateral contracts established a footing, the old analogies seem to have prevailed and at first only express conditions were recognized in such contracts. That is the explanation of Nichols v. Raynbred, supra.

3 "The contract says that, if 'by any cause' the Willlys-Overland is unable to complete all its contracts, it may prorate among its various customers, including complainant. It cannot be that any conceivable cause would justify a default.

"We feel that the construction to be given to the term 'by any cause' is that the cause must be one reasonably beyond the power of the Overland to prevent." Killits, J., in Daily-Overland Co. v. Willlys-Overland, 263 Fed. 171, 181 (1919).

In Liverpool and London & Globe Ins. Co. v. Kearney, 180 U. S. 132 (1900-1901), plaintiffs were allowed to recover on a policy of fire insurance under which they covenanted to keep a set of books with proper entries and the

THOMPSON AND OTHERS v. GILLESPIE.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1855. 5 Ellis & Blackburn, 209.)

LORD CAMPBELL, C. J.⁴ This was an action by the owners of a ship on a charter-party, whereby it was agreed between them and the defendant that the ship, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, should at Sunderland load from the factors of the defendant a full cargo of coals, and, being so loaded, should therewith proceed to Constantinople for orders, and deliver the cargo there or at some port in the Black Sea, being paid freight on the quantity delivered at certain stipulated rates: "one-fourth of the freight to be advanced to the owner's agent in London, on the ship having sailed, less five per last inventory in a fire-proof safe, or in some secure place not exposed to a fire which would destroy the house where the business was carried on, and to produce the books and inventory in case of loss, although the policy provided that "in the event of the failure to produce the same, this policy shall be deemed null and void, and no suit or action at law shall be maintained thereon for any such loss," and although the last inventory was not produced because in the hurry and confusion of moving the books from the safe when the building was on fire it was either left behind and destroyed or otherwise lost. The court said that a "fire-proof safe" did not mean one absolutely sufficient against every fire that might occur but one commonly used and in the judgment of prudent men in the locality sufficient, nor did "some secure place not exposed to a fire" mean a place absolutely secure against any fire that would destroy the house, but a place selected in good faith and with such care as prudent men ought to exercise under like circumstances; and that plaintiffs owed a duty to the defendant to remove the books and inventory if that seemed reasonably prudent under the circumstances. On these propositions as a basis, the court said, per Harlan, J., "We are of opinion that the failure to produce the books and inventory, referred to in the policy, means a failure to produce them if they are in existence when called for, or if they have been lost or destroyed by the fault, negligence, or design of the insured. Under any other interpretation of the policies, the insured could not recover if the books and inventory had been stolen, or had been destroyed in some other manner than by fire, although they had been placed 'in some secure place not exposed to a fire' that would reach the store. If the plaintiffs had the right, under the terms of the policy, as undoubtedly they had, to remove their books and inventory from the safe to some secure place not exposed to a fire which might destroy the building in which they carried on business, surely it was never contemplated that they should lose the benefit of the policies if, in so removing their books and inventory, they were lost or destroyed, they using such care on the occasion as a prudent man, acting in good faith, would exercise. A literal interpretation of the contracts of insurance might sustain a contrary view, but the law does not require such an interpretation. In so holding the court does not make for the parties a contract which they did not make for themselves. It only interprets the contract so as to do no violence to the words used and yet to meet the ends of justice."

That a condition is express and apparently iron-clad does not preclude reasonable interpretation. But once it has been interpreted, it must be lived up to literally as interpreted. See Shadforth v. Higgins, 3 Campbell 385 (1813); The Austin Friars, 71 L. T. 27 (1894).

cent thereon for insurance, interest, and commission." The declaration alleged that the defendant caused the ship to be loaded with a cargo of coals, and "that the said ship, being so loaded, sailed, to wit, for Constantinople, pursuant to the said charter-party;" and that, although the plaintiffs had done everything to entitle them to an advance of one-fourth of the freight, amounting to 214*l.*, the defendant had not paid the same or any part thereof to their agent in London.

The second plea was, "That the said ship was not, at the commencement of the said voyage, tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage; and that by reason of the premises, the said ship and the said cargo of coals were wholly lost." To this plea there was a demurrer. * * *

We are of opinion, however, that this plea is a bar to the action, on the ground that it shows that the advance of freight had never become payable.

Freight, generally speaking, is not payable till the goods have been delivered at the port of destination. Here, by special stipulation, one-quarter of the amount was to be paid in advance on a certain event, viz., the ship having sailed from Sunderland for Constantinople, in pursuance of the charter-party. The charter-party required that when she sailed, she should be "tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage." If she sailed on the voyage in a seaworthy condition, the merchant was to advance one-fourth of the freight, which he could not recover back if the ship, having so sailed, should afterwards be lost by the perils of the sea without having delivered any part of her cargo. Pro tanto the risk was transferred from the shipowners to the merchant; and the arrangement between them was that the amount to be advanced was to be insured by him, as appears clearly from the deduction of five per cent for insurance, interest, and commission. By a policy of insurance, the merchant was to be indemnified to the extent of the sum he was to advance. But he could not have the benefit of this indemnity unless, at the commencement of the voyage, the ship was seaworthy. He must be considered to have promised to pay one-fourth of the freight in advance, if, when the ship sailed, she was in such a condition as that a policy of insurance on the freight would attach, and enable him to recover the money back in case of a subsequent loss. But the plea avers that the ship was not seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and that, by her unseaworthiness, the cargo of coals was wholly lost. It was argued, for the plaintiff, that the loss after the sailing is for this purpose immaterial, and that, although unseaworthy when she sailed, she might have completed the voyage and delivered the cargo in safety. In that case the full freight certainly would have been earned, and would have been payable; but still the conjuncture never would have arisen upon which a part of the freight was to be paid in advance. For these reasons we think that the second plea is sufficient.

There is a third plea, upon which, as it is demurred to, we are bound to give our opinion. This plea has some introductory observations about the ship having been sent to sea in an unseaworthy state, but it contains no allegations to that effect, and we consider the substance and gist of the plea to be that, after the ship sailed and while she was on the high seas (near to the sea shore) the plaintiffs were guilty of negligent and improper conduct with regard to the management of the ship, in permitting her to be for a great length of time without a master and without a proper and sufficient crew to manage and navigate her, by reason whereof the ship and cargo were wholly lost. This plea, we think, is bad, as it admits that the ship sailed on the voyage from Sunderland in pursuance of the charter-party. If this be true, one-fourth of the freight thereupon became payable in advance; and any subsequent default or misconduct of the plaintiffs would only be the subject of a cross-action.

*Judgment for defendant on the second plea; for the plaintiffs on the third.*⁵

TURNER v. GOODWIN.

(Court of King's Bench, 1714. Fortescue 145.)

This was an action of debt on bond for 3000*l*, for the payment of 1500*l*. The condition of the bond recites, that whereas John Dibble was indebted to the plaintiff in a bond for 3000*l*, for payment of 1500*l*, and had recovered judgment for this money; the defendant Goodwin, in consideration that the plaintiff would forbear suing out execution against Dibble, promised to pay the money to the plaintiff on request, he assigning the said judgment. The defendant pleads that the plaintiff had not assigned the said judgment; the plaintiff replies, he was ready to assign, and the defendant demurs.

PARKER, C. J.⁷ The question is, whether the plaintiff's assignment be the first act to be done, or not. * * * Here are no words that expressly show the priority of the act. The defendant would have assigning to be first assigning, and the plaintiff would it assigning thereupon; that is, after payment. This is supplying words supposed to be understood, for here are no express words. * * *

We are all of opinion that there is one way that will solve all these difficulties and that is, that the assignment shall neither precede nor wait, but shall accompany the payment, and both be done at the same time.

The defendant ought to find out the plaintiff, to tender him the money, and at the same time to demand an assignment; and then if the plaintiff refuse, the defendant will be excused. He is not to tender the money absolutely, because he is not bound to pay it absolutely, but he is to tender it sub modo, on the same terms he is to pay it. * * *

He that pleads a tender and refusal, that is not enough, unless he plead that he was always ready; for this is only an excuse for non-payment. The payment required in this case is a special payment upon assumpsit. Otherwise if he had said, 'After that you have proved that I struck you, etc., then I do assume to pay you 20*l*.' And it was said that it was so in 18 E. 4, and that it was so adjudged in this court; and the clerk of the court so affirmed that it was ruled in this court." 1 Williston's Cases on Contracts (1904), p. 186, n.

See Traver v. ———, 1 Siderfin 57 (1661), where the condition of a widow's promise to pay her husband's debt was if the creditor would prove that the husband owed it, and it was held that proof in the action against her was enough.

The question is one of construction of the word "prove." Where the condition is, "If you will prove such a thing," that means, normally, "prove in a legal trial," and the proof, therefore, cannot be deemed a condition precedent to the bringing of the action. That such is the normal meaning of proving the existence of a debt, the commission of a tort, etc., where the promise to pay is conditioned on proof, see also, Butcher v. Vale, 1 Siderfin 313 (1667); Beayne v. Beal, 3 Lev. 240 (1685).

terms, and not a general one; and being obliged to make a special tender, there must be a special refusal, and it must be pleaded in the same manner as a general tender. * * * He must plead he has done all of his part possible, but here he has done nothing at all.

Here is no inconvenience, 'tis in assistance of justice, therefore we are all of opinion that the plaintiff should have judgment.

(Court of King's Bench, 1669. 1 Saunders, 319.)

Debt upon a specialty for £774 15s. The plaintiff declares that the defendant, by his certain writing of agreement made at, etc., by the plaintiff by the name, etc., and the defendant by the name, etc., and brings the deed into court, etc., it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendant in manner and form following—viz., that the defendant should give to the plaintiff the sum of £775 for all his lands, with a house called Ashmole House thereunto belonging, with the brewing vessels remaining in the said house, and with the malt-mill and wheelbarrow; and that, in pursuance of the said agreement, the defendant had given to the plaintiff 5s. as an earnest; and it was by the said writing further agreed between the plaintiff and defendant, that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the residue of the said sum of £775 a week after the feast of St. John the Baptist then next following (all other movables, with the corn upon the ground, except). And although the defendant has paid 5s., parcel, etc., yet the said defendant, although often requested, has not paid the residue to the damage, etc. The defendant prays oyer of the specialty, which is entered in hoc verba, to wit: "May 11th, 1668. It is agreed between Dr. John Pordage and Bassett Cole, Esq., that the said Bassett Cole shall give unto the said doctor £775 for all his lands, with Ashmole House thereunto belonging, with the brewing-vessels as they are now remaining in the said house, and with the malt-mill and wheelbarrow. In witness whereof we do put our hands and seals, mutually given as earnest in performance of this 5s., the money to be paid before midsummer, 1668; all other movables, with the corn upon the ground excepted." And upon oyer thereof the defendant demurs.

But it was adjudged by the court, that the action was well brought without an averment of the conveyance of the land; because it shall be intended that both parties have sealed the specialty. And if the plaintiff has not conveyed the land to the defendant, he has also an action of covenant against the plaintiff upon the agreement contained in the deed, which amounts to a covenant on the part of the plaintiff to convey the land; and so each party has mutual remedy against the other. But it might be otherwise if the specialty had been the words of the defendant only, and not the words of both parties by way of agreement as it is here. And by the conclusion of the deed it is said that both parties had sealed it, and therefore judgment was given for the plaintiff, which was afterward affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, Trin. 22 of King Charles the Second.*

THORP v. THORP.

(Court of King's Bench, 1702. 12 Modern, 455.)

Error from the Court of Common Pleas of a judgment in an action on the case, wherein the plaintiff declared, that the defendant had and held of him by way of mortgage two closes of copyhold lands; and that there was a discourse between them concerning the plaintiff's releasing his equity of redemption therein to the defendant, and concerning divers sums of money due from the plaintiff to the defendant upon the said mortgage; upon which the plaintiff did agree with the defendant that he would release to him the said equity of redemption, in consideration of which the defendant did agree with the plaintiff to pay him seven pounds above all that was due; and that, in consideration that the plaintiff promised the defendant to perform all of his side, the defendant promised the plaintiff to perform of his side; and avers that he did perform all on his, the plaintiff's side, but that the defendant paid one pound seven shillings of the said seven pounds, and no more, &c.

To this the defendant pleads in bar, that long after the promise, viz., 29th July, 1694, the plaintiff did, by indenture made between him and the defendant, release to the defendant "all manner of actions, suits, debts, duties, sum and sums of money, and all demands whatsoever, which ever he had, or he, his heirs, executors, or assigns ever should have, for or by reason of any thing, matter, or demand whatsoever."

Upon oyer of this deed of release, it recited the said mortgage, and released "all provisos therein, and all his estate, right, title, and interest in the said close, both in law and equity;" and then follows the foregoing clause.

And upon this the plaintiff demurred, and judgment for the plaintiff in the Court of Common Pleas.

HOLT, C. J.* We all agree that the promise was not discharged by this release. It was argued at the bar by Cowper [counsel for the plaintiff in error] that if the plaintiff might have founded an action upon the mutual promise and agreement before any performance on his part, that certainly this release would have barred him; and the consequence is very true and necessary, if that were the case. And by the same reason, if he could not bring an action before such time as he had made a release, there is no color for the release to bar him, for till he makes the release in this case, if he has no title to the £7, then till release there is no right of action; and then they do not lie in demand till release, and that a release of "all demands" will not release a thing that does not lie in demand at that time. See 2 Cro. 171; 5 Co. 70; Hoe's Case. * * *

* See Serjeant Williams' Rules on Conditions in Contracts in his note to this case, reprinted post, p. 700.

So the whole question will be here whether the plaintiff could have an action before the release. * * * If in this case there were a positive promise that one should release his equity of redemption, and on the other side that the other would pay £7, then the one might bring his action without any averment of performance; but this agreement is not so, but that the plaintiff should release his equity of redemption, in consideration whereof the defendant was to pay him £7, so that the release is the consideration, and therefore being executory is a condition precedent which must be averred. And whereas there seems to be a variance in the books upon this learning, it will be fit on this occasion to settle it; and I agree the case in Hob. 58 to be good law, for there is a positive agreement that one shall deliver a cow to the other, and that the other shall give him so much money, and therefore the action lies for either side without performance of his promise; but if by the agreement A were to deliver B a cow, and that for it B were to deliver him a horse, there the delivery of the cow would be a condition precedent, and therefore ought to be performed before A can bring his action, and upon this diversity the books are reconcilable. 15 Hen. 7, 10, pl. 17. If A covenant with B to serve him for a year, and B covenant with A to pay him £10, there A shall maintain an action for the £10 before any service; but if B had covenanted to pay £10 for the said service, there A could not maintain an action for the money before the service performed. And there is great reason for this diversity, for when one promises, agrees, or covenants to do one thing for another, there is no reason he should be obliged to do it till that thing for which he promised to do it be done, and the word "for" is a condition precedent in such cases. But upon this head some diversities are to be observed.

First, if there be a day set for the payment of money, or doing the thing which one promises, agrees, or covenants to do for another thing, and that day happens to incur before the time the thing for which the promise, agreement, or covenant is made, is to be performed by the tenor of the agreement; there, though the words be "that the party shall pay the money," or "do the thing for such a thing," or "in consideration of such a thing," after the day is past the other shall have an action for the money or other thing, although the thing for which the promise, agreement, or covenant was made be not performed; for it would be repugnant there to make it a condition precedent, and therefore they are in that case left to mutual remedies on which, by the express words of the agreement, they have depended. See 48 Edw. 3, 2-3, cited in Ughtred's Case, 7 Co. 10b, where the diversity is taken when there are mutual remedies and not; it is thus put in that book: Sir Richard Pool covenants with Sir Ralph Tolcelser to serve him with three esquires in the wars of France; Sir Ralph Tolcelser covenants, in consideration of those services, to pay him so much money; and there it is said action will lie for the money without any services performed. But if you look into the book at large, you will find it was upon the diversity which I have taken, for the case in 48 Edw. 3, 2-3, is, Richard Pool covenants with Ralph Tolcelser to serve him with three esquires in the wars of France, and Ralph Tolcelser covenanted with him to pay him so much money for the service; and it was further agreed that twenty marks of the money should be paid in England, at a day certain, before they went for France, and the rest by quarterly payments, which might likewise incur before the service; and upon action brought by Sir Richard Pool it was objected that the service was not performed, but there was no room for that objection upon the diversity which I have taken, the money, by the agreement, being made payable at a day certain before the service was to have been performed. 1 Vent. 147. * * *

Secondly, if there be a day for the payment of the money or doing of other act for another, and that day is to be after the performance of the thing for which the promise, etc., was made, there, if the agreement be to pay the money, or do other thing "for" or "in consideration," or such other words that would make a condition precedent, there such things, for the doing or performing of which the other agrees to pay the money, or do other thing, must be averred to maintain an action, and for this Sir W. Jones, 318. The executor of A brought an action on the case against B declaring that in consideration A in his lifetime did promise to assure certain lands to B before Michaelmas next, B promised to pay him so much money for the land; so the assurance was to be made before Michaelmas, and the money was to be paid for the land, and consequently after Michaelmas, for A had time till Michaelmas to make the assurance; and because the assurance was to have been made first, and the money by agreement to be paid for the land, though there were mutual promises, yet it was adjudged the action would not lie for the money without making the assurance first. This case, as it is there reported, is intricate, and requires consideration to make this construction upon it; but upon examination it is a full authority in point. Dy. 76 pl. 3. A agrees to deliver B. a hawk at midsummer, for which he agrees to pay him a horse at Michaelmas; there if a hawk be not delivered at midsummer, there shall be no horse delivered at Michaelmas, nor any remedy for it. * * *

But let us now see the reason of the thing. What is the reason that mutual promises shall bear an action without performance? One's bargain is to be performed according as he makes it. If he make a bargain, and rely on the other's covenant or promise to have what he would have done to him, it is his own fault. If the agreement be that A shall have the horse of B, and A agree that B shall have his money, they may make it so, and then there needs no averment of performance to maintain an action on either side; but if it appear by the agreement that the plain intent of either party was to have the thing to be done to him performed, before his doing what he undertakes of his side, it must be then averred, as where a man agrees to give so much money for a horse, it is plain he meant to have the horse first, and therefore he says the money shall be given for the horse. * * *

But in our case the money was to be paid for the release, and a vast difference. And the £7 being to be paid in consideration of making the release, the words "in consideration" make a condition precedent, which till performed does not entitle the plaintiff to action. Then the £7 were not demandable here, and consequently not dischargeable by the general release of all demands.

Another objection was that the plaintiff had not averred a release given or tendered by him, as he ought to have done. But here sufficient appears that it was done, for he avers performance of all that was to be done on his side; and that general averment, though informal, and beside wants time and place, for which it had been bad on demurrer, is helped by the defendant's passing it over and pleading a release, whereby he admits the plaintiff had a cause of action. And there are stronger cases than this in the books, where pleading over has helped an insufficient declaration. * * * So we all agree the judgment ought to be affirmed, for there was no money due to the plaintiff till release of the equity of redemption, and therefore none demandable till then, and consequently a release of all demands could not bar it.

Note: In this case Cowper offered this diversity in relation to mutual promises, that where the promise is of a valuable thing to the defendant, there such promise, without any performance, may be a good consideration; but where the promise is not of a thing valuable, but may be a consideration, because a trouble to the party promising; there such promise, without a performance, cannot be a consideration, because such promise cannot be a trouble.

But per Holt, C. J., no diversity at all, but the cases are the same upon the learning laid down above.

(Court of King's Bench, 1723. 1 Strange, 569.)

The plaintiff declares, that the defendant by his writing indented agreed with the plaintiff, that he, the defendant, would accept of the plaintiff £500 fourth subscription so soon as the receipts should be delivered out by the company, and would pay for the same £950 on November 5th next after the date of the writing. Then he avers, that the defendant did not pay the money at the day.

The defendant demurs generally.

PRATT, C. J.¹⁰ This is an action upon a deed poll made by the defendant, and whereby he covenants to accept so much stock, and to pay for the same, and the plaintiff in an action for the money has not averred a delivery or tender of the stock, and for this fault we are all of opinion the declaration is not good.

The intent of the parties appears to be, that one should have the money, and the other the stock; and not that either should perform his part of the agreement, and lay himself at the mercy of the other for the equivalent. This is not a covenant entered into by both parties, upon which each will have his mutual remedy; but it is the deed poll of the defendant only, and, therefore, though upon delivery or tender of the stock the plaintiff will have his remedy for the money, yet the defendant on the other side upon payment of the money will have no remedy to compel the delivery of the stock; and having no such remedy he shall not be obliged to pay the money, till the consideration for which it is payable is performed.

The word pro will be either a condition precedent or subsequent, as will best answer the intent of the parties; in this case it must be a condition precedent, because otherwise the intention of the defendant to have the stock for his money can never take effect, and this is proved by 7 Co. 10, and 1 Inst. 204, where the annuity pro una acra, says the book, supposes the acre to be first granted. * * *

The resolutions that were mentioned at the bar of the case of Thorp v. Thorp are all founded on great reason, and the first of them is agreeable to the resolution of this case, which is an executory contract, where one is to do the act, and for the doing thereof the other is to pay.

And this difference between a mutual covenant and a deed poll is likewise taken and allowed in the case of Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 320, where the court were of opinion the defendant had his remedy, "otherwise (says the book) it would have been, if the deed had been the words of the defendant only," which is this case.

For these reasons we are all of opinion the defendant must have judgment.

¹⁰ Part of the opinion is omitted.

KINGSTON v. PRESTON.

(Court of King's Bench, 1773. 2 Douglas, 689.)¹¹

Action of debt for non-performance of covenants contained in certain articles of agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant. The declaration stated: That, by articles made the 24th of March, 1770, the plaintiff, for the considerations thereafter mentioned, covenanted with the defendant to serve him for one year and a quarter next ensuing, as a covenant servant, in his trade of a silk-mercier, at 200*l.* a year, and, in consideration of the premises, the defendant covenanted that, at the end of the year and a quarter, he would give up his business of a mercier to the plaintiff, and a nephew of the defendant, or some other person to be nominated by the defendant, and give up to them his stock in trade, at a fair valuation; and that, between the young traders, deeds of partnership should be executed for fourteen years, and from and immediately after the execution of the said deeds the defendant would permit the said young traders to carry on the said business in the defendant's house. Then the declaration stated a covenant by the plaintiff, that he would accept the business and stock-in-trade, at a fair valuation, with the defendant's nephew, or such other person, &c., and execute such deeds of partnership, and, further, that the plaintiff should and would, at and before the sealing and delivery of the deeds, cause and procure good and sufficient security to be given to the defendant, to be approved of by the defendant, for the payment of 250*l.* monthly to the defendant, in lieu of a moiety of the monthly produce of the stock in trade, until the value of the stock should be reduced to 4000*l.* Then the plaintiff averred that he had performed, and been ready to perform, his covenants, and assigned for breach, on the part of the defendant, that he had refused to surrender and give up his business, at the end of the said year and a quarter. The defendant pleaded, first, that the plaintiff did not offer sufficient security; and, second, that he did not give sufficient security for the payment for the 250*l.*, etc. And the plaintiff demurred generally to both pleas.

LORD MANSFIELD. There are three kinds of covenants: First, such as are called mutual and independent, where either party may recover damages from the other, for the injury he may have received by a breach of the covenants in his favor, and where it is no excuse for the defendant to allege a breach of the covenants on the part of the plaintiff; second, there are covenants which are conditions and dependent, in which the performance of one depends on the prior performance of another, and, therefore, till this prior condition is performed the other party is not liable to an action on his covenant; third, there is also a third sort of covenants, which are mutual conditions to be performed at the same time; and in these, if one party was ready, and offered, to perform his part, and the other neglected, or refused, to perform his, he who was ready, and offered, has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other; though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act.

His lordship then proceeded to say that the dependence or independence of covenants was to be collected from the evident sense and meaning of the parties, and that however transposed they might be in the deed, their precedency must depend on the order of time in which the intent of the transaction requires their performance. That in the case before the court it would be the greatest injustice if the plaintiff should prevail. The essence of the agreement was, that the defendant should not trust to the personal security of the plaintiff, but, before he delivered up his stock and business, should have good security for the payment of the money. The giving such security, therefore, must necessarily be a condition precedent. Judgment was accordingly given for the defendant, because the part to be performed by the plaintiff was clearly a condition precedent.¹²

GOODISSON v. NUNN.

(Court of King's Bench, 1792. 4 Term Reports, 761.)

This was an action of debt to recover 21*l.* on certain articles of agreement, the substance of which was stated in the declaration. The defendant cravedoyer of the agreement, by which the plaintiff agreed that he would, on or before the 2d of September then next, "by such conveyances, surrenders, assurances, ways, and means in the law, shall reasonably devise, advise, or require,¹³ well and sufficiently grant, sell, release, assign, and surrender, or otherwise convey to the defendant all that copyhold tenement, lying," &c. In consideration whereof the defendant covenanted to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 210*l.* on or before the second day of September next ensuing; on failure of complying with the before-mentioned agreement the defendant was to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 21*l.*; and if the plaintiff did not deliver the estate according to the before-mentioned agreement, then he was to pay to the defendant the sum of 21*l.* It was further agreed between the parties that the plaintiff should take up the copyhold as follows, that is to say: "That the plaintiff should take it up either for the defendant or his wife, as they should agree at the time; that the plaintiff should take it up for himself; that each party should pay share and share alike towards the expenses attending the taking it up." The defendant then pleaded, 1st, Non est factum. 2d, That the plaintiff did not, on or before the second day of September next, &c., by such conveyances, assurances, surrenders, ways and means as the law, reasonably devised, advised, and required, well and sufficiently grant, sell and release, assign and surrender, or otherwise convey to the defendant the said premises in the said articles of agreement mentioned, &c. 3d, That the plaintiff did not on or before the second day of September, &c., or at any time since, well and sufficiently grant, sell, and release, assign and surrender, or otherwise convey to the defendant the said premises, &c. 4th, That the plaintiff at the time of the making of the articles, &c., had nothing in the said premises whereby he could be enabled to grant, &c., to the defendant the said premises, &c.

¹² "You can always imply a condition in a contract. But why do you imply it? It is because of some belief as to the practice of the community or of a class, or because of some opinion as to policy, or, in short, because of some attitude of yours upon a matter not capable of exact quantitative measurement, and therefore, not capable of founding exact logical conclusions." Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Path of the Law, 10 Harv. L. Rev. 466.

To the three last pleas the plaintiff demurred generally.

LORD KENYON, C. J.¹⁴ This case is extremely clear, whether considered on principles of strict law or of common justice. The plaintiff engaged to sell an estate to the defendant, in consideration of which the defendant undertook to pay 210*l.*; and if he did not carry the contract into execution, he was to pay 21*l.* And now, not having conveyed his estate, or offered to do so, or taken any one step towards it, the plaintiff has brought this action for the penalty. Suppose the purchase-money of an estate was 40,000*l.*, it would be absurd to say that the purchaser might enforce a conveyance without payment, and compel the seller to have recourse to him, who perhaps might be an insolvent person. The old cases cited by the plaintiff's counsel have been accurately stated; but the determinations in them outrage common sense. I admit the principle on which they profess to go; but I think that the judges misapplied that principle. It is admitted in them all that where they are dependent covenants no action will lie by one party, unless he have performed or offered to perform his covenant. Then the question is whether these are or are not dependent covenants? I think they are; the one is to depend on the other; when the one party conveyed his estate, he was to receive the purchase-money; and when the other parted with his money he was to have the estate. They were reciprocal acts to be performed by each other at the same time. It seems, from the case in Strange [Blackwell v. Nash], that the judges were surprised at the old decisions; and, in order to get rid of the difficulty, they said that a tender and refusal would amount to a performance: it is true they went farther, and said that "in consideration of the premises" meant only in consideration of the covenant to transfer, and not in consideration of the actual transferring of the stock; but to the latter part of that judgment I cannot accede. It is our duty, when we see that principles of law have been misapplied in any case, to overrule it. The principle is admitted in all the cases alluded to that, if they be dependent covenants, performance, or the offer to perform, must be pleaded on the one part, in order to found the action against the other. The mistake has been in the misapplication of that principle in the cases cited. And I am glad to find that the old cases have been overruled, and that we are now warranted by precedent as well as by principle to say that this action cannot be maintained.

(Court of King's Bench, 1776. 1 Henry Blackstone, 273, note a.)

Covenant on a deed, whereby the plaintiff conveyed to the defendant the equity of redemption of a plantation in the West Indies, together with the stock of negroes upon it, in consideration of £500 and an annuity of £160 per annum for his life; and covenanted that he had a good title to the plantation, was lawfully possessed of the negroes, and that the defendant should quietly enjoy. The defendant covenanted ¹⁵ "Where there is a contract by one party to sell an article and by the other party to pay for it, no time being named, it would be a strong thing to say that the buyer shall pay the money before he gets the consideration. The effect of the agreement set out in the plea is that the plaintiffs are to buy the mines and minerals from the defendant and the defendant is to take all the coals he may require from the plaintiffs. These clearly are concurrent acts." Erie, C. J., in Bankart v. Bowers, L. R., 1 C. P. 484, 489 (1866).

"Several conditions must occur, however, to make mutual dependency [concurrent conditions] possible and appropriate. 1st. Each of the covenants or promises must be capable of performance in a moment of time; for otherwise it would not be possible for them to be performed concurrently. 2dly. The object of the covenants or promises must, it seems, be the exchange of some property or right for some other property or right; otherwise mutual dependency will be inappropriate. For this reason as well as the former, two covenants or promises can seldom, if ever, be mutually dependent, unless they both consist in giving (dando) as distinguished from doing (faciendo). In particular, mutual covenants or promises which are entered into for the promotion of some object common to both parties can never, it seems, be mutually dependent. 3dly. The exchange contemplated by the covenants or promises must be between the parties thereto; otherwise it cannot, in legal contemplation, be made in an instant of time. Mutual promises, therefore, between A and B that A shall give something to B and B shall give something to C will not be mutually dependent [unless expressly made so]. 4thly. The covenants or promises must be capable of being performed at the same place; otherwise they cannot be performed at the same time." Langdell's Summary of Contracts, sec. 133.

that the plaintiff well and truly performing all and everything therein contained on his part to be performed, he, the defendant, would pay the annuity. The breach assigned was the non-payment of the annuity. Plea: that the plaintiff was not at the time of making the deed legally possessed of the negroes on the plantation, and so had not a good title to convey.

To which there was general demurrer.

LORD MANSFIELD. The distinction is very clear, where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other. But where they go only to a part, where a breach may be paid for in damages, there the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and shall not plead it as a condition precedent. If this plea were to be allowed, any one negro not being the property of the plaintiff would bar the action.

Judgment for the plaintiff.¹⁶

¹⁶ In Campbell v. Jones, 6 T. R. 570, 573 (1796), Lord Kenyon, C. J., reports Mr. Justice Ashland as adding in Boone v. Eyre, after Lord Mansfield's opinion: "There is a difference between executed and executory covenants; here the covenants are executed in part, and the defendant ought not to keep the estate because the plaintiff has not title to a few negroes."

In view of the facts before the court, it seems clear that Lord Mansfield's language in Boone v. Eyre was intended as a general statement to the effect that if a breach by one party to the contract does not go to the essence of the contract, the other party is bound to perform on his part, though he has an action for the damages due to the breach, but that if the breach is so material as to go to the essence of the contract, such other party is excused from performing.

In Bank of China, etc. v. American Trading Co., [1894] A. C. 266, 271, Lord Watson said: "The circumstance that one of the conditions of a contract only affects part of the consideration is not per se sufficient to make it collateral to the main contract. It is capable of being so construed, but cannot be so regarded, unless it also appear that the condition was not intended by the parties to go to the root of the whole contract."

In explaining Lord Mansfield's language, Sanborn, J., in Kauffman v. Raeder, 108 Fed. 171, 179 (1901), said: "The breach of a covenant of the first class—a dependent covenant, one which goes to the whole consideration of the contract, gives to the injured party the right to treat the entire contract as broken and to recover damages for a total breach [citations]. But a breach of a covenant of the second class, an independent covenant, a covenant which does not go to the whole consideration of the contract and is subordinate and incidental to its main purpose, does not constitute a breach of the entire contract, does not authorize the injured party to rescind the agreement, but he is still bound to perform his part of it and his only remedy is a recovery of damages for the breach." See also Palmer v. Meriden Britannia Co., 188 Ill. 508 (1901). As was said by Goode, J., in Koerper v. Royal Inv. Co., 102 Mo. App. 543, 77 S. W. 307, 309 (1903). "By no means every breach of a contract by a party entitles the other to regard it as abandoned, and it is not always easy to tell what breach is sufficient to do so. One rule is that, when the failure or refusal to perform substantially deprives the innocent party of the benefit that would arise from performance—in other words, goes to the entire consideration that

"It is justly observed, that covenants, etc., are to be construed to be either dependent or independent of each other, according to the intention and meaning of the parties, and the good sense of the case; and technical words should give way to such intention. [Citations.] In order, therefore, to discover the intention, and thereby to learn, with some degree of certainty, when performance is necessary to be averred in the declaration, and when not, it may not be improper to lay down a few rules, which will perhaps be found useful for that purpose.

"1. If a day be appointed for payment of money or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen or may happen before the thing which is the consideration of the money or other act is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance; for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend¹⁸ to make the performance induced him to make the contract—he may treat it as abandoned by the non-performing party."

But because of its ambiguity, the language of Boone v. Eyre, has been twisted so as to suggest the application of part of it to divisible contracts in a way that may be proper in England but not generally in this country. In 2 Parsons on Contracts (9 ed.), 682, for instance, we find this language: "It is said that where the clause in question goes to the whole of the consideration it should be read as a condition. The meaning of this must be that if the supposed condition covers the whole ground of the contract and cannot be severed from it, or from any part of it, a breach of the condition is a breach of the whole contract, which gives to the other party the right of avoiding or rescinding it altogether. But where the supposed condition is distinctly separable, so that much of the contract may be performed on both sides as though the conditions were not there, it will be read as a stipulation, the breach of which only gives an action to the injured party." Such loose paraphrasing seems to turn every divisible contract into as many separate and independent contracts as there are apportioned performances, which, of course, is wholly contrary to our general American doctrine. The fact of the matter is that Lord Mansfield's language in Boone v. Eyre, is unintelligible until it is translated, and yet is so likely to be translated incorrectly that wherever possible it should be avoided. If the language is to be retained in use, it must be modified to provide for conditions concurrent.

¹⁸ The theory that implied in law conditions are found solely by construction, which is here accepted by Sergeant Williams, is not to be approved. Construction of the contract there must be and intended conditions must often be enforced, but in many cases conditions are implied by law to meet a situation which everybody knows the parties never contemplated because, if they

a condition precedent; and so it is where no time is fixed for performance of that which is the consideration of the money or other act.¹⁹ [Citations.]”

“2. But when a day is appointed for the payment of money &c., and the day is to happen after the thing which is the consideration of the money &c., is to be performed, no action can be maintained for the money, &c., before performance.²⁰

“3. Where a covenant goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be maintained for a breach of the covenant on the part of the defendant without averring performance in the declaration.²¹

had, what should be done in that situation would have been expressly stipulated. To deduce what they would have provided if they had thought of the situation—a process which in the law of wills passes perforce as construction—is not nearly as satisfactory in the law of conditions in contracts as to frame a rule which they ought to have provided. See 33 Harv. L. Rev. 384, n. 16.

In explaining his first rule, Serjeant Williams said: “This seems to be the ground of judgment in this case of Pordage v. Cole, the money being appointed to be paid on a fixed day, which might happen before the lands were, or could be, conveyed.” 1 Notes to Saunders' Reports (1871 ed.), 551. But if Pordage v. Cole were up for decision today it would be held to be a case of concurrent conditions, so it cannot be supported.

Professor Williston by a simple illustration has shown the error of the rule as framed by Serjeant Williams. He says:

“This rule still occasionally finds judicial support [citing Busch v. Stromberg-Carlson Telephone Mfg. Co., 217 Fed. 328; Loud v. Pomona Land & Water Co., 153 U. S. 564, 578], though a simple concrete case would show how far removed it is from modern ideas. If one makes a contract with his tailor to make a suit of clothes and promises to pay on January 1, as no time is fixed for the making of the clothes, the promises are independent, and the tailor may sue for the money though he never has made the clothes and a reasonable time for so doing has elapsed. So said Serjeant Williams, and such may have been the law once, but it is not now.” 2 Williston on Contracts, § 821, pp. 1572-1573.

As for the rest of rule 1, it has been said, that “It requires no acuteness to discern that if A covenants to pay B a sum of money on the first of April and B on his part agrees, in consideration of the said stipulation, to convey to A a tract of land on the first of May succeeding, the money was intended to be paid before performance of the consideration.” Hosmer, C. J., in Bean v. Atwater, 4 Conn. 3 (1821).

²¹ Serjeant Williams' Rules 3 and 4 are taken from the brief opinion of Lord Mansfield in Boone v. Eyre, reported, ante, p. 698. See footnotes to that case, ante.

"5. Where two acts are to be done at the same time, as, where A. covenants to convey an estate to B. on such a day, and in consideration thereof B. covenants to pay A. a sum of money on the same day, neither can maintain an action without showing performance of, or an offer to perform his part, though it is not certain which of them is obliged to do the first act; and this particularly applies to all cases of sale."

JAMES WOODS, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR v. DAVID DIAL, for the Use of JOHN WILLIAMS, DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1850. 12 ILL. 72.)

Judgment for the plaintiff for $40 and costs. Writ of error brought by defendant.

TRUMBULL, J. This record shows, that Woods agreed with Dial to give him forty dollars in trade, for his improvements on Congress land—Dial to keep possession of the place for one year—that he left the premises in the Spring, and brought suit for forty dollars for which he had judgment. The agreement was by parol, and the evidence of its terms, as shown by the record, is exceedingly meagre. Neither the kind of trade, the time or place for its delivery, the residence of the parties, except that one of them resided on Congress land, nor the business that either of them followed appears in the case. The Circuit Court refused to instruct the jury that proof of a demand was necessary to entitle appellee to recover.

The courts have felt some difficulty in construing contracts of this character, and their decisions are somewhat conflicting.

In this state, we have a statute regulating the place of delivery of personal property in certain cases, when the contract is in writing and payable at a particular time. The statute however has no application to this case, as the contract is not in writing.

When the contract is payable in trade generally, and no time or place is specified for its delivery, it is but reasonable that the promisee, before bringing suit, should notify the promisor what kind of trade he will have, and when he is ready to receive it, or show some excuse why he has not done so.

A contract payable in trade without time or place is payable on demand, or within a reasonable time thereafter, according to the nature of the thing demanded. Upon a contract payable in farm produce, it was held in the case of Lobdell v. Hopkins, 5 Cowen, 516, that a special demand was necessary. The case of Vance v. Bloomer, 20 Wend. 196, is to the same point.

We are disposed to adopt the rule as settled in New York, and hold that a special demand was necessary in this case.

In the absence of all testimony to show where the contract was made, or where the parties resided, the presumption is, that they resided in the county where the suit was brought. In such case the demand should be made at the debtor's residence or place of doing business. If he had no fixed place of residence or doing business, or was a non-resident, the rule would be different and perhaps in some instances the demand might be dispensed with.

The creditor in this case undoubtedly had the right to select the kind of trade he would have, confining himself however to such articles as the parties had in view at the time of making the contract. If the case showed that the debtor was a merchant, there could be no question that the creditor would be confined in his selection to such articles as the debtor usually traded in, and that he would be bound to make the demand and receive the goods at his store, and at the usual prices. 2 Kent's Com., 505; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 609.

The subject matter of the agreement is however the only circumstance that appears in this record, from which to ascertain what the parties meant by trade. In such a case the custom and usage of those who enter into similar contracts ought to govern its construction.

A debtor who wished to discharge such a contract would have the right to call upon his creditor to select the property and name a time and place for its delivery, and upon his failure to do so, it would then be the right of the debtor to select property subject to the same restrictions as the creditor would have been under, had he made the selection, and tender the same at some reasonable time and place in discharge of his obligation.

As the case will have to be reversed, on account of the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that a special demand was necessary, and it is probable that further testimony will be adduced upon another trial, it is unnecessary to pursue this discussion further. Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

²² "Where circumstances, left uncertain by the contract, are of such a nature that one party cannot perform his part of the contract until they are fixed, the other party, insisting on the contract, ought to fix those particulars." Coleridge, J., in Armitage v. Insole, 14 Q. B. 728, 731 (1850).

Compare Cadwell v. Blake, 6 Gray (Mass.) 402 (1856), where the contract for the sale of machinery and fixtures and of a right to manufacture paper by a secret process provided that the sellers should instruct the buyers in the art and mystery of manufacturing the paper and that the buyers should pay for the machinery and fixtures in paper manufactured according to the process, and where the court held that the instruction must precede any recovery for the machinery and fixtures.

Declaration upon a covenant contained in a lease of a mill, and other buildings, with machinery and fixtures, by which the lessors (of whom the defendant was one) covenanted with the plaintiff (the lessee), that they would, at all times, during the demise, at their own expense, maintain and keep the main walls, main timbers, and roofs of the said buildings in good and substantial repair, order, and condition; alleging performance of conditions precedent, and a default in repairing, whereby, &c.

Plea: That the plaintiff gave no notice to the lessors of any want of repair in the main walls, main timbers, and roofs, nor that the same were not in good and substantial order and condition.

Demurrer and joinder.

CHANNELL, B.²² I am of opinion that this is a good plea. The declaration is good, because it avers the performance of conditions precedent, which would include a request if a request is necessary. The question is, whether the plea denying the giving of notice is a good defence. * * *

Now here repairs are to be done to the exterior of the premises, as to which it is just possible that the lessor might by observation acquire a knowledge of their necessity. But the main timbers of the building, which must be within its carcase, and the roofs are to be kept in repair; and of the repairs required for these he could have no knowledge without notice. He could not enter to see the condition of those parts, even though, independently of his obligation under the covenant, it might be of great consequence to him to be acquainted with it. Here, therefore, by the rule of common sense, which is supported by the case of Vyse v. Wakefield, we ought to import into the covenant the condition that he shall have notice of the want of repair before he can be called on under the covenant to make it good.

BRAMWELL, B. I am also of opinion that the plea is good. To hold it to be so, we must hold the defendant's covenant to be a covenant to repair on notice. I have the strongest objection to interpolate words into a contract, and think we ought never to do so unless there is some cogent and almost irresistible reason for it, arising from the absurdity of the contract if it is read without them. Does such a reason, then, exist, here? I think it does. I think that we are irresistibly driven to say that the parties cannot have intended so preposterous a covenant as that the defendant should keep in repair that of which he has no means of ascertaining the condition. The lessee is in possession; he can say to the lessor; "You shall not come on the premises without lawful cause;" and to come for the purpose of looking into the state of the premises would not be a lawful cause. If the lessor comes to repair when no repair is needed, he will be a trespasser; if he does not come, he will, according to the plaintiff's contention, be liable to an action on the covenant if repair is needed, and will be liable, not only to the cost of repair, but to consequential damage for injury to chattels caused by want of the repairs he had no opportunity of effecting. This is so preposterous that we ought to hold that the parties intended the covenant to be read with the qualification suggested. * * *

If we look to the reason of the rule, it is that when a thing is in the knowledge of the plaintiff, but cannot be in the knowledge of the defendant, but the defendant can only guess or speculate about the matter, then notice is necessary.

To have inserted a provision in the covenant, requiring notice, would certainly have been very reasonable. When it is a question of putting it into the covenant by implication, one must needs, as in all such cases, have great doubt; but upon the whole, * * * I think we are warranted in so reading the covenant.

MARTIN, B. I am of opinion that this plea is bad. I think that when we are construing a contract we ought to adhere to its words, and not insert words not to be found in it; otherwise it is impossible for the parties to know what are the obligations they have bound themselves to, or for counsel to advise with certainty. Now the declaration states a covenant by the defendant to keep in good and substantial repair, and that the defendant did not keep in repair. In answer to this the plea alleges that there was no notice of want of repair. I think this plea bad, and for the simplest reason, that no such stipulation is contained in the covenant, nor any thing from which such a stipulation can be inferred.

I cannot perceive that the covenant as it stands is so unreasonable as alleged. Moreover, there are in leases covenants to repair generally, and covenants to repair on notice; but if this covenant is construed in the way proposed, it is idle to require notice in terms; the one covenant will do as well as the other.

The authorities appear to me directly against the plea. * * * Lastly, Rolfe, B., [in Vyse v. Wakefield, 6 M. & W. 442] says: "I own that when the case was first opened my impression was in favor of the plaintiff; and for this reason, that when a party enters into a contract he is bound to perform it, whether reasonable or not. Where the law casts an obligation upon him, it says that it shall be reasonable; but that is not so when a party contracts to do a particular act, for then it is his own fault for entering into such a contract." I entirely agree with the rule of law so stated, and therefore think we are not at liberty to import any such stipulation into this covenant as the defendant claims.

*Judgment for the defendant.

* "The law implies that the parties must have agreed or intended that notice should be given by the party entitled to the benefit of a condition, of every

HAYDEN v. BRADLEY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1856. 6 Gray 425, 66 Am. Dec. 421.)

Action of contract to recover damages for the defendant's failure to keep in repair the buildings included in a lease from the defendant to the plaintiff of a hotel and farm in Southwick, by which the defendant covenanted to "put the buildings and fences on, around, and about the premises in a good condition, and so to maintain them for and during the term of" the lease, and the plaintiff covenanted "that the lessor fact necessary for the other party to know, to enable him to perform the condition, and of every material circumstance connected with it, which is within his peculiar and personal knowledge, or which depends on his choice, so that the other party has no means, or no reasonable means, to arrive at that knowledge except from the party himself. But where the condition depends on any act of a third person, no notice is implied, and the party who is bound to perform is bound to take notice of such act. In the class of cases where the performance of the condition depends on any thing to be done by the party entitled to the performance, to or with any third persons, who is distinctly named or designated, or by any such third person to or with him, though it is apparent that what is done is more properly and particularly within the knowledge of the plaintiff, yet, because the defendant may obtain knowledge of it otherwise than from him, notice is not required to be given nor averred; for the party who is bound must take notice of it at his peril." Bell, J., in Whitton v. Whitton, 38 N. H. 127, 137-138 (1859). See Lord Abinger, C. B., in Vyse v. Wakefield, 6 M. & W. 442, 453 (1840), quoted in Hayden v. Bradley, post.

In Hugall v. McLean, 53 L. T. R. 94 (1885), a receiver as landlord agreed with the tenant of a house that the receiver would execute the repairs to the drains and sewers, "which are to be kept in good tenantable repair and condition by the receiver during the tenancy." On June 18, the drains which, unknown to tenant and to landlord, though the jury found that the receiver "had the means of knowing," were in a defective condition before, ceased to function properly and the basement of the tenant's house was flooded with sewage in consequence of the defective condition of the drains. The tenant thereupon had a sanitary engineer put the drains in proper state of repair and on September 22 sent the landlord his first notice of the happening in the form of a complaint as to the expense to which the tenant had been put and of a question as to whether the bill for repairs should be sent to him. The defendant was given a judgment on the apparent theory that the tenant, who had no knowledge or means of knowledge of the defective state of repair of the drains could not recover against the landlord, who had no knowledge but had means of knowledge, in the absence of a notice of the need of repair. And Brett, M. R., went farther by saying: "I doubt whether, if the landlord had notice at the time he would be liable." Professor Williston has properly referred to the case as one where the rule of Makin v. Watkinson "seems to have been grossly misapplied" (2 Williston on Contracts, § 894); but nevertheless the actual decision perhaps may be supported on the ground that a tenant has no right to make repairs and charge them up to the landlord, in the absence of an emergency which will not permit of the delay, without first notifying the landlord of what has actually happened and giving him a reasonable time to make his own repairs. See 1 Tiffany, Landlord and Tenant, p. 587.

may enter to view and make improvements, and to expel the lessee, if he shall fail to pay the rent, or make or suffer any strip or waste thereof."

At the trial in the Court of Common Pleas, the defendant, who resided in Springfield, contended that he was not liable, under his covenant, for damages arising from want of repair, after the plaintiff had entered into the occupation of the premises under the lease, and before notice to the defendant of such want of repair. But Mellen, C. J., instructed the jury, that "for defects in the buildings, occurring after the commencement of the lease, the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for such want of repair from the time such defects occurred; it being the duty of the defendant, under this lease, to take notice of such defects or want of repair, and prevent damage to the plaintiff, by repairing the same, without notice from the plaintiff." The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleged exceptions.

METCALF, J. The established rule of law, which the court are now to apply, is rightly stated by Lord Abinger in Vyse v. Wakefield, 6 M. & W. 452, 453. It is this: "Where a party stipulates to do a certain thing in a certain specific event which may become known to him, or with which he can make himself acquainted, he is not entitled to any notice, unless he stipulates for it; but when it is to do a thing which lies within the peculiar knowledge of the opposite party, then notice ought to be given him." The case at bar comes within the first branch of this rule. The defendant stipulated to maintain the buildings in good condition during the term for which he demised them to the plaintiff, on the happening of a specific event, to wit, that they should not be in good condition, but should need repairs. He might have known, or made himself acquainted with the fact, that they needed repairs. And he did not stipulate for notice. See Smith v. Goffe, 2 Ld. Raym. 1126, and 11 Mod. 48; 1 Saund. Pl. & Ev. (2d ed.) 214; System of Pleading, 126, 127; Laws Pl. in Assump. (Amer. ed.) 176 et seq.

But if the defendant's agreement to maintain the buildings in good condition were not, of itself, sufficient to decide the question raised in this case, yet there is another clause in the lease which is decisive, namely, the reservation, by the defendant, of a right of entry upon the premises, "to view and make improvements." He, therefore, having provided for himself the means of ascertaining the contingency upon which he was to make repairs, was not entitled to notice from the plaintiff that the contingency had happened. Keys v. Powell, 2 A. K. Marsh. 254.

²⁵ In Melles & Co. v. Holme, [1918] 2 K. B. 100, it is held that no express notice from the tenant is required where his lease is of only a part of the premises, where the landlord's covenant is to make outside repairs, and where the part to be repaired remains under his control or in his possession.

SEMMES v. HARTFORD INSURANCE COMPANY.

Semmes sued the City Fire Insurance Company, of Hartford, in the court below, on the 31st of October, 1866, upon a policy of insurance, for a loss which occurred on the 5th day of January, 1860. The policy as declared on showed as a condition of the contract, that payment of losses should be made in sixty days after the loss should have been ascertained and proved.

The company pleaded that by the policy itself it was expressly provided that no suit for the recovery of any claim upon the same should be sustainable in any court unless such suit should be commenced within the term of twelve months next after any loss or damage should occur; and that in case any such suit should be commenced after the expiration of twelve months next after such loss or damage should have occurred, the lapse of time should be taken and deemed as conclusive evidence against the validity of the claim thereby so attempted to be enforced. And that the plaintiff did not commence this action against the defendants within the said period of twelve months next after the loss occurred.

To this plea there were replications setting up, among other things, that the late civil war prevented the bringing of the suit within the twelve months provided in the condition, the plaintiff being a resident and citizen of the State of Mississippi and the defendant of Connecticut during all that time.

The plea was held by the court below to present a good bar to the action, notwithstanding the effect of the war on the rights of parties.

That court, in arriving at the conclusion, held, first, that the condition in the contract, limiting the time within which suit could be brought, was like the Statute of Limitation, susceptible of such enlargement, in point of time, as was necessary to accommodate itself to the precise number of days during which the plaintiff was prevented from bringing suit by the existence of the war. And ascertaining this by a reference to certain public acts of the political departments of the government, to which it referred, found that there was, between the time at which it fixed the commencement of the war and the date of the plaintiff's loss, a certain number of days, which, added to the time between the close of the war and the commencement of the action, amounted to more than the twelve months allowed by the condition of the contract.

Judgment being given accordingly in favor of the company the plaintiff brought the case here.

MILLER, J. It is not necessary, in the view which we take of the matter, to inquire whether the Circuit Court was correct in the principle by which it fixed the date, either of the commencement or cessation of the disability to sue growing out of the events of the war. For we are of opinion that the period of twelve months which the contract allowed the plaintiff for bringing his suit, does not open and expand itself so as to receive within it three or four years of legal disability created by the war, and then close together at each end of that period so as to complete itself, as though the war had never occurred.

It is true that, in regard to the limitation imposed by statute, this court has held that the time may be so computed, but there the law imposes the limitation, and the law imposes the disability. It is nothing, therefore, but a necessary legal logic that the one period should be taken from the other. If the law did not, by a necessary implication, take this time out of that prescribed by the statute, one of two things would happen: either the plaintiff would lose his right of suit, by a judicial construction of law which deprived him of the right to sue yet permitted the statute to run until it became a complete bar, or else, holding the statute under the circumstances to be no bar, the defendant would be left, after the war was over, without the protection of any limitation whatever. It was, therefore, necessary to adopt the time provided by the statute as limiting the right to sue, and deduct from that time the period of disability.

Such is not the case as regards this contract. The defendant has made its own special and hard provision on that subject. It is not said, as in a statute, that a plaintiff should have twelve months from the time his cause of action accrued to commence suit, but twelve months from the time of loss; yet by another condition the loss is not payable until sixty days after it shall have been ascertained and proved. The condition is that no suit or action shall be sustainable unless commenced within the time of twelve months next after the loss shall occur, and in case such action shall be commenced after the expiration of twelve months next after such loss, the lapse of time shall be taken and deemed as conclusive evidence against the validity of the claim.²⁶ Now, this contract relates to the twelve months next succeeding the occurrence of the loss and the court has no right, as in the case of a statute, to construe ²⁶ Such a contract provision, fixing a period shorter than that fixed by the legislature for the bringing of an action, will be held invalid, in any event, by some courts if the period fixed is unreasonably short. Dechter v. National Council of Knights & Ladies of Security, 130 Minn. 329 (1915). One fixing a period of six months was held invalid in Miller v. State Ins. Co., 54 Neb. 121 (1898). One fixing a period of a year was held invalid in Union Central Life Ins. Co. v. Spenks, 119 Ky. 261 (1904).

"The statutes of this state provide in what time all actions may be brought, and a contract which provides that no action shall be brought thereon, or for a breach thereof, unless within a time therein specified, which is different from the time which the statute fixes for bringing an action on such contract, or for a breach thereof, is against public policy, and will not be enforced by the courts of this state." Ragan, C., in Miller v. State Ins. Co. of Des Moines, 54 Neb. 121, 122-123 (1898).

it into a number of days equal to twelve months, to be made up of the days in a period of five years in which the plaintiff could lawfully have commenced his suit. So also if the plaintiff shows any reason which in law rebuts the presumption, which, on the failure to sue within twelve months, is, by the contract, made conclusive against the validity of the claim, that presumption is not revived again by the contract. It would seem that when once rebutted fully nothing but a presumption of law or presumption of fact could again revive it. There is nothing in the contract which does it, and we know of no such presumptions of law. Nor does the same evil consequence follow from removing absolutely the bar of the contract that would from removing absolutely the bar of the statute, for when the bar of the contract is removed there still remains the bar of the statute, and though the plaintiff may show by his disability to sue a sufficient answer to the twelve months provided by the contract, he must still bring his suit within the reasonable time fixed by the legislative authority—that is, by the statute of limitations.

We have no doubt that the disability to sue imposed on the plaintiff by the war relieves him from the consequences of failing to bring suit within twelve months after the loss, because it rendered a compliance with that condition impossible, and removes the presumption which that contract says shall be conclusive against the validity of the plaintiff's claim. That part of the contract, therefore, presents no bar to the plaintiff's right to recover.

As the Circuit Court founded its judgment on the proposition that it did, that judgment must be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.⁸⁷

GRAY v. GARDNER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1821. 17 Mass. 188.)

Assumpsit on a written promise to pay the plaintiff $5,198.87, with the following condition annexed—viz., "On the condition that if a greater quantity of sperm oil should arrive in whaling vessels at Nantucket and New Bedford, on or between the first day of April and the first day of October of the present year, both inclusive, than arrived at said places, in whaling vessels, on or within the same term of time the last year, then this obligation to be void." Dated April 14th, 1819.

The consideration of the promise was a quantity of oil sold by the plaintiff to the defendants. On the same day another note unconditional had been given by the defendants, for the value of the oil estimated at 60 cents per gallon; and the note in suit was given to secure the residue of the price estimated at 85 cents, to depend on the contingency mentioned in the said condition.

Such conditions subsequent occur also in indemnity bonds. Helmer v. Title Guaranty Surety Co., 55 Wash. 558 (1909).

At the trial before the chief justice the case depended upon the question whether a certain vessel, called the Lady Adams, with a cargo of oil, arrived at Nantucket on October 1st, 1819, about which fact the evidence was contradictory. The judge ruled that the burden of proving the arrival within the time was on the defendants, and further that, although the vessel might have, within the time, gotten within the space which might be called Nantucket Roads, yet it was necessary that she should have come to anchor, or have been moored, somewhere within that space before the hour of twelve following the first day of October in order to have arrived within the meaning of the contract.

The opinion of the chief justice on both these points was objected to by the defendants, and the questions were saved. If it was wrong on either point, a new trial was to be had, otherwise judgment was to be rendered on the verdict, which was found for the plaintiff.

PARKER, C. J. The very words of the contract show that there was a promise to pay, which was to be defeated by the happening of an event—viz., the arrival of a certain quantity of oil at the specified places in a given time. It is like a bond with a condition; if the obligor would avoid the bond, he must show performance of the condition. The defendants in this case promise to pay a certain sum of money on condition that the promise shall be void on the happening of an event. It is plain that the burden of proof is upon them, and if they fail to show that the event has happened, the promise remains good.

The other point is equally clear for the plaintiff. Oil is to arrive at a given place before 12 o'clock at night. A vessel with oil heaves in sight, but she does not come to anchor before the hour is gone. In no sense can the oil be said to have arrived. The vessel is coming until she drops anchor or is moored. She may sink or take fire, and never arrive, however near she may be to her port. It is so in contracts of insurance, and the same reason applies to a case of this sort. Both parties put themselves upon a nice point in this contract; it was a kind of wager as to the quantity of oil which should arrive at the ports mentioned before a certain period. They must be held strictly to their contract, there being no equity to interfere with the terms of it.

Judgment on the verdict.²⁸

²⁸ It is important to distinguish between contracts which contain conditions subsequent in form only, being precedent in fact, and those which contain genuine conditions subsequent. In doing so it is well to consider two assertions in Harriman on Contracts, 2 ed., § 205, namely: (1) "If A covenants to pay B $100 per annum for ten years, provided B does not use tobacco during that time, B's use of tobacco is a condition subsequent entitling A to be discharged from his obligation to pay the annuity;" and (2) "If A sells a cow to

(Court of Exchequer Chamber, 1863. 3 Best & Smith 751.)

The defendant brought error on the judgment for the plaintiff entered in the Queen's Bench.

WILLIAMS, J.²⁰ The question in this case is whether the statement in the charter-party, that the ship is "now in the port of Amsterdam," is a "representation" or a "warranty," using the latter word as synonymous with "condition;" in which sense it has been for many years understood with respect to policies of insurance and charter-parties.

It may be expedient to commence the consideration of this question by some examination into the nature of representations. Properly speaking, a representation is a statement, or assertion, made by one party to the other, before or at the time of the contract, of some matter or circumstance relating to it. Though it is sometimes contained in the written instrument, it is not an integral part of the contract; and, consequently, the contract is not broken though the representation proves to be untrue; nor (with the exception of the case of policies of insurance, at all events marine policies, which stand on a peculiar anomalous footing) is such untruth any cause of action, nor has it any efficacy whatever, unless the representation was made fraudulently, either by reason of its being made with a knowledge of its untruth, or by reason of its being made dishonestly, with a reckless ignorance whether it was true or untrue. See Elliot v. Von Glehn, 13 Q. B. 632; Wheelton v. Hardisty, 8 E. & B. 232, 285.

If this be so, it is difficult to understand the distinction which is to be found in some of the treatises, and is in some degree perhaps sanctioned by judicial authority (see Barker, appellant, Windle, respondent, 6 E. & B. 675, 680), that a representation, if it differs from the truth to an unreasonable extent, may affect the validity of the contract. Where, indeed, the misrepresentation is so gross as to amount to sufficient evidence of fraud, it is obvious that the contract would on that ground be voidable.

The representations are not usually contained in the written instrument of contract, yet they sometimes are. But it is plain that their insertion therein cannot alter their nature. A question, however, may arise, whether a descriptive statement in the written instrument is a mere representation, or whether it is a substantive part of the contract. This is a question of construction which the court, and not the jury

B as a Jersey cow for $100 and agrees that B may return the cow if she is not a Jersey, the fact that the cow is not a Jersey is a condition subsequent, entitling B to rescind the contract." See note to Costigan's Performance of Contracts, pp. 14-18.

must determine. If the court should come to the conclusion that such a statement by one party was intended to be a substantive part of his contract, and not a mere representation, the often-discussed question may, of course, be raised, whether this part of the contract is a condition precedent, or only an independent agreement, a breach of which will not justify a repudiation of the contract, but will only be a cause of action for a compensation in damages. In the construction of charter-parties, this question has often been raised, with reference to stipulations that some future thing shall be done or shall happen, and has given rise to many nice distinctions. Thus a statement that a vessel is to sail, or be ready to receive a cargo, on or before a given day, has been held to be a condition (see Glaholm v. Hays, 2 M. & G. 257; Oliver v. Fielden, 4 Exch. 135; Croockewit v. Fletcher, 1 H. & N. 893; Seeger v. Duthie, 8 C. B. N. S. 45), while a stipulation that she shall sail with all convenient speed or within a reasonable time, has been held to be only an agreement. See Tarrabochia v. Hickie, 1 H. & N. 183; Dimech v. Cortlett, 12 Moo. P. C. C. 199; Clipsham v. Vertue, 5 Q. B. 265. But with respect to statements in a contract descriptive of the subject-matter of it, or of some material incident thereof, the true doctrine, established by principle as well as authority, appears to be, generally speaking, that if such descriptive statement was intended to be a substantive part of the contract, it is to be regarded as a warranty—that is to say, a condition on the failure or non-performance of which the other party may, if he is so minded, repudiate the contract in toto, and so be relieved from performing his part of it, provided it has not been partially executed in his favor. If, indeed, he has received the whole or any substantial part of the consideration for the promise on his part, the warranty loses the character of a condition, or to speak perhaps more properly, ceases to be available as a condition, and becomes a warranty in the narrower sense of the word—viz., a stipulation by way of agreement, for the breach of which a compensation must be sought in damages. See Ellen v. Topp, 6 Exch. 424-441; Graves v. Legg, 9 Exch. 709-716³⁰;

³⁰ In the passage in the text by "warranty in the narrower sense of the word" is meant not a warranty that is a condition but a warranty as the English have it in the law of sales of personal property, namely, "An agreement with reference to goods which are the subject of a contract of sale, but collateral to the main purpose of such contract, the breach of which gives rise to a claim for damages, but not to a right to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated." Sales of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict.), c. 71, sec. 62. Under the American Uniform Sales Act, and in general in the United States, the right of rescission exists. See 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1462.

In Graves v. Legg, supra, the court had to pass on a contract for the sale of wools to arrive by vessels, the names of the vessels to be declared as soon as the wools were shipped. In leading up to the statement that if the condition was originally precedent it remained so for lack of sufficient benefit to the buyer, Parke, B., said, that when it appears that the consideration has been sufficiently executed in part "it is no longer competent for the defendant to insist upon the nonperformance of that which was originally a condition prece-adopting the observations of Williams on the case of Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, note a, in 1 Saund. 320 d, 6th ed.; Elliott v. Von Glehn, 13 Q. B. 632. * * *

In the present case, as the defendant has not received any benefit or advantage under the contract, but has wholly repudiated it, the question is simply whether, in the true construction of the charter-party, the court ought to infer that the statement as to the ship's being at that date in the port of Amsterdam, was meant to be a substantive part of the contract, or a representation collateral to it. And this question appears to be properly raised by the averment in the plea, that time, and the situation of the vessel, were essential and material parts of the contract. * * *

It is plain that the court must be influenced in the construction, not only by the language of the instrument, but also by the circumstances under which, and the purposes for which, the charter-party was entered into. For instance, if it was made in the time of war, the national character of the vessel is of such importance, that a statement of it in the charter-party might properly be regarded as part of the shipowner's contract, and so amounting to a warranty; whereas, the very same statement in the time of peace, being wholly unimportant, might well be construed to be a mere representation. So if it were shown that the charter-party was made for a purpose such that, unless the vessel began her voyage from the port of loading, with her cargo on board, by a certain time, it was manifest that the object of the charter-party would in all probability be frustrated, the court might properly be led by this circumstance to conclude that a statement as to the locality of the ship, coupled with a stipulation that she should sail with all convenient speed, was a warranty of her then locality. But we feel a difficulty in acceding to the suggestion which appears to have been, to some extent, sanctioned by high authority (see Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moo. P. C. C. 199), that a statement of this kind in a charter-party, which may be regarded as a mere representation if the object of the charter-party be still practicable, may be construed as a warranty if that object turns out to be frustrated; because the instrument, it should seem, ought to be construed with reference to the intention of the parties at the time it was made, irrespective of the events which may afterward occur. It is true that in some of the cases, where the question has been whether a stipulation in a charter-party amounted to a condition, the court decided that question in the negative, and in so doing took occasion to suggest that neglect or delay on the part of the shipowner to execute his part of the contract, might be a breach of such an essential stipulation on his part as to justify the charterer in treating the contract as brought to an end thereby, and in refusing on that account to perform; and this is more correctly expressed than to say it was not a condition precedent at all."

his part of it, and further suggested that, in deciding whether the breach on the shipowner's part was of such an essential stipulation as that described, the court might advert to the fact whether such breach had frustrated the whole object which the charterer had in view. See Freeman v. Taylor, 8 Bing. 124; Tarrabochia v. Hickie, 1 H. & N. 183; Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moo. P. C. C. 199, 224, 227. But the court did not, we apprehend, mean to intimate that the frustration of the voyage would convert a stipulation into a condition, if it were not originally intended to be one.

The question on the present charter-party is confined to the statement of a definite fact—the place of the ship at the date of the contract. Now the place of the ship at the date of the contract, where the ship is in foreign parts and is chartered to come to England, may be the only datum on which the charterer can found his calculations of the time of the ship's arriving at the port of loading. A statement is more or less important in proportion as the object of the contract more or less depends upon it. For most charters, considering winds, markets, and dependent contracts, the time of a ship's arrival to load is an essential fact, for the interest of the charterer. In the ordinary course of charters in general it would be so; the evidence for the defendant shows it to be actually so in this case. Then, if the statement of the place of the ship is a substantive part of the contract, it seems to us that we ought to hold it to be a condition upon the principles above explained, unless we can find in the contract itself or the surrounding circumstances reason for thinking that the parties did not so intend. If it was a condition and not performed, it follows that the obligation of the charterer dependent thereon, ceased at his option, and considerations either of the damage to him or of proximity to performance on the part of the shipowner are irrelevant. So was the decision of Glaholm v. Hays, 2 M. & G. 257, where the stipulation in a charter of a ship to load at Trieste was that she should sail from England on or before February 4th, and the non-performance of this condition released the charterer, notwithstanding the reasons alleged in order to justify the non-performance.³¹ So in Ollive v. Booker, 1 Exch. 416, the statement in the charter

³¹ In Glaholm v. Hays, cited supra, Tindal, C. J., said:

"The very words themselves, 'to sail on or before a given day,' do, by common usage, import the same as the words 'conditioned to sail,' or 'warranted to sail on or before such a day;' and, undoubtedly, if in the middle of a common bought and sold note, for a cargo of corn, or any other goods were found the words, 'to be delivered on or before such a day,' they would be held to amount to a condition; and the purchaser would not be bound to accept the cargo, if not ready for delivery by the day appointed.

"And looking at the subject-matter of the contract, without regarding the precise words, we think that construing the words as a condition precedent, will carry into effect the intention of the parties, with more certainty than holding them to be matter of contract only, and merely the ground of an action for damages.

"Both parties were aware that the whole success of a mercantile adventure of a ship which was to load at Marseilles was that she was "now at sea, having sailed three weeks ago," and it was held to be a condition for the reasons above stated.³² And we would note that the marginal abstract of this case states the stipulation to have been "having sailed three weeks ago or thereabouts." If the statement had really been so indefinite, it may be that the court would have come to a different conclusion.

We think these cases well decided, and that they govern the present case. We think that the decision of Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moo. P. C. C. 199, does not conflict with them, because it is immersed in the specific facts there set out, so as to be a precedent only for cases with very analogous specific facts. The statement in that charter, that the ship was "now at anchor in this port" (Malta), did not avail to release the charterer, because the ship was in the port in the dry dock; and although the statement of the fact that she was at anchor in the port was definite, and indicated that she was ready for sea, while in truth she was in a dry dock being built, and was not completed for a month, yet, as the defendant was at Malta, and was presumed to have known the state of the ship, and also to have known of the delay, and did not insist that the charter-party was broken, but allowed the ship to sail from Malta for Alexandria without objection, his defence on this point failed.

The court below in a manner referred the present case to a court of error to say whether the decision should be governed by Ollive v. Booker, 1 Exch. 416, or Dimech v. Corlett. We are of opinion, for the reasons assigned, that the decision of Ollive v. Booker was sound, and that it governs our decision here; and we are further of opinion that, in so holding, we do not at all conflict with the decision in Dimech v. Corlett, as above explained.

On these grounds we think that the judgment of the Queen's Bench should be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

does, in ordinary cases, depend upon the commencement of the voyage by a given time. The nature of the commodity to be imported, the state of the foreign and home market at the time the contract of charter-party is made, and the various other calculations which enter into commercial speculations, all combine to show that despatch and certainty are of the very first importance to their success; and certainly nothing will so effectually insure both despatch and certainty as the knowledge that the obligation of the contract itself shall be made to depend upon the actual performance of the stipulation which relates to them."

³² In Ollive v. Booker, supra, Baron Parke said:

"It appears to me that it [the statement in the charter-party] is a warranty, and not a representation that the vessel had sailed three weeks. It is, therefore, a condition precedent. The rule depends upon each particular contract, and here time was of the essence of the contract."

THE GLOBE MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION OF CHICAGO v. DORA WAGNER.

80 Am. St. Rep. 169.)

Action by the appellee upon a policy of insurance on the life of her son, Richard Wagner. The plaintiff recovered judgment and the appellant appealed to the Appellate Court, which affirmed the judgment. Defendant then appealed to the Supreme Court.

WILKIN, J. The chief ground urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment of the Appellate Court is the falsity of the answer to one of the questions appearing in the medical examination of the insured. On the back of the application made by appellee, in what purports to be the medical examination of the insured, this question and answer appear: "Q.—How many brothers dead? Ans.—None." The medical examination is certified to by the medical examiner, as follows:

"I certify that I have, this 7th day of October, 1895, made a personal examination of the above named person, (Richard Wagner,) and that the above answers are in my own handwriting, and that the signature of the applicant or person examined was written in my presence.

"M. J. McKENNA, M.D."

Preceding the medical examiner's certificate, and immediately at the end of the series of questions and answers referred to in the certificate, of which the quoted question is one, appears the following language, to which is affixed the signature of Richard Wagner, the insured: "I hereby declare and warrant that the answers to the above questions, and the statements made in the applications on the other side hereof, are true, and were written by me or by my proper agent, and that said answers and statements, together with this warranty, shall form the basis of any contract of insurance that may be entered into between me and the Globe Mutual Insurance Association, and that if a contract of insurance is issued it shall not be binding on the company unless, upon its date and delivery, I shall be in sound health." On the front side of the sheet, on the back of which is the medical examination and statement signed, as above, by the insured, is the application by appellee for the policy, and over her signature appears the following: "I hereby make application for the policy described above, and as an inducement to the association to issue a policy, and as a consideration therefor, make the agreement as to agency, and all other agreements, and warranties contained in the medical examination, as fully as if I had signed the same."

It appears from the evidence that a brother of the insured died in London, England, more than four years prior to the date of the application for insurance in this case, but there is no evidence tending to show that the insured ever knew of his brother's death. Appellant asserts, however, that, whether he knew of it or not, the statement that none of his brothers were dead is a warranty, and being untrue, avoids the policy. Appellee contends that the statement, though false, is not a warranty, but a mere representation, which, unless material, would not avoid the policy.

In the absence of explicit, unequivocal stipulations requiring such an interpretation, it should not be inferred that the insured or the appellee took a life policy with the distinct understanding that it should be void if any statements made in the medical examination should be false, whether the insured was conscious of the falsity thereof or not. (Moulor v. American Life Ins. Co., 111 U. S. 335.) Whether or not the deceased knew of the death of his brother at the time of the application for insurance was a question for the jury, and no evidence of such knowledge appears in the record. To hold that, as a precedent to any binding contract, he should guarantee absolutely that none of his brothers were dead would be unreasonable, in the absence of a more explicit stipulation than here appears. It not infrequently happens that a man loses trace of all or a part of his relations, and to hold him to absolutely guarantee that they were living, in order that he might obtain insurance, would sometimes be to require an impossibility, and would be almost absurd.

What is said in Moulor v. American Life Ins. Co., supra, is peculiarly applicable to the case at bar. In that case the insured made a false statement as to his having had certain diseases, and "warranted that the above are fair and true answers." The court say: "The entire argument in behalf of the company proceeds upon a too literal interpretation of those clauses in the policy and application which declare the contract null and void if the answers of the insured to the questions propounded to him were in any respect untrue. What was meant by 'true' and 'untrue' answers? In one sense, that only is true which is conformable to the actual state of things. In that sense a statement is untrue which does not express things exactly as they are, but in another and broader sense, the word 'true' is often used as a synonym of honest, sincere, not fraudulent. Looking at all the clauses in the application, in connection with the policy, it is reasonably clear—certainly the contrary cannot be confidently asserted—that what the company required of the applicant as a condition precedent to any binding contract was, that he would observe the utmost good faith towards it, and make full, direct and honest answers to all questions, without evasion or fraud, and without suppression, misrepresentation or concealment of facts with which the company ought to be made acquainted, and that by so doing, and only by so doing, would he be deemed to have made fair and true answers." In that case the untrue statements were held to be representations, and not warranties, and we think, on the same reasoning, the answer here in question should be so held, and in the absence of proof by the company of fraud or intentional misstatement on the part of the insured the policy was not rendered invalid merely because the answer proved to be false.

We are satisfied the court below committed no reversible error, and the judgment of that court will be affirmed.

FRANKLIN STATE BANK v. MARYLAND CASUALTY CO.
SAME v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, 1919. 256 Fed. 356, 167 C. C. A. 526.)

GRUBB, J.²⁴ These cases arise, so far as the alleged loss is concerned, upon identical facts. They differ only as to the terms of the policies, which are the bases of the suits. They are both actions on policies, providing banks with indemnity protection against losses of money or securities, through burglary and robbery. The facts being identical, the cases may be best treated in one opinion. * * *

The plaintiff was a state bank, engaged in business at Winnsboro, La. Evidence was introduced by plaintiff tending to show that on the night of February 12, 1917, about 9 o'clock, while the vice president of the bank, Heatherwick, and a citizen, Judge Holstein, were in the ²³ "Policies are drawn by the legal advisers of the company, who study with care the decisions of the courts, and, with those in mind, attempt to limit as narrowly as possible the scope of the insurance. It is only a fair rule, therefore, which the courts have adopted to resolve any doubt or ambiguity in favor of the insured and against the insurer." Taft, J., in Manufacturers' Accident Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan, 58 Fed. 945, 956 (1893). See also Wright v. Fraternities' Health & Accident Assoc., 107 Me. 418 (1910).

"The practical operation of such literal warranties is so often harsh and unfair that courts require their existence to be evidenced clearly and unequivocally, and are not inclined to allow it to rest upon a mere verbal interpretation, where a reasonable construction of the contract as a whole will authorize a different meaning." Gray, J., in McClain v. Provident, etc., Co., 110 Fed. 80, 84 (1901).

"Furthermore, 'freedom of contract' rarely exists in these cases. Life insurance contracts are contracts of 'adhesion.' The contract is drawn up by the insurer and the insured, who merely 'adheres' to it, has little choice as to its terms." Edwin W. Patterson, The Delivery of a Life Insurance Policy, 33 H. L. R. 198, 222.

By statutes in a number of states no misrepresentation or warranty will defeat recovery on an insurance policy unless the misrepresentation is made with actual intent to deceive or the matter misrepresented is material to the risk. See White v. Provident, etc., Soc., 163 Mass. 108 (1895). Such statutes have been held to be a proper exercise of legislative power. Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Mechanics', etc., Co., 72 Fed. 413 (1896). But due weight should be given to the opinion of the company as to what is material. See Continental Casualty Co. v. Lindsay, 111 Va. 389 (1910).

bank for the purpose, as claimed, of agreeing on and settling the amount of an overdraft in Judge Holstein's account, a man with a flash light in one hand and a pistol in the other appeared and ordered Heatherwick to give him the bank's money, and then forced them both into the bank vault, which had been opened to get the ledger showing Holstein's account with the bank. The man himself, standing outside at the door of the vault, threw Heatherwick a flour sack, and, continuing to point the gun at him, forced him to open the inner safe, which was not locked and which was supposed to contain the money, and to put the money in the sack. Heatherwick testified that he filled the sack with currency and asked the robber if he wanted the silver. The robber shook his head in reply, and Heatherwick then threw the sack to the robber, who grabbed it and quickly slammed the outside door of the vault, and, by turning the combination, locked Heatherwick and Holstein on the inside of the vault, and disappeared with the sack, containing about $44,000 in currency. Heatherwick and Holstein got out of the vault by the use of a screwdriver and iron bar, left in it, as claimed, to meet such an emergency. * * *

The district judge directed a verdict in the case in which the Maryland Casualty Company was defendant, upon the ground that the policy did not cover the loss; the undisputed evidence showing that the money was taken from an open safe. In the case in which the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company was defendant, the verdict was directed because the policy issued by it was held to include losses from daylight robberies only. If the verdicts were properly directed, for a reason different from that assigned by the district judge, the result would be an affirmance of the judgments entered on them. * * *

Our conclusion is that the policies of the defendant in error, Maryland Casualty Company, properly construed, cover losses from safes only when the safe is closed and locked, and entrance is effected either by "cracking" the safe or by forcibly compelling an officer or office employee to unlock and open it. Access to the safe was not obtained by either method in this case, and the district judge rightly directed a verdict, on this ground, for the defendant the Maryland Casualty Company.

In the case of the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, defendant, the district judge directed a verdict for the defendant, holding that its policy covered daylight robberies only; the robbery, in this case, having occurred at night. We find it unnecessary to pass either upon this question, or upon the question of the scope of the policy, as to the inclusion in it of losses from unlocked safes. The language of the policy is different from those of the Maryland Casualty Company in the latter respect. We think the direction of the verdict was proper upon another ground. The policy contained the statement, in its schedule, that the insured's safe contained an outer burglar-proof door, which was locked by both a combination and time lock. It also contained this promissory warranty:

"All combination and time locks will be continued to be regularly used during the currency of the policy."

It also recited that the consideration for the policy was the premium paid, and—

"the statements in the schedule hereinafter contained, which statements the assured makes on the acceptance of this policy, and warrants to be true."

It also contained a provision that, "in case of error of description of equipment or failure to maintain watchman's service," the policy should not be avoided, but the indemnity, in case of loss, reduced to correspond to what the premium paid would purchase, in view of the increased hazard.

The district judge found that the stipulation with reference to the character of locks was a matter of description of equipment only, and not a warranty, and a breach of it would not totally avoid the policy. The first extract from the policy might bear that interpretation. We do not think the statement that "combination and time locks will be continued to be regularly used during the currency of the policy" admits of being construed as a description of equipment. It was a warranty of an existing fact as to the use when the policy was issued, and promissory as to what was to be done during the currency of the policy. The last renewal before the loss in February, 1917, was on March 25, 1916, and for a year from that date. The evidence, without conflict, shows that the safe from which the money and securities were taken was not locked with either a combination or a time lock at the time of the robbery, and that it had not been so locked at any time during the years 1916 and 1917, and that the combination had passed out of the memory of the officers of the bank. When the policy was last renewed in March, 1916, the implied statement that a combination and time lock was then being used was false, and the statement that it would continue to be used regularly during the currency of the policy was one the bank officers had no intention of keeping, and did not, in fact, keep.

That the warranty was breached, both as a representation of a present existing condition and also as a future promise, is shown without dispute. It also appears that, if the warranty had been observed and the safe locked with either the time or combination lock, or both, access to the safe could not have been had by the method it is testified it was had. If the time lock had been used at the close of business hours, the vice president, Heatherwick, could not have opened the safe, even though he had the combination. If the safe had been locked with the combination lock only, it would have been equally out of the power of Heatherwick to have opened it, if his testimony is to be credited, since it was to the effect that he had forgotten the combination, and he was the only bank officer present, ex officio, at least, when the alleged robbery occurred.

If the agreement to regularly use the combination and time lock was a warranty, then a breach of it would avoid the policy, though it did not contribute to the loss. Royal Exchange Assurance Co. v. Thrower, 246 Fed. 768, 770, 159 C. C. A. 70; Imperial Fire Insurance Co. v. Coos County, 151 U. S. 452, 14 Sup. Ct. 379, 38 L. Ed. 231. We think the decisions of the federal courts require us to hold that it was a warranty. It was partly promissory and partly an assurance of an existing condition when the policy was last renewed. It was material to the risk insured. Covenants against overinsurance, change of occupancy or title, and for the keeping of proper books of account in an iron safe, in fire insurance policies, have all been recognized as warranties, though pertaining to the future conduct of the insured, the breach of which would work a forfeiture of the policy, as have covenants against deviation in marine insurance, and covenants against the engaging in certain hazardous occupation in life and accident insurance policies. Home Insurance Co. of New York v. Williams, 237 Fed. 171, 150 C. C. A. 317; Royal Exchange Assurance Co. v. Thrower, 246 Fed. 768, 159 C. C. A. 70; Imperial Fire Insurance Co. v. Coos County, 151 U. S. 452, 14 Sup. Ct. 379, 38 L. Ed. 231; Kentucky Vermillion M. & C. Co. v. Norwich U. F. Ins. Soc., 146 Fed. 695, 77 C. C. A. 121; Lumber Underwriters v. Rife, 237 U. S. 605, 35 Sup. Ct. 717, 59 L. Ed. 1140.

The district court did not err in directing verdicts for the defendants in both cases, and the judgment in each case is affirmed, with costs.

Section 2. General Principles Applicable to Conditions in Contracts.

VAN DEMARK v. CALIFORNIA HOME EXTENSION ASS'N ET AL.

185 Pac. 866.)

Action by Harry S. Van Demark against the California Home Extension Association and M. V. Hartranft. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

SLOANE, J.³⁵ The only questions on this appeal arise on the construction and application of provisions in a contract for the sale of land, whereby it is agreed that in the event of the purchaser becoming dissatisfied with the investment the seller shall buy back the land.

³⁵ Parts of the opinion are omitted.

The complaint contained two causes of action, based on agreements to repurchase, under separate contracts for the sale of separate tracts, and judgment was against the defendant, appellants here. The repurchase clause in the first contract is as follows:

"Art. 10. If after completion of payments the buyer should be dissatisfied with the investment, the association stands ready at any time between the fifth and sixth year from date of planting to buy back the land by paying the buyer the amount of the purchase price."

The second provides:

"Art. 6. If after completion of purchase the buyer should be dissatisfied with the investment, the association guarantees at any time during the sixth year following date of this contract * * * to buy back the land."

It will only be necessary to incidentally refer to any other subject-matter of these contracts, as no dispute exists on any other of the conditions pleaded.

The complaint also contains an allegation that within the period specified in the contracts plaintiff became dissatisfied with his investments, and so notified the defendant corporation, and demanded that the agreement to repurchase be fulfilled. No facts are stated as to reasons or grounds for dissatisfaction with the investment. Defendants urged on demurrer that without some showing of reasonable grounds for dissatisfaction the complaint does not state a cause of action, and the overruling of this demurrer is one of the alleged errors on appeal. * * *

The distinction is well recognized, though the line cannot always be very clearly drawn, in actions arising on these "dissatisfaction clauses," that where the right involved is one which is submitted to the taste or fancy, feelings, or judgment of the party in whose favor the option is given, it may be exercised without any practical or utilitarian reason; but, when it is apparent that the question of satisfaction relates to the commercial value or quality of the subject-matter of the contract, it must be shown that it is deficient or defective in these respects, and that the dissatisfaction is reasonable and well founded. "But where there is nothing to justify the contrary construction, the general rule is that the party to be satisfied is the judge of his own satisfaction, subject only to the limitation in most jurisdictions that he must act in good faith, and, if he does so act and is really dissatisfied, he may reject the work or the article on the ground that it is not satisfactory to him." Tiffany v. Pacific Sewer Pipe Co., 182 Pac. 428. Such construction of the rule has been applied to contracts for a suit of clothes, a portrait, a musical instrument, a carriage, a steam heater, a literary article for a magazine, horses, employment of a servant, dissatisfaction with a home furnished, and with security for performance of an obligation. 9 Cyc. 618, and citations; Singerly v. Thayer, 108 Pa. 291, 2 Atl. 230, 56 Am. Rep. 207; McCarren v. McNulty, 7 Gray (Mass.) 139; Brown v. Foster, 113 Mass. 136, 18 Am. Rep. 463; Zaliski v. Clark, 44 Conn. 218, 26 Am.

Rep. 446; Moore v. Robinson, 92 Ill. 491. It has been held in California that an agreement to furnish title satisfactory to the purchaser was not met by a merely good and marketable title, if the purchaser himself was not satisfied. Parkside Realty Co. v. MacDonald, 166 Cal. 426, 137 Pac. 21; Allen v. Pockwitz, 103 Cal. 85, 36 Pac. 1039, 42 Am. St. Rep. 99; Church v. Shanklin, 95 Cal. 626, 30 Pac. 789, 17 L. R. A. 207.

The contract considered under the decisions cited by appellant are for the most part clearly distinguishable from the contract under consideration here. They involve the quality or value of things in common use which have a fixed and recognized standard of fitness and worth, and concerning which it is fair and equitable to require a purchaser to be satisfied with the commonly accepted standard of excellence. And sometimes, too, the courts have been controlled in their rulings on this question by the equities involved in cases where the exercise of a capitious and unreasonable feeling of dissatisfaction would involve the other party to the contract in serious loss or damage. Hawkins v. Graham, 149 Mass. 284, 21 N. E. 312, 14 Am. St. Rep. 422. We think it is clear in this case that the purpose of the agreement to repurchase in the event the buyer should become dissatisfied with his investment was to submit the matter to the personal option and judgment of the purchaser. The exercise of this right is not dependent upon a failure in value of the property, or a breach of any conditions of the contract. It was made a question alone of his dissatisfaction with the "investment"—with that particular disposition of his capital which tied it up in this California land—a matter which might develop into a condition of personal dissatisfaction entirely independent of values or quality. The fulfillment of the terms of the agreement, moreover, does not involve the loss of the vendor's property. It amounts only to a rescission. He gets his property back and refunds the purchase money with interest. It was probably incumbent on the plaintiff to show good faith, and that he was really dissatisfied; but an allegation that he did become dissatisfied, which was pleaded and testified to, was sufficient. Incidentally it appears by the plaintiff's evidence not only that he was dissatisfied, but that he had grounds for his dissatisfaction, in that by reason of unseasonable frosts the growing eucalyptus trees on his land had been injured. The defendants pleaded by their answer that the injury to the premises resulting from the freeze was the fault of plaintiff, but the court found against this defense, and there was evidence to the contrary; but in any event the finding is not made an issue on this appeal. * * *

It is apparent that it was the intention of the parties that if, for any reason not growing out of the wrong or fraud of the purchaser, he became dissatisfied with his investment under the first contract, the vendor would repurchase at any time during the sixth year after July 17, 1915, and, if he was dissatisfied after the completion of his purchase under the second contract, that the vendor would repurchase at any time during the sixth year after date of the contract. That he did become dissatisfied with these contracts and was entitled to exercise the option given him against the defendant corporation is sufficiently pleaded and proved.³⁶

The rulings and judgment of the court are supported by the pleadings, evidence, and findings.

INMAN MANUFACTURING CO. v. AMERICAN CEREAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1904. 124 Ia. 737, 100 N. W. 860.)

SHERWIN, J.³⁸ The plaintiff agreed to build certain machines for the use of the defendant in its mill at Cedar Rapids, and to install the same therein. The several machines were to have a specified capacity operated by the number and class of workmen named in the contract. The contract contained the following provision: "The party of the first part further agrees that all of said machines are to be to the full satisfaction of the officers of the second party as to quality of work and life and durability of the machines before payment of the machines will be required." The agreement was made on the 23d day of August, 1899, and the machines were to be in place within six months thereafter. On account of delays, however, some of which were caused by the failure of the machines to do the work agreed upon, this time was extended until the 22d of April, 1901, at which time the defendant in writing rejected the entire outfit. The court gave the following instruction:

"The written contract between the parties, under which the machines claimed for in the first count of the plaintiff's petition were furnished, provides that the same were to be to the full satisfaction of the officers of the defendant as to the quality of work and life and durability of the machines before payment would be required. You are instructed that the above condition of the contract did not give the defendant the right to arbitrarily and capriciously declare that it was dissatisfied with said machines, and thus refuse to accept the same. The law requires the defendant to act reasonably and fairly, and to exercise fair, just, and honest judgment. A dissatisfaction with the machines which would warrant the defendant in rejecting the machines must be founded upon some reasonable objection to the quality of the work, or life and durability of the machines. That which the law shall say a contracting party ought in reason to be satisfied with, that the law will say he is satisfied with."

This instruction is wrong in principle and contrary to the decisions of this court. The language of the contract is plain and its meaning certain; the machines were to be to the full satisfaction of the defendant, and nothing less would satisfy the terms of the contract. The plaintiff did not undertake to make and install machines which the defendant ought in reason to be satisfied with, and therefore ought to pay for, but he undertook to furnish machines which the defendant would be satisfied with, and by this contract he is bound, provided only that the defendant acted in good faith, and was honestly dissatisfied. This much and no more the law requires of the contemplated purchaser, and if his dissatisfaction is in good faith, it matters not whether it be reasonable or unreasonable, for the law will not make contracts for persons sui juris. *McCormick H. SYLVESTER RICHARDSON v. J. D. BRECKER.

HELM, J.⁴⁰ * * * Nearly 11 years passed between the maturity of the note and the commencement of suit thereon; plaintiff's action was therefore barred by our statute of limitations, and he could only recover upon proof of a new promise sufficient in law to revive the debt, or give him a new right of action therefor. For this purpose but one witness was sworn. * * * Upon a careful consideration of his entire testimony, we think, if it establishes anything, it is that the new promise was to pay when able, or to pay on the thirtieth of the current month, provided a sale of coal land was effected.

No evidence whatever was offered by plaintiff to show that at the commencement of the action, defendant was able to pay the note, or that he had sold his coal land. The suit is upon the contract created by the new promise, and therefore, if such new promise be conditional, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover except upon the performance or happening of such condition; and the burden of proving the same rests upon him. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 440, and note; Wood, Lim. Act. § 79, and notes. If the new promise in this case was to pay the note

³⁹ In Taylor v. Brewer, 1 M. & S. 290 (1813), a person who had performed work under the resolution of a committee which provided that his service should be taken into consideration "and such remuneration be made as shall be deemed right" was not allowed to maintain an action.

upon the sale of coal lands, it clearly developed upon plaintiff to prove such sale; so, also, if the new promise was to pay when able, we think it was plaintiff's duty to establish defendant's ability to do so. Upon this question, however, there is some conflict of authority. In Illinois, Connecticut, Vermont, and New Hampshire, it is held that promises to pay "when able," "as soon as possible," "when I can," "as soon as he could," were not conditional. It is said that these phrases, following a promise, are too uncertain to constitute a condition. Horner v. Starkey, 27 Ill. 13; Cummings v. Gassett, 19 Vt. 310; Norton v. Shepard, 48 Conn. 142; First Cong. Soc. v. Miller, 15 N. H. 522. But we think the weight of authority, as well as the better reason, supports the position that the promise to pay "when able" is conditional; of course, the expression must be construed as referring to financial ability.

In this case the statutory bar had attached before the alleged new promises were made. The debtor was under no legal obligation whatever to pay the debt. While the indebtedness itself was not canceled, it could never be collected by judicial proceedings, if he saw fit to invoke the statute. Whatever promise he made was entirely voluntary, and authorities universally recognize his right to impose any condition which he might deem proper. By agreeing to pay when able, he practically declared that he would not bind himself unless he then had, or should thereafter acquire, the means to do so; and it is difficult to understand how it can truthfully or logically be said that his promise was absolute and unconditional; the very language used indicates an intention not to renew the liability, except upon the conditions above mentioned. It may be hard for the creditor to prove the debtor's financial ability, yet it is not more difficult for him to do this than to prove a great many other conditions which might legally be imposed. This is not a matter left to the debtor's discretion and judgment. His ability to pay is a question of fact for the jury, and that body might find that he was able to do so at the very time he made the conditional promise.⁴¹

"A promise to pay when able is to be reasonably interpreted. On the one hand it does not imply ability to pay without embarrassment, or even without crippling the debtor's resources or business, while on the other hand ability to pay cannot be fairly implied while the debtor, although he may be in possession of property sufficient to pay the particular debt, is plainly insolvent or when payment, if enforced would strip him of his means of support. * * * It is not contemplated by the parties that the debtor will pay the debt out of earnings necessary for the support of himself or his family, or that he will pay the particular debt to the prejudice of other creditors, whose debts are absolute and unconditional." Andrews, J., in Tebo v. Robinson, 100 N. Y. 29, 30 (1885). Each case must be judged on its own facts. If the promise really is properly construed to be one to pay only when the promisor's

The law regards the creditor as culpable for not enforcing his demand within the statutory period; and the leading authorities are now decidedly against removing the bar of the statute, and relieving him from the result of such negligence, except upon clear proof of a new promise, and the performance or fulfillment of the conditions, if any attached thereto. See; generally upon this subject, 2 Greenl. Ev., supra; Wood, Lim. Act. § 78; Mattaacks v. Chadwick, 71 Me. 314; Tompkins v. Brown, 1 Denio, 248; Bidwell v. Rogers, 10 Allen, 438; Laforge v. Jayne, 9 Pa. St. 410; Sedgwick v. Gerding, 55 Ga. 264. * * * The court erred in finding upon the evidence adduced that defendant made a new promise to pay the debt in controversy sufficient to avert the statutory bar.

The judgment, resting upon such finding, must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

WORSLEY v. WOOD ET AL., ASSIGNEES OF LOCKYER AND BREAM, BANKRUPTS; IN ERROR.

(Court of King's Bench, 1796. 6 Term Reports, 710.)

This was an action of covenant brought in the Court of Common Pleas. The declaration stated that by a policy of insurance made before Lockyer and Bream became bankrupts, namely, on the 9th of March, 1792, it was witnessed that Lockyer and Bream had paid 11*l.* 16*s.* to the Phoenix Company, and had agreed to pay to them, at their office, the sum of 11*l.* 16*s.* on the 25th of March, 1793, and the like sum yearly on the said day during the continuance of the policy for insurance from loss or damage by fire, not exceeding the sum of 7,000*l.* That Worsley covenanted with L. and B. that, so long as the assured should pay the above premium, the capital stock and funds of the Phoenix Company should be liable to pay to the assured any loss that the assured should suffer by fire on the property therein mentioned, circumstances "change for the better," either by an acquisition of fortune or a decrease of obligation, it is an essential part of the plaintiff's case to show such change at a period subsequent to the time when the promise was made. Work v. Beach, 13 N. Y. Supp. 678 (1891). In Work v. Beach a judge who for about three years after he promised to pay about $14,600 "when I shall be able to do so" had received $15,000 a year salary, paid monthly, was given a judgment when sued for the money because he saved nothing out of the salary. Courts differ as to whether one has ability to pay if by acting reasonably he could pay.

If the promisor once becomes able to pay, the condition disappears and his promise becomes absolute, and his subsequent inability will not restore the condition. Denney & Co. v. Wheelwright Co., 60 Miss. 733 (1833). As soon as he has ability to pay the statute of limitations begins to run. Tebo v. Robinson, 100 N. Y. 29 (1835).

On effect of promise to pay as soon as one can, see L. R. A. 1918 A, 902, note.

not exceeding 7,000*l.*, according to the tenor of the printed proposals delivered with the policy. That in the printed proposals referred to by the policy it is declared that the company would not be accountable for any loss by fire caused by foreign invasions, civil commotion, &c.; and also that all persons assured sustaining any loss by fire should forthwith give notice to the company, and as soon as possible after deliver in as particular an account of their loss as the nature of the case would admit, and make proof of the same by their oath and by their book of accounts, or other vouchers as should be reasonably required, and should procure a certificate under the hands of the minister and churchwardens and of some reputable householders of the parish, not concerned in the loss, importing that they were acquainted with the character and circumstances of the person insured, and knew or believed that he by misfortune and without any kind of fraud or evil practice had sustained by such fire the loss and damage therein mentioned; and in case any difference should arise between the assured and the company touching any loss, such difference should be submitted to the judgment of arbitrators indifferently chosen, whose award should be conclusive, &c., and when any loss should have been duly proved, the assured should immediately receive satisfaction to the full amount of the same. The declaration then stated that on the 1st of July, 1792, a loss happened by fire in the house of L. and B., in which all their books of accounts were destroyed, to the amount of 7,000*l.* That L. and B. on the same day gave notice of it to the company, and on the same day delivered to the company as particular an account of their loss as the nature of the case admitted, and were then and there also ready and willing and then and there tendered to make proof of the loss by their oath, and to produce such vouchers as could be reasonably required in that behalf; that on the same day they procured and delivered to the said company a certificate under the hands of four reputable householders of the parish, to the effect required in the printed proposals, and applied to E. Embry, the minister, and H. Hutchins and J. Bellamy, the churchwardens of the parish, to sign such certificate, but that they, without any reasonable or probable cause, wrongfully and unjustly refused and have ever since refused to sign it. The declaration then stated that the funds of the company were sufficient to pay this loss, yet the company have not paid it, either to the bankrupts or to their assignees; nor have the company submitted the said difference to the judgment of such arbitrators, &c.

There was another count, in which it was not averred that the bankrupts either offered to make proof of the loss, or procured a certificate, or applied to the minister, &c., for one; and the breach in this count was, that the company had not submitted the said difference to the judgment of such arbitrators, &c.

The defendant pleaded (to the first count) that the bankrupts were not interested in the house or goods, &c., at the time of the loss, on which issue was taken in the replication. 2d. That the loss was occasioned by the fraud and evil practice of the bankrupts; on which issue was taken, &c. 3d. That the minister and churchwardens did not refuse wrongfully and injuriously, and without any reasonable or probable cause, to sign the certificate; on which issue was taken. To the second count: 1st. That the bankrupts were not interested, &c.; on which issue was taken. 2d. That the loss was occasioned by fraud, &c. (as above); on which issue was taken. 3d. That neither the bankrupts or their assignees procured such certificate under the hands of the minister and churchwardens and respectable inhabitants, &c., as required in the printed proposals.

To the last of these pleas, the plaintiffs replied, that the bankrupts as soon as possible after the loss, namely, on the 1st of July, 1792, procured and delivered to the company such certificate as is required in the printed proposals under the hands of four respectable inhabitants, &c., but that the minister and churchwardens wrongfully refused to sign it without any reasonable or probable cause for so doing.

The rejoinder stated that the minister and churchwardens did not wrongfully refuse, &c., on which issue was taken in the surrejoinder.

The jury found all the issues for the plaintiffs, and gave a verdict for 3,000*l*.

The defendant below removed the record into this court by writ of error, and assigned for error that the declaration, the replication, and the other pleadings of the plaintiffs below, were not sufficient in law to maintain the action.

LORD KENYON, C. J.⁴⁸ * * * We are called upon in this action to give effect to a contract made between these parties; and if from the terms of it we discover that they intended, that the procuring of the certificate by the assured should precede their right to recover, and that it has not been procured, we are bound to give judgment in favor of the defendant below. These insurance companies, who enter into very extensive contracts of this kind, are liable (as we but too frequently see in courts of justice) to great frauds and impositions; common prudence, therefore, suggests to them the propriety of taking all possible care to protect them from frauds when they make these contracts. The Phoenix Company have provided, among other things, that the assured should, as soon as possible after the calamity has happened, deliver in an account of their loss, and procure a certificate under the hands of the minister and churchwardens, and of some reputable householders of the parish, importing that they knew the character and circumstances of the assured, and believed that they had sustained the loss without any kind of fraud. That this is a prudent regulation, this very case is sufficient to convince us; for it appears on the record, that soon after the fire the assured delivered in an account of their loss, which they said amounted to 7,000*l.*, that they obtained a certificate from some of the reputable inhabitants that the loss did amount to that sum, and that the jury after inquiring into all the circumstances were of opinion that the loss did not exceed 3,000*l.*; and yet it is also stated that the minister and churchwardens, who refused to certify that they believed that the loss amounted to 7,000*l.*, wrongfully and without any reasonable or probable cause refused to sign such certificate. The great question here is, whether or not it was the intention of these parties that that certificate should precede payment by the insurance office; now it seems to me from the printed proposals that it was their intention that it should precede payment. What is a condition precedent, or what a condition subsequent, is well expressed by my brother Ashhurst in the case of Hotham v. The East India Company, to which I refer in general. If there be a condition precedent to do an impossible thing, the obligation becomes single; but however improbable the thing may be, it must be complied with, or the right which was to attach on its being performed does not vest. If the condition be, that A shall enfeoff B, and A do all his power to perform the condition, and B will not receive livery of seisin, yet from the time of Lord Coke to the present moment, it has not been doubted but that the right which was to depend on the performance of that condition did not arise. In the case of Hesketh v. Gray, which has been cited as a determination in this court, there was also an application to the Great Seal, at the time when Lord Chief Justice Willes was the first commissioner, to dispense with the condition, which was, that the Bishop of Chichester should accept the resignation of a living; but it was held that there was no ground for a court of equity to interfere. This court also held, when the case came before them, that it was a condition precedent, and must be performed.

In this case, however, it is said that, though the minister and churchwardens did not certify, some of the inhabitants did certify, and that that was sufficient, it being a performance of the condition cy pres. But I confess, I do not see how the terms cy pres are applicable to this subject; the argument for the plaintiffs below goes to show that if none of the inhabitants of this parish certified, a certificate by the inhabitants of the next or of any other parish would have answered the purpose. But the assured cannot substitute one thing for another. In the case of Campbell v. French, we explained the grounds of this doctrine, and said that the party who had not complied with the condition could not substitute other terms or conditions in lieu of those which all the parties to the contract had originally made. So here it was competent to the insurance office to make the stipulations stated in their printed proposals; they had a right to say to individuals who were desirous of being insured, "Knowing how liable we are to be imposed upon, we will, among other things, require that the minister, churchwardens, and some of the reputable inhabitants of your parish shall certify that they believe that the loss happened by misfortune and without fraud, otherwise we will not contract with you at all." If the assured say that the minister and churchwardens may obstinately refuse to certify, the insurers answer, "We will not stipulate with you on any other terms." Such are the terms on which I understand this insurance to have been effected; and, therefore, I am clearly of opinion, that there is no foundation for the action, and that the judgment below must be reversed.

HEBERT v. DEWEY.

DEWEY v. HEBERT.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1906. 191 Mass. 403, 77 N. E. 822.)

Two actions. The first by Valerie Hebert, administratrix, against P. H. Dewey; the second by Dewey against Hebert. Rulings were adverse to Dewey, and he excepted. In second action, exceptions overruled; in first action, exceptions sustained.

But in Lang v. The Eagle Fire Company, 12 N. Y. App. Div. 39 (1896), Adams, J., said: "The defendant further insists that the plaintiff should fail in his action because of his omission to furnish a certificate of the magistrate or notary public living nearest the place of the fire, stating the amount of the loss sustained. It seems that the policy in suit does, in terms, require such a certificate to be furnished when requested by the insurer, and that the request was made in this case. Thereafter, a certificate was furnished to the defendant, which is apparently satisfactory in all respects save that it was not made out by the magistrate or notary living nearest the place of the fire. It is conceded that there was such an officer living nearer the place of the fire than the one making the certificate, but as he declined to act the plaintiff procured a certificate of the nearest notary who was willing to act. It is to be noticed that the provision which requires this certificate is one which relates merely to the procedure after the loss has occurred, and the courts of this state are inclined to be liberal and reasonable in their construction of the stipulations of a contract of insurance which prescribe the formal acts upon the part of the insured necessary to the recovery of his loss. (McNally v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 127 N. Y. 389-398, and cases there cited.) In this case we think that the plaintiff has done all that could be required of him; he certainly could not compel any magistrate or notary to furnish the certificate called for by the defendant, and if upon his application to the one living nearest the fire he was met with a refusal to comply with his request, there was nothing left for him to do but to apply to the one living next nearest. The defendant's contention in this regard is extremely technical, and, in the absence of any objection to the person making the certificate, or to the certificate itself, is not entitled to serious consideration."

KNOWLTON, C. J.⁴⁴ The first of these actions was brought by the plaintiff's intestate to recover upon a contract in writing for building a house for the defendant, and also for extra work done in connection with the contract. The second is a cross-action, brought to recover damages for the nonperformance of the contract, and also for money lent to the defendant, and money had and received by the defendant to the plaintiff's use. * * *

The first important exception relates to the rulings and refusals to rule in regard to certificates given to the plaintiff's intestate by the architect, upon which payments were made by the defendant under the contract. The contract provided for three payments to be made at different stages in the progress of the work, and a fourth after the completion of it. Then followed this proviso: "That in each case of the said payments, a certificate shall be obtained from and signed by said F. S. Newman, architect, to the effect that the work is done in strict accordance with the drawings and specifications, and that he considers the payment properly due; said certificate, however, in no way lessening the total and final responsibility of the contractor; neither shall it exempt the contractor from liability to replace work, if it be afterwards discovered to have been done ill, or not according to the drawings and specifications, either in execution or materials," etc.

The third certificate, in its substantive parts, is as follows: "This is to certify that under the terms of the contract dated," etc., "Mr. Joseph Hebert, contractor for building your house, is entitled to the third payment, amounting to $1,200." The first and second certificates were in the same form; but the architect refused to give the fourth and final certificate, and the plaintiff's intestate never obtained it.

At the trial the evidence was conflicting upon all the questions in issue, and there was much dispute as to whether the plaintiff's intestate had performed the contract, or had done improper work and used improper materials in violation of it. The judge instructed the jury, in substance, that so far as the work and materials which had previously been supplied were known to the architect at the time of giving one of these certificates, the certificate would be conclusive upon the defendant as to the quality and fitness of the work and materials, and it would not afterwards be open to the architect or the owner to question it. He treated each of these certificates as a final determination, in favor of the contractor, that the contract had been properly performed up to that time, in all parts of which the architect had knowledge.

It is well settled that, in the absence of fraud, or such mistake as prevents him from exercising his judgment upon the case, the parties are bound by the certificate of an architect, made under the authority of a building contract like that now before us. His position is like that of an arbitrator, to determine the particular matter submitted to him.

Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373, 389; Flint v. Gibson, 106 Mass. 391; Robbins v. Clark, 129 Mass. 145; National Contracting Co. v. Com., 183 Mass. 89, 66 N. E. 639; Norcross v. Wyman, 187 Mass. 25, 27 N. E. 347; White v. Abbott, 188 Mass. 99, 74 N. E. 305. The only question of difficulty in this part of the case arises from the peculiar language of the contract as to the effect of the certificates. They are referred to as "in no way lessening the total and final responsibility of the contractor," etc. This language furnishes ground for an argument that the certificates given prior to the completion of the work were intended to be merely intermediate or progress certificates, for the benefit of the builder, given to enable him to obtain payments on account, during the progress of the work. Such certificates are not conclusive as to the final payment, nor upon a claim for damages, nor on a quantum meruit. 1 Hudson, Building Contracts, 288; Tharsis Sulphur & Copper Co. v. McElroy, 3 App. Cas. 1040; Ford v. Railroad Co., 54 Iowa, 723, 7 N. W. 126. While the matter is not free from doubt, we are inclined to hold that these certificates were intended to be something more than progress certificates, and that they are to be held final in their determination of all matters which were then within the knowledge of the architect. In the first place, the contract makes no distinction in this particular between the certificates to be given before the work is completed and the final certificate. Then the special provision as to the effect is that they shall not relieve the contractor from liability for inferior work, "if it be afterwards discovered to have been done ill, * * * either in execution or materials," etc. Inasmuch as the general rule would make such certificates conclusive, we are of opinion that they should be held to leave the claims open only as to deficiencies that are afterwards discovered, and that this exception of the defendant should be overruled.

The defendant contended that the plaintiff could not recover under the contract, because her intestate failed to obtain from the architect a certificate that the final payment was due. The question is whether a sufficient justification was shown for this failure. The instruction to the jury on this point was as follows: "If the defendant's architect capriciously withheld the final certificate, and capriciously allowed the contractor to believe that nothing more remained to be done to entitle him to such certificate, the contractor is thereby relieved from his obligation to secure the certificate." This was in accordance with the plaintiff's request, except that the judge left out the word "fraudulently" which was used in the request with "capriciously." The law bearing upon this part of the case has not been definitely settled in this commonwealth.

There is a class of cases arising under policies of insurance and other similar contracts, in which it is held that the procurement of the certificate, called for by the contract, is a condition precedent to the plaintiff's recovery. Johnson v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 112 Mass. 49, 17 Am. Rep. 65; Audette v. L'Union St. Joseph, 178 Mass. 113, 59 N. E. 668, and cases there cited. The reason why it is not open to the plaintiff in these cases to show that he could not obtain the certificate, is because the nature of the contract and the purpose of the requirement of a certificate are such as to make the recovery conditional upon the presentation of the paper, for the purpose of affording the insurer an assurance against fraud, and giving him additional evidence that there is a legal liability. Johnson v. Phoenix Ins. Co., ubi supra. The promise is to pay only upon the existence of conditions shown by a particular kind of proof, which the parties prescribe as the only evidence that will be deemed sufficient to establish the fact. In such contracts the plaintiff takes upon himself the obligation to furnish the required proof, and assumes the risk of whatever difficulty there may be in procuring it. Whether a contract is of this kind is a question of construction, dependent upon the meaning of the parties, as ascertained from the writing.

A provision for a certificate by an architect, in a building contract, stands differently. The architect is the agent of the owner, to perform an act for the convenience of both parties, in regard to a matter with which he is directly connected as an employee. It is assumed by the contracting parties and implied in the contract that he will do his duty, and will act in good faith in determining whether a certificate should be granted. In cases under provisions like the one before us, it is everywhere held that the contractor may recover without a certificate, if the circumstances relieve him from the obligation to obtain one. What circumstances are sufficient for this purpose is the only question. If the owner wrongfully interferes to prevent the giving of a certificate, it is universally held that this will entitle the contractor to recover without it. Beharrell v. Quimby, 162 Mass. 571, 575, 39 N. E. 407; Whitten v. New England Live Stock Co., 165 Mass. 343, 345, 43 N. E. 121; Battsburg v. Vyse, 2 H. & C. 42; Whelen v. Boyd, 114 Pa. 228, 6 Atl. 384. Many of the authorities are to the effect that any wrongful refusal of the architect to give a certificate will entitle the contractor to proceed without one. In some cases it is said that if the architect unreasonably refuses to give a certificate it is enough. Nolan v. Whitney, 88 N. Y. 648; Flaherty v. Miner, 123 N. Y. 382, 390, 25 N. E. 418; Thomas v. Stewart, 132 N. Y. 580, 30 N. E. 577; Crouch v. Gutman, 134 N. Y. 45, 31 N. E. 271, 30 Am. St. Rep. 608; United States v. Robeson, 9 Pet. 319, 327, 9 L. Ed. 142. In others it appeared that he refused "dishonestly and arbitrarily," or "willfully and fraudulently," or "capriciously." Bentley v. Davidson, 74 Wis. 420, 43 N. W. 139; Chism v. Schipper, 51 N. J. Law, 1, 16 Atl. 316, 2 L. R. A. 544, 14 Am. St. Rep. 668; Bradner v. Roffsell, 57 N. J. Law, 32, 29 Atl. 317; Id., 57 N. J. Law, 412, 31 Atl. 387; Badger v. Kerber, 61 Ill. 328. In Beharrell v. Quimby, 162 Mass. 571, 575, 39 N. E. 407, 409, there is an implication that if the architect "had fraudulently or capriciously withheld a final certificate," the plaintiff might have recovered without it.

In the present case there was evidence from which the jury might have found that after a complete performance of the contract the plaintiff's intestate applied to the architect for the final certificate, and he willfully and fraudulently refused to give it. It is plain that in making the contract it was understood between the parties that the architect would act in good faith in the performance of this part of his duty. In legal effect, the contract is as if their understanding in this particular had been written into it, as one of its terms. If, under such an agreement, after the full performance of the contract, the architect willfully and fraudulently refuses to act, or dies, or becomes disqualified, and there is no provision for such a case, the question arises whether the contractor is entitled to receive the contract price, the fact of performance being shown in some other way, or whether the entire contract falls to the ground, and the parties are left to enforce their rights under a quantum meruit. It is a general rule that if an implied condition that fails is of the essence of the contract, and enters largely into the consideration, in such a way that there can be no substantial performance under the changed conditions, the whole contract will fail, and the parties may have reasonable compensation for what they have done in reliance upon it. Butterfield v. Byron, 153 Mass. 517, 27 N. E. 667, 12 L. R. A. 571, 25 Am. St. Rep. 654. But the provision in this case for the ascertainment of their rights, in reference to the construction of the building called for by the contract is of a different kind. It is a part of the machinery provided for the ascertainment and adjustment of their rights in reference to the matters to which the contract relates. It is provided to be used only upon an implied condition that it will be available for use. If, through the death or incapacity of the architect, or his willful refusal to act, it becomes impossible to adopt this method of determining the rights of the parties, other means may be adopted, on the ground that this no longer remains as an essential term of the agreement. In all substantial particulars the contract is complete without the provision for obtaining a final certificate, and, in the case supposed, it should be treated as if the provision were stricken from the contract.⁴⁵ In Whitten v. New England

Live Stock Insurance Co., 165 Mass. 343, 345, 43 N. E. 121, this was held to be the effect of an interposition by a party to prevent that from happening, upon the happening of which he was to make a payment under a contract.

A provision like the one before us in this kind of contract, where the substance of the consideration on one side is valuable property in the form of labor and materials, is materially different from the provision in the policies of insurance to which we have referred. In these contracts for insurance a small sum is paid on one side to obtain indemnity from the possible consequences of a risk which is very likely to cause damage. The compensation is to be paid only for genuine losses, resulting from the risk insured against. Satisfactory proof of their character, as coming within the policy, is of the very essence of the contract. On that depends the obligation of the insurer to pay a very large sum for which only a small consideration is given. In view of the ease with which frauds may be practiced the parties sometimes prescribe a method of establishing the validity of the claim, which they make essential to its recognition. They say, in effect, that the policy shall apply only to claims established in this way, and they thereby make the production of the prescribed certificate of the very essence of the contract. It is only to contracts which are construed as showing such a strict agreement that this rule is applied. Whether any of these insurance contracts should be held to require the production of a certificate as a condition precedent to recovery, if the person who is to give it is incapacitated from acting, or fraudulently refuses to act, is a question which we need not consider in this case. In regard to such questions the rights of the parties depend upon what is their meaning and intention as shown by their contracts as applied to the subject with which they are dealing. We do not intend to extend the doctrine of the insurance cases beyond the statements in our decisions.

In all the cases that we have cited under building contracts, it is held that there may be a recovery upon the contract, where the contractor's failure to obtain the architect's certificate showing perform-been to call upon the defendants to appoint some other surveyor who will do his duty."

Considering the importance to the owner of having competent supervision and certification before making payments, it would seem as if far less remaking of the contract would take place if the owner were simply required to make a reasonable choice of a new architect and simply deprived of the benefits of a certificate as to matters with which the new architect could not fairly acquaint himself. Where the owner has the right to name any architect, one not being named in the contract, that should be the rule applied as a matter of construction. Where, however, the satisfaction of a named architect is called for and the owner discharges him and employs another architect without any agreement for his substitution, it is fair to regard the condition as to architects as eliminated. Thomas Haverty Co. v. Jones, (Cal.) 197 Pac. 105 (1921).

ance of it is caused by the fraud or intentional misconduct of the architect. In United States v. Robeson, 9 Pet. 319, 327, 9 L. Ed. 142, a case where the contract entitled the plaintiff to payment on the certificate of a colonel, commanding a party, Mr. Justice McLean said in the opinion: "Had the defendant proved that application has been made to the commanding officer for the proper certificates, and that he refused to give them, it would have been proper to receive other evidence to establish the claim." In Whelen v. Boyd, 114 Pa. 228, 232, 6 Atl. 384, 386, the court said of the defendant, in reference to the refusal of a certificate: "The law is settled that he cannot take advantage of his own or his agent's wrong." In Baltimore & Ohio R. R. v. Polly, Woods & Co., 14 Grat. (Va.) 447, 464, this language is used, in reference to the same subject: "The principal cannot take advantage of the fraud of his agent, even though he did not actually participate in the perpetration of the fraud." Other cases, indicating that, where the plaintiff is excused from obtaining such a certificate, the recovery may be on the contract itself, are Herrick and Belknap's Estate v. the Vermont Central R. R., 27 Vt. 673, 681, and Batchelor v. Kirkbride (C. C.) 26 Fed. 899. We have found no case of this kind in which it is held, on a failure to obtain an architect's certificate after performance of a contract, that the contract lost its force, and that the parties were left to their rights upon a quantum meruit.

In a case like the present, we are of opinion that if an architect after the completion of a contract willfully, and without excuse, refuses to act at all, or if he acts dishonestly and in bad faith, and the contractor is thereby prevented from obtaining a certificate, the contractor may proceed with his suit without it. Such action or refusal to act would leave the provision for obtaining an architect's certificate of no effect upon the rights of either party. The judge followed the instruction quoted with other instructions which went too far in relieving the plaintiff from obligation to obtain the certificate. He said: "If the fact was that after Mr. Hebert had finished the contract so far as he thought it required him to do work and furnish material, and when he called upon Mr. McCauley or Mr. Newman to come there and see whether the thing was right, and if it was, to give him a certificate, and if not, tell him what work was to be done, and he would do it, Mr. McCauley went there and pointed out where things were necessary to be done, and then the certificate could be given, and Guinan or Mr. Hebert caused those things to be done, and the doing of those things was said to be all that was required, and they were done, and then Mr. Newman [the architect] refused to give the certificate, or to come to the premises to look them over and see whether in these respects the added matters were sufficiently done, and they were sufficiently done, then the architect's certificate would drop out of sight and not be required." The facts here stated would be evidence from which the jury might find that the plaintiff's intestate was excused from obtaining the certificate; but it cannot be said as matter of law that they would excuse him. The architect, in the meantime, might have discovered other things which justified him in refusing the certificate.

After telling the jury that certain conduct of Dewey would not be fraudulent in reference to the certificate, he added: "It would still have to be shown by the plaintiff that the certificate ought to have been given, and if it was shown that the work was done and the contract substantially performed, then the fact that the certificate was not given was not of any account." This last proposition was not correct in law. If the architect, acting in good faith, thought that the work was not properly done and the contract was not substantially performed, and refused the certificate for that reason, the mere fact that the certificate ought to have been given, and that the work was done, and the contract was performed, would not entitle the plaintiff to recover without the certificate. The parties were bound by the decision of the architect made in good faith. The judge also gave the following instruction: "Under the law as I have instructed you I do not know as it would make any difference what was the conduct of Mr. Dewey, whether he tried improperly to get the architect to withhold the certificate, because if the work was properly done, then the certificate ought to have been given. If the work was not properly done, and was so far improperly done as to render it no performance of the contract by Hebert, then the certificate would not avail. Perhaps it is only in the event that although the contract was not performed, still there were particulars in which it could be compensated for, and certain things could be done by Mr. Dewey to remedy it, in that event, but even in that event I don't see that the certificate would make any difference."

Because these instructions give too little effect to the requirement that the contractor shall procure a certificate from the architect before he is entitled to payment, there must be a new trial.⁴⁶ We deem it un-

⁴⁶ In Bush v. Jones, 144 Fed. 942, 944, 947-948 (1906), Archbald, J., said:

"The law upon the subject of architects' certificates is well settled. It is perfectly legitimate to provide in a building or working contract that payment of the several installments of the contract price shall only be made upon certificates or estimates by the architect or engineer in charge as to the extent and value of the work done or materials furnished, and that final payment shall not be demandable without a certificate of completion. These are familiar provisions, universally recognized, and will be enforced. 30 Am. & Eng. Encycl. Law (2d Ed.) 1237. Equally well recognized, however, is it that the production of such a certificate as a condition precedent to a recovery is not necessary where it is capriciously or arbitrarily withheld. But where this is alleged it is incumbent on the contractor, in order to bring himself within the exception, if he does not produce a certificate, to show why he cannot, and until he successfully does so he has not made out a case. * * *

"Completion to the satisfaction and according to the trained professional judgment of the architect, who drew the plans and specifications, and is able to speak from a direct supervision over and inspection of the work as it progresses, and completion according to the opinion of the jury, under the imperfect conditions of a trial and the inability to produce things as they actually are, are two different and distinct propositions; and the owner, who has stipulated for the one, is not to be put off with the other, where everything is honestly and fairly done. Whether this is true, or whether the architect in withholding his approval acts capriciously or fraudulently, where there is evidence to sustain this charge, has necessarily to be submitted to the jury, and proof of a substantial compliance with the contract enters into this as an essential step. But to hold that, upon such proof, without more, the necessity for the production of a certificate is dispensed with, or is to be regarded as unreasonably withheld, and that, not as a fact, with others, for the consideration of the jury, but as a matter of law for the court, not only loses sight of the distinction which we have referred to, but makes the provision with regard to the architect's certificate useless and meaningless, for it puts a contract where it appears on a level with one where it does not; the contractor in the former being permitted to recover upon showing that he has substantially complied with it, and in the latter being required to prove no less. The jury in the present instance should therefore have been instructed that the production of a certificate was essential to a recovery, and that the want of it could not be dispensed with, unless it was established to their satisfaction that it had been unreasonably withheld. Bearing upon this, as already stated, was the evidence of a substantial completion of the work; but it should not have stopped there. Compliance with the contract was seriously questioned, and the material reduction made by the jury from the amount of the plaintiff's claim shows that at least some things were lacking. Admittedly, there was a leaky and imperfectly waterproofed cellar, and whatever may be said of the guaranty that it should be water-tight, there was in this an apparent defect, sufficient to justify the architect in refusing to approve until it had been remedied. Had the jury, therefore, been instructed as to the necessity for his approval, and what was requisite to overcome the want of it, they might well have hesitated, under the circumstances, to hold as they were required, in order to find for the plaintiffs, that his refusal was arbitrary. In any view, the question was for them, and, not having been submitted to them nor passed upon by them, the verdict is without a proper finding to support it, and cannot be sustained."

⁴⁷ The English rule has been stated as follows:

"Reading the two clauses [of the building contract] together I am of opinion that their true meaning is that the [architect's] certificate must be obtained before the plaintiff can sue for payment. * * * The plaintiff must fail in the action unless he can show that there was some wrong act done by the defendant entitling him, the plaintiff, to proceed notwithstanding that he has not obtained the architect's certificate. Such a wrong would be fraud or collusion between the defendant and the architect, or some moral turpitude amounting to improper conduct which would lead the court to interfere. There must be something in the nature of improper conduct by the defendant before the court can ignore the contract and say that the plaintiff may proceed not-

MICHAEL NOLAN ET AL., RESPONDENTS v. CORDELIA C.
WHITNEY, APPELLANT.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1882. 88 N. Y. 648.)

In July, 1877, Michael Nolan, the plaintiffs' testator, entered into an agreement with the defendant to do the mason work in the erection of two buildings in the City of Brooklyn for the sum of $11,700, to be paid to him by her in instalments as the work progressed. The last instalment of $2,700 was to be paid thirty days after completion and acceptance of the work. The work was to be performed to the satisfaction and under the direction of M. J. Morrill, architect, to be testified by his certificate, and that was to be obtained before any payment could be required to be made. As the work progressed, all the instalments were paid except the last, and Nolan, claiming that he had fully performed his agreement, commenced this action to recover that instalment. The defendant defended the action upon the ground that Nolan had not fully performed his agreement according to its terms and requirements, and also upon the ground that he had not obtained the architect's certificate, as required by the agreement.

Upon the trial the defendant gave evidence tending to show that much of the work was imperfectly done, and that the agreement had not been fully kept and performed on the part of Nolan; the latter gave evidence tending to show that the work was properly done, that he had fairly and substantially performed his agreement, and that the architect had refused to give him the certificate which, by the terms of his agreement, would entitle him to the final payment. The referee withstanding the absence of the certificate. Clarke v. Watson, 18 C. B. (N. S.) 278, shows this quite clearly. The mere fact that the architect may have been guilty of an error of judgment by not applying his mind sufficiently to the question raised, or that he gave a wrong judgment are immaterial matters for this purpose. The court cannot consider them unless the plaintiff has shown a ground for attacking the defendant with regard to the architect's certificate and that is where the plaintiff fails. In Hickman & Co. v. Roberts, [1913] A. C. 229, it was said that where improper conduct was shown, for example, if the architect was acting in the interests of one party by his direction, that would render his acts invalid. If in this case it had been shown that the defendant had given instructions to the architect as to the amount for which he should certify, or as to the decision at which he ought to arrive upon any particular matter, there would be sufficient to override the necessity for obtaining the certificate and the plaintiff would be entitled to proceed without it. But that is what is absent in this case. There is no allegation that the defendant did anything wrong. * * * All the allegations are against the architect. Neither fraud nor collusion nor improper conduct on the part of the defendant is alleged; all that is said is that the architect has done things which he ought not and has omitted to do things which he ought to have done. That being so, sufficient has not been shown to entitle the plaintiff to proceed with the action in view of the conditions of the contract." Earl of Reading, C. J., in Eaglesham v. McMaster, [1920] 2 K. B. 169, 175, 177-178.

found that Nolan completed the mason work required by the agreement according to its terms; that he in good faith intended to comply with, and did substantially comply with, and perform the requirements of his agreement; but that there were trivial defects in the plastering for which a deduction of $200 should be made from the last instalment, and he ordered judgment in favor of Nolan for the last instalment, less $200.

The court say: "It is a general rule of law that a party must perform his contract before he can claim the consideration due him upon performance; but the performance need not in all cases be literal and exact. It is sufficient if the party bound to perform, acting in good faith, and intending and attempting to perform his contract, does so substantially, and then he may recover for his work, notwithstanding slight or trivial defects in performance, for which compensation may be made by an allowance to the other party. Whether a contract has been substantially performed is a question of fact depending upon all the circumstances of the case to be determined by the trial court. Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 189; Thomas v. Fleury, 26 id. 26; Glacius v. Black, 50 id. 145; Johnson v. DePeyster, 50 id. 666; Phillip v. Gallant, 62 id. 256; Bowery Nat. Bank v. The Mayor, 63 id. 336. According to the authorities cited under an allegation of substantial performance upon the facts found by the referee, Nolan was entitled to recover unless he is barred because he failed to get the architect's certificate, which the referee found was unreasonable and improperly refused. But when he had substantially performed his contract, the architect was bound to give him the certificate, and his refusal to give it was unreasonable; and it is held that an unreasonable refusal on the part of an architect in such a case to give the certificate dispenses with its necessity."

EARL, J., reads for affirmance.

*Judgment affirmed.*⁴⁸

⁴⁸ This New York case seems to have been one of refusing to give effect to the clearly expressed intention that the honest dissatisfaction of the architect should be final so far as recovery on the contract was concerned. In Crouch v. Gutmann, 134 N. Y. 45 (1892), where the contract was for the building of a brick block for $16,500 payable in instalments, and the architect's certificate was an express condition precedent to the right to any payments upon the work, the architect refused to give the last certificate because there were defects in the work to the amount of $216.71. The court held that the refusal to give a certificate after deducting that amount was unreasonable and dispensed with the necessity of production of the certificate, since the builder had substantially performed. Bradley, J., for the court, said: "The rule of substantial performance should not be extended beyond the purpose in view when the relaxation of the strict performance was adopted, which was founded upon equitable considerations in furtherance of justice, and made applicable to cases of honest intention of contractors to fairly perform their contracts, and who shall in the main have done so, with only slight defects or omissions inadvertently and unintentionally caused and appearing in the work" (p. 55). In

JACOB & YOUNGS, Inc., v. KENT.

Action by Jacob & Youngs, Incorporated, against George E. Kent. From an order of the Appellate Division (187 App. Div. 100, 175 N. Y. Supp. 281), reversing judgment for defendant entered on verdict directed by the court and granting new trial, defendant appeals. Order affirmed and judgment absolute directed in favor of plaintiff.

CARDOZO, J. The plaintiff built a country residence for the defendant at a cost of upwards of $77,000, and now sues to recover a balance of $3,483.46, remaining unpaid. The work of construction ceased in June, 1914, and the defendant then began to occupy the dwelling. There was no complaint of defective performance until March, 1915. One of the specifications for the plumbing work provides that—

"All wrought-iron pipe must be well galvanized, lap welded pipe of the grade known as 'standard pipe' of Reading manufacture."

The defendant learned in March, 1915, that some of the pipe, instead of being made in Reading, was the product of other factories. The plaintiff was accordingly directed by the architect to do the work anew. The plumbing was then encased within the walls except in a few places where it had to be exposed. Obedience to the order meant more than the substitution of other pipe. It meant the demolition at great expense of substantial parts of the completed structure. The plaintiff left the work untouched, and asked for a certificate that the final payment was due. Refusal of the certificate was followed by this suit.

The evidence sustains a finding that the omission of the prescribed brand of pipe was neither fraudulent nor willful. It was the result of the oversight and inattention of the plaintiff's subcontractor. Read-dissenting Follett, C. J., said: "The tendency, called equitable, of courts to relieve persons from the performance of engagements deliberately entered into, and in legal effect to make for litigants new contracts which they never entered into, and which it cannot be supposed they ever would have entered into, has been and is being carried to a length which cannot be justified in reason" (p. 58). In connection with this dissenting opinion, see Fuchs v. Saladino, 133 N. Y. App. Div. 710 (1909), where it was held that there was no substantial performance of a building contract, and that the architect's certificate was not unreasonably withheld, since fifteen per cent in value of the work was unperformed. There Laughlin, J., for the court said (pp. 715-716): "Neither a complete nor a substantial performance can be predicated upon facts showing omissions, deviations and defects of this magnitude, regardless of whether or not they constituted structural defects. * * * Contractors should understand that the obligation to perform a building contract is the same as the law imposes with respect to other contracts, and that there can be no recovery where there have been deviations or omissions of a material nature, unless a sufficient excuse or waiver be pleaded and proved, and that the rule with respect to allowing a deduction on account of small or immaterial items, and a recovery as for a substantial performance, will not be extended."

ing pipe is distinguished from Cohoes pipe and other brands only by the name of the manufacturer stamped upon it at intervals of between six and seven feet. Even the defendant's architect, though he inspected the pipe upon arrival, failed to notice the discrepancy. The plaintiff tried to show that the brands installed, though made by other manufacturers, were the same in quality, in appearance, in market value, and in cost as the brand stated in the contract—that they were, indeed, the same thing, though manufactured in another place. The evidence was excluded, and a verdict directed for the defendant. The Appellate Division reversed, and granted a new trial.

We think the evidence, if admitted, would have supplied some basis for the inference that the defect was insignificant in its relation to the project. The courts never say that one who makes a contract fills the measure of his duty by less than full performance. They do say, however, that an omission, both trivial and innocent, will sometimes be atoned for by allowance of the resulting damage, and will not always be the breach of condition to be followed by a forfeiture. Spence v. Ham, 163 N. Y. 220, 57 N. E. 412, 51 L. R. A. 238; Woodward v. Fuller, 80 N. Y. 312; Glacius v. Blanck, 67 N. Y. 563, 566; Bowen v. Kimbell, 203 Mass. 364, 370, 89 N. E. 542, 133 Am. St. Rep. 302. The distinction is akin to that between dependent and independent promises, or between promises and conditions. Anson on Contracts (Corbin's Ed.) §367; 2 Williston on Contracts, § 842. Some promises are so plainly independent that they can never by fair construction be conditions of one another. Rosenthal Paper Co. v. Nat. Folding Box & Paper Co., 226 N. Y. 313, 123 N. E. 766; Bogardus v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 101 N. Y. 328, 4 N. E. 522. Others are so plainly dependent that they must always be conditions. Others, though dependent and thus conditions when there is departure in point of substance, will be viewed as independent and collateral when the departure is insignificant. 2 Williston on Contracts, §§841, 842; Eastern Forge Co. v. Corbin, 182 Mass. 590, 592, 66 N. E. 419; Robinson v. Mollett, L. R., 7 Eng. & Ir. App. 802, 814; Miller v. Benjamin, 142 N. Y. 613, 37 N. E. 631. Considerations partly of justice and partly of presumable intention are to tell us whether this or that promise shall be placed in one class or in another. The simple and the uniform will call for different remedies from the multifarious and the intricate. The margin of departure within the range of normal expectation upon a sale of common chattels will vary from the margin to be expected upon a contract for the construction of a mansion or a "skyscraper." There will be harshness sometimes and oppression in the implication of a condition when the thing upon which labor has been expended is incapable of surrender because united to the land, and equity and reason in the implication of a like condition when the subject-matter, if defective, is in shape to be returned. From the conclusion that promises may not be treated as dependent to the extent of their uttermost minutiae without a sacrifice of justice, the progress is a short one to the conclusion that they may not be so treated without a perversion of intention. Intention not otherwise revealed may be presumed to hold in contemplation the reasonable and probable. If something else is in view, it must not be left to implication. There will be no assumption of a purpose to visit venial faults with oppressive retribution.

Those who think more of symmetry and logic in the development of legal rules than of practical adaptation to the attainment of a just result will be troubled by a classification where the lines of division are so wavering and blurred. Something, doubtless, may be said on the score of consistency and certainly in favor of a stricter standard. The courts have balanced such considerations against those of equity and fairness, and found the latter to be the weightier. The decisions in this state commit us to the liberal view, which is making its way, nowadays, in jurisdictions slow to welcome it. Dakin & Co. v. Lee [1916], 1 K. B. 566. 579. Where the line is to be drawn between the important and the trivial cannot be settled by a formula. "In the nature of the case precise boundaries are impossible." 2 Williston on Contracts, § 841. The same omission may take on one aspect or another according to its setting. Substitution of equivalents may not have the same significance in fields of art on the one side and in those of mere utility on the other. Nowhere will change be tolerated, however, if it is so dominant or pervasive as in any real or substantial measure to frustrate the purpose of the contract. Crouch v. Gutmann, 134 N. Y. 45, 51 31 N. E. 271, 30 Am. St. Rep. 608. There is no general license to install whatever, in the builder's judgment, may be regarded as "just as good." Easthampton L. & C. Co., Ltd., v. Worthington, 186 N. Y. 407, 412, 79 N. E. 323. The question is one of degree, to be answered, if there is doubt, by the triers of the facts (Crouch v. Gutmann; Woodward v. Fuller, supra), and, if the inferences are certain, by the judges of the law (Easthampton L. & C. Co., Ltd., v. Worthington, supra). We must weigh the purpose to be served, the desire to be gratified, the excuse for deviation from the letter, the cruelty of enforced adherence. Then only can we tell whether literal fulfillment is to be implied by law as a condition. This is not to say that the parties are not free by apt and certain words to effectuate a purpose that performance of every term shall be a condition of recovery. That question is not here. This is merely to say that the law will be slow to impute the purpose, in the silence of the parties, where the significance of the default is grievously out of proportion to the oppression of the forfeiture. The willful transgressor must accept the penalty of his transgression. Schultze v. Goodstein, 180 N. Y. 248, 251, 73 N. E. 21; Desmond-Dunne Co. v. Friedman-Doseher Co., 162 N. Y. 486, 490, 56 N. E. 995. For him there is no occasion to mitigate the rigor of implied conditions. The transgressor whose default is unintentional and trivial may hope for mercy if he will offer atonement for his wrong. Spence v. Ham, supra.

In the circumstances of this case, we think the measure of allowance is not the cost of replacement, which would be great, but the difference in value, which would be either nominal or nothing. Some of the exposed sections might perhaps have been replaced at moderate expense. The defendant did not limit his demand to them, but treated the plumbing as a unit to be corrected from cellar to roof. In point of fact, the plaintiff never reached the stage at which evidence of the extent of the allowance became necessary. The trial court had excluded evidence that the defect was unsubstantial, and in view of that ruling there was no occasion for the plaintiff to go farther with an offer of proof. We think, however, that the offer, if it had been made, would not of necessity have been defective because directed to difference in value. It is true that in most cases the cost of replacement is the measure. Spence v. Ham, supra. The owner is entitled to the money which will permit him to complete, unless the cost of completion is grossly and unfairly out of proportion to the good to be attained. When that is true, the measure is the difference in value. Specifications call, let us say, for a foundation built of granite quarried in Vermont. On the completion of the building, the owner learns that through the blunder of a subcontractor part of the foundation has been built of granite of the same quality quarried in New Hampshire. The measure of allowance is not the cost of reconstruction. "There may be omissions of that which could not afterwards be supplied exactly as called for by the contract without taking down the building to its foundations, and at the same time the omission may not affect the value of the building for use or otherwise, except so slightly as to be hardly appreciable." Handy v Bliss, 204 Mass. 513, 519, 90 N. E. 864, 134 Am. St. Rep. 673. Cf. Foeller v. Heintz, 137 Wis. 169, 178, 118 N. W. 543, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 321; Oberlies v. Bullinger, 132 N. Y. 598, 601, 30 N. E. 999; 2 Williston on Contracts, § 805, p. 1541. The rule that gives a remedy in cases of substantial performance with compensation for defects of trivial or inappreciable importance has been developed by the courts as an instrument of justice. The measure of the allowance must be shaped to the same end.

The order should be affirmed, and judgment absolute directed in favor of the plaintiff upon stipulation, with costs in all courts.⁴⁰

McLAUGHLIN, J.* I dissent. The plaintiff did not perform its contract. Its failure to do so was either intentional or due to gross neglect which, under the uncontradicted facts, amounted to the same thing, nor did it make any proof of the cost of compliance, where compliance was possible. * * *

* Parts of the dissenting opinion are omitted.

The question of substantial performance of a contract of the character of the one under consideration depends in no small degree upon the good faith of the contractor. If the plaintiff had intended to, and had, complied with the terms of the contract except as to minor omissions, due to inadvertence, then he might be allowed to recover the contract price, less the amount necessary to fully compensate the defendant for damages caused by such omissions. Woodward v. Fuller, 80 N. Y. 312; Nolan v. Whitney, 88 N. Y. 648. But that is not this case. It installed between 2,000 and 2,500 feet of pipe, of which only 1,000 feet at most complied with the contract. No explanation was given why pipe called for by the contract was not used, nor that any effort made to show what it would cost to remove the pipe of other manufacturers and install that of the Reading Manufacturing Company. The defendant had a right to contract for what he wanted. He had a right before making payment to get what the contract called for. It is no answer to this suggestion to say that the pipe put in was just as good as that made by the Reading Manufacturing Company, or that the difference in value between such pipe and the pipe made by the Reading Manufacturing Company would be either "nominal or nothing." Defendant contracted for pipe made by the Reading Manufacturing Company. What his reason was for requiring this kind of pipe is of no importance. He wanted that and was entitled to it. It may have been a mere whim on his part, but even so, he had a right to this kind of pipe, regardless of whether some other kind, according to the opinion of the contractor or experts, would have been "just as good, better, or done just as well." He agreed to pay only upon condition that the pipe installed were made by that company and he ought not to be compelled to pay unless the condition be performed. Schultze v. Goldstein, 180 N. Y. 248, 73 N. E. 21; Spence v. Ham, supra; Steel S. & E. C. Co. v. Stock, 225 N. Y. 173, 121 N. E. 786; Van Clief v. Van Vechten, 130 N. Y. 571, 29 N. E. 1017; Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145, 10 Am. Rep. 449; Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 173, and authorities cited on page 185, 72 Am. Dec. 442. The rule, therefore, of substantial performance, with damages for unsubstantial omissions, has no application. Crouch v. Gutman, 134 N. Y. 45, 31 N. E. 271, 30 Am. St. Rep. 608; Spence v. Ham, 163 N. Y. 220, 57 N. E. 412, 51 L. R. A. 238. * * *

I am of the opinion the trial court did not err in ruling on the admission of evidence or in directing a verdict for the defendant.

For the foregoing reasons I think the judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed and the judgment of the Trial Term affirmed.

THURNELL v. BALBIRNIE.

(Court of Exchequer, 1837. 2 Meeson & Welsby, 786.)

The first count of the declaration stated, that before and at the time of making the agreement and the promise and undertaking of the defendant thereafter mentioned, the defendant held, occupied, and enjoyed, at his request, certain rooms, apartments, and premises of the plaintiff, as tenant thereof to the plaintiff, the same then being part and parcel of a dwelling-house of the plaintiff, and in which there were certain goods and fixtures and chattels, to wit, etc., of the plaintiff, of great value, to wit, of, etc.; and thereupon heretofore, to wit, on December 26th, 1836, it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and the defendant in manner following; that is to say, the plaintiff then agreed to sell and deliver to the defendant, who then agreed to purchase and take of the plaintiff, the said goods, fixtures, and chattels, at a valuation to be made by certain persons, to wit, Mr. Newton and Mr. Matthews, or their umpire: and the plaintiff said, that the said Mr. Newton was appointed by and on behalf of the plaintiff, and the said Mr. Matthews by and on behalf of the defendant, to value as aforesaid. The declaration then averred mutual promises, and alleged that Newton, on behalf of the plaintiff, was ready and willing to value the said goods, etc., and at the request and by the authority of the plaintiff requested Matthews to value the same, whereof the defendant and Matthews had notice; but that the defendant and Matthews then and thence continually neglected and refused so to do: and the plaintiff further said, that he, the plaintiff, afterward, to wit, on February 2d, 1837, gave notice to the defendant that the plaintiff's said appraiser and valuer, the said Newton, was ready to meet the defendant's appraiser and valuer, the said Matthews, or any other person he might think proper to nominate for the purpose on the defendant's behalf, at any time within ten days from the said February 2d, which the defendant might fix, to value the said goods, etc., of which the defendant then had notice, but then and thence hitherto wholly neglected and refused to appoint any day for his appraiser, the said Matthews, to value, and wholly neglected and refused to nominate any other appraiser, and during all that time, has wholly refused and neglected to take any steps to value as aforesaid, or to cause or procure the same to be valued according to his said agreement and promise, and has during all the time aforesaid wholly refused to value the said goods, etc., or to let the same be valued, according to his said agreement and promise: And thereupon the said Mr. Newton, afterward, and after the lapse of a reasonable period of time, to wit, one month from the day and year last aforesaid, proceeded to value and did then value the said goods, etc., and the price thereof, upon such valuation, reasonably amounted to the sum of £500, whereof the defendant had notice, and was requested to pay the same to the plaintiff: and the plaintiff further says, that he had always from the time of making such valuation as aforesaid been ready and willing to sell and deliver to the defendant the said goods, etc., and to receive payment by him of the value thereof, whereof the defendant had always had notice; yet the defendant, not regarding, etc., did not nor would, although often requested, take the said goods, etc., so agreed by him to be taken as aforesaid, and pay the plaintiff the value thereof, but had hitherto wholly neglected and refused so to do, whereby, etc.

There were also counts for goods and fixtures bargained and sold, and on an account stated.

Special demurrer to the first count, assigning, among other causes, the following: that the count does not sufficiently allege a breach of the defendant's promise therein mentioned, for that it does not allege that the defendant hindered or prevented the said persons appointed and agreed on to make the said valuation, or either of them, from making such valuation. And also that it is alleged by way of breach that the defendant refused to take the goods, etc., agreed by him to be taken, and that he also refused to pay the plaintiff the value of the said goods, etc., and no agreement or promise is stated in the said count, to take the said goods, etc., at their value generally, or at the valuation made by the said Mr. Newton, but at the valuation only of the said Newton and Matthews, or their umpire. Joinder in demurrer.

LORD ABINGER, C. B. I am of opinion that this count is bad. The agreement stated is an agreement to purchase the goods on the valuation of Newton and Matthews. There is no distinct allegation that the defendant refused to permit Matthews to value on his part; but only an obscure statement that he refused to appoint any day for his valuing, or to take any steps to value or to cause and procure the goods to be valued according to his agreement, and that he has refused to value the goods, or to let them be valued, according to his agreement: all which comes after the allegation that Matthews had refused to value, there being no statement that he had changed his mind, and was ready and willing to do so, but that the defendant would not permit him. I am of opinion, therefore, that enough is not stated to render the defendant liable for the price of the goods.

ALDERSON, B. I should refer the words "or to let the same be valued," etc., to the defendant's letting the goods be valued by another appraiser instead of Matthews, according to the notice which the plaintiff says he gave him.⁵⁰

Leave to amend on payment of costs; otherwise judgment for the defendant.

⁵⁰ The case of a valuer, mutually selected, differs from the case of an architect selected by the owner for his protection against the builder sufficiently for it to be fair not to require the appointment of a new valuer unless, as suggested by Alderson, B., the construction of the contract calls for that. Accordingly the parties need not go ahead under the contract where the valuer dies,

LAMB v. LATHROP ET AL.

Demurrer. The plaintiff declared on a note made by the defendants, bearing date 8th March, 1831, whereby the defendants promised, one year after date, to pay to the plaintiff $50 in a horse, neat stock, or first rate pine lumber, to be delivered in Cortland village, at the market price, at the appraisal of two persons of the names of Bartlett and Rowley, with use; and alleged non-performance. The defendants pleaded, that when the note became due, to wit, on the 8th March, 1832, they tendered to the plaintiff the said sum of $50 and the interest thereof for one year, in a horse, appraised by Bartlett at $70, averring that Rowley was not on that day in the state, but was in the state of Pennsylvania, wholly beyond the reach, power and control of the defendants, so that they could not procure his attendance to unite with Bartlett in the appraisal of the horse, and concluding by alleging that the plaintiff refused to receive the horse so tendered by them; wherefore they prayed judgment, &c. This plea did not contain the averment of tout temps prist. The plaintiff replied, that after the tender of the horse, to wit, on the 10th day of March, &c., at, &c. he demanded the same horse of the defendants, which horse then was in their possession, and that the defendants refused to deliver the horse to him, unless he would pay to them $16.50, the difference between the appraised value of the horse and the sum of $50, with the interest thereof for one year; concluding with a verification and prayer of the judgment. To which replication the defendants demurred.

SAVAGE, C. J. The principal question arises upon the plea of the defendants, the validity of which is denied by the plaintiff, and the first ground urged on his part is, that it is not averred that the defendant is still ready to deliver the horse. It is contended, on the authority of Chipman's Essay on Contracts, p. 96, that such an averment is necessary; and that, in a case like this, the replication of a subsequent demand and refusal authorizes a recovery upon the original cause of action. The learned author of this essay argues that as there is at this day no case where property is lost to the creditor by a tender and refusal, it follows that every plea of tender must contain an averment that the property is still ready. It is true that property tendered is not lost to the creditor by his neglect or refusal to receive it; but it is also true that, in the case of a tender of specific articles, the courts in this or without the fault of either party refuses to act, and in so far as they have gone ahead, rescission and, where proper, quasi contract recovery may be allowed. See 2 Williston on Contracts § 801. For a case of hardship redressable today if a fair method of ascertaining the value of the property was contracted for, i. e., if there was no disguised wager, and if a quasi contract recovery could not be had, see Brogden v. Marriott, 2 Bing. N. C. 473 (1836). Compare Deyo v. Hammond, 102 Mich. 122 (1894), semble contra to Brogden v. Marriott.

state consider the contract to deliver or pay such articles discharged. The tender, properly made, is a satisfaction of the demand; the debt is paid, and the articles tendered become the property of the creditor, and afterwards are kept at his risk and expense. In the case of Slingerland v. Morse, 8 Johns. 478, the court say, "We consider it a complete bar to the suit upon the contract." In Shelden v. Skinner, 4 Wend. 528, 529, this subject was again considered by this court, and such a tender held analogous, as it was in the last case cited, to the French consignment, whereby the debtor is discharged. The creditor must resort to the specific articles, and to the person who tendered them as the bailee thereof. The relation of debtor and creditor no longer subsists between these parties, but that of trustee and cestui que trust, or bailor and bailee. See 2 Kent, Comm. 508, 509. If such be the law, the defendant in this case was not bound to aver that the horse was still ready; and the plea is not faulty for want of such averment.

The remaining objections to this plea are, that it is not averred that the appraisal was by the persons agreed upon, nor at the market price, nor that the tender was made in satisfaction of the debt. No authority is cited to show that it should be averred that the offer was made in satisfaction of the debt; the precedents are not so, nor do I see any necessity for such an averment. The plaintiff complains that the defendant did not pay him $50 and interest in a horse, according to his contract. The defendant says, that on the day, and at the place appointed, he tendered to him the said sum in a horse, according to his contract; that is enough. Nor can it be necessary, in such case, to aver that the appraisement was at the market price. The market price is the price of every article, unless some other is mentioned. The market price, I apprehend, was inserted as directory to the appraisers and the averment that the horse was appraised by the appraisers is sufficiently minute and certain; to appraise at any other price would be a violation of duty, even if the words market price were omitted. The presumption, in such cases is, that the persons designated have done their duty; not that they have violated it.

But the objection that there is no averment that the property in question was appraised by the persons agreed upon is not so easily obviated. The defendants, by their contract, agreed to pay $50 and interest for one year, in a horse, at the appraisal of Bartlett and Rowley. They aver that they tendered the horse at the appraisal of Bartlett; that is not a compliance with the contract; the appraisement by two persons is a condition precedent to the tender; the plaintiff has not agreed to accept a horse at the appraisement of Bartlett alone, nor of Bartlett and any other except Rowley. It is not sufficient that the act done may be equivalent. The plaintiff relied upon the judgment of those particular persons; the defendants undertook to procure it: if they failed, they must pay the money. There is a debt due the plaintiff; he agrees to receive a horse, provided it is appraised by Bartlett and Rowley. The defendants agree to pay the money, if they do not deliver a horse at the appraisal of Bartlett and Rowley. This is the legal effect of the contract. It is manifest that the defendants have not procured the appraisal of the two persons named; and as they have not performed the condition upon which they were to be excused from the payment of the money, it follows that the money must be paid. It is not for the defendants to say that they can make a new agreement for the plaintiff; nor can the court do it. The plaintiff has substantially said, I will not agree to take a horse at all, unless at the appraisal of these two men. I will not take the appraisal of one of them, but of both. The defendants entered voluntarily into the agreement, and they must perform it. This case appears to me to be analogous to the cases upon fire policies, where, if the certificate of certain persons is required, no other can be substituted. 6 Term. R. 719; 1 H. Bl. 254; 2 H. Bl. 574. This view of the subject is sufficient to authorize a judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

It is not improper to remark, that the plea is defective in another particular, though the point is made here as an objection to the replication. The horse, it seems, was appraised at $70, and the defendant claims the payment of the difference in money, before he is liable to deliver the horse. Under what agreement of the plaintiff do the defendants set up this claim? The plaintiff hath said that he will receive a horse worth $53, on certain conditions; but it does not follow that he is to receive a horse of a greater value, and pay the difference. He has entered into no such agreement. The defendants must tender the horse according to agreement; if he is of greater value, they must either tender him at the amount to be paid, or keep him, and pay the money.

The plea is bad, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, with leave to defendants to amend, on payment of costs.

CHISM v. SCHIPPER.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1888. 51 N. J. Law, 1, 16 Atl. 316, 2 L. R. A. 544, 14 Am. St. Rep. 668.)

On demurrer to declaration. The declaration was founded on a building contract, under seal, whereby it was alleged the plaintiff agreed to "erect and finish" a certain dwelling-house "agreeably to the drawings and specifications by Oscar S. T., architect, within the time aforesaid, in a good, workmanlike, and substantial manner, to the satisfaction and under the direction of said architect, to be testified by a writing or certificate, under the hand of said architect;" that the plaintiff was to furnish all materials, &c., and that for his work and materials he was to be paid the sum of $6,050; that if the defendant requested alterations, additions, or omissions, which, at a reasonable valuation, were to be deducted from or added to the contract price; that the defendant did request certain alterations (which were specified), which were made, to the value of $600; that it was further provided that in case of a dispute arising as to the true construction or meaning of the drawings or specifications, the said architect was "to decide the same, and whose decision should be final and conclusive." Full performance on the part of the plaintiff is alleged.

The breach is that the said architect "wilfully and fraudulently decides that the aforesaid alterations, deviations, and additions are within the true construction of said drawings and specifications referred to in the said contract, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to be paid the fair and reasonable value thereof, and wilfully and fraudulently withholds from the plaintiff, and refuses to sign the certificate, required by said contract, for the fifth and last payment called for thereby; which fraudulent and wilful decision of the architect, and fraudulent and wilful withholding of the said certificate have been brought to the knowledge of the said defendant by the said plaintiff; but the said defendant, though often," etc., "hath not paid the said sum of $600," &c.

This count was demurred to, and the issue thus raised was certified for the opinion of the Supreme Court.

BEASLEY, C. J.† A comprehension of the facts stated in the summary of the declaration prefixed to this opinion will make it manifest that the question to be decided is, Can the defendant cheat the plaintiff by due course of law?

The case, in brief, is this: The plaintiff has done work for the defendant to the value of $600, which work was additional to that specified in the written contract; the money was payable on the certificate of the architect, whose decision was to be final; such architect fraudulently decided that the work in question was not additional, but was embraced in the contract, and the defendant, being notified of the facts, refused to pay the demand. As the demurrer confesses the truth of this statement, it will be observed that the defendant stands now before the court saying: I admit that this money is due for additional work; I admit that the architect fraudulently certifies to the contrary; and I claim that, by a correct application of legal principles, I have the right to take advantage of this fraud, and to appropriate to myself the moneys that are its fruits. The inquiry is, Does the law, in reality, justify this immoral attitude?

It should be premised to the inquiry, that if this action will not lie, neither will any action against the defendant, founded on the facts stated, either at law or in equity. As such a result would be one much to be deprecated, and would stand as a blot on the jurisprudence of the state, it would seem that the most cogent reasons should be forthcoming to afford a satisfactory answer to the interrogatory: Why should a man be permitted to take advantage of the fraud of another? The only known reply is, that the plaintiff has covenanted to that effect; that he has agreed that the action of the architect, whether honest or dishonest, shall be conclusive.

It is proper to say, in limine, that it is not by any means deemed certain that this contract, if to be read in the sense just specified, is sustainable in law. It is assumed that a man cannot contract that he himself may commit a fraud; for example: this defendant could not have agreed that this money should not be payable except on his own written certificate, and that he might fraudulently withhold such certificate. If such a stipulation would, as it is thought, be expurged from the instrument on grounds of public policy, how can the party legally stipulate that another may commit this same crime for him? The capacity of parties to a contract to provide that one or the other, as the case turns out, may be cheated, does not appear to be a faculty requisite in the transaction of any legitimate business; while, at the same time, its existence is palpably offensive to good morals, and, consequently, may well be said to be adverse to the public welfare. The consequence is that it is, in my opinion, doubtful whether such an agreement can be legally made; but it is not deemed necessary to pursue the inquiry, inasmuch as, by proper rules of construction, applied to the facts set forth in this record, the proper conclusion is, that the contract existing between these parties does not contain this stipulation, so highly questionable.

The inquiry is: What did these parties mean? Did they intend, or by reason of the language employed must it be concluded de jure, that they intended, to be bound by the award of the architect, even though such award was the creature of fraud?

The clause thus referred to is in the common form, that has long been in frequent use; and yet, it may be safely said, that it is most improbable that it would have been adopted in a single instance if it had expressed in plain terms the meaning that it is now contended lies latent in its expressions. It is hard to believe that any self-respecting man would put his name to an agreement that a third party might do in his favor a fraudulent act. Nor does it seem probable that to the ordinary mind any suggestion of so extraordinary a purpose would be made by the generality of the expressions of this clause of the contract under criticism. And this last is an important consideration, for it is truly remarked by Gibson, C. J., in Schuykill Nav. Co. v. Moore, 2 Whart. 477, 491, that in the interpretation of contracts "the best construction is that which is made by viewing the subject of the contract, as the mass of mankind would view it, for it may be safely assumed that such was the aspect in which the parties themselves viewed it." Tested by this standard, it would seem to be certain that the construction of this term of the contract insisted on by the defence in this case cannot prevail.

But the adverse argument is, that the agreement of the parties is to be ascertained from the plain language used by them, and such agreement is to be enforced, no matter what the intention may have been.

This is the general rule, beyond a doubt, but such required literalism is not to be pushed to the preposterous length of requiring, that by its operation the general intention of the parties, as evidenced by their contract itself, shall be frustrated or perverted, either in whole or in part. The terms employed are servants and not masters of a perspicuous intent; they are to be interpreted so as to subserve and not to subvert such intent. As an illustration: it plainly appears on the face of this instrument that it was the evident and sole purpose of the provision in question to provide for the fair and definite decision of certain matters; and it is now said that by force of the terms used, the decider is empowered to cheat either party at will; and yet it is obvious that the existence of such a power in the agent has no tendency to effectuate the object in view, but so far as it can operate, it is destructive of it. The stipulation giving the quality of finality to the action of their agent, is part of a contrivance of these parties to enforce fair dealing between them in certain particulars; there seems to be no reason why they should impart to such a contrivance a fraudulent potency. It was quite reasonable for these parties to say to their agent, decide honestly between us, and your decision shall be final; but it was utterly unreasonable for them to agree to abide by such award if it were fraudulent. For my own part, I do not believe that in the history of the human race, the transaction has occurred in which a man has consciously agreed that another should be clothed with the power to cheat him, and that the decision of the frauder should be conclusive on the subject.⁵¹ And in the present instance such a stipulation can be con-

⁵¹ Yet in Tullis v. Jacson, [1892] 3 Chancery, 441, that was what occurred. And Chitty, J., said of the clause so agreeing as to the fraud of the architect: "It is said that the clause is void as being against public policy, because in substance it is an agreement on the part of the plaintiffs and defendants through the committee not to set up fraud, and the argument proceeds in this way. 'The court will not listen to any such stipulation to be found in any contract however solemn.' To some portion of this argument I accede. If a contract was obtained by fraud, and in the contract itself there was the term inserted that neither party should impeach the contract on the ground of fraud, it may well be that such a term would not stand, and the reason is obvious, that the court would set aside that contract, because it was obtained by fraud, and setting aside the contract, it would set aside the stipulation. That is a case I put by way of illustration, of fraud between the parties to the contract in its inception. It may well be also, that if there was some stipulation where some subsequent things had to be done which went to fraud on the part of either of the contracting parties, such a clause as that would not hold. But the case I have to deal with appears to me to be an entirely different one. Those who frame clauses in building contracts, which some years ago were stringent, structed only by an abstract interpretation of the conventional terms; for, if such language be construed as a part of an integer, and in the view of purpose in hand, it can be made to produce no such result. There is no more important rule of construction than that which requires that words shall be interpreted in the reflected light of the context in which they are found. And applying this rule to the case in hand it is not perceived how it can be reasonably said that these parties have have by degrees kept on making them more and more stringent by reason of the consequences that follow from opening a certificate, and the enormous cost and litigation that arises where the work is a large work like a railway or a large public building from any court of justice endeavoring to take the account, an account of thousands and thousands of items on every one of which skilful advisers may raise some issue, whether the amount should stand for the sum charged, or for some less sum, or for some greater sum. A litigation of that kind it is almost impossible to bring to a conclusion in a court of justice where the parties are entitled to be heard, and to insist on every possible objection. It does appear to me that those who deal in matters of this kind are wise in making the clauses more and more stringent. It is of course for the contractor when he enters into a contract of this kind to consider whether he will accept it or not. I have no doubt contractors do accept clauses which to the lawyer look terrific; but they do it as business men, they do it for better or worse, and they think on the whole it is very unlikely that any architect selected would act unjustly towards them, and they are content to take him as the person whose award is to be final on the subject. Then it appears to me that the policy of the law does not require that I should hold, in the case I am now dealing with, a clause like the present to be void. To put an illustration, suppose a gentleman who is going to have a house built for him enters into a complex agreement with the contractor, in the performance of which innumerable questions may arise, says, 'Will you agree with me (for if you will, I will agree with you) that nothing on earth shall upset the certificate that is given?' Why is that unfair or against public policy? The late Master of the Rolls (Sir G. Jessel), in the case of the Printing and Numerical Registering Co. v. Sampson, Law Rep. 19 Eq. 462, 465, says this: 'If there is one thing which more than another public policy requires it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts when entered into freely and voluntarily shall be held sacred and shall be enforced by courts of justice. Therefore, you have this paramount public policy to consider—that you are not lightly to interfere with this freedom of contract.' Entirely agreeing as I do with these remarks, I myself can see no reason why grown-up men should not be allowed to contract in these terms. 'Neither of us,' each says to the other, and each agrees with the other, 'will ever raise the charge of fraud.' Persons will shrink very often from charges of this kind, and those who are persistent, will, by making charges, induce persons to come to terms of compromise. It seems to me that this clause is addressed to get out of what the parties may consider evil, and which I have endeavored to describe. The clause therefore stands thus: 'both of us agree,' to our advantage or disadvantage as it may turn out, 'that every certificate given by the gentleman named shall stand firm and good and shall not be questioned even for fraud.' That that is the meaning of the clause I have no doubt. * * * I need hardly say that if the case had been that the trustees themselves [the defendants] had been party in any way to the fraud it would have been very different."

given to the provision in question that noxious efficacy that is sought to be imparted to it.

That the clause under discussion cannot be, out and out, construed literally, appears to be undeniable. This and similar engagements are never so read. Undoubtedly, if we construe these terms with entire literalness, the builder is required to produce, before he can claim the money due him, the certificate of the architect. There are no exceptions provided for nor indicated, if the language is thus alone regarded. But suppose the money be earned, and the architect die before the signing of the certificate, is the claim lost or forfeited? Such a result, it is presumed, would not be claimed; and yet it is avoidable only in one way, and that is, to construe the terms of the contract reasonably as applied to their subject, and not literally. The exception can stand on no other ground than this, for the maxim, "actus dei nemini facit injuriam," is never applied in violation of a contract. Looking to the letter alone, these parties have said that under all possible circumstances the certificate shall be a condition precedent to the right to payment. Admitting this as the true construction, the impossibility of the performance of such condition would not avoid it; and that such an effect has never been judicially given to such provisions, shows conclusively that they have been interpreted according to their spirit and not in subservience to their very letter.

And, indeed, in my view, the entire legal course that has been pursued in the construction of submissions to arbitration, in the common-law form, can be explained only on the ground that they have been construed liberally and not with literal narrowness. In all these submissions the stipulation is in the most unqualified form, that the award shall be final and conclusive; but if such award be tainted with fraud, it is set aside on the application of the party. And yet, it is plain that such party could not be permitted to make such application if his submission is to be read by its letter, and thus made to mean an engagement on his part to abide by the award, whether honest or dishonest. In such cases it has never been pretended that the parties by the terms of their submission, reasonably understood, meant anything of the kind. The grounds of decision in that entire class of cases would seem to be precisely applicable to the present case.

As another illustration of the principle that a literal interpretation is out of place when its adoption will run counter to the expressed general object of the contract, reference may be made to the familiar case of clauses so frequent in leases, that if the rent is in arrear for a certain time the instrument shall become void. In all these instances the courts have declared, notwithstanding the literal meaning of the terms, that the lease, on the happening of the event, is not absolutely vacated, but only becomes voidable at the option of the lessor. * * *

In Batchelor v. Kirkbride, 27 Fed. Rep. 899, the question present in this case was put directly in question, and was pointedly decided; for the inquiry was whether the plaintiff was dispensed from producing a certificate if it had been refused by the fraud of the arbiter without collusion with the defendant. The jury was instructed at the trial, by Mr. Justice Bradley, that if such fraud was shown, the plaintiff was entitled to recover; and that ruling was upon recommendation declared to be right both by the distinguished judge before whom the case had been tried and by his associate, Mr. Judge Nixon. The case in itself is of great weight and appears to be supported by the general current of American authority. * * *

I think on this issue the plaintiff should have judgment.⁵²

HAMILTON v. LIVERPOOL & LONDON & GLOBE INS. CO.

This was an action upon a policy of insurance numbered 2,907,224, against fire, for a year from September 5, 1885, upon a stock of tobacco in the plaintiff's warehouse at 413 and 415 Madison street, in Covington, in the state of Kentucky. Among the printed "conditions relating to the methods of adjustment of loss, and the payment thereof," was one as to arbitration. The defendant requested plaintiff to arbitrate and he refused. Verdict and judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

GRAY, J.⁵³ The conditions of the policy in suit clearly and unequivocally manifest the intention and agreement of the parties to the contract of insurance that any difference arising between them as to the amount of loss or damage of the property insured shall be submitted, at the request in writing of either party, to the appraisal of competent and impartial persons, to be chosen as therein provided, whose award shall be conclusive as to the amount of such loss or damage only, and shall not determine the question of the liability of the company; that the company shall have the right to take the whole or any part of the property at its appraised value so ascertained; and that until such an appraisal shall have been permitted, and such an award obtained, the loss shall not be payable, and no action shall lie against the company. The appraisal, when requested in writing by either party, is distinctly made a condition precedent to the payment of any loss, and to the maintenance of any action. Such a stipulation, not ousting the jurisdiction of the courts, but leaving the general question of liability to be judicially determined, and simply providing a reasonable method of estimating and ascertaining the amount of the loss, is unquestionably valid, according to the uniform current of authority in England and in this country. Scott v. Avery, 5 H. L. Cas. 811; Viney v. Bignold, 20 Q. B. Div. 172;⁵⁴ Delaware & Hudson Canal Co. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co., 50 N. Y. 250; Reed v. Insurance Co., 138 Mass. 572, 576; Wolff v. Insurance Co. 50 N. J. Law, 453, 14 Atl. Rep. 561; Hall v. Insurance Co., 57 Conn. 105, 114, 17 Atl. Rep. 356. The case comes within the general rule long ago laid down by this court: "Where the parties, in their contract, fix on a certain mode by which the amount to be paid shall be ascertained, as in the present case, the party that seeks an enforcement of the agreement must show that he has done everything on his part which could be done to carry it into effect. He cannot compel the payment of the amount claimed unless he shall procure the kind of evidence required by the contract, or show that by time or accident he is unable to do so." U. S. v. Robeson, 9 Pet. 319, 327. See, also, Railroad Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1035. * * * The court therefore rightly instructed the jury that the defendant had requested in writing, and the plaintiff had declined, the appraisal provided for in the policy, and that the plaintiff, therefore, could not maintain this action. If the plaintiff had joined in the appointment of appraisers, and they had acted unlawfully, or had not acted at all, a different question would have been presented.

⁵⁴In Viney v. Bignold, Wills, J., said: "The principle on which cases such as the present ought to be decided is very clear, and it is this. The court must look and see what the covenant is. If there is a covenant to pay the amount of the loss, accompanied by a collateral provision that the amount shall be ascertained by arbitration, such arbitration is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action on the covenant; but if the parties have covenanted that the liability is only to arise after the amount has been adjusted by arbitration, then such adjustment is a condition precedent to the right to recover."

See 8 Ann. Cas. 171, note; Ann. Cas. 1915 D, 327, note.

STEWART v. NEWBURY.

2 A. L. R. 519.)

Action on a contract for plaintiff to do the concrete work on the defendant's foundry building. Plaintiff without completing the work sued for work done to date of discontinuing work. A verdict for the plaintiff resulted and the judgment in his favor thereon was affirmed by the Appellate Division. Defendant appealed.

CRANE, J.⁵⁶ * * * The appeal to us is upon exceptions to the judge's charge. The court charged the jury as follows:

"Plaintiff says that he was excused from completely performing the contract by the defendants' unreasonable failure to pay him for the work he had done during the months of August and September. * * * Was it understood that the payments were to be made monthly? If it was not so understood, the defendants' only obligation was to make payments at reasonable periods, in view of the character of the work, the amount of work being done, and the value of it. In other words, if there was no agreement between the parties respecting the payments, the defendants' obligation was to make payments at reasonable times. * * * But whether there was such an agreement or not, you may consider whether it was reasonable or unreasonable for him to exact a payment at that time and in that amount."

The court further said, in reply to a request to charge:

"I will say in that connection, if there was no agreement respecting the time of payment, and if there was no custom that was understood by both parties, and with respect to which they made the contract, then the plaintiff was entitled to payments at reasonable times."

The defendants' counsel thereupon made the following request, which was refused:

"I ask your honor to instruct the jury that, if the circumstances existed as your honor stated in your last instruction, then the plaintiff was not entitled to any payment until the contract was completed."

The jury was plainly told that if there were no agreement as to payments, yet the plaintiff would be entitled to part payment at reasonable times as the work progressed, and if such payments were refused he could abandon the work and recover the amount due for the work performed.

This is not the law. Counsel for the plaintiff omits to call our attention to v. Middlesex Co., 209 Mass. 474, 95 N. E. 897." Cornish, C. J., in Jacques v. Otto Nelson Co. (Me.), 111 Atl. 515, 516 (1920).

PIKE v. THOMAS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1817. 4 Bibb 486, 7 Am. Dec. 741.)

COYLE, C. J.⁸⁸ This was an action of covenant upon articles of agreement between the plaintiff and defendant, the object of which was to erect and carry on a wool-carding machine in partnership. Various mutual covenants are made by the parties. Among those on the part of the defendant, is a covenant not to erect or have any hand in erecting a wool-carding machine within twenty miles of the plaintiff's machines then in operation, without paying to the plaintiff $200 a year during the operation of such machine.

The action was brought for a breach of this covenant only. The defendant pleaded:

⁸⁷ "The defendant agrees to work two years from the date of the agreement for the plaintiffs, and they agree to pay him $100. When was the agreement to be performed? The defendant was to occupy two years in performing his part of the agreement; of course he could not perform within one year. When were the plaintiffs to pay the $100? On this point the contract is silent in terms, but as the payment is to be made in consideration of the services, those services are a condition precedent to the payment, and must be performed in full, before payment can be enforced. The money then was to be paid at the end of two years, and of course not within one year. The contract then, by its terms, was not to be performed within one year." Savage, C. J., in Drummond v. Burrell, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 307, 308-309 (1835).

On contracts to render service silent as to time of payment, see 2 A. L. R. 522, note.

1st. That the plaintiff had not kept and performed the covenants on his part. * * *

3d. That the erection of the wool-carding machine, and the covenants on the part of the plaintiff in relation thereto, were the only consideration of the covenant on the part of the defendant, for the breach of which the action is brought, and that the said machine was never erected, nor did the plaintiff perform the covenants to be performed on his part in relation thereto; and so the consideration of said covenant has failed and the covenant [is] against law and void.

4th. The fourth plea is in substance the same as the third. * * *

The court below gave judgment for the defendant and the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

We have not thought it necessary to recite the substance of the replications, because we are not of opinion that either of the pleas is sufficient to preclude the plaintiff from a recovery; and as the demurrers to the replications brought the whole pleadings before the court, the judgment should have been given for the plaintiff, on the ground of the insufficiency of the pleas, without regard to the matter of the replications.

As to the first plea, it is sufficient to remark, that it could only have been sustained on the ground that the covenants on the part of the plaintiff were precedent to those on the part of the defendant, and the performance of the latter made to depend upon the performance of the former. But this is plainly not the case; for according to the terms of the covenant they are clearly independent, for a breach of which on either side, the other party may have his action; but a failure of performance on the one side is no bar to an action for a non-performance on the other. * * *

The third and fourth pleas turn essentially upon the same principles as the first, plainly presupposing that the performance of the covenants on the part of the plaintiff was the consideration of the covenants on the part of the defendant; whereas it is the covenants themselves, and not their performance, which is on each side the consideration of those on the other; and consequently there can be no failure of consideration unless there was a failure or destruction of the covenants themselves. * * *

The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for new proceedings to be had not inconsistent with the foregoing opinion.

FRANCIS JONES v. LATHROP MARSH.

Assumpsit on a written contract in these words: "Received, Franklin, September 31st, 1847, of Francis Jones, fifty dollars, in part pay for my dairy of cheese. I am to deliver all the new milk cheese I have now on hand, and all I make up to the first of October next, well boxed, on the wharf at St. Albans, by the fifteenth of October next, for which I am to have seven cents per pound on delivery. (Signed) Lathrop Marsh." Plea, the general issue, with notice, that the defendant would prove, that he had ready for delivery at the place agreed upon, on the fifteenth day of October, 1847, and for several days thereafter, all the cheese which he contracted to deliver, but that the plaintiff neglected to appear to receive the cheese, or to pay for the same, and that thereupon the defendant sold the cheese at a price less than seven cents per pound, and thereby incurred a loss of a large sum, to wit, seventy dollars. And it was conceded by the plaintiff, that the facts stated in the defendant's notice under the general issue were to be considered by the court as true. The court rendered judgment for the defendant. Exceptions by plaintiff.

KELLOGG, J.⁵⁰ * * * The question presented for consideration is, are the facts reported sufficient to sustain the judgment of the court below?

The contract, upon which the plaintiff seeks to recover, is entire and indivisible, and the delivery of the cheese by the defendant and the payment of the purchase money by the plaintiff are concurrent acts, to be performed at the same time. The contract remains unrescinded and upon such a contract it is well settled by the authorities, that neither party can maintain an action, without averring performance, or an offer to perform, his own part of the contract.

That the promises and undertakings of the parties are dependent would seem, by the language of the contract, to be placed beyond all doubt. But even if it were doubtful, whether the promises are dependent, or independent, it is said, that courts have uniformly favored the former construction,—that of dependent promises,—as being obviously the most just. The vendor ought not to be compelled to part with his property, without receiving the consideration; nor the vendee to part with his money, without receiving an equivalent return. But it is said, that although the promises of the parties are mutual and dependent, yet, inasmuch as part of the consideration has been accepted and enjoyed by the defendant, and the plaintiff has no other remedy than upon the agreement, and inasmuch as the plaintiff's failure to perform his part of the contract can be compensated in damages, the plaintiff should be allowed to recover, without alleging performance of the remainder. And some few authorities are cited by the plaintiff as sustaining this doctrine. These cases, however, proceed upon the ground, that the principal part of the consideration has been received and enjoyed. For it is admitted, that where there has not been such acceptance of part, as makes it fraudulent to set up this defense, the action will not be sustained, though the plaintiff's undertaking be divisible. And in this case it can hardly be said to be fraudulent in the defendant to set up this defence, inasmuch as the amount advanced by the plaintiff upon the making of the contract is less than the loss sustained by the defendant upon a re-sale of the property. * * *

Upon the facts found in this case we are unable to discover any ground, upon which the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The judgment of the county court is therefore affirmed.

DUNHAM & DIMON v. PETTEE & MANN.

Action brought upon a contract made between the plaintiffs and the defendants in the following form:

"Sold to Messrs. Pettee & Mann, for account of Messrs. Dunham & Dimon, 155 tons (or thereabouts) of English bar iron, as per specification of the same, now in public store in this city, at $50 per ton, as per custom-house weigher's return, equal to six months' credit; but payment for said iron is to be made as follows, to wit: $750 to be paid now, and the balance is to be paid within sixty days from this date, and discount is to be made on the bill at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, reckoning the time from the date of the average payment of the bill until the end of the six months above named. The sellers are to hold a policy of insurance on the iron until the whole amount is paid; and the buyers are to pay the insurance and all storage expenses from and after this date. It is understood that the iron is to be paid for on delivery (within the sixty days aforesaid), and should the full amount not be paid within the sixty days aforesaid, Messrs. Dunham & Dimon will be at liberty to sell the iron to other parties, for account of Messrs. Pettee & Mann.

"New York, March 12th, 1849.

"NATHAN CASWELL, Broker."

Verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs. Defendants appealed.

RUGGLES, C. J.⁶⁰ Under the contract of sale, the delivery of the iron and the payment of the money were things to be done at one and the same time. The plaintiffs were not bound to deliver the iron unless the defendants at the same time paid the money; and the defendants were not bound to pay the price unless the plaintiffs at the same time delivered the thing sold, or was ready to deliver it. The obligations to deliver on the one part and to pay on the other, were mutual and dependent. If the buyer in a case of this sort fails to pay or offer to pay within the time specified for mutual performance, the seller is discharged from liability to answer in damages for not delivering the thing sold. But it does not follow that the seller, in such case, is entitled from the mere default of the buyer to recover the purchase-money. To entitle the seller to recover the price, he must show not only that the purchaser failed to pay, but that he himself was ready and offered to deliver the goods. (12 Johns. 209, Porter v. Rose, 20 id. 130.)

The issue between the parties was framed upon a correct view of the legal question between them. The plaintiffs averred that they were ready and willing, and offered to deliver the iron within the time specified in the contract, and this averment was denied by the defendants in their answer; and this was the question which ought to have been put to the jury. Instead of that the judge charged the jury that the principal question for them to decide was, "Have the defendants on their part during the sixty days demanded the iron, and in readiness to pay on their part offered to pay the money on delivery?" If this had been an action by the purchaser against the seller, for the non-delivery of the goods, the charge would have been right, because the purchaser is bound, on a contract of this kind, to show a readiness and an offer to perform before he can require the seller to deliver. Which-ever party seeks to enforce the contract against the other must show performance or tender of performance. Until that be shown he is himself in default. The plaintiffs in this case are seeking to enforce the contract, and the judge should have told the jury that to entitle them to recover they were bound to show an offer of performance, whether the defendants were ready or not. But the case was put to the jury on the question whether the defendants had offered to pay; and if they had not, the jury were instructed in effect to find for the plaintiff, whether he had offered to deliver or not, thus making the payment by the defendant a duty precedent to the delivery when in truth it was concurrent merely; and allowing the plaintiff to recover in a case in which neither party had shown a readiness and offer of performance. In this the judge charged erroneously, and on this ground the judgment below must be reversed and a new trial ordered.

⁶¹ "This being a contract in which no time for delivery was fixed by the terms of the instrument itself, it is conceded by the briefs of both the appellant and the respondent that there could be no default which either the buyer or the seller could take advantage of until one party or the other had made a demand for delivery or acceptance. And this is unquestionably the law. * * *

"And we think it equally clear that, if either party lets a reasonable time expire, without a demand, then the contract lapses, and neither party can enforce a performance. Hume v. Mullins (Ky.) 35 S. W. 551." Bennett, J., in Hurst v. Hill, 96 Ore. 311, 321 (1920).

MORTON v. LAMB.

(Court of King's Bench, 1797. 7 Term Reports, 125.)

In an action on the case the plaintiff declared against the defendant for that whereas on the 10th Feb. 1796, at Manchester in the county of Lancaster, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the defendant had then and there bought of the defendant 200 quarters of wheat at £5 Os. 6d. per quarter, such price to be therefor paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, he the defendant undertook and then and there promised the plaintiff to deliver the said corn to him (the plaintiff) at Shardlow in the county of Derby in one month from that time, viz. of the sale; and then he alleged that although he (the plaintiff) always from the time of making such sale for the space of one month then next following and afterwards was ready and willing to receive the said corn at Shardlow, yet the defendant not regarding his said promise &c. did not in one month from the time of the making of such sale as aforesaid or at any other time deliver the said corn to the plaintiff at Shardlow or elsewhere, although he (the defendant) was often requested so to do, &c. The defendant pleaded the general issue: and at the trial the plaintiff recovered a verdict. Rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the judgment should not be arrested, because it was not averred that the plaintiff had tendered to the defendant the price of the corn, or was ready to have paid for it on delivery.

LORD KENYON, C. J.⁶² If this question depended on the technical niceties of pleading, I should not feel so much confidence as I do: but it depends altogether on the true construction of this agreement. The defendant agreed with the plaintiff for a certain quantity of corn, to be delivered at Shardlow within a certain time; and there can be no doubt but that the parties intended that the payment should be made at the time of the delivery. It is not imputed to the defendant that he did not carry the corn to Shardlow, but that he did not deliver it to the plaintiff: to this declaration the defendant objects, and says "I did not deliver the corn to you (the plaintiff), because you do not say that you were ready to pay for it; and if you were not ready, I am not bound to deliver the corn;" and the question is whether that should or should not have been alleged. The case [of Callonel v. Briggs] decided by Lord Holt, in Salk. 112, if indeed so plain a case wanted that authority to support it, shows that where two concurrent acts are to be done, the not request defendant to marry her. Clark v. Corey, 24 R. I. 137, 52 Atl. 811. and cases cited.

"Did the defendant tell the plaintiff that he did not intend to marry her? If he did not intend to marry her and he brought this fact to her knowledge no demand was necessary. Kelley v. Brennan, 18 R. I. 41, 25 Atl. 346." Per Curiam in Parkinson v. Murphy (R. I.) 107 Atl. 235, 237 (1919).

party who sues the other for non-performance must aver that he had performed or was ready to perform, his part of the contract. Then the plaintiff in this case cannot impute to the defendant the nondelivery of the corn, without alleging that he was ready to pay the price of it. A plaintiff, who comes into a court of justice, must show that he is in a condition to maintain his action. But it has been argued that the delivery of the corn was a condition precedent, and some cases have been cited to prove it: but they do not appear to me to be applicable. * * * In the case of Campbell v. Jones, [6 T. R. 570] I thought, and still continue of that opinion, that whether covenants be or be not independent of each other must depend on the good sense of the case, and on the order in which the several things are to be done: but here both things, the delivery of the corn by one, and the payment by the other, were to be done at the same time; and as the plaintiff has not averred that he was ready to pay for the corn, he cannot maintain this action against the defendant for not delivering it.⁶⁸

LAWRENCE, J. It has been argued, on behalf of the plaintiff, that this must be considered as a declaration on mutual promises, and that as this is a demand on the defendant on the ground of some mutual promise made by him, and which was the consideration of the plaintiff's promise, it was not necessary to aver performance on his part: but if so, the declaration is not adapted to the truth of the case, in not stating that the defendant's promise was in consideration of the plaintiff's. But on this declaration I can only consider it as an agreement by the defendant to deliver the corn at Shardlow on being paid for it. The payment of the money was to be an act concurrent with the delivery; and then the case is like that of Callonel v. Briggs, which was on an agreement to pay so much money six months after the bargain, the plaintiff transferring stock; and there Lord Holt said, "If either party would sue upon this agreement, the plaintiff for not paying, or the defendant for not transferring, the one must aver and prove a transfer or a tender," he did not say, that the not doing it should come from the defendant by way of excuse, but that the doing it must be alleged in the declaration; and that affords an answer to great part of the argument urged on behalf of the defendant in this case. The tendering of the money by the plaintiff makes part of the plaintiff's title to recover, and he must set out the whole of his title. * * * I am of opinion that the declaration cannot be supported and that the judgment must be arrested.

Rule absolute.

⁶⁸ "It is reported in the case of Morton v. Lamb, that I said that the plaintiff should have averred a performance or a readiness to perform his part of the contract; I do not doubt that I said so, and I still think it was rightly said." Lord Kenyon, C. J., in Rawson v. Johnson, 1 East 203, 208-209 (1801).

JACOB JOHNSON v. ABRAHAM REED AND ANOTHER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1812. 9 Mass. 78, 6 Am. Dec. 36.)

This was an action on the case, in which the plaintiff declared upon the following memorandum of an agreement between the parties, viz:

"Memorandum of an agreement made between Jacob Johnson on the one part, Abraham Reed and Daniel Cummings on the other, witnesseth that the said Reed and Cummings do engage to pay the said Johnson, on or before the first day of September next, all and full sums he, the said Johnson, shall recover of Thomas Millet; and the interest is to begin at this date. And the said Johnson engages to let them have all the advantage of the demands he is entitled to. September 13, 1808. Jacob Johnson, Abraham Reed, Daniel Cummings."

The action was tried upon the issue of non-assumpsit, before Thatcher, J., October term, 1810, and a verdict found for the defendants.

At the trial the plaintiff, to support the issue on his part, produced the memorandum declared on, and also the copy of a judgment recovered by him against Thomas Millet, at the Common Pleas for this county, held in November, 1808, for 45 dollars, 71 cents.

The defendants, to maintain the issue on their parts, proved that sufficient property of Millet was attached on the original writ in the suit, in which said judgment was rendered; that Johnson sued out execution thereon on the 5th of December, 1808., within thirty days from the rendition thereof, and kept the same in his hands, and endeavored to offset it against an execution which Millet held against him, until after the attachment was lost; and that, in January following, he offered the execution to the defendant Cummings, provided the defendants would give him a promisory note for the amount of the judgment and not otherwise; which the defendants refused to do.

The plaintiff then proved that, in the month of March ensuing, he tendered the execution to the defendants, without requiring a note as before; but they refused to accept it, as the attachment on the original writ was lost.

Verdict was found for defendants. Plaintiff excepted.

PARKER, J. Whether the verdict in this case is right, depends upon the construction of the writing upon which the action is brought; which, by the plaintiff, is considered to be evidence of mutual and independent promises, and, by the defendants, to contain evidence of a promise on their part, dependent only upon a due performance of the promise of the plaintiff to them.

The facts in evidence so clearly show a want of justice in the plaintiff's demand, that his counsel has been necessarily driven to some technical rules for the support of his action. Johnson refused to let the defendants have what they had promised to pay him for, and yet insists upon the price.

But it is contended,—and it is expected to support the action upon this ground,—that where there are two promises, one appearing to be in consideration of the other, each party may enforce his promise against the other, whether his own promise has been performed or not; and authorities have been cited in support of this position, which go far to maintain it. The position, as laid down in the authorities, occurs principally on questions relating to covenants; but doubtless the same principles will apply to the construction of promises. It is, that in covenants which are independent, either party may enforce his remedy for a breach, whether his own covenant is performed or not; but that, in covenants which are dependent an averment of performance on the part of the plaintiff is necessary in a declaration for a breach by his covenantor.

This principle is disputed nowhere; but, in the construction of covenants, there has been considerable difficulty, heretofore, in ascertaining whether they were dependent or independent.

In the case of Thorpe v. Thorpe, cited at the bar from Salkeld, it is declared by Lord Holt, that “where a certain day of payment is appointed, and is to happen subsequent to the performance of the thing to be done by the contract, performance is a condition precedent, and must be averred in an action for the money.” This doctrine is reasonable; for it seems to be unjust that a man, who has bargained for a thing, shall be obliged to pay for it, when he may never get the thing which he pays for. “Every man’s bargain,” says Lord Holt, “ought to be performed as he intended it. When he relies upon his remedy, it is but just he should be left to it according to his agreement; but, on the contrary, there is no reason a man should be forced to trust, where he never meant it; and therefore, if two men should agree, one that the other should have his horse, the other that he will pay ten pounds for him, no action lies for the money till the horse is delivered.”

Upon the principles of this case, there is no difficulty in deciding the nature of the promises now in question. The money stipulated by the defendants was to be paid on a day certain, and the thing to be done by the plaintiff was intended to have been done before that day arrived.

The substance and effect of the plaintiff’s engagement is, that he will assign over his demand, whether existing in action, judgment, or execution to the defendants. The action was pending at the time of the promise, and the judgment and execution were obtained several months before the day of payment stipulated by the defendants. Now, it could surely never have been contemplated by the parties to this contract, that, if it was in the power of the plaintiff to perform his promise before the day arrived for the payment of the sum, for which the promise was the consideration, he might neglect to do what he had engaged, and yet exact a performance of the other party; and this after a refusal of performance on his part, and after he had, by his own negligence, rendered himself unable, at any future time, to perform his promise.

There have been, however, many cases decided which establish very strict principles in the construction of covenants, and, perhaps, may be considered as applying to promises.

In one case, of modern date, it was decided that, if a man covenants to work upon a house, and the owner covenants to pay him by instalments, and that the last instalment shall be paid when the house is finished, the workman may recover the last instalment, whether the house shall be finished or not. Terry et al. v. Duntze, 2 H. Bl. 389. This seems to be turning a man's contract into something totally different from his words and intentions in the contract; and yet, in the same book, it is said that the intent of the parties is to govern in the construction of the covenants. The principal reason given for this decision is, that some of the instalments were to be paid before the house was finished. But, because a man had engaged to pay one certain sum of money before his house was finished, therefore he should be held to pay another sum, which he had not engaged to pay until his house should be finished, seems to be very questionable as a logical, whatever it may be as a legal conclusion.

The cases of Goodisson v. Nunn, 4 D. & E. 761, Campbell v. Jones, cited in the argument, Glazebrook v. Woodrow, 8 D. & E. 366, and Heard v. Wadham, 1 East Rep. 619, all show a disposition, on the part of the judges, to break through the bonds which some old cases had imposed upon them, and to adopt what Lord Kenyon, in one of the cases, calls the common sense doctrine,—that the true intent of the parties, as apparent in the instrument, should determine whether the covenants or promises are independent or conditional, instead of any technical rules, of which the parties were totally ignorant, and the application of which would, in most cases, utterly defeat their intention.

Now, in the case at bar, the defendants promise the plaintiff that they will pay the amount, which he shall recover of Millet, by a certain day, putting the day off so far as to leave no doubt that judgment would be previously recovered; and, in the same instrument, the plaintiff promises the defendants to let them have all the advantage of the demands that he is by law entitled to. What is meant by this, but that the defendants are to have an assignment of the judgment and execution, if necessary, as soon as obtained? Suppose the question had been put, at the time, by the defendants to the plaintiff: What if you, when you obtain your judgment, refuse to let us have the execution, until the benefit of the attachment shall be lost? Would not the plaintiff's answer have been: Why, then, you will not be obliged to pay the consideration? This contract, then, if it is construed according to the true intent and meaning of it, as entertained by the parties, must be considered as containing promises by both parties, dependent upon each other; and it would be idle to permit the plaintiff to recover in this action, when, at the time of the commencement of his suit, he had not only refused to perform his part of the engagement, but had disabled himself from performing it, by holding his execution against Millet until the attachment was lost, and so the judgment had probably become of no value.

This decision is not opposed to the most approved of the old cases, and is conformable to the more liberal doctrine, maintained of late, relative to the construction of contracts.

In the case of Thorpe v. Thorpe, 1 Salk. 171, it is stated that, "in executory contract, if the agreement be that one shall do an act, and for the doing thereof, the other shall pay, the doing of the act is a condition precedent to payment, and the party who is to pay shall not be compelled to part with his money until the thing be performed for which he is to pay."

It is true that, in the promise declared on in this case under consideration, a certain day is appointed for the payment; and that the thing to be done by the plaintiff might, by possibility, not have been in his power to perform before the day of payment; it might have happened that the plaintiff's judgment would not have been recovered until after the day of payment had arrived. But it did, in fact, take place before, and it was contemplated by the parties that it would, and that seemed the basis of the defendant's promise; and the plaintiff might, and ought to, have delivered the execution or tendered it without conditions, to entitle himself to this action.

There is a further ground, upon which we are clear that the plaintiff ought not to have a verdict, in the present action. All executory contracts may be rescinded by the parties to them, they continuing interested until the agreement to rescind be made. Now, this case shows acts and declarations by both parties, from which it was competent for the jury to decide that there was a mutual agreement to put an end to the contract; and those facts were submitted to the jury upon this very point.

The plaintiff, having obtained an execution against Millet, instead of passing it over to the defendants, in accordance with his agreement, kept it in his own hands, endeavoring to use it for his own purposes, by offsetting it against an execution which Millet had against him. In so doing, he had voluntarily broken his contract; and this being assented to by the defendants, in resisting the payment of the money, when it became due according to the terms of the contract, and on the very ground that the consideration had failed, it would be idle to suffer the plaintiff now to recover when the very recovery would give the defendants a right of action against the plaintiff for the same sum which should be recovered against them. In every view, therefore, we think the verdict right, and that a new trial ought not to be granted.

⁶⁴ "As has been stated, the verdict establishes the fact that at the time the defendant attempted to terminate the contract, and when it declared that it

(Supreme Court of New York, 1832. 9 Wend. 129, 24 Am. Dec. 137.)

Assumpsit. The plaintiff proved a contract signed by the defendants in these words: "We have this day bought of David Dey 1280 bushels of first quality merchantable wheat, to be delivered on board of boats, at or near the store house of David Brooks, at any time we may require the delivery of the same after the first day of April next, and are to pay seventy-five cents per bushel, payable the first of September next, and have paid him one dollar on account of the same; Geneva, 26th March, 1828;" and claimed to recover the price stipulated in the contract. The defendants insisted that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, unless he proved a delivery of the wheat, or an offer or readiness to do so. The judge ruled that the promises of the parties were independent, and refused to nonsuit the plaintiff. The defendants then proved a tender of the price and a demand of the wheat, made about the middle of September, 1828, and the refusal of the plaintiff to accept the money and to deliver the wheat—this evidence was objected to by the plaintiff. The plaintiff then introduced the record of the judgment in favor of the defendants against the plaintiff, docketed the 15th January, 1830, as of January term, 1830, by which it appeared that the defendants had sued the plaintiff for the non-delivery of the wheat, and obtained a verdict against him for $1,670.92, being the full value of the wheat on the day it was demanded. In the record, however, there was a remittitur of $1,005.25, stated to be the value of the wheat at 65-100 per bushel, with the interest thereof, and judgment was taken for only $771.61, the balance of the verdict and the costs of increase. The plaintiff also proved the issuing of an execution on such judgment, which was delivered to the sheriff on the 16th January, 1830, directing the levy of $771.61, and that the same was returned satisfied; all of which evidence in relation to the judgment and execution was objected to by the defendants. The suit in this case was commenced on the 11th Janu-would proceed no further thereunder, it was itself in default of performance of an essential covenant of the contract, because it had failed to deliver the agreed amount of coal the plaintiff was to receive in August, September, and October. The right to repudiate a contract for the default of the other party thereto cannot be exercised by a party who is himself in unexcused default of performance of an essential covenant thereof. Chitty on Contracts (15th Ed.) 722; Walds Pollock on Contracts (3d Ed.) 345; *Norwood Paper Co. v. ary, 1830, previous to which time the plaintiff demanded of the defendants the price of the wheat, as stipulated in the contract; the defendants told him they would remit such price from their verdict, which the plaintiff said he would not accept, and that if they entered such remittitur, they would do so against his wishes and consent. The contract price of the wheat, with the interest thereof, was shown to be $992.16, for which sum the jury found a verdict, notwithstanding the presiding judge in his charge to the jury expressed his opinion, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The defendants now moved to set aside the verdict.

NELSON, J. The plaintiff must fail upon principles too well settled to require examination, and the omission to avail himself of those principles, when prosecuted by the present defendants on the contract relative to this same subject matter, has no doubt given rise to the present suit; for, had they been applied, he would have had no cause of complaint. If a greater amount in damages for a breach of his agreement has been recovered against him than the well settled principles of law would warrant, it is his own fault, and cannot be heard or admitted as a sufficient reason to indulge him in a cross suit to right himself. But before inquiring to see if, upon principles of law and justice, the whole subject of litigation arising upon this agreement could not have been properly adjusted in the former suit, I will examine this case for the present as if the former suit was out of the question, and which is perhaps placing it upon the ground upon which it ought to have been litigated. It would then stand thus: the plaintiff, after being called upon to carry into execution the agreement on his part, peremptorily refused; and while persisting in such refusal, instituted a suit for damages, for the non-fulfilment of the agreement on the part of the defendants. There is certainly no principle upon which such an action can be sustained, nor have we been referred to any authority in support of it. It cannot be that the plaintiff seeks to recover damages in the strictest sense of that term for the breach of the contract on the part of the defendants, for his own conduct is conclusive to shew that he considers the fulfilment of it an injury to him, and has therefore preferred the hazard of responding in damages himself, rather than carry it into execution. Can he recover the whole consideration for the wheat? This would be unjust, for he has positively refused to deliver the wheat when demanded, unless, indeed, under the idea that they are independent agreements, the court is bound to afford to each party a specific performance, or its equivalent in damages. Suppose the court should do so, how would the case then stand? The plaintiff would recover the consideration to be paid for the wheat, and the defendants the same sum for the non-delivery of it, besides such damages as a jury would allow for the default in not delivering it. It is obvious from this view, that confining the remedy for a violation of this contract to a suit for damages against the party violating it, the result is exactly the same to both parties as that to which we arrive after the above circuitry of action, and I apprehend that such is the well settled law of the case. It is true, where the covenants or agreements are mutual and independent, that is, mutual and distinct, one party may maintain an action against the other without averring or shewing performance on his part, and the defendant in such case cannot plead the non-performance by the plaintiff in bar of the action. Wheat. Selw. 383; 1 Saund. 320, note. When this principle is rightly understood and applied, there can be no objection to it; and the sound reason given for it is, that the damages in each covenant or agreement may be very different, as where they are in the same instrument and the one not the consideration of the other, or where the covenants or agreements go only to part of the consideration on both sides, part having been executed, and the like cases; in all such the damages might be different, and a remedy must be sought in a suit by each party for a breach. So the terms of the instrument may be such that the covenants or agreements must necessarily be independent, without the existence of the reason above assigned; in such case, the court will carry into effect the agreement, according to the intent of the parties; but whether the covenants or promises are independent or not, where the agreement is wholly executory, and the one covenant or promise or performance is the consideration for the covenant or promise or performance of the other, it may be stated with confidence that there is no principle or authority which will maintain a suit at law by a party who has positively refused to fulfil his part of the agreement against the other to recover damages for a breach of it. Though the consideration of the defendants' covenant or promise cannot be said technically to have failed, the principle and reason of that rule have a strong application, but perhaps the best reason is, that this circuitry of action, as I trust has already been shewn, is wholly unnecessary, and therefore should not be sanctioned by the court. The case of Van Benthuyzen v. Crapser, 8 Johns. 257, I consider as containing the principle I am here applying to this case. See, also, 13 Johns. 365. Mr. Justice Marcy, in delivering the opinion of the court, when this agreement was before under consideration (3 Wend. 356), referred to Van Benthuyzen v. Crapser, and distinguished it from that case; but the distinction taken confirms its application here.

It seems to be considered by the counsel for the plaintiff that if one of the promises in the agreement is independent, the other must be so also, and as it has been decided by this court (3 Wend. 356) that the plaintiff's promise to deliver the wheat was independent, therefore the defendants' promise to pay the money must be also independent. This is an entire mistake. In all cases (except concurrent promises, where the performance of both takes place at the same time) where the performance of one promise is a condition precedent, and must be performed or excused before the right of action exists for the breach of the other promise, the one is independent and the other dependent. The definition of a dependent covenant or promise shews this; If A covenants to do or to abstain from doing a certain act, in consideration of the prior performance of some covenant on the part of B, A's covenant is termed a dependent covenant, because B's right of suing A for a breach of this covenant depends upon the prior performance, or what is equivalent, of the covenant to be performed by B, which, from its nature, is termed a condition precedent. Now it is obvious that the covenant of B is independent, because it must be performed without reference to the covenant of A, and for a breach of it, A may recover damages without shewing a performance himself. Where the promises are concurrent, there, either party seeking to enforce the agreement against the other must aver and prove performance on his part, or what is in law equivalent, before his right of action commences. There can be no doubt that the promise of the plaintiff in this suit was independent, upon the reasons and authorities given by the court (3 Wend. 356); but is not that of the defendant dependent? One of the rules of construction applicable to questions of this kind from the same high authority there referred to is, that "when a day is appointed for the payment of money, &c., and the day is to happen after the thing, which is the consideration of the money, &c., is to be performed, no action can be maintained for the money, &c., before performance. 1 Saund. 320b. In the case under consideration, by the terms of the agreement, the delivery of the wheat became due, and demandable on the first day of April, and the consideration money therefor was not to be paid until the first of September thereafter. Applying the above rule, the delivery of the wheat is a condition precedent, which must be performed, or that must be done which is equivalent in law, before this suit can be sustained for a breach of the agreement by the defendants. It may be remarked that this rule, and the one upon which the case in 3 Wend. was decided, so far as the dependency or independency of the promises was concerned, are conclusive to shew that one of the covenants or promises in an agreement may be dependent and the other independent. If the money is to be paid on a day fixed before the act is to be done for which it is the consideration, the payment of the money does not depend upon the performance of the act—the promise is independent; but the performance of the act may depend upon the payment of the money—that promise may be dependent. If the money is made payable after the act is to be performed, the performance of the act does not depend upon payment of the money, but according to the rule I have above referred to, the payment of the money depends upon the performance of the act; that is, this case. The payment of the money was fixed at a day after the plaintiff was bound to deliver the wheat; by the terms of it, therefore, the defendants were not to trust to the credit or personal responsibility of the plaintiff, but had a right to have possession of the wheat before they parted with their money. This may be no great matter here, where all parties are responsible, but the rule is no less valuable, and must be universal in its application.

The rule to which I have before referred, and which ought to have been applied to the defense on the former suit by the then defendant, and would have adjusted all the rights of the parties without further litigation upon principles of law and justice, and which has been very fully considered by this court, will be found in the case of Clark v. Pinney, 7 Cow. 681. The principle of that case is, that where the vendor is in default for not delivering goods or chattels in pursuance of the contract of sale, and no money has been advanced by the vendee, the true measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the value at the time the article should have been delivered; and the reason of the rule is conclusive, to wit, that such damages, added to the contract price which the vendee has not parted with, will enable him to buy the article in the market. It is obvious, if this rule had been applied, the plaintiff here would have had no cause of complaint, and his omission to apply it cannot be remedied in this suit. This principle itself is sufficient to defeat this action without the interposition of any other, and settles, with the utmost exactness, all rights and remedies upon the agreement, with the least possible litigation.

The view I have thus taken of the case, renders it unnecessary to examine many of the questions raised; those which have been examined were raised upon the trial.

New trial granted, costs to abide the event.

ELLEN v. TOPP.

(Court of Exchequer, 1851. 6 Exch. 424.)

Covenant on an indenture of apprenticeship of the 21st of July, 1846, by the master against the father of the apprentice, the father being a party to the indenture.

By the indenture the infant with the consent of the father put himself apprentice to the plaintiff, "auctioneer, appraiser, and corn-factor to learn his art," for a five-year period, promising faithful service, and the plaintiff, in consideration of 70*l.* paid him by the father, covenanted with the father and the infant to teach and instruct the latter, or cause him to be taught and instructed in the art of an auctioneer, appraiser, and corn-factor. After serving three years the apprentice absented himself, and continued absent without consent. The plea set up that before the apprentice left the service "the plaintiff voluntarily and of his own free will gave up, relinquished, abandoned and ceased to exercise and carry on, and hath not, at any time since, exercised and carried on the art and business of a corn-factor as aforesaid." There was a replication, to which a demurrer was filed, but the replication being insufficient, as the law then stood, the question arose on the sufficiency of the plea.

POLLOCK, C. B.⁶⁶ * * * The case therefore resolves itself into the only question really argued before us, which was whether the plea was good. * * * The other objection taken by Mr. Taprell [counsel for plaintiff] was, that the carrying on all the three trades was not a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to recover, but that his omission or refusal to carry on any one must be the subject of a cross-action.

This objection is founded on one of the rules for determining when covenants are dependent on each other; which is laid down in Boone v. Eyre, and followed in Campbell v. Jones and other cases collected in the note to 1 Wms. Saund. 320 c. That rule is, that when a covenant goes to part of the consideration on both sides; that is, forms a part of the consideration on the plaintiff's side for the defendant's covenant on the other, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, and the whole of the remaining consideration has been had by the defendant, the covenant is independent, and the performance of it is not a condition precedent.

"The reason of the decision in these cases is," as is observed by the learned editor, "that where a person has received a part of the consideration for which he entered into the agreement, it would be unjust that, because he had not had the whole, he should, therefore, be permitted to enjoy that part without either paying or doing any thing for it. Therefore the law obliges him to perform the agreement on his part; and leaves him to his remedy to recover any damages he may have sustained in not having received the whole consideration."

It is remarkable that, according to this rule, the construction of the instrument may be varied by matter ex post facto; and that which is a condition precedent when the deed is executed may cease to be so by the subsequent conduct of the covenantee in accepting less: as in the cases referred to, the defendant, in the first, might have objected to the transfer, if the plaintiff had no good title to the negroes, and refused to pay; in the second, he might have objected to the payment if the plaintiff had refused to transfer the patent, though he had been willing to teach the art of bleaching. But this is no objection to the soundness of the rule, which has been much acted upon. But there is often a difficulty in its application to particular cases, and it cannot be intended to apply to every case in which a covenant by the plaintiff forms only a part of the consideration, and the residue of the consideration has been had by the defendant. That residue must be the substantial part of the contract; and if, in the case of Boone v. Eyre, two or three negroes had been accepted, and the equity of redemption not conveyed, we do not apprehend that the plaintiff could have recovered the whole stipulated price, and left the defendant to recover damages for the non-conveyance of it.

Whether the rule can be applied to the present case has been a matter of great doubt in the minds of some of us; but, after much consideration, we agree that it is not applicable. If this had been an action on a covenant to pay an apprentice fee at the end of the term, and the apprentice had served the whole period, and had had the benefit of instruction as such in two of the trades, it would, we are disposed to think, have been no answer to the action that the plaintiff had discontinued one. But this is an action for not continuing to serve as an apprentice; and although the later services of an apprentice are much more valuable than the early, and are in part a compensation to the master for his instruction in the commencement of the apprenticeship, and so are analogous in some degree to an apprentice fee payable in futuro, yet the immediate cause of action is the breach of the contract to serve, and the obligation to serve depends upon the corresponding obligation to teach as an apprentice; and, if the master is not ready to teach in the very trade which he has stipulated to teach, the apprentice is not bound to serve. To this particular covenant to serve, the relative duty to teach seems to us to be directly a condition precedent; and we are not able to distinguish between the three trades of auctioneer, appraiser, and corn-factor, so as to say that one is more the substantial part of the contract than another.

As the plaintiff by his own fault has disabled himself from acting as a master in all the three trades, he has no right to complain of the defendant's son refusing to continue to serve in any.

Our judgment will, therefore, be for the defendant.

CHRISTIE v. BORELLY.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1880. 29 L. J., C. P. (N. S.) 153.)

The first count of the declaration stated that, in consideration that the plaintiff guaranteed to the defendant that two bills of exchange, of £100 and £62, both drawn by Messrs. C. W. Olivier & Co. upon Messrs. Owen & Co., 75 Lower Thames Street, and both due on January 23d, 1859, would be paid and retired by the said Messrs. Owen & Co. when due, the defendant, in return, engaged and guaranteed to the plaintiff the repayment of the sum of £300 toward the payment of Scotch whiskies, as follows: Six puncheons, 5 hhds., 4 qr. casks, Auchtertool, 2 puncheons, 5 hhds., 8 qr. casks, Anderton, which Mr. B. Fisse, of Norris Street, had ordered, and was about to receive from the plaintiff. Averment, by the plaintiff, that he had performed all things on his part to be done and performed, in pursuance of the said agreement, to entitle him to the due performance by the defendant of his, the defendant's, part of the said agreement; and that the said two bills of exchange of £100 and £62 were duly paid and retired by the said Messrs. Owen & Co. when the same became and were due and payable; and that he, the plaintiff, delivered to the said Mr. B. Fisse, the said Scotch whisky, in the said agreement hereinbefore mentioned, and that the said Mr. B. Fisse, although requested to pay the said amount of £300 toward the payment of the said Scotch whiskies, had not paid for the said Scotch whiskies, nor the said sum of £300 or any part thereof, and the same still remained wholly due and unpaid; yet that the defendant had disregarded and broken his said promise in this, that he had not paid, or caused to be paid, to the plaintiff the said sum of £300, or any part thereof, but, on the contrary thereof, wholly neglected and refused so to do.

The defendant pleaded (inter alia), secondly, to the said first count, that, although the said debt and sum of £300, in the said first count mentioned, repayment whereof the defendant engaged and guaranteed to the plaintiff, was not payable, and, by the terms of the said order of the said Mr. B. Fisse, was not payable until after the said two bills drawn by Messrs. C. W. Olivier upon Messrs. Owen & Co., and guaranteed by the plaintiff, became due and payable, as the plaintiff and the defendant, at the time of the making of the said mutual agreement and guarantees, well knew; yet the said two bills of exchange of £100 and £62, in the said first count mentioned, were not duly or at any time paid or retired by the said Messrs. Owen, of which the plaintiff had due notice, but never at any time paid or retired the said bills. Issue thereon.

The defendant having, at the trial, obtained a verdict in his favor on the issue taken on the second plea, the court granted a rule nisi to enter judgment for the plaintiff on such issue non obstante veredicto, on the ground that the said second plea was no answer to the action.

ERLE, C. J. I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute, and that the plaintiff is entitled to have judgment entered for him non obstante veredicto. The real question is, whether the promises are independent promises, or whether they are mutual promises, their performance being mutually the consideration for each other. It appears to me that they are independent promises. The defendant guarantees the repayment of £300 toward the payment of certain whisky being paid for when due; and the plaintiff guarantees that two bills of exchange of £100 and £62 shall be paid when due. It, therefore, appears that the damages in respect of the breach on one side must be very different from the damages arising from the breach on the other side; on the one side they would be £300, and on the other only £162; it is consequently apparent, on the face of the contract itself, that it was not intended by the parties that performance of the one stipulation should be a condition precedent to performance of the other. The question is, to my mind, one entirely of fact—namely, what was the intention of the parties to this contract? The rules of law are agreed on by both sides, and it is only a question of construction. On the construction of this contract, I am of opinion that the performance of the plaintiff's promise was not a condition precedent, and, therefore, that the second plea is no answer, and consequently that the rule ought to be made absolute.

WILLIAMS, J. The rules of law are now well established, and the object is to discover in each case what is the intention of the parties. If it had appeared from the contract in the present case, that the undertaking of the plaintiff had been to pay absolutely when the bills became due, the case would have been a very different one from what it is. What, however, the plaintiff undertakes is, only to pay if Messrs. Owen do not retire the bills; therefore, the compensation to be paid by the plaintiff, in consequence of such third party not doing their duty, is a matter which must have to be afterward ascertained; and is it likely that it was the intention of the parties to this contract that the defendant's performance was not to take place until after such amount of compensation had been ascertained? It is, I think, obvious that such could not have been the intention of the parties; for Messrs. Owen might have retired the bills when due, and so there would have been nothing at all payable by the plaintiff.

WILLES, J. I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the promise only on the one side is the consideration for the promise on the other side; and that the plea is, therefore, a bad plea.

Rule absolute.

BETTINI v. GYE.

(High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, 1876. 1 Q. B. D., 183.)

Third count, that the defendant was and is the director of the Royal Italian Opera in London, and the plaintiff was and is a dramatic artist and professional singer, and thereupon it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and the defendant, in parts beyond the seas, to wit, at Milan, in Italy, by an agreement in writing in the French language, of which the translation is as follows:

"Royal Italian Opera,
"Covent Garden, London.

"Year 1875.

"The undersigned, Mr. Frederick Gye, gentleman, and director of the Royal Italian Opera in London, of the one part, and Mr. Bettini, dramatic artist, on the other part, have agreed as follows:

"1. Mr. Bettini undertakes to fill the part of primo tenor assoluto in the theatres, halls, and drawing-rooms, both public and private, in Great Britain and in Ireland during the period of his engagement with Mr. Gye.

"2. This engagement shall begin on the 30th of March, 1875, and shall terminate on the 13th of July, 1875.

"3. The salary of Mr. Bettini shall be £150 per month, to be paid monthly.

"4. Mr. Bettini shall sing in concerts as well as in operas, but he shall not sing anywhere out of the theatre in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, 1875, without the written permission of Mr. Gye, except at a distance of more than fifty miles from London, and out of the season of the theatre.

"5. Mr. Gye shall furnish the costumes to Mr. Bettini for his characters according to the ordinary usage of theatres.

"6. Mr. Bettini will conform to the ordinary rules of the theatre in case of sickness, fire, rehearsals, etc.

"7. Mr. Bettini agrees to be in London without fail at least six days before the commencement of his engagement, for the purpose of rehearsals.

"8. In case Mr. Gye shall require the services of Mr. Bettini at a distance of more than ten miles from London, he shall pay his travelling expenses.

"9. Mr. Bettini shall not be obliged to sing more than four times a week in opera. Mr. Bettini, in order to assist the direction of Mr. Gye, will sing, upon the request of Mr. Gye, in the same characters in which he has already sung, and in other characters of equal position. In case of the sickness of other artists, Mr. Bettini agrees to replace them in their characters of first tenor assoluto.

"10. Mr. Gye shall have the right to prolong the period limited above upon the same conditions, provided that the period does not go beyond the end of the month of August.

"Milan, 14 Dec., 1874."

That the plaintiff did not sing anywhere out of the said theatre in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from January 1st, 1875, to the date of the commencement of this action, without the written permission of the defendant, except at a distance of more than fifty miles from London, and out of the season of the said theatre. That the plaintiff was prevented by temporary illness from being in London before March 28th, 1875, but he did arrive in London on that day; and, save as afore-said, the plaintiff has always performed his said agreement, and was and is ready and willing to perform his part of the said agreement, of all which the defendant had notice, and all things were done and happened, and all conditions were fulfilled and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to a performance by the defendant of the said agreement and to maintain this action. Yet the defendant did not nor would receive the plaintiff into his said service, but wholly refused so to do, and wrongfully exonerated and discharged the plaintiff from his said agreement, and from the performance of the said agreement on the plaintiff's part, and wrongfully put an end to and determined the said agreement, whereby the plaintiff was damnified.

The defendant pleaded, ninthly, to the third count, that the plaintiff was not in London six days before the commencement of the said engagement for the purpose of rehearsals, nor had the defendant notice before the six days of the plaintiff's inability to be in London, or that he would not be in London six days before the commencement of his said engagement for the purpose of rehearsals, nor was the plaintiff ready and willing to attend such rehearsals, although it was necessary for him to do so, wherefore the defendant did not nor would receive the plaintiff into his service in the capacity and on the terms aforesaid, which is the breach complained of.

Demurrer to the ninth plea, and joinder.

BLACKBURN, J. In this case the parties have entered into an agreement in writing, which is set out on the record.

The court must ascertain the intention of the parties, as is said by Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the court in Graves v. Legg, 9 Ex. at p. 716, "to be collected from the instrument and the circumstances legally admissible in evidence with reference to which it is to be construed." He adds: "One particular rule well acknowledged is, that where a covenant or agreement goes to part of the consideration on both sides, and may be compensated in damages, it is an independent covenant or contract." There was no averment of any special circumstances existing in this case, with reference to which the agreement was made, but the court must look at the general nature of such an engagement. By the seventh paragraph of the agreement, "Mr. Bettini agrees to be in London without fail at least six days before the commencement of his engagement for the purpose of rehearsals." The engagement was to begin on March 30th, 1875. It is admitted on the record that the plaintiff did not arrive in London till March 28th, which is less than six days before the 30th, and therefore it is clear that he has not fulfilled this part of the contract.

The question raised by the demurrer is, not whether the plaintiff has any excuse for failing to fulfil this part of his contract, which may prevent his being liable in damages for not doing so, but whether his failure to do so justified the defendant in refusing to proceed with the engagement, and fulfil his, the defendant's, part. And the answer to that question depends on whether this part of the contract is a condition precedent to the defendant's liability, or only an independent agreement, a breach of which will not justify a repudiation of the contract, but will only be a cause of action for a compensation in damages.

This is a question which has very often been raised, and the numerous cases on the subject are collected in the first volume of Sir

E. V. Williams' Notes to Saunders, p. 554, in the notes to Pordage v. Cole, and in the second volume, p. 742, notes to Peeters v. Opie.

We think the answer to this question depends on the true construction of the contract taken as a whole.

Parties may think some matter, apparently of very little importance, essential; and if they sufficiently express an intention to make the literal fulfilment of such a thing a condition precedent, it will be one⁶⁷; or they may think that the performance of some matter, apparently of essential importance and prima facie a condition precedent, is not really vital, and may be compensated for in damages, and if they sufficiently expressed such an intention, it will not be a condition precedent.

In this case, if to the seventh paragraph of the agreement there had been added words to this effect, "And if Mr. Bettini is not there at the stipulated time Mr. Gye may refuse to proceed further with the agreement;" or if, on the other hand, it had been said, "And if not there, Mr. Gye may postpone the commencement of Mr. Bettini's engagement for as many days as Mr. Bettini makes default, and he shall forfeit twice his salary for that time," there could have been no question raised in the case. But there is no such declaration of the intention of the parties either way. And in the absence of such an express declaration, we think that we are to look to the whole contract, and applying the rule stated by Parke, B., to be acknowledged, see whether the particular stipulation goes to the root of the matter, so that a failure to perform it would render the performance of the rest of the contract by the plaintiff a thing different in substance from what the defendant has stipulated for; or whether it merely partially affects it and may be compensated for in damages. Accordingly, as it is one or the other, we think it must be taken to be or not to be intended to be a condition precedent.⁶⁸

If the plaintiff's engagement had been only to sing in operas at the theatre, it might very well be that previous attendance at rehearsals

⁶⁸ "Substantial performance, as that phrase is correctly used, means not doing the exact thing promised, but doing something else that is just as good, or good enough for both obligor and obligee; and courts and juries say what is good enough or just as good. The object (or one important purpose) of warranties and precedent conditions is to prevent (e. g.) our doing any such thing in this case." Hough, J., in Dorrance v. Barber & Co., 262 Fed. 489, 492 (1919).

"It is a clearly recognized principle that if there is only a partial failure of performance by one party to a contract for which there may be a compensation in damages, the contract is not put an end to." Littledale, J., in Franklin v. Miller, 4 A. & E. 599, 605 (1836).

"Substantial performance of a contract means performance in all the essential elements necessary to the accomplishment of the purpose of the contract. Manning v. School District, 124 Wis. 84." Carter, J., in People v. Omen, 290 Ill. 59, 65 (1919).

On right of a building contractor to recover for a substantial performance of his contract, see 134 Am. St. Rep. 678, note.

with the actors in company with whom he was to perform was essential. And if the engagement had been only for a few performances, or for a short time, it would afford a strong argument that attendance for the purpose of rehearsals during the six days immediately before the commencement of the engagement was a vital part of the agreement. But we find, on looking to the agreement, that the plaintiff was to sing in theatres, halls, and drawing-rooms, both public and private, from March 30th to July 13th, 1875, and that he was to sing in concerts as well as in operas, and was not to sing anywhere out of the theatre in Great Britain or Ireland from January 1st to December 31st, 1875, without the written permission of the defendant, except at a distance of more than fifty miles from London.

The plaintiff, therefore, has, in consequence of this agreement, been deprived of the power of earning anything in London from January 1st to March 30th; and though the defendant has, perhaps, not received any benefit from this, so as to preclude him from any longer treating as a condition precedent what had originally been one, we think this at least affords a strong argument for saying that subsequent stipulations are not intended to be conditions precedent, unless the nature of the thing strongly shows they must be so.

And as far as we can see, the failure to attend at rehearsals during the six days immediately before March 30th could only affect the theatrical performances and, perhaps, the singing in duets or concerted pieces during the first week or fortnight of this engagement, which is to sing in theatres, halls, and drawing-rooms, and concerts for fifteen weeks.

We think, therefore, that it does not go to the root of the matter so as to require us to consider it a condition precedent.

The defendant must, therefore, we think, seek redress by a cross-claim for damages.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

POUSSARD v. SPIERS & POND.

(High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, 1876. 1 Q. B. D., 410.)

Declaration on an agreement by the defendants to employ the plaintiff's wife to sing and play in an opera at the defendants' theatre. Breach, that the defendants refused to allow the plaintiff's wife to perform according to the agreement.

Pleas: 1. That defendants did not agree as alleged. 2. That plaintiff's wife was not ready and willing to perform. 3. That plaintiff rescinded the contract before breach. Issue joined.

At the trial before Field, J., at the Middlesex Michaelmas sittings, 1875, judgment was entered for the defendants, with leave to move to enter judgment for the plaintiff for £83.

A notice of motion was given accordingly, and a cross order was obtained by the defendants for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that the damages were excessive.

The facts proved and the course of the trial are fully given in the judgment of the court.

BLACKBURN, J. This was an action for the dismissal of the plaintiff's wife from a theatrical engagement. On the trial before my Brother Field it appeared that the defendants, Messrs. Spiers & Pond, had taken the Criterion Theatre, and were about to bring out a French opera, which was to be produced simultaneously in London and Paris. Their manager, Mr. Hingston, by their authority, made a contract with the plaintiff's wife, which was reduced to writing in the following letter:

"Criterion Theatre, October 16, 1874.

"To Madame Poussard:

"On behalf of Messrs. Spiers & Pond I engage you to sing and play at the Criterion Theatre on the following terms:

"You to play the part of Friquette in Lecocq's opera of 'Les Pres Saint Gervais,' commencing on or about the fourteenth of November next, at a weekly salary of eleven pounds (£11), and to continue on at that sum for a period of three months, providing the opera shall run for that period. Then, at the expiration of the said three months, I shall be at liberty to re-engage you at my option, on terms then to be arranged, and not to exceed fourteen pounds per week for another period of three months. Dresses and tights requisite for the part to be provided by the management, and the engagement to be subject to the ordinary rules and regulations of the theatre.

"E. P. HINGSTON, Manager.

"Ratified:

"Spiers & Pond.

"Madame Poussard, 46 Gunter Grove, Chelsea."

The first performance of the piece was announced for Saturday, November 28th. No objection was raised on either side as to this delay, and Madame Poussard attended rehearsals, and such attendance, though not expressed in the written engagement, was an implied part of it. Owing to delays on the part of the composer, the music of the latter part of the piece was not in the hands of the defendants till a few days before that announced for the production of the piece, and the latter and final rehearsals did not take place till the week on the Saturday of which the performance was announced. Madame Poussard was unfortunately taken ill, and though she struggled to attend the rehearsals, she was obliged on Monday, November 23d, to leave the rehearsal, go home and go to bed, and call in medical attendance. In the course of the next day or two an interview took place between the plaintiff and Mr. Leonard (Madame Poussard's medical attendant) and Mrs. Liston, who was the defendants' stage manager, in reference to Madame Poussard's ability to attend and undertake her part, and there was a conflict of testimony as to what took place. According to the defendants' version, Mrs. Liston requested to know as soon as possible what was the prospect of Madame Poussard's recovery, as it would be very difficult on such short notice to obtain a substitute; and that in the result the plaintiff wrote stating that his wife's health was such that she could not play on the Saturday night, and that Mrs. Liston had better, therefore, engage a young lady to play the part; and this, if believed to be accurate, amounted to a rescission of the contract. According to the evidence of the plaintiff and the doctor, Mrs. Liston told them that Madame Poussard was to take care of herself and not come out till quite well, as she, Mrs. Liston, had procured, or would procure, a temporary substitute; and Madame Poussard could resume her place as soon as she was well. This, it was contended by the plaintiff, amounted to a waiver by the defendants of a breach of the condition precedent if there was one.

The jury found that the plaintiff did not rescind the contract, and that Mrs. Liston, if she did waive the condition precedent (as to which they were not agreed), had no authority from the defendants so to do.

These findings, if they stand, dispose of those two questions. There was no substantial conflict as to what was in fact done by Mrs. Liston. Upon learning, on the Wednesday (November 25th), the possibility that Madame Poussard might be prevented by illness from fulfilling her engagement, she sent to a theatrical agent to inquire what artistes of position were disengaged, and learning that Miss Lewis had no engagement till December 25th, she made a provisional arrangement with her, by which Miss Lewis undertook to study the part and be ready on Saturday to take the part, in case Madame Poussard was not then recovered so far as to be ready to perform. If it should turn out that this labor was thrown away, Miss Lewis was to have a douceur for her trouble. If Miss Lewis was called on to perform, she was to be engaged at £15 a week up to December 25th, if the piece ran so long. Madame Poussard continued in bed and ill, and unable to attend either the subsequent rehearsals or the first night of the performance on the Saturday, and Miss Lewis's engagement became absolute, and she performed the part on Saturday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and up to the close of her engagement, December 25th. The piece proved a success, and in fact ran for more than three months.

On Thursday, December 4th, Madame Poussard, having recovered, offered to take her place, but was refused, and for this refusal the action was brought.

On January 2d Madame Poussard left England.

My Brother Field, at the trial, expressed his opinion that the failure of Madame Poussard to be ready to perform, under the circumstances, went so much to the root of the consideration as to discharge the defendants, and that he should therefore enter judgment for the defendants; but he asked the jury five questions.

The first three related to the supposed rescission and waiver. The other questions were in writing and were: 4. Whether the non-attendance on the night of the opening was of such material consequence to the defendants as to entitle them to rescind the contract? To which the jury said, "No." And 5, was it of such consequence as to render it reasonable for the defendants to employ another artiste, and whether the engagement of Miss Lewis, as made, was reasonable; to which the jury said, "Yes." Lastly, he left the question of damages, which the jury assessed at £83.

On these answers he reserved leave to the plaintiff to move to enter judgment for £83.

A cross rule was obtained on the ground that the verdict was against evidence and that the damages were excessive.

We think that, from the nature of the engagement to take a leading, and, indeed, the principal female part (for the prima donna sang her part in male costume as the Prince de Conti) in a new opera which (as appears from the terms of the engagement) it was known might run for a longer or shorter time, and so be a profitable or losing concern to the defendants, we can, without the aid of the jury, see that it must have been of great importance to the defendants that the piece should start well, and consequently that the failure of the plaintiff's wife to be able to perform on the opening and early performances was a very serious detriment to them.

This inability having been occasioned by sickness was not any breach of contract by the plaintiff, and no action can lie against him for the failure thus occasioned. But the damage to the defendants and the consequent failure of consideration is just as great as if it had been occasioned by the plaintiff's fault, instead of by his wife's misfortune. The analogy is complete between this case and that of a charter-party in the ordinary terms, where the ship is to proceed in ballast (the act of God, etc., excepted) to a port and there load a cargo. If the delay is occasioned by excepted perils, the shipowner is excused. But if it is so great as to go to the root of the matter, it frees the charterer from his obligation to furnish a cargo. See per Bramwell, B., delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., L. R. 10 C. P. at p. 141.

And we think that the question, whether the failure of a skilled and capable artiste to perform in a new piece through serious illness is so important as to go to the root of the consideration, must to some extent depend on the evidence; and is a mixed question of law and fact. Theoretically, the facts should be left to and found separately by the jury, it being for the judge or the court to say whether they, being so found, show a breach of a condition precedent or not. But this course is often (if not generally) impracticable; and if we can see that the proper facts have been found, we should act on these without regard to the form of the questions.

Now, in the present case, we must consider what were the courses open to the defendants under the circumstances. They might, it was said on the argument before us (though not on the trial), have postponed the bringing out of the piece till the recovery of Madame Poussard, and if her illness had been a temporary hoarseness incapacitating her from singing on the Saturday, but sure to be removed by the Monday, that might have been a proper course to pursue. But the illness here was a serious one, of uncertain duration, and if the plaintiff had at the trial suggested that this was the proper course, it would, no doubt, have been shown that it would have been a ruinous course; and that it it would have been much better to have abandoned the piece altogether than to have postponed it from day to day for an uncertain time, during which the theatre would have been a heavy loss.

The remaining alternatives were to employ a temporary substitute until such time as the plaintiff's wife should recover; and if a temporary substitute capable of performing the part adequately could have been obtained upon such a precarious engagement on any reasonable terms, that would have been a right course to pursue; but if no substitute capable of performing the part adequately could be obtained, except on the terms that she should be permanently engaged at higher pay than the plaintiff's wife, in our opinion it follows, as a matter of law, that the failure on the plaintiff's part went to the root of the matter and discharged the defendants.

We think, therefore, that the fifth question put to the jury, and answered by them in favor of the defendants, does find all the facts necessary to enable us to decide as a matter of law that the defendants are discharged.

The fourth question is, no doubt, found by the jury for the plaintiff; but we think in finding it they must have made a mistake in law as to what was a sufficient failure of consideration to set the defendants at liberty, which was not a question for them.

This view taken by us renders it unnecessary to decide anything on the cross rule for a new trial.

The motion must be refused with costs.

LEOPOLD ET AL. v. SALKEY.

SCHOLFIELD, J.⁷⁰ This was an action by appellee against appellants, upon a written contract, under seal, whereby the former agreed to render personal services for the latter, during a stipulated term, for a price agreed to be paid by the latter. By the terms of the contract, appellee agreed to enter the employ of appellants as a superintendent and manager of the manufacturing department of appellants (they being engaged in the manufacturing and selling of boys', youths' and children's clothing), in connection with, and under the direction of Asher F. Leopold, and whenever required by appellants' firm or either member thereof, to assist in the purchase and sale of materials and goods manufactured by the firm, in such manner and at such times as the firm should direct. Appellee also agreed that he would continue in the employ of the firm for a period of three years from the 1st day of December, 1874, at which time his services were to commence; that during said time, he would devote himself entirely to the business of the firm, in the manner as agreed upon, giving his whole time, attention and skill thereto, and at all times work for the best interest of appellants. Appellants, as a compensation therefor, agreed to pay appellee the sum of $3,000 per annum, in sums of $250 per month, at the expiration of each month.

Appellee commenced work, under the contract, on the 1st of December, 1874, and continued to render services thereunder until the 12th of January, 1875, when he was arrested by a United States marshal, under an order of the district court of the United States for the northern district of this state, and put in jail. He remained in jail until the 25th of the same month, when he was released on bail. Upon being released, he returned to appellants' establishment to resume work under the contract, but they, having obtained another foreman in his place whilst he was in jail, refused to receive him again into their employ.

Appellee has been paid for all the services he actually rendered, and the present suit is only to recover damages for appellants' alleged breach of contract in not continuing him in their employ. The judgment below was in favor of appellee for $500.

The covenants of appellee clearly constitute but one single and entire undertaking—each goes to the whole consideration. The covenant of appellants to pay $3,000 per annum, although to be paid in monthly payments, was not for a part, but for the whole of the term. The covenant by appellee that he would devote himself entirely to the business of the firm, giving his whole time, attention and skill thereto, goes to where the teacher died during the summer vacation leaving one vacation month of the school year unpaid for, see Donlan v. City of Boston, 223 Mass. 285 (1916), criticised adversely in 2 Williston on Contracts, p. 1601, note 13.

the root of the whole matter, and when the situation of the parties, as disclosed by the evidence, is taken into consideration, it is manifest that the failure by appellee to perform his contract from the 12th to the 25th of January, inclusive, would render the performance of the rest of the contract by appellee a thing different, in substance, from that which appellants stipulated for. Appellants were engaged in an extensive business in the manufacturing and selling of boys', youths' and children's clothing. The month of January was their busiest season of the year. In that month they manufactured their goods for the spring trade, and in the latter part of it they sent out their traveling men with samples. When appellee was arrested there were in appellants' employ fourteen cutters and three trimmers. It was his duty as superintendent and manager to superintend these, lay out their work, direct its performance, etc., and also to inspect and receive work from the tailors, besides discharging various other duties incident to the position he assumed. It required peculiar skill, knowledge and great promptness and fidelity. To delay the manufacturing in that month would, obviously, work immediate pecuniary loss, to some extent, and must, necessarily, materially endanger the future prosperity of the business. Rival manufacturers would be enabled to forestall appellants in the trade of that year, and being once forestalled, they might not, during the term, recover their former trade; besides, the character and quality of work have much to do in building up and establishing a prosperous permanent trade in manufactured articles, and great risk, in that respect, would be incurred by the mere change of superintendents and managers; nor is it to be assumed that a person of competent experience, skill, energy and fidelity could be got, without a moment's warning, to fill such a position, and induced to stay, from day to day, during such a season in the business, for a compensation approaching in any reasonable degree a pro rata part of that which he would be willing to accept for his services for a term of three years.

In our opinion, therefore, the failure of appellee to perform the services he had covenanted to perform, from the 12th to the 25th of January, 1875, was a substantial breach of his covenant.

Appellee has averred in his declaration, ability, readiness, and offer to perform, and his undertaking being an entire one, it was incumbent on him to make the averment and support it by proof. Badgley v. Heald, 4 Gilm. 64; Swanzy v. Moore, 22 Ill. 63. * * *

It may be conceded that appellee was put in jail without his fault, yet, this would not relieve him of his covenant to give his whole time, attention and skill to appellants' business. It is not claimed to have been through appellants' fault that he was put in jail, and there is no reason, therefore, why appellants' business should suffer in consequence of it. He might have guarded against this by an exception in his covenant, but he did not do so.

The rule is, it is a good defense to an action on a covenant or contract, that the obligation to perform the act required was dependent upon some other thing which the other party was to do and has failed to do. And the defense is good, although the omission of the other party to do the thing required of him, was produced by causes which he could neither foresee nor control. 2 Parsons on Contrs. (6th ed.) 674; Chitty on Contrs. (11 Am. ed.) 1086.

There is a class of cases, where a party contracting to render personal services, after part performance, becomes disabled by inevitable casualty and is thereby prevented from fully completing his contract, has been held entitled to recover for the services actually rendered, upon a quantum meruit. Fenton v. Clark, 11 Vt. 557; Hubbard v. Belden, 27 id. 645; Dickey v. Linseott, 20 Me. 453; Wolf v. Hewes, 20 N. Y. (6 Smith) 197. But these furnish no warrant for the position that the laborer can, in such case, recover upon the contract for a failure to pay for future services which he has been prevented from performing. On the contrary, they proceed upon the theory that the contract is discharged by the inevitable casualty, and therefore allow the party to recover simply what he has earned. * * *

The general remark [in Selby v. Hutchinson, admr. 4 Gilm. 333], made by the court which counsel quote in discussing the evidence, that "in order to justify an abandonment of the contract, and the proper remedy growing out of it, the failure of the opposite party must be a total one; the object of the contract must have been defeated or rendered unattainable by his misconduct or default," is not understood as laying down the rule that to justify an abandonment of a contract the opposite party must have failed to discharge every obligation imposed on him,—but simply that matters which do not go to the substance of the contract, and the failure to perform which would not render the performance of the rest a thing different in substance from what was contracted for, do not authorize an abandonment of the contract; for, when the failure to perform the contract is in respect to matters which would render the performance of the rest a thing different in substance from what was contracted for, so far as we are advised, the authorities all agree the party not in default may abandon the contract.

It is said in Wood's Law of Master and Servant, p. 233, § 120: "Sickness for a lengthened period—in one case two weeks—releases both parties from the contract. The master is not bound to wait, unreasonably, for the restoration of his servant's health, and his necessities may well be regarded as the measure of what is reasonable." See, also, Hubbard v. Belden, supra.

In Poussard v. Spiers and Pond, Law Reports (Q. B. Div.), Vol. 1, p. 410, this rule is, in substance, recognized and applied by the court.

Where neither party is at fault, the absence of the servant from the master's employ, without his consent (by whatever cause occasioned), for an unreasonable length of time, we are of opinion authorizes the master to treat the contract as abandoned; and what, in such case, is an unreasonable length of time, depends upon the nature and necessities of the business in which the servant is employed. Under the facts here proved, a much shorter time than that during which appellee was confined in jail, might, in our opinion, be regarded as unreasonable. Under different circumstances, absence for a much greater length of time might furnish no cause for abandonment—the question always being, does the delay so affect the interests of the master that the performance of the residue of the contract by the servant would be a thing different in substance from what the master contracted for. * * *

There was evidence that after appellee was in jail, and whilst he was there, appellants agreed that if he got out and returned to his duties within a certain time, they would receive him into their employ. * * * This promise did not amount to a contract. There was no mutuality in it, and no consideration to support it. It was a mere offer which might be withdrawn at any time before it was acted upon. It did not amount to an estoppel because appellee did no act placing himself in a worse condition than he would otherwise have been in, on the faith of the promise. Had appellee been received again into appellants' employ, the promise, and the act of receiving him, would have been sufficient evidence of a waiver of a right to declare a forfeiture for the previous default. * * *

When appellants refused to receive appellee into their employ, upon his return to their place of business, he was fully and sufficiently notified of their election to treat the contract as abandoned, and he needed no other or different notice. * * *

The opinion had previously stated that the defendant was under "the duty to wait a reasonable time for her recovery," though that was stated because of agreements for the postponement from time to time of the marriage.

should hold office subject to termination at twelve months' notice by either party, and with a restriction on his right to trade after its termination"]. The restriction on trade was that he should not whilst in the engagement or within two years after its termination carry on a similar business within a certain radius without the company's permission. In 1906 the company dismissed him without notice. In an action against the company for wrongful dismissal he recovered damages, and afterwards began to trade as a billposter on his own account within the radius. The appellants as assignees of the Newcastle Company brought an action against the respondent for an injunction and for damages for breach of contract. Neville, J., held that the appellants were entitled to sue the respondent for damages notwithstanding the wrongful dismissal. This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M. R. Fletcher Moulton and Buckley, L. JJ.). Hence this appeal.

LORD ROBERTSON.⁷² My lords, if this case be considered for a moment on its own merits and substance (apart in the meantime from authority) it is extremely difficult to be reconciled to the appellant's contention. The respondent's position in entering the contract is a very intelligible one. He says, "I am a billposter, and I desire occupation either on my own account or in the service of others. If I enter the employment of others, I am willing to give up the right to trade on my own account to the extent specified in this agreement. I do not desire to have it both ways." The claim of the appellants, on the other hand, as now put forward, is that, taking him at his word, as expressed in the contract, and getting his services, they are to be entitled both to deprive him (against the contract) of the right to serve them and also of the right to serve himself.

It seems to me that the covenant not to set up business is not only germane to but ancillary to the contract of service, and that once the contract of service is rescinded the other falls with it.

I have only to add that the suggestion that the respondent has already received his quid pro quo in that he has had the appellants' wages for a considerable time ignores the equally important fact that they have had his services for the same period.

CLARKE CONTRACTING CO. v. CITY OF NEW YORK.

Action by the Clarke Contracting Company against the City of New York. From a judgment of the First Appellate Division (182 App. Div. 835, 170 N. Y. Supp. 136), unanimously modifying and affirming a judgment of the Trial Term for defendant entered upon the verdict of a jury, the plaintiff by permission appeals. Judgment reversed, and new trial granted.

HISCOCK, C. J.⁷⁴ The plaintiff is the assignee of a contract made with the city of New York. The purpose of this contract as stated therein was "to provide for the loading and trimming of the deck scows, dumpers and other vessels at the water front dumps of the department of street cleaning in the borough of Manhattan, of the ashes, rubbish and street sweepings delivered at said [14 specified] dumps" for the term of three years, commencing January 2, 1914, with the right of renewal. In addition to furnishing the labor necessary for loading and trimming the various vessels by which this material was to be taken to sea or to the appointed dumping ground, the contractor was to pay the sum of $600.51 a week for the privilege. The consideration and benefit secured from the city in return for the performance of this labor and the payment of this sum was the privilege to pick over the ashes, rubbish, etc., and reclaim therefrom certain articles. * * *

As a matter of fact the city under its contract did not furnish for use by the contractor in picking and loading and trimming, and make deliveries at, the 14 water front dumps as it agreed to. Owing to various mishaps, at the time the contract took effect it was able to furnish only 10 of these, supplying in the place of 3 of those originally specified, dumps located at other points and of a character less advantageous for the contractor in his work, and in the place of another one supplying no dump, but diverting the ashes, etc., to a private dump. The city undertook to repair and replace the lacking dumps, and 3 of them ultimately, but after the rescission of the contract hereinafter mentioned, were made fit for use. * * *

Notwithstanding plaintiff's claim of default upon the part of the city * * * it entered upon and continued in the performance of the contract from January 2d to April 11th, fully performing its work of loading and trimming at the water fronts which were furnished, and making its weekly payment of $600.51. It did this, however, under protest, each week serving upon the proper official a written notice in effect calling to his attention and notifying him that the city had failed to furnish specified dumps, * * * depriving plaintiff of its rights under the contract, causing it substantial loss, and that it reserved all rights, claims, and privileges under its contract for loss or damage arising out of the breach of the contract, and on April 11th it served upon said official a notice that it elected to rescind its contract upon the ground that the city had made breach thereof, and had substantially impaired its rights and rendered performance impossible.

When thereafter it brought this action based on such rescission it originally claimed damages aggregating a large amount for breach of the entire contract extending over three years. On the trial of the case, however, by acquiescence in the rulings of the court as well as by its own attitude, it limited its claim to a right to recover with interest the sum of $15,000 deposited as security for the performance of its contract and the damages which it had suffered by reason of the alleged default of the city during the period which intervened the commencement of the contract and the rescission. * * *

I think also that it was error as matter of law to permit the jury to find for defendant on the theory that the failure to furnish 4 out of 14 dumps was an unsubstantial default which did not materially impair performance of "the contract in its whole scope."

It will be remembered that in the place of 1 dump which was lacking none was supplied, and the ashes, etc., were diverted from it to private dumps, and that in the place of the other 3 dumps which were lacking dumps were supplied which were less convenient and beneficial for the contractor, and that the exchange resulted in loss. We are not embarrassed by the unanimous affirmance in respect of this evidence because the court substantially charged these facts, as matter of law.

Thus we have a contract under which as a fundamental, single, and indivisible agreement the city undertook to deliver all of its ashes, etc., from a certain territory (City of New York v. Paoli, 202 N. Y. 18, 94 N. E. 1077) at 14 specified dumps, with picking privileges, and in return for which the contractor by like single and indivisible agreement promised to perform labor at the entire collection of dumps and make payment for the privilege in an undivided sum of money. One agreement in its entirety is the foundation for and consideration of the other. There is in the contract no suggestion of or opportunity for divisibility and apportionment whereby the city might default in furnishing part of the dumps, and the contractor proportion performance of his obligations to what was left. He had a right to look to the profits of one dump as an offset to the possible losses at another, and to the entire collection as the source from which he might draw the benefits and profits which would enable him to perform his obligations and pay the single aggregate sum of money which he had promised. When the city defaulted in such an agreement it committed a material breach of its contract, which a jury might not find to be otherwise, and gave to the other party a right to rescind.

Applying to it familiar principles governing rescissions in such a case, the default was not of a covenant which was incidental, inconsequential, or subordinate to the main purpose of the contract which would not support rescission. On the other hand, the breach was of a promise which was substantial, which lay at the basis of the entire contract, went to its entire consideration, and affected plaintiff's entire obligation thereunder, and hence furnished ample basis for rescission. Leopold v. Salkey, 89 Ill. 412, 31 Am. Rep. 93; Kauffman v. Raeder, 108 Fed. 179; 47 C. C. A. 278, 54 L. R. A. 247; Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273 (note); Osgood v. Bauder & Co., 75 Iowa, 550, 39 N. W. 887, 1 L. R. A. 655; Worthington & Co. v. Gwin, 119 Ala. 44, 24 South. 739, 43 L. R. A. 382.

The possibility that plaintiff might have waived for a period or indefinitely the failure to furnish dumps is not overlooked. It is sufficient to say here, however, that the evidence rebutted any such idea, and the case was not disposed of upon any such claim or theory.

The judgment so far as against plaintiff should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

POUND, J. (dissenting). I think that the only arguable point presented to this court by a proper exception has to do with the question of entire dependent covenants and substantial performance. Unquestionably plaintiff might have performed on its part and claimed substantial damages for delay in full performance by the city. Was it limited to such an action for damages or might it rescind?

When the contract was made in August, 1913, it was the letter of the agreement that on January 1st 14 water-front dumps should be ready. The implied agreement was that the dumps known to both parties to be out of commission should be put in repair. The city was slow in getting 4 of them ready, but it was getting them ready when plaintiff undertook to rescind the contract. The city had showed not the slightest intention not to be bound by the contract nor to deliberately disregard its terms. Was its breach of minor importance or of such a material or essential character as to go to the root of the contract and excuse further performance by plaintiff?

"Where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other; but where they go only to a part, where a breach may be paid for in damages, there the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and shall not plead it as condition precedent." Lord Mansfield in Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, note; Kauffman v. Raeder, 108 Fed. 171, 179, 47 C. C. A. 278, 54 L. R. A. 247.

The principle thus established has been uniformly followed, but its application varies with the special circumstances of each case. It has recently been said by an eminent authority that—

"The test is whether on the whole, it is fair to allow damages merely or to excuse performance entirely." Williston on Contracts, § 841.

On the evidence it does not appear that the intention of the parties was that the delivery of the entire 14 dumps on January 1st was a condition that went to the whole of the consideration on the other side, so that the failure to deliver promptly 1, 2, 3, or 4 dumps on that date, or by April 11th following, gave the injured party the right to treat the entire contract as at an end, and to recover damages for a total breach. The fact that the 4 dumps which were out of commission when the contract was signed were not ready on January 1st when plaintiff went into possession indicates that plaintiff would have been satisfied with damages for delay up to April 11th, at least if the 4 dumps had then been ready. One was ready on April 13, 1914, the date that plaintiff actually abandoned the work. One was completed May 15, 1914, one May 29, 1914, and one December 21, 1914. The trial judge thought the question of substantial failure to perform by the city was for the jury. Did the delay in completing the 4 dumps amount in law to a substantial impairment of plaintiff's entire consideration? Unless it can be said that plaintiff's promise to pay anything was absolutely dependent upon the delivery of all 14 dumps on January 1st, plaintiff had no right to rescind after entering into possession except for such unreasonable delay on the part of the city as either evinced a disposition on its part not to perform until it had substantially defeated plaintiff's purpose in making the contract or had that result.

Was the delay so unreasonable that it cannot be paid for in damages?

How does the case differ from an agreement to rent 14 houses, some finished, some being constructed, beginning at a future day? The covenant to have all the houses ready is not a condition precedent to pay rent if the partial breach may be paid for in damages. That is, if one house is lacking a coat of paint, which is being put on, that is not a breach of a condition precedent. If one house only is ready, that is a breach of a condition precedent. If the facts as to part performance are, as in the case before us, the question may be for the jury. I do not see that as matter of law the city's partial failure to perform on time was a large part of the consideration.

It may be noticed that the plaintiff when paying rent made no claim of total failure of consideration. It merely claimed that it was sustaining "a substantial loss," and asserted that paying rent in full was not a waiver of its rights under the contract. It makes no claim of any right to abandon the contract for breach and non-performance and impossibility of performance until April 11th. This at least indicates that plaintiff considered damages only up to the latter date and made no prior claim of impossibility of performance on its part.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

*Judgment reversed, etc.*⁷⁵

⁷⁵In an earlier New York case, Oakley v. Morton, 11 N. Y. 25 (1854) it was held that plaintiff should have been nonsuited because, under a contract to keep twenty cows on his dairy farm and sell the butter made from the dairy to the defendant during a specified season, he did not show that he kept at least twenty cows yielding milk during the dairying season, but on the contrary the evidence showed that while he started with twenty of such cows five of them went practically dry and were sold by him and not replaced by others. The action was for the price of butter alleged to have been delivered under the contract, and W. F. Allen, J., said:

"The right of action of the plaintiff depends upon the performance by him of a condition precedent, to-wit, the keeping of at least twenty cows for the dairying business, during the season of 1916, and delivering the butter made therefrom to the defendant at the time and place specified in the agreement. The plaintiff was bound to aver and prove a fulfilment of such condition, or some excuse for the non-performance; and if an excuse was relied on, he should have averred his readiness to perform, and the particular circumstances which constituted such excuse. 1 Chit. Pl. 321, 326. * * *

"The proof was, that the dairying season commenced in April, and ends during the month of November, and when the cows begin feeding on hay; that the plaintiff, in the spring, put twenty cows on his farm, three of which became dry about the first of September, and two others, from the first to the fifteenth of October; the five were disposed of and their places were not supplied. The quantity of butter, of course, depended upon the number of cows from which it was made, and there was evidence offered to show the value in market of butter made from a dairy of twenty cows was greater than that made from fifteen cows. * * * The covenant was co-extensive with the season, and a failure to perform it, at the latter part of the season was as much a violation of its letter and spirit, as would have been a failure in the earlier part. The agreement was to keep the entire number, during the entire season, and a strict performance was a condition precedent to his right to recover of the defendant, who could not be compelled to receive and pay for the butter from any less number of cows. Page v. Ott, 5 Denio 406; Smith v. Briggs, 3 Id. 73. * * * A keeping of twenty cows for three months, and fifteen for the next three months, is not literally, nor substantially, keeping the first number for the whole six months. The contract cannot be otherwise construed than if the defendant had undertaken to pay a gross sum for the butter to be made from a given number of cows; and under such a contract, it would not be claimed, that the dairyman could provide the whole number of cows, of such as would become dry in the midst of the season, and still compel a performance by the defendant. This case is in principle somewhat like Beatson v. Schank, 3 East 233, in which it was held, that the party who took upon himself to keep on his vessel a certain number of hands, was bound to provide against the contingency of any of them dying, as by taking an extra number on board. See also Inman v. Western Fire Ins. Co., 12 Wend. 452. * * *

"The plaintiff did not prove a substantial performance of this part of the contract, and the performance was not dispensed with or prevented by the defendant. The evidence did not tend to establish an excuse for nonperformance, even if, under the pleadings, an excuse could have been shown."

Problems of breach to the essence are as varied as the subject-matter of contracts. For instance, in Williams v. Sweet (Me.), 110 Atl. 316 (1920), a guest in a hotel, who had contracted to take and pay for rooms for two

TOLMAN, J.⁷⁶ On January 12, 1918, appellant ordered, through a merchandise broker representing the respondent in Seattle, 300 crates of Australian onions. The order reads:

"Sold to J. B. Powles Co. How ship, Boat. When, March. 300 crts. Australian onions, $94 per ton. Cost, freight and insurance Frisco. Acceptance Australia."

It appears to have been understood that there was but one ship each month plying between the Australian port of shipment and San Francisco, and that to comply with the order and ship in March the shipment would necessarily be by the Steamship Sonoma. About March 12, following, appellant notified the broker of its desire to cancel the order, and caused the broker to cable respondent to that effect; but the cable was not delivered until after the ship had sailed with the partial shipment of onions hereinafter referred to.

In due time the respondent had ready for shipment the full 300 crates of onions as ordered, but was permitted to load on the ship but 240 crates; the remainder of the space being taken at the last moment by the United States government for the purpose of shipping wheat to the United States. The 240 crates so shipped were consigned to the shipper's order, with directions to notify the buyer, and a draft with bill of lading attached was drawn on the buyer for the purchase price, with the privilege of inspection before payment. Appellant, the buyer, declined to receive the shipment or pay the draft. The goods were sold for its account, and this case was brought to recover the loss occasioned by the resale at a price less than that named in the order, plus the expenses of resale. The case was tried to the court without a jury, resulting in a weeks, was held justified in leaving after three days and refusing to pay because numerous flies, about whose filthy habits the opinion discourses at length, were allowed in the dining room.

Closely connected with the topic of breach to the essence is fraudulent concealment of some fact so important that it entitles the party deceived to avoid the contract. With reference to mutual promises to marry, for instance, the following statement is inserted here because of its assertion of a single standard of virtue:

"The proposition that illicit intercourse of the plaintiff, prior to the promise and then unknown to the defendant, or subsequent to the promise, with another than the defendant is a defense to the action is fundamental and established beyond the reach of discussion. The law, through implication, reads into the promise of either party to the engagement the representation of chastity, and physical qualification for the relation, which, if false or a misrepresentation constitutes a fraud vitiating the whole contract. Boynton v. Kellogg, 3 Mass. 188; Palmer v. Andrews, 7 Wend. 142; Kniffen v. McConnell, 30 N. Y. 285; Goddard v. Westcott, 32 Mich. 180; Budd v. Crea, 6 N. J. L. 370. It is in this respect impartial between the sexes." Collin, J., in McKane v. Howard, 202 N. Y. 181, 183-184 (1911).

2. It is contended, and generally held, that the delivery of goods under an executory contract must be of the exact quantity ordered. otherwise the buyer may refuse to receive them; and it is not necessary that he base his refusal on this specific ground, but, having refused to accept the goods on other grounds, he may yet defend, an action for the purchase price upon this ground. It was so held in Inman, Akers & Inman v. Elk Cotton Mills, 116 Tenn. 141, 91 S. W. 760, where the order was for 50 bales of cotton. The buyer sought to cancel the order, as in this case, and the seller refused to cancel. The buyer then refused to accept the goods, upon the ground that the delivery was not promptly made as the contract required. The seller resold for the account of the buyer, and sued for the loss sustained. It developed during the trial that the seller had tendered delivery of but 49 bales, and the buyer was permitted to amend his answer and defend upon this ground. The court said:

"A delivery of a less number was not a compliance with this contract. So far as it affected the contract relations of the parties, a failure in the matter of one bale was as much as a failure to deliver any greater number of bales. The complainants sue to recover for the breach of an entire contract, and in order to maintain their bill they must show a compliance or a willingness to comply with it as an entirety. Failing in this latter regard, they fail altogether. Tiedeman on Sales, § 101; Barker v. Reagan, 4 Heisk. 590. Their insistence that they were relieved from tendering 50 bales by reason of the repudiation of the contract by the defendant, under the facts found by the Court of Chancery Appeals, cannot avail them. If they had accepted the repudiation, or rather cancellation, of the contract contained in the telegram from the defendant, of July 7th, then this failure would not have affected, other matters out of the way, their right to recovery. This, however, they failed to do. They declined positively to accept the cancellation, and thus kept the contract alive between themselves and the defendant, and thus enabled the defendant, notwithstanding its attempted cancellation, to avail itself of any previous or subsequent breach on the part of the complainant."

3. Since the seller did accept the order in Australia and was bound to deliver the exact quantity ordered, may he be excused from making full delivery because our national government (rightfully as we must assume) as a war measure commandeered the only available shipping space for its necessities? Much as the writer would like to so hold, the authorities lay down the contrary rule. Had respondent been sued for damages for failure to ship the full order, this act by the government might have afforded a defense; but, having sued on the contract, it is essential to a recovery that a full performance be shown, and no excuse not provided for in the contract will justify a recovery, where the performance is partial only, save only an act of the buyer rendering performance impossible, or a waiver by it. *Newell v. We conclude that the judgment must be reversed, with directions to dismiss the action. It is so ordered.⁷⁷

CYRUS MARK ET AL. v. STUART-HOWLAND CO.

STUART-HOWLAND CO. v. CYRUS MARK ET AL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1917. 226 Mass. 35, 115 N. E. 42, 2 A. L. R. 678.)

RUGG, C. J.⁷⁸ The action of Mark and others, who will hereafter be called the plaintiffs, was brought first. The declaration is in two counts, the first to recover damages for breach of a written contract dated May 25, 1908, and the second upon an account for goods sold and delivered to the Stuart-Howland Company, who will hereafter be called the defendant. * * * The second is a cross-action brought by the defendant against the plaintiffs. The declaration in this action contains one count for damages arising from the general breach of the contract.

The contract provided in substance for the appointment of the defendant as the exclusive agent for the New England states for the plaintiffs' entire line of rigid iron conduit for a period of two years, with a privilege of written cancellation by either party on sixty days' notice, and an absolute privilege of cancellation on the part of the defendant by giving written notice. The plaintiffs quoted "a discount of 50, $\frac{1}{10}$ s & 5" from its regular published list, the price, however, to be raised or lowered according to market conditions, but the defendant always to be allowed a 5 per cent. preference below the price quoted by the "Associated Manufacturers." The controversy centers about an order given by the defendant to the plaintiffs on December 12, 1908, for twenty-five carloads of conduit, to be shipped to Boston unless otherwise directed, "prices not to be higher than last shipment." There was evidence tending to show that the order was not intended for immediate delivery nor delivery before January 1, 1909. On October 27, 1908, the plaintiffs had written the defendant withdrawing all outstanding prices on conduit and submitting a schedule of higher prices for goods to be shipped after December 31, 1908. The chief issue between the parties was whether upon all the evidence the plaintiffs were bound to accept the defendant's order of December 12 at the lower price, or whether they were justified in refusing to accept it unless at the higher price. There was much correspondence over this order and there were efforts at compromise of the differences. These were without avail and in May, 1909, the plaintiffs brought their action. * * *

There was no error in the denial of the defendant's requests 10 and 32, to the effect that, if the refusal by the plaintiffs to accept the defendant's order of December 12, 1908, was a breach of the contract between the parties, then the plaintiffs could not recover for the goods sold and delivered. It is a general rule that, where one breaks a contract to be performed for an entire price, he cannot recover on the contract, because he has not performed it,⁷⁹ nor on a quantum meruit, because his voluntary failure to complete his agreement prevents recovery, save in restricted instances where there has been an honest intention to go by the contract. Homer v. Shaw, 177 Mass. 1, 58 N. E. 160, s. c., 212 Mass. 113, 98 N. E. 697. A willful default in the performance of a stipulation not going to the essence of the whole contract bars recovery. Sipley v. Stickney, 190 Mass. 43, 76 N. E. 226, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 469, 112 Am. St. Rep. 309, 5 Ann. Cas. 611; Douglas v. Lowell, 194 Mass. 268, 273, 80 N. E. 510; *Bowen v. But this principle is not applicable to the facts here disclosed. The ⁷⁹ "If there is anything well settled, it is that the party who commits the first breach of a contract cannot maintain an action against the other for a subsequent failure to perform. Loudenback v. Tennessee Phosphate Co., 121 Fed. 298, 58 C. C. A. 220, 61 L. R. A. 407. The defendant has not kept its contract, and shows no excuse for its breach. It is therefore in no position to demand that the plaintiff should go on and perform or answer for its refusal to recognize the contract as in force." Sanders, J., in Bradley v. Nevada-California-Oregon Ry., 42 Nev. 411, 178 Pac. 906, 908-909 (1919).

Where the plaintiff, a contractor, had intentionally failed to comply with the specifications in many respects, so that the architect refused to give him a certificate, but sought to recover because he had substantially performed, it was held, that "Under this state of the proof he is not entitled to the benefit of the equitable doctrine of substantial performance. That doctrine 'is intended for the protection and relief of those who have faithfully and honestly endeavored to perform their contracts in all material and substantial particulars, so that their right to compensation may not be forfeited by reason of mere technical, inadvertent, or unimportant omissions or defects. It is incumbent on him who invokes its protection to present a case in which there has been no willful omission or departure from the terms of his contract.' Gillespie Tool Co. v. Wilson, 123 Pa. 19, 16 Atl. 36." Smyth, C. J., in Turner v. Henning, (App. D. C.), 262 Fed. 637, 638 (1920).

instant contract has a double aspect; one was exclusive agency by the defendant for two years for one kind of goods manufactured by the plaintiffs; the other was sales of goods from time to time by the plaintiffs to the defendant at prices to be fixed by agreement of the parties, but in any event with at least a five per cent. preference over other manufacturers. So far as the successive sales are concerned, they are severable and each is a contract of sale by itself. Young & Conant Mfg. Co. v. Wakefield, 121 Mass. 91; West End Mfg. Co. v. Warren Co., 198 Mass. 320, 326, 84 N. E. 488; Badger v. Titcomb, 15 Pick. 409, 26 Am. Dec. 611; Raphael v. Reinstein, 154 Mass. 178, 28 N. E. 141; Bowker v. Hoyt, 18 Pick. 555; Barlow Mfg. Co. v. Stone, 200 Mass. 158, 86 N. E. 306; Knight v. New England Worsted Co., 2 Cush. 271, 290. Breach of the agency aspect of the contract arising from failure to honor orders for goods sent by defendant to the plaintiffs in accordance with the contract would not alone prevent recovery by the plaintiffs for goods already sold and delivered. * * *

This was a suit by summary process on a written contract, in these words: "On or before December 25th, 1827, I promise to pay or cause to be paid unto Daniel Hull, or holder, $50, to be discharged in a horse, for value received of him August 14th, 1826." This paper was signed by the defendant, and delivered to Daniel Hull, who subsequently transferred it, by delivery, to the plaintiff.

The day after that specified for payment of the money or delivery of a horse, the defendant went in search of Hull to tender a horse; but Hull having removed, he was unable to make the tender. Subsequently on being apprised that the contract had been transferred to the plaintiff, the defendant went to him and tendered a horse in satisfaction, which the plaintiff refused to accept, on the ground that he had the right to elect, and he preferred the money.

The presiding judge held, that, as to Hull, the right of election was in the defendant, by the terms of the contract; and the plaintiff could claim no higher right than Hull, although he might have taken the note as one for the payment of money; that the tender of a horse to the plaintiff was consequently a performance of the defendant's contract, and discharged the plaintiff's right of action. His honor, therefore, ordered a nonsuit; which the plaintiff now moved to set aside.

JOHNSON, J. The question, whether the note, on which this action was brought, was, or was not, transferable by delivery, so as to enable the plaintiff to maintain an action on it in his own name, does not appear to have been made in the court below, and cannot therefore be considered here; and I concur with the presiding judge, in the opinion, that the plaintiff stood in no better situation, with respect to his power to accept, or refuse the horse, when tendered, than the original payee would, if the note had not been transferred, but the tender had been made to himself, and the action brought in his name. So that the only question is, whether the plaintiff was, or was not, bound to accept the horse when tendered.

I take it that the rule is very clear, that when one contracts in the alternative to do one of two things by a given day, he has, until the day is past, the right to elect which of them he will perform; but if he suffer the day to elapse without performing either, his contract is broken, and his right of election is lost. The present case sufficiently illustrates the reason of the rule. The payee of the note might reasonably calculate upon the value of a horse, at a particular day. He might want him at that time for a particular purpose. But if it were left to the defendant, at his election, to deliver a horse at any indefinite period afterward, he might select that time, at which the value of horses would be most depreciated; and thus gain an advantage inconsistent with his contract. The note in question was due on December 25th, 1827, and this action was brought in October, 1828. The tender is said to have been made shortly before, so that at least eight months had elapsed before the tender was made. The plaintiff was not bound to accept; and a new trial must therefore be granted.

AMOS J. DAWLEY, JUN., v. EARL H. POTTER.

STINESS, J. This suit is based upon the following offer:

"PROVIDENCE, July 12, 1892.

"JOHN A. DAWLEY, Esq.

"Dear Sir:—I will agree to give you two hundred and fifty dollars ($250.00) for a foal of 1893, by Aristocrat, out of Empress, provided

⁸⁰ "The defendant * * * had his election to pay the $400 at the end of six months, or account, or to pay the $600 at the end of one year, or account for the profits; but having totally failed, he has lost his election, and the plaintiff may now elect for himself. This is a settled principle. The case of 13 Edw. IV., pl. 12, and which is abridged in Bro., Dette, pl. 159, established this rule. That was debt upon an obligation to pay £20 or 20 bales of wool, and the plaintiff demanded the £20. Pigot and Brian, JJ., held, that before the day of payment, the obligor had his election to tender which of them he would, but that after the day of payment, and no tender made, the obligee had his election to demand which he would. But Brian, J., admitted, that if a man such colt is a filly, all right and sound at five months' old, well marked, with no white on front feet, should you wish to sell her.

"Very truly,

"EARL H. POTTER."

A filly was born May 12, 1893, which became five months old October 12, 1893. The declaration and evidence showed that the consideration was a sale by the defendant to the plaintiff of the mare with a foal for the sum of $450, coupled with this offer, and the first ground of exception is the admission of testimony to that effect. We see no valid objection to it. Its evident purpose was to show that the offer was not a mere voluntary offer, which could be revoked at any time, but that it was founded upon a consideration which kept it alive according to its terms.

The main question, therefore, comes upon the proper construction of the proposal. The court instructed the jury that the plaintiff had a reasonable time after the expiration of the five months within which to signify his intention to sell the colt to the defendant pursuant to his offer. We think that this instruction was correct. By the terms of the offer the plaintiff could not make the sale until it appeared that the condition could be satisfied at the end of five months, and he was then to determine whether he wished to sell or not. This is enough to show that the contract was not to be consummated upon the very day that the time for determining the conditions expired, and to take the case out of that class of cases where the time is fixed for the performance of the contract, e.g., Ives v. Armstrong, 5 R. I. 567, and where time is of the essence of the contract. Hicks v. Aylsworth 13 R. I. 562; Potts v. Whitehead, 20 N. J. Eq. 55; Maclay v. Harvey, 90 Ill. 525.

This contract is silent as to the time of performance, and fixes only the time for the determining conditions upon which a sale shall be based. We do not think that the contract shows an intention of the parties to complete the whole transaction on the last day of the five months. In such a case the sale and delivery may be completed within a reasonable time. 2 Chitty on Contracts, 11th. Am. ed. 1062, and note.

be bound to pay £20 at Easter, or £10 at Michaelmas, here, although he paid not at the first day, he can pay at the second day. In Dyer, 18 a, Baldwin and Englefield, JJ., recognized the same doctrine; and the cases cited from Cro. Eliz. and Cro. Jac. are to the same effect." Per Curiam in McNitt v. Clark, 7 Johns (N. Y.) 465, 466-467 (1811).

⁶¹ Where the time for performance depends upon when the contract comes into existence, the problem is primarily one of offer and acceptance. The performance problem, however, also calls for determination.

JOHN W. PEAD v. LARKIN T. TRULL, ADMINISTRATOR.

HOLMES, J. This is an action of contract upon an indenture by which, in consideration of the plaintiff Pead's covenant, Whitman covenanted to convey certain land to Pead within forty-five days, and Pead, in consideration of Whitman's covenant, covenanted to convey certain land to Whitman within forty-five days, and further covenanted to pay him fifteen hundred dollars upon receiving a deed of Whitman's land; and to give Whitman a note for three thousand dollars secured by second mortgage on the Whitman land and to assume and pay a first mortgage with interest from the date of the conveyance to him. Then followed mutual covenants to pay five hundred dollars as indemnity and liquidated damages in case of failure to perform the agreement. Before the forty-five days elapsed Whitman died, and on the last day, no administrator having been appointed, the plaintiff, to save his rights, tendered performance on his side to the widow of Whitman and to the defendant Trull, who had been Whitman's attorney in other matters and who afterwards was appointed administrator, but, apart from other technical difficulties, the deed tendered by the plaintiff ran to Whitman, the dead man.

It appears to us that the covenants ought to be construed as mutually dependent. There is some little suggestion of independence to be drawn from them, but nothing on the whole strong enough to overcome the presumption that in an exchange performance on the two sides is to be concurrent. Goodisson v. Nunn, 4 T. R. 461. In actions upon such covenants the plaintiff must show performance on his side, or readiness to perform, and a refusal by the other party. Brown v. Davis, 138 Mass. 458; Hapgood v. Shaw, 105 Mass. 276, 279; Smith v. Boston & Maine Railroad, 6 Allen, 262, 273. But in a case like the present, under our statutes the administrator was the natural and proper person to perform the contract, as he was the one to receive the money from the plaintiff. Pub. Sts. c. 142, § 1. It was impossible to demand performance of him, or to offer it to him within the forty-five days, and therefore the plaintiff was not in default for not having done so, and the contract was not discharged at the end of that time. Of course the contract was not discharged by the death of a party.

The plaintiff's tender, although defective as such, is evidence that he was ready and willing to perform and that the administrator knew that he was. But it did not put the administrator in default. All that appears is that the latter has not caused the land to be conveyed to the plaintiff. It does not appear that he ever has repudiated the agreement. On the other hand, it does not appear that the plaintiff ever has renewed his offer since the administrator was appointed. Assuming as we do that the plaintiff had a right to demand performance within a reasonable time after the appointment of an administrator, it does not appear that the judge has not found that he suffered more than a reasonable time to elapse, and so lost his rights. We are compelled by the terms of the report to direct a judgment on the finding. If in fact the finding was based solely on the ground that the plaintiff had lost his rights at the end of forty-five days, that ground is insufficient, and the rescript of this court will not prevent an application to the judge who heard the case to reopen the cause, or to enter what judgment he deems proper under this decision. Platt v. Justices of the Superior Court, 124 Mass. 353, 355; Kenerson v. Colgan, 164 Mass. 166.

BUTLER v. MANNY.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, 1873. 52 Mo. 497.)

Action for breach of covenant in a lease to pay the value of improvements. The court, a jury being waived, found for the plaintiffs, rendering judgment in their favor for $1,500.00. Defendant appealed.

VORIES, J.† * * * It is contended by the defendant, that the covenant to pay rent and taxes on the part of the lessee, and the covenant to pay for the permanent improvements at the expiration of the lease, were mutual dependent covenants, and that if any part of the rent or taxes remained unpaid at the expiration of the lease, that the lessee could not recover for said improvements. By the terms of the lease, the lessee agrees to pay the rent semi-annually for ten years, to be paid on the first day of July and January of each year, and he also agrees to pay the taxes and assessments, but no time is fixed by the lease for the payment of the taxes, it is therefore left to the presumption that they will be paid as they became due; these covenants do not depend at all upon the covenant of the lessor to pay for the improvements after the lease has expired, but they are necessarily independent of such covenants, and may be sued on when broken, without any reference to the performance by the lessor of his covenants to pay for the improvements at the expiration of the term; and again, these covenants to pay the rents by installments and to pay taxes, each only goes to a part of the consideration of the performance of the contract on the part of the lessor, and cannot therefore be mutually dependent covenants; covenants to be dependent must be mutual, and go to the entire consideration. (Smith v. Busby, 15 Mo. 387; Bennett v. Pixley,

† The brief statement as to the action is summarized from the opinion. Part only of the opinion is given.

7 John 249; 1 Saunders, 320; 30 John., 15; 15 Pick., 546.) The mere recital in the lease, that the agreements in the lease to be performed by the lessees being performed, the lessor will at the expiration of the lease pay for the improvements, etc., does not have the effect to make independent covenants in the lease, dependent;⁸³ these covenants, if violated at any time, can be sued on, and their violation compensated for in damages, and the lessor has expressly provided in the lease for the securing of the performance of these covenants, by providing that if the rent remains unpaid for sixty days he may exact double rent, or that if either the rent or the taxes shall remain unpaid, the lessor at his option may forfeit the lease. These provisions show that the covenants to pay rent and taxes are independent of the covenant to pay for the improvements at the termination of the lease. * * *

⁸³ See Edge v. Boileau, 16 Q. B. D. 117 (1885), where a similar decision was made without any apparent appreciation of the fact that there was express condition language in the lease.

⁸⁴ We have seen that in the case of an ordinary bilateral contract a breach by one party of a material promise made by him, if that breach is so serious as to defeat the other party's justifiable expectations in making the contract to such an extent that it must be deemed to the essence, will justify the disappointed party in refusing to go on with performance on his part. But in many jurisdictions that doctrine has not received general application to leases, because leases with mutual covenants are not merely contracts but conveyances and so are treated conservatively. Consequently in a number of jurisdictions leases are governed by the general rule that stipulations not expressly made conditions are independent (1 Tiffany on Landlord & Tenant, sec. 51), though that rule is subject to various exceptions, mostly covered by actual or "constructive" eviction, and in addition the courts applying it seem occasionally to forget it and imply dependency. See, for instance, Sigmund v. Newspaper Co., 82 Ill. App. 178. Where, however, there are unusual covenants, the courts are more likely to enforce the equitable defenses fictitiously known as conditions implied in law, i. e., to find that the covenants are dependent. An instance of that kind is University Club v. Deakin, 265 Ill. 257 (1914), commented upon in 10 Ill. L. Rev. 61. In that case, an action by a landlord for rent, it was held to be a defense to the tenant, who had moved out, that he did so because the landlord violated a covenant not to lease during the term any other store in the building to any tenant making a specialty of selling certain goods sold by the defendant.

If the landlord actually evicts the tenant, the obligation to pay rent not previously due is suspended during the eviction, even though the eviction is of only part of the premises and the tenant retains the remainder.

"The rule contended for by the defendant that an eviction from a part of the premises suspends the rent in its entirety is established by the great weight of authority not only in England, but in this country. Mirick v. Hopkin, 118 Mass. 582; Fifth Ave. Bldg. Co. v. Kernochan (N. Y.) 117 N. E. 579; Kuschinsky v. Flanigan, 170 Mich. 245, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 430 and note, Ann. Cas. 1914 A. 1228." Powers, J., in Powell v. Merrill, 92 Vt. 124, 103 Atl. 259, 261 (1918).

In the case of constructive eviction, due to premises becoming untenable through breach of the landlord's covenant to keep them in repair—and it is

DANIEL G. LEAVITT v. CHARLES G. FLETCHER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1865. 10 Allen 119.)

Contract brought by a lessee against a lessor to recover damages for a breach of the covenant to repair. The material portions of the lease and the agreed facts upon which the case was submitted to the determination of the whole court are stated in the opinion.

GRAY, J. By the indenture upon which this action is brought the defendant "does lease, demise, and let" to the plaintiff a brick stable standing on the lessor's own land, and a wooden carriage-house standing on land held by him under a lease from others, with a provision that if they shall require the termination of that lease and the removal of the carriage house, the plaintiff may terminate this lease. The lessor "agrees to make all necessary repairs on the outside of said building." The lessee agrees to pay a certain rent monthly, and to quit and deliver up the premises to the lessor at the end of the term "in as good order and condition, reasonable use and wearing thereof, fire and other unavoidable casualties excepted, as the same now are or may be put into by the said lessor;" not to make or suffer any waste thereof; and "that the lessor may enter to view and make improvements, and to expel the lessee, if he shall fail to pay the rent as aforesaid, or make or suffer any strip or waste thereof. And said lessee is to make all necessary repairs on the inside of the building at his own expense."

The brick stable is the building mentioned in the lease next before the lessor's covenant to make outside repairs; but we have no doubt that this covenant includes all the premises leased by the defendant to the plaintiff, the carriage-house as well as the stable. Indeed in the duplicate indenture in the hands of the defendant the plural word "buildings" is substituted for "building" in this covenant.

The facts agreed by the parties are as follows: The carriage-house necessary for the tenant to move out to make a complete demonstration of untenantability—the liability for rent also ends. And in at least one state that has been so by statute even in the absence of an express covenant by the landlord. May v. Gillis, 169 N. Y. 330 (1901).

On the effect of nonhabitability of leased dwelling or apartment, see 4 A. L. R. 1453, note.

In Oppenheimer v. Szulerecki, 297 Ill. 81, 86 (1921), Dunn, J., for the Illinois Supreme Court said, that "Counsel on both sides agree in their briefs that the remedies available to a tenant on the breach of his landlord's covenant to repair are correctly stated in Cromwell v. Allen, 151 Ill. App. 404, as follows: 'In case a landlord fails to make repairs in violation of his covenant the tenant may (1) abandon the premises if they become untenantable by reason of want of repair; (2) he may make the repairs himself and deduct the cost from the rent; (3) he may occupy the premises without repair and recoup his damages in an action for rent; (4) he may sue for damages for breach of the covenant to repair, and the damage recoverable in this last instance is usually the difference between the value of the premises in repair and out of repair.'" was a frame covered with matched boards, had a shingled roof and a plank floor, and on the inside was left uncovered by lath or plaster. While the plaintiff was occupying the premises under the lease, a quantity of snow accumulated upon the roof of the carriage-house, until, at the close of a heavy snow storm, the carriage-house fell from the weight of snow, crushing and injuring the plaintiff's carriages kept therein. The plaintiff afterwards demanded of the defendant that he should restore and rebuild the carriage-house, but the defendant refused to do so. There is nothing in the case to show that any negligence of either party contributed to the accident.

For five months succeeding the fall of the carriage-house, the plaintiff paid to the defendant, under protest, the rent reserved in the lease; and then, ceasing to pay rent, was ejected by the defendant. The lessee's covenant to pay rent was not affected by the injury to the premises, nor limited by the exception of unavoidable casualty in his subsequent covenant, and is independent of the lessor's covenant to make outside repairs. Belfour v. Weston, 1 T. R. 310; Hare v. Groves, 3 Anstr. 687; Kramer v. Cook, 7 Gray, 550, and cases cited. And it is not now denied that the lessee was rightly required to pay rent, and lawfully ejected for failing to pay.

The lessee in this action claims damages, 1st, for the injury occasioned by the fall of the carriage-house; 2dly, for the failure of the lessor to rebuild it, after being expressly requested so to do.

It is well settled that in a lease of real estate no covenant is implied that the lessor shall keep the premises in repair or otherwise fit for occupation. Dutton v. Gerrish, 9 Cush. 89; Foster v. Peyser, id. 242, and cases cited; Welles v. Castles, 3 Gray, 326. The express covenant of the defendant in this case is only "to make all necessary repairs on the outside of the building." He does not covenant that the outside shall not give way, but that, if it does, he will repair it. He cannot therefore be held liable for the damages occasioned by the fall of the building.

But it has been the established rule of the common law for ages that an express covenant to repair binds the covenantor to make good any injury which human power can remedy, even if caused by storm, flood, fire, inevitable accident, or the act of a stranger. Yearbook 40 Ed. III. 6; Dyer, 33 a; Paradine v. Jane, Aleyn, 27; s. c. Style, 47; Compton v. Allen, Style, 162; Bullock v. Dommitt, 6 T. R. 650; Green v. Eales, 2 Q. B. 225; s. c. 1 Gale & Dav. 468; Phillips v. Stevens, 16 Mass. 238; Bigelow v. Collamore, 5 Cush. 231; Allen v. Culver, 3 Denio, 294; Dermott v. Jones, 2 Wallace, 7, 8. The defendant's covenant contains no exception of natural causes or inevitable accident. "The outside of the building" includes the whole outer shell of the building, or external inclosure of roof and sides. Green v. Eales, above cited. "The necessary repairs on the outside" are those which will make the building outwardly complete. When those are made, then, and not before, the lessee will be bound by his covenant "to make all necessary repairs on the inside." The fact that rebuilding the outside will so far replace the whole building as to leave very little to be done on the inside, and thus make the performance of the lessee's covenant very easy, does not in any degree excuse the lessor from first performing his covenant. The defendant is therefore responsible for the damages suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant's refusal to rebuild, from the time of that refusal until the ejection of the plaintiff for not paying his rent; and according to the agreement of the parties the case must stand for the assessment of those damages.

Judgment for the plaintiff accordingly.

MORSE ET AL. v. MOORE.

13 L. R. A. 224, 23 Am. St. Rep. 783.)

This was an action of assumpsit to recover for two cargoes of ice under a written contract. The verdict was for the plaintiffs, for the full contract price, with interest. The defendant excepted.

PETERS, C. J.⁸⁵ The controversy in this case grows out of an agreement between plaintiffs and defendant, made and delivered in this state, which runs as follows: "This agreement, made and entered into this seventh day of January, 1888, by and between Morse & Sawyer, of Bath, Maine, of the first part, and Warner Moore, of Richmond, Va., of the second part, witnesseth:

"That the said parties of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar to them in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby sell and agree to deliver at their wharves at Water Cove, (Cape Small Point, opposite Burnt Coal island, as seen in Coast Chart No. 6, from four to six miles west of Seguin Island light house,) Maine, after the ice has become twelve inches in thickness, of good quality, during the months of January or February, 1888, two thousand tons of good, clear, merchantable ice, not less than twelve inches in thickness, to be weighed by a sworn weigher, with all the proper fitting material necessary for the voyage included, at the price or rate of forty cents per ton of two thousand pounds. Each cargo to be paid for on presentation of sight draft or note for thirty days or sixty days, as may suit party of second part, for the amount accompanying bill of lading and weigher's certificate of said cargo. Cakes to be twenty-two by thirty inches."

The ice delivered under this contract was shipped to Richmond, Va.,

where the defendant resides, to be sold in that market to his customers. It was to be paid for according to its weight and quality at the port of shipment in Maine, any deterioration of the article during transit being at the risk of the purchaser.

The first question submitted to the jury was whether the ice had been accepted by the defendant or not, and that was decided in favor of the plaintiffs.

That brought up the question whether having accepted the ice, the defendant could rely on a breach of the warranty of the quality of the ice to reduce the claim of the plaintiff, who sues in this action of indebitatus assumpsit for the contract price; the defendant alleging that the ice was not, at the time and place of delivery in Maine, of the quality called for by the contract.

The judge presiding, being of the impression that such a defense might be admissible in case of an executed agreement containing warranty, but not where the agreement is executory, ruled out the defense as a matter of law. It is to be noticed that the ruling was without qualification, admitting of no inquiry into the circumstances in which the ice was accepted. It determines that an acceptance in a case of this kind (in the absence of fraud, of course) absolutely terminates the obligation of the vendor. The judge further ruled that "when the defendant took [that is, by a hired carrier] the property and carried it away the property passed to him."

Our examination of this question leads us to the conclusion that the position of the defendant was well taken, and that the alleged defense should have been permitted to him.

That there is a warranty or a condition precedent amounting to warranty in the contract, there can be no doubt. Such a warranty will be found to be variously characterized in the books as executory warranty, a condition precedent amounting to warranty, in the nature of warranty, with the effect of warranty, equal to warranty, and the like. It is immaterial, for present purpose, whether it be regarded as an express warranty or an express condition implying warranty, as the effect must be the same. One kind within its limit is not a more potential ingredient in a contract than the other, the difference between them being only in the style of agreement to which they may be annexed. An express warranty may be also special, however. It is now well settled by the authorities generally—our own cases included—that a sale of goods by a particular description of quality imports a warranty that the goods are or shall be of that description; a warranty which becomes a part of the contract if relied upon at the time by the purchaser. Bryant v. Crosby, 40 Me. 9; Randall v. Thornton, 43 Me. 226; Hillman v. Wilcox, 30 Me. 170; Gould v. Stein, 149 Mass. 570, 22 N. E. Rep. 47, and cases cited. Here there is a clear description of both the kind and quality of the ice,—the quality to be merchantable.

It was conceded at the trial that the position relied on by the defense would be legitimate were it an executed, instead of executory, contract that contained the warranty. Why should there be the difference? Certain early New York cases, which will be further considered hereafter, by which the rule given at the trial is more or less supported, give as a reason for the rule that in an executory contract any article of a particular quality may be tendered in the performance of the contract, and the vendee must see if the article agrees with the terms of the contract, while in an executed sale the agreement is that a particular article actually delivered possesses the quality stipulated for. This undoubtedly expresses correctly the distinction between the classes of contract, but it does not impress us that there should be such an essential difference in their effect. The reason is not palpable why the vendee in the one case more than in the other should have to see that he receives only merchantable articles when a delivery is made. It seems inconsistent that the warranty, which is a part of either contract, should terminate at delivery in one contract and not in the other. Each vendor makes virtually the same warranty, and the two vendors at the point of delivery would appear to stand upon common ground. The seller in an executory contract agrees to do what the seller in an executed contract has already done. When he tenders the articles that he has agreed to deliver, such articles become particularized and identified; and he then represents that such particular and identified articles possess the quality stipulated for by his executory agreement. The terms of the contract of sale become the terms of the sale. The condition precedent becomes a warranty. Prof. Wharton (Whart. Cont. § 564) expresses the idea in these words: "A substantial, though partial (defective) performance of a condition precedent, followed by acceptance on the other side, transmutes the condition precedent into a representation, (implying warranty,) not barring a suit on the contract, though leaving ground for a cross-action for damages."

Executory and executed contracts are very much alike in the elements that enter into them. There are executory steps in all executed contracts. A bargain precedes the sale. If there be a warranty, that is usually first a part of the bargain, and afterwards of the sale. So in an executory contract the warranty is part of the agreement of sale, and at delivery a part of the sale. Many contracts commonly spoken of as executed contracts are really wholly or partially executory. All orders for goods, whether for present or future delivery, are of an executory nature. All sales by sample are such. The author of Smith's Leading Cases (8th Ed., vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 339) says in discussing this distinction: "Where the vendor agrees to sell goods of a certain kind, without designating or referring to any specific chattel, the contract is essentially executory, whether it purports to be a present transfer or a mere undertaking to deliver at a future period, and the right of property does not pass until the merchandise is delivered to or set apart for the purchaser." Every contract is executory on the one side or the other until the party has done what he has agreed to do.

The fact of acceptance, however, as a matter of evidence, may have great weight on the question of satisfactory or sufficient performance. In the first place, it raises considerable presumption that the article delivered actually corresponded with the agreement. In the next place, it is some evidence of a waiver of any defect of quality, even if the article did not so correspond; evidence of more or less force according to the circumstances of the case. If the goods be accepted without objection at the time or within a reasonable time afterwards, the evidence of waiver, unless explained, might be considered conclusive. But if, on the other hand, objection is made at the time, and the vendor notified of the defects, and the defects are material, the inference of waiver would be altogether repelled. But acceptance accompanied by silence is not necessarily a waiver. The law permits explanation, and seeks to know the circumstances which induced acceptance. It might be that the buyer was not competent to act upon his own judgment, or had no opportunity to do so, or declined to do so as a matter of expediency, placing his dependence mainly, as he has a right to do, upon the warranty of the seller. Upon this question the facts are generally for the jury, under the direction of the court.

The law of waiver more commonly applies to things that are not essential to a substantial execution of the contract; often such as relate to the time, place, or manner of performance, or that affect merely the taste or fancy, perhaps, and are such departures from literal performance as do not bring loss or injury upon the purchaser. Baldwin v. Farnsworth, 10 Me. 414; Lamb v. Barnard, 16 Me. 364.

We think the rule invoked by the defendant a just one. Speaking generally, it is the safer rule for both buyer and seller. The opposite rule imposes on either of them very great responsibility and risk. It might be ruinous to a vendee, who is in urgent need of an article, not to accept it, although even much inferior in quality to the description contained in the contract. Certainly it should not be considered a hardship to a seller to require of him a compliance with his contract, or damages for his non-compliance.

The present case illustrates the justness of the rule, if the facts are proved as the defendant alleges them. The plaintiffs agreed to deliver ice, which they warranted should be good, clear, and merchantable. Two cargoes were loaded for shipment to a southern port. Defendant furnished the vessels, though they were probably chartered by the plaintiffs on the defendant's account. There is nothing in the charge of the judge, in the exceptions, or on briefs of counsel, intimating that the defendant ever saw the ice, either by agent or personally, until it arrived in Virginia, or that he was notified to be present, or knew of the delivery at the time of it. It would seem to be a rather stringent construction of the contract that the defendant must watch the loading of cargoes, upon the penalty, if he failed to do so, of having to pay full price for whatever defective ice might be delivered behind his back, after he had taken for his protection, and paying for it in the consideration of the contract, an agreement of warranty in such positive terms. Still it may be that the plaintiffs could legally refuse to deliver the ice unless the defendant after notice should be present to receive it. The cargoes, after reasonable passages, arrived in a very unmerchantable condition. There was no lack of objection or protest from the defendant. He wrote repeatedly, and telegraphed the plaintiffs, expressing his disappointment, and asking their advice as to the disposition of the ice. But no satisfactory answer came. What should he do? There was no possibility of reshipment, nor could the ice be preserved in that climate without the protection that his own ice-houses would afford for such purpose. Storage in any ordinary manner could not possibly save the property. He stored the ice, and sold it by enterprising expedients as rapidly as possible. He alleges that it was late spring ice, of poor texture, and in proximately worthless condition when shipped from Maine. If that can be shown by witnesses and in court at the home of the plaintiffs, it would seem to be an injustice if the defendant is not permitted to make the defense.

Mr. Benjamin, (Benj. Sales 3d Amer. Ed. p. 888,) in allusion to the buyer's remedies after receiving possession of the goods, says he has three remedies against the seller for breach of the warranty of quality: First, the right to reject the goods if the property in them has not passed to him; second, a cross-action for damages for the breach; third, the right to plead the breach in defense to an action by the vendor, so as to diminish the price. These remedies are mentioned without any distinction between kinds of sales. The propositions are general, without any intimation that the procedure does not apply to warranties in executory sales. In the text such a distinction is not even noticed. In the notes to the text, however, it is remarked by the American editor that there are New York decisions inconsistent with the rule stated in the text. The first of these remedies—that of rejecting the goods—seems especially applicable to executory and inapplicable to executed sales, because it precedes acceptance, while in executed sales there has been acceptance, and the title has passed. It is only in executory contracts and contracts that are merely prima facie executed that the title has not passed.

Mr. Benjamin states further that the buyer's remedies are not dependent on his return of the goods, nor is he bound to give notice to the vendor; "but," he adds, "a failure to return the goods or complain of the quality raises a strong presumption that the complaint of defective quality is not well founded." Prof. Parsons, in the text and notes of his work on Contracts, lays down the same legal propositions that Mr. Benjamin does, making not a word of allusion to there being any difference in the application of them between sales executed and sales executory. He also states that if the buyer accepts goods inferior to such as are stipulated for, his continued possession without complaint will be a presumption against him on the question of damages. Pars. Cont. (6th Ed.) *591, and notes.

Mr. Smith, in Leading Cases, in notes to the case of Chandelor v. Lopus, (8th Ed., vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 294,) discusses and fully indorses the same rules, as deducible from the authorities, and he and the editors in the last American edition of that work cite and compare a great many of the decided cases on the subject, and they give no recognition to a distinction between executed and executory contracts in the application of such remedies. We quote a few passages from their comments: "When specific property is referred to, still, if the reference be through the medium of a sample, the contract will be so far executory as to fail of effect unless the bulk of the commodity corresponds with the sample." "Nor will his [buyer's] right to indemnity or compensation necessarily end on his acceptance and use of the goods with full knowledge of the defect, but he will be entitled to bring suit on the contract, and receive damages for the breach of the implied engagement that the bulk of the commodity should correspond with the sample exhibited at the time of the sale." In the case at bar there was an ideal or descriptive sample—a description equivalent to the exhibition of a sample. There can be no doubt that, if the vendee may bring an action of his own on the contract, he can as well defend against an action brought upon the contract by the vendor. "The right of the vendee to rely on the breach of warranty, or a failure to comply with the terms of an executory contract, as a defense to an action for the purchase money may now be regarded as established in England and in most of the courts in this country." "The course of decision at the present day tends towards the position that a partial failure of consideration may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages, even when the original contract remains in full force, and the suit is expressly or impliedly founded upon it." "In the case of Withers v. Greene, 9 How. 213, the Supreme Court of the United States receded from the ground taken in Thornton v. Wynn, 12 Wheat. 183, by holding that a partial failure of consideration, growing out of fraud or breach of warranty, may be set up as a defense to an action brought by the vendor. The same rule applies to sales under an executory contract or by sample, and the buyer may rely on the deficiency of value resulting from the failure of the property sold to correspond with the terms of the contract as a reason why he should not be compelled to pay the price in full. Mondel v. Steel, 8 Mees. & W. 858; Babcock v. Trice, 18 Ill. 420; Dailey v. Green, 15 Pa. St. 118." * * *

The length of this opinion reasonably precludes further discussion of points that may be regarded as merely theoretical. Whether, in the present case, it be a condition or a warranty, and that might be at the election of the defendant to determine as he pleased, we think the defense set up to the action should have been heard upon the ground of a breach of condition, or of warranty, or upon both grounds. * * *

The New York court held in earlier cases that warranty in an executory contract did not in ordinary circumstances survive delivery and acceptance. But the doctrine grew up from the theory of law, maintained for a great while by that court, that description of quality is not a warranty of quality. In Leading Cases, before cited, it is said, in distinguishing the New York theory from that of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania: "The authorities in New York assume that calling a thing by a particular name, or designating as of a certain quality, is no evidence of a warranty or contract that it should be as described." Certainly a thing cannot survive that does not exist. Wilde, J., in Henshaw v. Robins, 9 Metc. (Mass.) 90, declared upon that ground that the authorities in New York were without influence upon the question of effect of acceptance in Massachusetts, saying: "Opposed to these authorities are the cases in New York; but these were determined on the assumption that there was no warranty express or implied, and they therefore have no bearing on the question as to the effect of the inspection of the goods sold by the purchaser."

The last-named rule of the New York cases was found to be so much at variance with the authorities elsewhere that in the case of White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, all previous cases which held that warranty did not follow from description of quality were overruled; and, as a natural, if not necessary, consequence thereof, the tendency of that court seems in later cases to have been progressive towards the adoption of the other rule, that acceptance in cases of executory sales with warranty does not preclude the vendee from afterwards claiming damages against the vendee for a breach of the warranty; if the court has not already arrived at that point. There are late cases in that state, of express warranties, the doctrine of which seems to completely vindicate the position of the defendant in the present case, even should he be obliged to stand or fall upon the interpretation of the law of his contract according to the New York authorities. In Brigg v. Hilton, 99 N. Y. 517, 3 N. E. Rep. 51, and in Canning Co. v. Metzger, 118 N. Y. 260, 23 N. E. Rep. 372, it is declared that an express undertaking to deliver in the future articles of a certain quality was an express warranty of such quality when the articles were afterwards delivered,—a warranty that survived an acceptance of the articles delivered; and that the rule would be the same whether the goods were in existence at the time of contract of sale or were to be manufactured.

Upon the authority of these cases the contract in the case at bar contains an express warranty. An express undertaking to produce a thing is an express warranty of the thing produced.

*Exceptions sustained.

CRAIG v. LANE.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1912. 212 Mass. 195, 98 N. E. 685.)

Action by Frank H. Craig against John J. Lane. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant brings exceptions. Overruled.

This was an action of contract for the purchase of three cars of potatoes at 90 cents per bushel.

SHELDON, J. We see no ground on which the exceptions can be sustained. The ruling asked for by the defendant could not have been given; and that is the only question presented.

The defendant's contract was an entire one for the purchase of three cars of potatoes; and it was not severed by the fact that the plaintiff shipped them at different times and drew a separate draft for the alleged contents of each car at the agreed price. We assume without deciding that upon discovering the shortage which he claimed in the load of the first car he might have declined to accept it and rescinded his contract. But he chose not to do this. Instead of doing so he accepted that car load and sold it to a customer of his own, thus putting it beyond his power to return it to the plaintiff. He could not then rescind the contract by reason of the shortage. He must seek his remedy under the contract by way of set-off or recoupment, or by an independent action. Morse v. Brackett, 98 Mass. 205; Mansfield v. Trigg, 113 Mass.

breach of any promise or warranty in the contract to sell or the sale. But if, after acceptance of the goods, the buyer fail to give notice to the seller of the breach of any promise or warranty within a reasonable time after the buyer knows, or ought to know of such breach, the seller shall not be liable therefor." The "But if" qualification is not in the English Sale of Goods Act. The Uniform Sales Act has been adopted by New York, among other states.

In America Theatre Co. v. Siegel & Co., 221 Ill. 145, 147 (1906), Scott, J., for the court, said: "The law does not permit a person to receive goods under a contract, appropriate them to his own use, and then defeat an action for the purchase price on the ground that the goods were not of the exact quality or description called for by the contract. His remedy, in the absence of a warranty, is to refuse to accept the goods when delivered, or to return them within a reasonable time after the departure from the terms of the contract is discovered. Wolf v. Dietzsch, 75 Ill. 205; Tilley v. Enterprise Stove Co., 127 Ill. 147." But in 1915 Illinois adopted the Uniform Sales Act, with the provision quoted supra.

On right of buyer to retain goods and defeat action for price on discovering that goods do not comply with requirements of contract, see 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1167, note.

There seems to be a tendency in the cases to confuse defeating a recovery with recoupment or counterclaim. While the defendant cannot wholly defeat recovery where the goods are of any value, he may take the proper procedural method to get a deduction if he acts with reasonable promptitude. See 2 Williston on Contracts, § 715.

"It is not the law that the acceptance of the performance of one service or duty when two are due is an abandonment of all claim of damages for the service not performed." Stone, C. J., in Dicks v. Belscher, 80 Ala. 369, 371 (1885).

RAUDABAUGH v. HART.

(Supreme Court of Ohio, 1899. 61 Ohio St. 73, 55 N. E. 214, 76 Am. St. Rep. 361.)

Action by Charles F. Hart against I. F. Raudabaugh. The action below was brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract for the sale of certain interests in oil property. Judgment for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial being thereupon overruled, and error prosecuted to the circuit court, that court affirmed the judgment of the common pleas. Raudabaugh brings error to this court to obtain a reversal of both judgments. Reversed.

SPEAR, J.⁶⁸ * * * The contract pleaded was one that contained reciprocal and mutual obligations, and the limit of performance was, by the terms of the agreement, fixed for October 1, 1894. Time was thus made of the essence of the contract, as clearly stated in these words: "Said agreement between plaintiff and defendant contained a condition that defendant would sell said plants and property above set forth to plaintiff, provided the deal was closed by October 1, 1894." Each party was thus duly apprised of the time within which the deal was to be concluded. What, then, was it necessary for either to do in order to put the other in default? With respect to such contracts, Hitchcock, J., in Courcier v. Graham, 1 Ohio, at page 342, observes: " * * * If one party was ready and offered to perform his part, and the other neglected or refused to perform his, he who was ready and offered has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other, though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act." And it would follow that neither party could, in such case, maintain any action upon the contract against the other without offering and proving performance, or a readiness and willingness to perform, and notice to the other party of such readiness and willingness. 1 Warv. Vend. 366. Under the ancient rule a purchaser could not maintain an action for breach of contract without having tendered a conveyance and the purchase money. 1 Sugd. Vend. 366. The later rule, and the one which has always prevailed in this state, is that, in the absence of stipulations in the contract to the contrary, the conveyance is to be prepared and furnished by the vendor; but the ancient rule otherwise [i. e., apart from preparing and tendering a conveyance?], it is believed, has always prevailed here, and is the law today. So long, therefore, as there is no tender of the deed on the one hand, nor of performance on the other, neither party is in default. Irvin v. Bleakley, 67 Pa. St. 28; Leaird v. Smith, 44 N. Y. 618.⁸⁰

To entitle the vendee to demand a deed, he must be ready and offer to comply with the contract on his part, and show ability to perform it. Smoot v. Rea, 19 Md. 398. Whether or not it is necessary to have present and offer, in legal-tender money, the exact sum due, as is required in making tender upon an obligation for the unconditional payment of money, except where waived, it is at least necessary that the purchaser show readiness and ability to comply. Nor does the transaction imply haste, but deliberation, rather. As expressed by Woodworth, J., in Fuller v. Hubbard, 6 Cow. 13: "There is, then, something more to be done than the simple payment or the tender of the purchase money. A conveyance must be demanded. Nor would this alone appear to satisfy the principle of the rule. A reasonable time should be allowed to the vendor to prepare the conveyance. The purchaser not having himself prepared it (which he may do), he shall not be allowed to retire immediately and bring his action, but should present himself to receive the conveyance which he has thus required to be furnished. Deliberation and advice of counsel may be necessary in settling its terms. The framing and execution of modern conveyances, even with us, where the titles to real estate are much less complicated than in England, are not like the payment of money or the delivery of a chattel." The rule here announced is followed in a number of other cases in New York and elsewhere. Wells v. Smith, 2 Edw. Ch. 78; Bruce v. Tilson, 25 N. Y. 196; Fuller v. Williams, 7 Cow. 54; Connelly v. Pierce, 7 Wend. 129; Slocum v. Despard, 8 Wend. 619; Hartley v. James, 50 N. Y. 43; People v. Mills, 17 Cal. 276.

⁸⁰ "In contracts for the purchase and sale of real estate there are important differences between the law of England and the law of this country as to what constitutes performance by the parties respectively. Thus in England the presumption [in the absence of a provision in the contract to the contrary] is that the deed of conveyance is to be prepared by the buyer and tendered to the seller for execution; while in this country [in such case] the presumption is that it is to be prepared by the party who is to execute it. Hence in an action by the seller, it is only necessary in England to aver a readiness and willingness to execute a deed of conveyance; while in this country it is necessary to aver an execution of it and an offer to deliver it. In an action by the buyer, on the other hand, it is necessary in England to aver a tender of a deed of conveyance for execution; while in this country it is only necessary to aver a readiness and willingness and an offer to pay the purchase money upon the delivery of a deed of conveyance." Langdell, Summary of Contracts, § 170.

"In general, where there is a contract to convey to a stranger, it will be construed to be an undertaking on the part of the person contracting to convey, that the stranger shall accept the conveyance, and an offer or tender to convey will not be equivalent to actual performance, as it would be where the conveyance is to be made to a party to the contract. See Co. Litt., 209a." Boyle v. C. J., in Davis v. Parish, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.), 153, 154 (1812).

The case of Smith v. Lewis, reported in 24 Conn. 624, and again in 26 Conn. 110, is authority for the proposition that "the word 'tender,' as used in connection with such a transaction, does not mean the same thing as when used with reference to the offer to pay money where it is absolutely due, but only a readiness and willingness to perform in case of the concurrent performance by the other party, with present ability to do so, and notice to the other party of such readiness."⁹⁰

In Cutter v. Powell, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 12, the rule is given thus: "Where two acts are to be done at the same time, as when A covenants to convey an estate to B on such a day, and in consideration thereof B covenants to pay A a sum of money on the same day, neither can maintain an action without averring a performance, or an offer to perform his own part, though it is not certain which of them is obliged to do the first act; and this particularly applies to cases of sales."

But there seems no doubt as to the rule in this state. * * * Mowry v. Kirk, 19 Ohio St. 375, was an action to recover for nondelivery of certain railroad bonds purchased, in which a recovery was had in the trial court for the difference between the purchase price and the market value of the bonds. This judgment was reversed for error in the charge, and for that, upon the whole case, the judgment should have been for defendant. We quote from the opinion, at page 383: "But the court below further told the jury that when 'the defendant denied the agreement, and refused to perform on his part, this dispensed with the necessity of a tender.' In this we think there was error. I can find no authority to sustain the proposition given to the jury. In the interview between Kirk and Mowry the next morning after the bargain was made, Kirk simply demanded the bonds. He did not offer to pay for them, nor tender payment for them; nor does it even appear that he then had the money to pay for them. His right to demand and have possession of the bonds depended on his making or tendering payment, unless such payment or tender was waived by Mowry. Though the property in the bonds passed by the bargain, the right of possession did not pass without payment or its equivalent, and it seems to us that neither principle nor authority would authorize us to hold that the mere fact of a denial of the contract by the vendor alone amounted to a waiver of a tender of the price of the bonds. The vender might well say to himself, 'I deny the contract to be as it is claimed to be, but, if it be insisted on as claimed, I still have the right to insist on payment before delivery.' And if, in a transaction of this kind, where prompt action was evidently contemplated by both parties, a week's delay occurs in making either tender or payment, a rescission of the contract by the ⁹⁰But it would seem as if an actual tender must be made unless waived by a refusal to accept, or by a failure to call for it, when it is offered by a party able to make his offer good.

With reference to the time of a tender, see Startup v. Macdonald, 6 M. & G. 593 (1843).

mutual consent of both parties may well be presumed in favor of either. Mutual delinquency gives rise to the presumption of mutual assent to a rescission. See Pars. Cont. 667 et seq., and Lewis v. White, 16 Ohio St. 454." And in the syllabus it is held: "The mere facts that the vendor denied having made the contract, and refused to deliver the bonds, did not imply a waiver by him of the vendee's obligation promptly to render payment. The delinquency of the vendee in failing to tender payment for a week after the contract was made gave rise to the conclusive presumption, as against him, of his assent to a rescission of the contract, and authorized the vendor to act on that presumption."

In the light of the rules thus ascertained, what is the attitude of the plaintiff below as shown by the petition? It is stated in the brief of defendant in error that the amended petition alleges "that plaintiff did all things on his part to be done and performed under said contract." Whether, if this were so, it would or not avail the plaintiff, we need not consider, because the allegations of the pleading do not justify this claim. On the contrary, the language is: "Plaintiff further says that from the 21st day of September, 1894, and until and including October 1, 1894, he was ready and willing to do and perform everything to be done by him in the carrying out of said sale and contract; but the defendant, although often requested so to do, has refused to comply with said contract, and has at all times refused to transfer and deliver said property to plaintiff." Of what consequence can this averment be, so long as there was no attempt to apprise the adverse party of such readiness and willingness, no tender of performance on his part, in any way or manner? The fact of readiness to perform, locked up in the breast of plaintiff, could neither give information to defendant, nor entail on him any duty. It is, in law, as though the pleading were without any averment as to willingness and readiness to perform on the plaintiff's part. Nor is this fault aided by the allegation of demand of performance. The allegation of demand is, at best, vague and uncertain. It does not even purport to have been made on or before October 1st. It would not, we think, have availed had it so stated; for, applying the doctrine of Mowry v. Kirk, supra, the defendant had the right to refuse to perform on his part so long as there was no effort at performance on the other side. To hold that a party so circumstanced may put the other party in the wrong by merely demanding of him that he make conveyance of the leasehold interests would be to countenance a scheme smacking of mere bluff. It would be to give him an advantage over his adversary without any show of readiness or ability to perform on his part. We are aware that there is a holding in a sister state that the demand implies that the demandant is himself ready and able to perform. For the reasons above stated, and many others, we cannot assent to the proposition. Nor can it be said, reasonably, that the pleading shows that defendant had put it out of his power to convey. For aught that is alleged, he could have acquired the title, and could have completed the contract on his part, had the plaintiff come forward with the money, or given notice that he was able and ready to perform. In the absence of such action on or prior to October 1st, the defendant might well conclude, as in Mowry v. Kirk, that the contract had, by implied assent, been rescinded.

We are of opinion that the overruling of the demurrer to the amended petition was erroneous, and that both judgments should be reversed. The cause will be remanded to the court of common pleas, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the amended petition, and for further proceedings according to law.

Reversed.

ELIZA ROBINSON v. M. H. HARBOUR.

(High Court of Errors and Appeals of Mississippi, 1869. 42 Miss. 795, 97 Am. Dec. 501, 2 Am. Rep. 671.)

PEYTON, J.⁹¹ In this case it appears that on the 16th day of December, 1859, one John J. Hall bargained and sold to Eliza Robinson certain land, situated in the county of Yallobusha, for the sum of $2,440, one-half of which was paid in cash at the time of the sale, and for the other half she executed her promissory note of that date, payable to the order of said Hall on the 1st day of January, 1861; and that the said John J. Hall at the same time executed and delivered to the said Eliza Robinson his bond, conditioned to make her a title to said land when said note for the balance of the purchase-money was paid, and placed her in possession of the land, which she has retained ever since.

On the 3rd of February, 1860, the said Hall assigned the said note for value to M. H. Harbour, who filed his bill in the Chancery Court of said county of Yallobusha to subject the said land to payment of the said note.

To this bill the defendant, Eliza Robinson, demurred, on the ground of the want of equity on the face of the bill, and that the complainant had not made or tendered to her a deed for the land and demanded the purchase-money, so as to put her in default before filing said bill. The demurrer was overruled by the said court, and the appellant brings the case to this court, and assigns for error the action of the court in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the complainant's bill.

There is no doubt that the vendor of land, who has taken the notes of the vendee and given bond, conditioned to convey the title when the purchase money is paid, can, by an assignment of the notes, pass his lien for the purchase-money, and that the assignee may proceed in equity to subject the land to the payment of his debt. Tanner v. Hieka, 4 S. & M. 294, and Terry v. George, 37 Miss. 539.

The main question presented by the record for our determination is, whether the covenants of the vendor and vendee in this action are dependent or independent covenants? And upon this subject it must be conceded that there has been considerable oscillation of the judicial pendulum, and what is much to be regretted, a great want of uniformity and harmony in the decisions of our own courts.

Knowing the necessity of some certain, intelligible, and correct rules with respect to the construction and character of covenants in agreements, we have given this subject that thorough investigation and mature consideration which its importance demands.

The order of time in which covenants are to be performed is an important consideration in determining whether they are to be dependent or independent. And the rule seems to be clear and indisputable, that where there are several covenants, which are independent of each other, one party may bring an action against the other for breach of his covenants, without averring a performance or tender or offer of performance of the covenants on his part; and it is no excuse for the defendant to allege in his plea a breach of the covenants on the part of the plaintiff. But where the covenants are dependent, it is necessary for the plaintiff to aver and prove a performance, or tender and offer to perform his part of the agreement, and demand performance by the other party of his part of the agreement, to entitle himself to an action for the breach of the covenants on the part of the defendant. The difficulty lies in the application of this rule to the particular case. It is justly observed, that covenants are to be construed to be either dependent or independent of each other, according to the intention and meaning of the parties and the good sense of the case, and technical words should give way to such intention. * * *

Where the vendee of land covenants to pay for the same by instalments, and the vendor covenants to make him a title when the last instalment is paid, the covenants of the vendee to pay the instalments, except the last one, are independent covenants. But the covenant of the vendee to pay the last instalment and the covenant of the vendor to make title, are dependent covenants; and to entitle either of them to maintain an action against the other, he must aver and prove performance or tender or offer of performance of his part of the agreement. The payment of this instalment of the money, and the making of the title, are concurrent acts of the parties, to be done or performed at the same time, and are therefore dependent covenants. This rule is sustained by reason and authority, and accords with the justice of the case and the intention of the parties.

Suppose the whole of the purchase money had been payable at once, instead of being payable in instalments, and the stipulation had been to pay three thousand dollars in twelve months, the deed to be executed at the payment; upon this statement of the question, is there a doubt that the agreements would have been mutually dependent and conditional? And what difference is there, whether the final payment is the whole or part? Where the whole of the purchase money is to be paid at once, and the deed is then to be given, the covenants are held to be dependent, because it is unreasonable to presume that the purchaser intended to pay the whole consideration without having the equivalent in a title to the land purchased. The same reason applies to the last instalment. An obvious reason why the prior instalments should be paid without having a deed, is, that the vendor was to withhold the title, as a security for the purchase money, and the vendee was content to rely on the vendor's contract for his future title; but no such reason applies to the final and complete payment of the purchase money. Whether we consider the particular language, or the general intent of the parties, the covenants between them were mutually dependent and conditional, and the vendor cannot recover without averring performance or an offer to perform on his part. Kane v. Hood, 13 Pick. 281; Runkle v. Johnson, 30 Ill. 328, 332.

This court has repeatedly decided that the vendor of land, who has given a bond to make title to the vendee on the payment of the purchase-money, cannot maintain a bill for the specific performance of the contract until he has put the vendee in default by a tender of a deed. The covenants to make title and to pay the money, are concurrent, mutual and dependent; and neither party can insist on a performance of the contract, without an offer or tender of performance on his part: and this rule applies with equal force in law and equity. Mobley v. Keys, 13 S. & M. 677; Eckford v. Halbert, 30 Miss. 273; Klyce v. Broyles, 37 Miss. 524; and McAlister v. Moye, ib. 258.

Courts will construe covenants to be dependent, unless a contrary intention clearly appears. A party shall not be forced to pay out his money, unless he can get that for which he stipulated. Stockton v. George, 7 How. 172; Peques v. Mosby, 7 S. M. 340, 347; Wadlington v. Hill, 10 S. & M. 560; Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 1 Pet. 455. * * *

It has been held that a covenant to pay a certain sum of money, one-half on a certain day, and the other half on a certain subsequent day, at which time the covenantee was to execute and deliver a deed, so far as respects the first payment, was independent, but as to the other, was dependent; and in an action thereon, the tender of the deed must be averred. So in a declaration for the whole sum, after both instalments have become due. Biddle v. Corgell, 3 Harrison, 377, and Leonard v. Bates, 1 Blackford, 172.

In contracts where either party might be compelled to part with his money or his property, without receiving the stipulated equivalent, the latest and best action of the courts has been to hold that the party seeking to enforce the contract must make his own part of the agreement precedent, and allege either a performance or a tender and refusal.

Wadlington v. Hill, 10 S. M. 562. And a mere offer to make a deed and averment of readiness at all times to make it, will not do. Klyce v. Broyles, 37 Miss. 524.

This principle applies in all cases to the last instalment where the vendee gives the vendor his note to secure the payment of the purchase money, payable at different times, and takes from the vendor a bond for title when the money or last instalment is paid. For it is not to be presumed that the vendee intended to pay his money without receiving the stipulated equivalent in a title to the land purchased, nor that the vendor intended to part with the title to the land sold, without receiving the money. The conveyance and the last payment were intended to be simultaneous acts.

We have arrived at the conclusion, that, in this case, the covenants between the assignor of the appellee and the appellant were dependent covenants, and that the appellee could not maintain his bill without averring and proving a performance of the covenant on the part of the vendor, or tender or offer to perform, before the filing of the bill. The averment in the bill that the assignor of the note is ready and willing to execute a deed on payment of the purchase money is not sufficient to sustain it. And for this reason, we think the court below erred in overruling the demurrer to the bill.

Shackelford, C. J., dissenting, declines to write a dissenting opinion, but refers to the case of Bowen v. Bailey [42 Miss. 405 (1869)], for his views on the question decided in this opinion. The decree must be reversed, the demurrer sustained, and the bill dismissed.

DARIUS RUNKLE AND WILLIAM POLLOCK, APPELLANTS, v. AMOS
M. JOHNSON ET AL., APPELLEES.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1863. 30 Ill. 328, 83 Am. Dec. 191.)

The appellees brought an action of debt to the February term of the Fulton Circuit Court, claiming fifteen hundred dollars debt and five hundred dollars damages. The declaration contains eight counts.

The first count is on a writing obligatory (bearing date 19th June, 1858,) by which appellees sell to appellants certain lands for the sum of $1,500, payable in three instalments of $500 each—$500 on the first day of December, 1858; $500 on the first day of December, 1859; and $500 on the first day of December, 1860—and the time is made the essence of the contract; said payments to be made at the office of the appellees in Vermont, in said county.

Special plea alleging "And the said defendants, for a further plea, in this behalf, say, plaintiffs actio non, because they say that the said causes of action in the said plaintiff's declaration mentioned are one and the same, and not other or different and that the said plaintiffs' cause of action is the writing obligatory in the said first count mentioned; and the said defendants aver that the said plaintiffs, in and by the said writing obligatory, covenant that they will, on the payment of the money mentioned in said writing obligatory, convey to defendants the land in said writing obligatory mentioned, and in and by their deed covenant to warrant the title so conveyed to the said defendants against any person claiming by, through, or under the patentee of said land; and the said defendants aver, that neither at the time of the making of said article of agreement, or at any time since, have the said plaintiffs been the owner of the patent title to said land or had any right or title to the same whatever, nor have the said plaintiffs made or tendered to these defendants any such deed for the same as is mentioned in said declaration. And the said defendants further aver, the title to the land in the said writing obligatory mentioned was the only consideration and object of said contract by the said defendants, so signed as aforesaid.

The appellees filed a general demurrer to the said amended plea, and the court sustained the same, and the defendants abided the demurrer.

At the February term, 1862, a trial was had. The article of agreement, mentioned in first count, was read to the jury, and that was all the evidence in the case. The court then allowed the plaintiffs to enter a nolle prosequi as to the last payment and interest mentioned in the agreement. To which appellants excepted.

Verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs for one thousand dollars debt, and two hundred and seven dollars and fifty cents damages. The defendants bring the case to this court by appeal.

CATON, J.⁹² We think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the defendant's special plea. By the instrument on which the action is brought, the plaintiff agreed to convey to the defendant a particular title to the land described, that is to say, the patent, and it was for this title to the land that the defendant agreed to pay fifteen hundred dollars. And now it is admitted by the demurrer, that the plaintiff never had such title, and is unable to convey to the defendant such a title. Had the plaintiff brought his action for the first two instalments before the time had arrived when the plaintiffs agreed to convey, it may be that the want of title would not have been a sufficient answer, for he might claim the whole time until the contract matured to acquire such title. Harrington v. Higgins, 17 Wend. 376. But the case is different where the party delays his action until the last payment is due, when the obligations under the contract become mutual and dependent, and the acts to be done in its execution are simultaneous. Then the party who insists upon the performance by the other party, must show performance on his own part, while he who desires to rescind the contract, need only show non-performance or an inability to perform by the other party. Doyle v. Teas, 4 Scam. 265. Indeed, this inability to perform, is a good excuse on the part of the purchaser for not tendering the last payment, for the law will not require the performance of a useless act, and would be sufficient to entitle him to recover the money back if he had paid the first instalments. Sir Anthony Mayne's Case, 5 Coke, 21. There can be no difference in principle, whether the party never had the title, or having had it, has parted with it. In either case, it might be competent for him to show that he still owned it in equity, and could control it for the benefit of the purchaser, so that he could in fact perform his covenant. But here it is admitted that the plaintiff never had the title which he professed to sell, and agreed to convey, and this was, at least prima facie, a breach of his covenant the moment the time arrived when he might be called upon to perform it, and this authorized the purchaser to renounce it altogether, and treat it as if it had never existed.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

BRIMMER v. SALISBURY ET AL.

(Supreme Court of California, 1914. 167 Cal. 522, 140 Pac. 30.)

Action by H. W. Brimmer against F. M. Salisbury and another. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff appeals. Reversed with directions.

HENSHAW, J.⁹⁴ This appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone. Plaintiff brought his action to enforce the collection of a ⁹³ In Taul v. Bradford, 20 Tex. 261 (1857), Hemphill, C. J., said:

"As a general rule, it may be sound law, that a covenant on the part of the vendee, to pay the purchase money at a particular date, and of the vendor to convey at some indefinite period, as for instance, after a patent is obtained from the government, are not dependent upon each other, and that the purchaser must pay the money when due, and rely on the covenant of the agreement for his remedy. But can this be the rule where it manifestly appears that there is a valid outstanding title, superior to the claim of the vendor, or which, as long as it is permitted to stand, would prevent the vendor from procuring a patent for his land, and deprive him of the power to convey according to the conditions of his bond? This would involve that circuity of action and multiplicity of suits, so much discountenanced by our law and so repugnant to the genuine and fundamental principles of our system of procedure. * * *

"The case stands on its allegations, as if the plaintiff had at the time of the contract, no knowledge of the difficulties about the title. The vendee in an executory contract may set up the defects of title as a defense against the recovery of the purchase money, and is not bound to allege his ignorance of these defects at the time of the sale. It is for the plaintiff to reply and prove notice of the condition of the title by the defendant."

promissory note in the sum of $500 executed by defendants. Defendants answered, alleging lack of consideration and fraud in the procurement of the instrument. The facts in this regard alleged and found by the court are the following: In 1908 defendants entered into an agreement with the plaintiff to purchase a piece of land owned by plaintiff in Imperial county for the sum of $6,250, $2,500 of which amount was payable May 1, 1909, the remainder at a later date in the same year. On the 27th day of April, 1909, "the plaintiff rescinded the said contract in toto and sold the said property to one A. A. Cox, without the knowledge or consent of the defendants or either of them." Thereafter, on the 29th day of April, 1909, plaintiff came to defendants, who were unable to make the forthcoming payment of $2,500 upon May 1st, and, concealing from them the fact that he had sold the property, threatened them that he would commence an action against them for specific enforcement of their contract to purchase if they did not make the payment when due. The defendants did not know and had no means of knowing that plaintiff had theretofore sold the property to Cox, and being unable to meet the payment of $2,500 due on the 1st of May, and believing that their contract to this effect was in full force and effect and that plaintiff had a right to insist upon its due performance and would bring action against them to enforce such due performance, without any other consideration and so without any consideration at all, they executed to plaintiff in settlement of the controversy and for relinquishment of plaintiff's demands the note for $500 which is the subject of this litigation. Under these findings the court concluded that plaintiff was not entitled to recover and gave judgment for defendants accordingly. Plaintiff has appealed, asserting that under the authorities and rule of decision in this state he was neither in default nor had he violated his contract by the conveyance of the property to Cox; that he was under no duty to advise defendants of this conveyance, and that therefore his failure to do so was not a concealment amounting to fraud; that the single condition imposed upon him by his contract was to make a good and sufficient deed to the defendants when the last payment was due and tendered; that this duty did not run concurrently and interdependently with defendants' obligation to pay the installment of $2,500; that consequently defendants were in default, and he (plaintiff) was not (Hill v. Grigsby, 35 Cal. 656; Civ. Code, § 1439); that notwithstanding the conveyance of the property he had a legal right of action to enforce the instalment payment of $2,500; and that his forbearance so to do and his agreement with defendants to abandon the contract was a good and legal consideration for their promissory note.

Thus are presented the contentions upon this appeal, and for their proper consideration a review of our decisions becomes imperative. The first of these which may be mentioned is Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. 280, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123. * * * The next of these is Joyce v. Shafer, 97 Cal. 335, 32 Pac. 320. * * * Here it is immediately to be noted that a vendor under an executory contract of sale who has title may part with it under two essentially different conditions. He may part with it to a third person, who, if he be not charged with knowledge of the previous executory contract, takes it freed from the obligations of that contract. Such would be the case were the executory contract of sale unrecorded. He may, however, part with his title, subject to the rights of the vendees under the executory contract of sale, and thus not put it beyond his reasonable power to make title to his vendees under the executory contract of sale when in due time title may be demanded of him. In the one case the conduct of the vendor may with propriety be termed a fraud upon the vendee, since he has parted with the title, and consequently with the security upon which his vendee was entitled to rely in the making of his instalment payments, and after having done so he insists that these instalment payments should be continued without any legal assurance to him that, at the time when the vendee is entitled to demand a deed, the vendor will be in a position to convey title. Joyce v. Shafer therefore must be read in connection with Easton v. Montgomery, and bearing in mind that Joyce v. Shafer was before the court upon demurrer the decision amounts to this, that a pleading merely that during the life of such an executory contract of sale the vendor has parted with the title, is not sufficient to put the vendor in default or to show an abandonment by him of the contract. It must be further pleaded that the vendor did this without reserving and protecting his vendee's rights under the executory contract—allegations which did not appear in Joyce's complaint. * * *

The last of our cases is Crane v. Ferrier-Brock Development Co., 164 Cal. 676, 130 Pac. 429. * * *

This completes the review of our decisions, and, to summarize, they hold, first, that a contract to sell a piece of land by one without title will not be held fraudulent and void by virtue of the mere fact that the vendor had not such title. Deceit, concealment, or false representations upon which a vendee was entitled to rely will, of course, avoid such a contract; but where the dealings between the parties are openhanded, and where, as is the general rule, the vendee is charged with the duty of acquiring his own knowledge of the condition of the vendor's title, such contracts will be enforced upon the theory that the vendee contracted with his eyes open and contracted not in the belief that the vendor did have title, but in the expectation that he would be able to make title. Second, our adjudications hold that, in an action for breach of contract based upon a conveyance by the vendor to a third person during the existence of such an executory contract of sale, the averment merely that the vendor has sold does not state a complete cause of action. * * *

The gist of the matter then is this, that a vendee is entitled to rely upon the security of the vendor's title, whatever it may be, in the making of his installment payments. A vendor will not have breached his contract if he shall have conveyed the property subject to or under circumstances such as do protect the rights of his vendee. But where his conveyance has been in disregard of those rights, under such circumstances that those rights are not protected, then this is a breach of contract and a fraud on the vendee. Where a vendee contracts with one having none or an imperfect title, he contracts in the hope or expectation that the vendor may be able to perfect the title. Such is not the case where the vendor has title and thereafter parts with it. Of the essence of the contract is the security to the vendee, in his payments, of the title which the vendor has, and, if the vendor parts with that title to the impairment or destruction of that security, the vendee may be heard justly to complain, and it is, of course, no answer to say that the vendor thereafter may be able to go into the open market and repurchase the property. Common experience tells us that such an expectation is in its nature but a remote possibility and that such a vendor has not the slightest intention of so doing.

Coming once more directly to the case at bar, the question of consideration or no consideration for the promissory note in suit will be answered as is answered the question: Were the vendees' rights under their executory contract protected under the sale which the plaintiff made? Herein it makes no difference whether the sale was made before or after the default of the vendees, and therefore the motion in this case to amend the record by striking from it a certified answer filed in the court of appeals need not be considered. The record here is not in such condition as to enable us to answer the question which we have propounded. The answer, as has been said, charged fraud and lack of consideration. The finding of the court is that the fraud was in the concealment from the defendants of the fact that plaintiff "had previously rescinded the contract and had sold the said property to the said Cox." As we have been at pains to show, the mere sale was not a rescission. The mere concealment could not therefore be a fraud. The vital question is whether the sale to Cox was made in disregard and in sacrifice of defendants' security growing out of plaintiff's ownership of the land. If the sale was so made, then unquestionably there was no consideration for the promissory note and plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. If, however, the sale was made with due regard to those rights, then, as plaintiff would have committed no breach of his contract and no fraud, it could not be said that there was no consideration under plaintiff's forbearance to sue and agreement to rescind the contract.

It appearing therefore that the judgment is not supported by the findings, it is reversed, with direction to the trial court to permit such amendments to the pleadings as will directly present the vital issue in the case, and to retry and determine the action under the law as here set forth.⁹⁵

EDWARD D. JAMES ET AL., APPELLANTS v. JOHN J. BURCHELL, RESPONDENT.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1880. 82 N. Y. 108.)

Appeal from judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas in and for the city and county of New York, affirming a judgment in favor of defendant, entered upon a decision of the court on trial without a jury. (Reported below, 7 Daly, 531.)

This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged failure of defendant to perform a contract.

On January 11, 1871, the parties entered into a contract by which the plaintiff, Sarah James, in consideration of one dollar, agreed "to sell and convey, or cause to be conveyed," as hereinafter stated, to the defendant four lots of land in the city of New York, for the sum of $11,000 for each lot. It was further covenanted that the defendant should commence the erection of four houses upon the lots on or before February 10, 1871, and complete the same within seven months from that date; the plaintiffs to advance $4,000 on each house to aid in its erection, and upon being paid and reimbursed the price of said lots and advances thereon, either in cash or the bonds of the defendant, secured by mortgages on the premises, then the plaintiffs agreed "to convey, or cause to be conveyed," the same to the defendant, in fee by a full ⁹⁵ "It is the settled rule in this state that the vendor need not have even an inchoate title at the time of the contract; that he may sell land to which he has no title, and the contract will be valid and enforceable if, when the time for performance arrives, he is able to furnish the title he contracted to convey. His contract will not be held fraudulent or void by virtue of the mere fact that, when he made it, he did not have the title that he agreed to pass to his vendee. Hanson v. Fox, 155 Cal. 106, 99 Pac. 489, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 338, 132 Am. St. Rep. 72; Backman v. Park, 157 Cal. 607, 108 Pac. 686, 137 Am. St. Rep. 153; Brimmer v. Salisbury, 167 Cal. 522, 530, 140 Pac. 30. And even where the vendor fraudulently represents himself to be the owner of more land than he has title to, his vendee, nevertheless, may waive the fraud and his right to rescind the contract, and may sue to enforce specific performance; and, if in enforcing the contract the court finds itself unable to enforce conveyance of all the land the vendor agreed to convey, it will compel compliance with the agreement, so far as possible, by compelling the vendor to convey such title as he has on being paid therefor at the rate agreed upon between the contracting parties; the compensation allowed for the deficiency in quantity being at the rate of the average price agreed to be paid for the entire tract. Quarg v. Scher, 136 Cal. 411, 69 Pac. 96; Butte Creek, etc., Co. v. Olney, 173 Cal. 697, 707, 161 Pac. 260. This is precisely what was done by the trial court here." Finlayson, P. J., in Anderson v. Willson (Cal. App.), 191 Pac. 1016, 1019 (1920).

covenant warranty deed free from all reasonable objections and from all incumbrances, except such incumbrances as should be made, or caused or suffered to be made, by the defendant; the latter agreed to complete the contract and to take title within eight months. The plaintiffs also covenanted that Sarah James was seized in her own right of a good title to said premises in fee simple. It was also agreed that the plaintiffs at their election might mortgage each of said lots to the amount of $15,000, and convey the same subject to said mortgage in lieu of purchase-money for the same amount.

The court found that on the same day the contract was made, plaintiffs conveyed the premises by warranty deed to Isaac B. Findull, subject to no incumbrances whatever. Defendant never entered into possession of the premises, but refused to erect the buildings because the plaintiffs could give no valid title to the property.

It appeared that some months after, but before the expiration of the eight months, Findull reconveyed to Mrs. James. Findull was a former clerk of James, and the conveyance to him was without consideration. He knew at the time he received the deed of the contract between the parties.

MILLER, J. The plaintiffs, in their contract with the defendant, covenanted that Sarah James, one of them, was seized in her own right of a good title to the premises in fee simple which were to be conveyed to the defendant; and it was further provided that the plaintiffs, if they so desire, could mortgage each of the lots to the amount of $15,000. On the same day after the contract bears date, and when the parties acknowledged its execution, the plaintiffs conveyed the premises by warranty deed to one Findull, subject to no incumbrances whatever. The question presented is whether the plaintiffs had a right thus to impair the title, or in any other manner than by the mortgages provided for; and, as this conveyance was made to Findull, whether the plaintiffs had not violated the covenant, and the defendant was thereby released from any liability under the contract. The plaintiff's counsel insists that the fact that another person held the legal title for a portion of the intervening time, or that the defendant prior to the time fixed for taking title, was required by independent covenants to do certain acts and things toward the performance of the contract on his part, is immaterial. We think he is in error in this respect, and, under the provisions of the contract, the transfer of the title to Findull by the plaintiffs was important and material. By the contract, as will be seen by reference to the same, the defendant agreed to erect buildings upon the lots, of a certain style and quality, and of considerable value, within seven months from the date, the plaintiffs to advance money from time to time on each of such buildings. The lots were to be conveyed by the plaintiffs by warranty deed, free from incumbrances, except such as should be caused or suffered by the defendant, who was to take title and pay for the same within eight months from date. It is apparent from the terms of the contract that the defendant must have relied to a considerable extent upon the personal responsibility of the plaintiffs. Upon the faith of an existing and perfect title in Mrs. James, he was to take possession, erect valuable buildings, and expend large amounts of money. The covenant that Mrs. James was seized and the permission given to mortgage the premises was not only an inducement for the expenditure of $60,000, to be made by the defendant, as the contract provided, but a guarantee that no other incumbrances should be placed upon the property. The covenant of seizin would be of no benefit if the plaintiffs could convey to a stranger without its violation, and compel the defendant to erect the buildings upon lands to which he might never acquire any title, and in that event to trust entirely to an action at law against the plaintiffs for reimbursement or indemnity. From the contract it is evident that the intention of the parties was that the defendant should be protected in taking possession of the premises and in the erection of buildings thereon, and under the circumstances of the case that the title should remain unimpaired in Mrs. James until the conveyance was delivered. Instead of this, on the very day the contract was acknowledged the plaintiffs conveyed the premises to Findull, who had been a clerk of Mr. James, and who took it in trust for Mrs. James and paid no consideration for the conveyance. They thus parted with all their right and title to the lot, and subjected the defendant to the hazard of losing what might be expended upon the same. As the testimony stood we think the defendant was not bound to proceed and complete the contract after the plaintiffs had parted with their title by a conveyance to a stranger.

The conveyance by the plaintiffs and the execution of the mortgages by the defendant, according to the contract for the price of the lots and advances, were to be simultaneous acts. In such a case the covenants are dependent, and there must be an existing capacity in the one who is to convey to give a good title. This distinction is stated fully by Spencer, J., in Robb v. Montgomery, 20 Johns. 15. The expenditure to be made, which was very large, should not, in view of the peculiar provisions of the contract, be regarded as an ordinary payment on account of the purchase-money, as the covenants were manifestly intended and must be considered as mutual and dependent. Judson v. Wass, 11 Johns. 525; Tucker v. Woods, 12 id. 190. We have carefully examined all the cases cited to sustain the proposition contended for by the plaintiffs' counsel, and we think that none of them uphold the doctrine that in a case presenting the characteristic features of the one at bar, a conveyance to a third party is not material.

Some stress is laid by the appellants' counsel upon the provision in the contract that the plaintiffs agreed "to sell and convey, or cause to be conveyed." This is not controlling; and taking the whole contract together, we think that the testimony shows that the defendant did no:

intend to accept any other warranty than that of the plaintiffs. That Findull knew of the contract with the defendant at the time he took the deed, and therefore he took it subject to the rights of the defendant, and could have been compelled to convey, is not important, for as we have seen, the defendant lost the benefit of the plaintiffs' responsibility by the transfer of the title without any consideration whatever to a person of at least doubtful responsibility, and thus was not sufficiently protected in making the large expenditure required for the building of the houses. The defendant had a right to rely upon the responsibility of the plaintiffs under the contract, and the want of it may well have prevented the defendant from taking possession and from erecting buildings as was intended. The subsequent reconveyance by Findull to Sarah James could have no effect in restoring the defendant's rights which were affected by the conveyance to Findull. The conveyance from Findull to the plaintiffs was not made until some months after the conveyance by the plaintiffs to him, and was recorded even long after that, and it is not proved to have been brought to the knowledge of the defendant. The defendant, with knowledge of the want of title in the plaintiffs, was not, under the covenants in the contract, bound to take possession and proceed with the erection of the buildings.

The question whether the deed to Findull was made and delivered before or after the making and delivery of the contract is not vital, as in either contingency the plaintiffs had broken the covenant of seizin, and as the covenants were dependent and mutual, the defendant was under no obligation to proceed and erect the buildings and fulfil the terms of the contract. In view of the covenants which have been considered, the contract was at an end when the conveyance was made to Findull. The finding of the judge, that the contract was executed and delivered upon the 11th day of January, 1871, being the time of its acknowledgment, instead of the day of its date, is therefore not material, and even if erroneous, cannot affect the result. For the same reason the refusal to find that the deed was delivered after the date of the contract was not erroneous. There was no error in refusing to send the case back for further findings, or in any of the refusals to find, or in any other respect.

*Judgment affirmed.

* In Eddy v. Davis, 116 N. Y. 247 (1889), the rule was applied to a contract to sell land whereby the vendor agreed to keep open a right of way back of the building to be conveyed. When the vendor sold to innocent purchasers the land over which the right of way was to be kept open and did not reserve the right of way or retain any land over which one could be granted as needed, and when the right of way was found "to constitute in value one half of the property agreed to be sold," recovery of instalments of the purchase price was denied to the vendor.

In Ziehen v. Smith, 148 N. Y. 558 (1896), the fact that unknown to both seller and buyer the property contracted to be sold was subject to a mortgage did not excuse the buyer from offering to perform since the incumbrance was re-

TUCKER v. WOODS.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1815. 12 Johns. 190, 7 Am. Dec. 305.)

Assumpsit. The plaintiff gave in evidence the following memorandum—"I will sell my dwelling house, tan works, and all the buildings belonging thereto, for five thousand dollars, payable as follows: One thousand dollars on taking possession, and one thousand dollars annually thereafter, until the whole is paid; secured by bond and mortgage, or other good security, until the whole is paid; and will give possession of the house and part of the tan-works on the 1st of October next; or, I will take of Mr. David Tucker, of Whiteborough, all his landed property, consisting of nine acres of land, lying on both sides of the road, near Whitman's Mills in Whiteborough, with all the buildings, and appendages, in good order, for 4,500 dollars, towards my said works, and have possession of his when he takes possession of mine, and pays me, or secures it on interest for one year, the five hundred dollars, for odds. This proposition shall be binding on me until the first day of January next. Greenbush, October 13, 1807. John W. Woods."

The plaintiff proved by a witness, that in December, 1807, he went to Greenbush, and informed the defendant that he had come to fulfil the agreement on his part, and was then ready to convey the land at Whiteborough, and to secure the 500 dollars for the difference according to the terms of the contract; and demanded performance of the defendant on his part; but the plaintiff did not tender or offer a deed for his land, nor say that he had a deed ready; nor did he tender any sum of money for the 500 dollars. The defendant said he had changed his mind, and refused to do anything in the business, and said that the plaintiff must seek his remedy. The defendant made no objection to any encumbrance being on the plaintiff's land, but absolutely refused to perform the agreement.

The defendants counsel moved for a non-suit, on the ground that the writing produced was not a contract, but a mere proposition in writing without consideration or reciprocity, which might be rescinded by either party at his option; but the judge overruled the motion. The defendant then proved, that, at the time of the proposition or contract, there was a tenant on the property of the plaintiff, under a lease, and that about two years of the term was unexpired; and that the tenant was in possession in December, 1807, when the plaintiff offered to convey, and demanded a performance of the contract on the part of the defendant.

The judge charged the jury, that if there was an outstanding lease on the plaintiff's property, which would have prevented his giving possession, in case the defendant had been willing to carry the contract into movable. See also Higgins v. Eagleton, 155 N. Y. 466 (1897). Cf. Heard v. Bowers, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 455, (1840); Thomas, J. Baird Inv. Co. v. Harris, 209 Fed. 291 (1913).

execution, the plaintiff was not in a situation to convey; and if they should be of that opinion, they ought to find for the defendant. And the jury found a verdict accordingly, for the defendant.

PER CURIAM. It might well be questioned whether the memorandum which is set up as the contract between these parties and upon which this action is founded, is not void for want of consideration. It would seem to be a mere proposition, on the part of the defendant, and without mutuality. * * *

But the ground upon which the judge, at the trial, put the case, is perfectly conclusive. For, admitting there was a consideration, and that the plaintiff was bound on his part, yet it appearing by the evidence that he was not in a situation to perform, the contract might be rescinded by the other side. (2 Com. Con. 52, 58, 59.) The proof in the case shows conclusively, that the property to be conveyed by the plaintiff to the defendant was under lease, and that the term would not expire until long after the bargain between these parties was to have been consummated; and this brings it within the principle decided by this court, in the case of Jackson v. Wass (11 Johns 525). The motion for a new trial must, therefore, be denied.

ROSENTHAL PAPER CO. v. NATIONAL FOLDING BOX & PAPER CO.

Action by the Rosenthal Paper Company against the National Folding Box & Paper Company.

COLLIN, J. The action was for the recovery of royalties for the use of a patent. Originally brought in the City Court of New York City, the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,840.73. The judgment of the City Court set the verdict aside, upon the ground that it was contrary to law, and dismissed the complaint. The Appellate Term, upon the appeal of the plaintiff, reversed that judgment, reinstated the verdict, and upon it rendered judgment for the plaintiff. The Appellate Division, upon the appeal of the defendant, reversed the determination of the Appellate Term, and affirmed the judgment of the City Court. The Appellate Division permitted the appeal to this court.

The action is based upon a contract in writing of March, 1909, between Isse Seligstein and the defendant. January 22, 1912, Seligstein assigned to the plaintiff here the patent involved (and others), which Seligstein held, not as the inventor, but as the assignee of the inventor, and all of his "right, title, and interest in, to, and under" the contract of March, 1909. Plaintiff instituted this action in virtue of the assignment. The contents of the contract of March 1909, may be adequately stated as follows:

The ownership of Seligstein of letters patent for the millinery or suit box and the desire of the defendant to acquire the exclusive right to manufacture and sell the box within a designated territory are recited. Seligstein sells to the company the exclusive right to manufacture and sell the boxes under said patent within the territory, "upon the following terms and conditions":

(1) The company "agrees to pay Seligstein a royalty of one dollar ($1.00) per thousand boxes up to an average daily sale of twenty (20) thousand boxes per day, per year of 300 days, and on all boxes sold in excess of said twenty (20) thousand boxes per day, per year of 300 days, the said the National Folding Box & Paper Company agrees to pay a royalty of seventy-five cents (75c.) per thousand boxes, but it is expressly understood that the payment by the said the National Folding Box & Paper Company to said Seligstein for the right to manufacture and sell boxes under said letters patent shall not be less than the sum of five hundred dollars ($500.00) for each and every year during the life of this contract.

"(2) The said Seligstein promises and agrees that he will faithfully protect said letters patent from any and all substantial infringements of said letters patent.

"(3) The said Seligstein further agrees that during the life of this contract he will not sell within the territory, above described, any box manufactured under said letters patent No. 906,138, nor any other clothing, millinery, or suit box, and further that he will not during the life of this contract sell any rights for any clothing, millinery, or suit box to any one for the territory hereinbefore described.

"(4) The term of this contract shall be five (5) years from and after the 1st day of March, A. D. 1909. * * *

The defendant, through the period of five years, made and sold the boxes, and regularly paid, quarter-annually, to Seligstein the royalty of $1 per thousand boxes on all the boxes sold. Those paid royalties aggregated $917.79. The minimum aggregate royalty to be paid for the five years was $2,500; that is, not less than $500 each year. This action is to recover the sum of the difference between those aggregates, with interest.

The City Court set aside the verdict in favor of the plaintiff and dismissed the complaint upon the grounds: (a) Seligstein, by assigning the patent, put it out of his power to perform his agreement to protect the patent from any and all substantial infringements of the letters patent, and, in consequence thereof, the defendant was released from its agreement to pay the royalty; and (b) the defendant did not, by paying royalty throughout the period, waive its right to assert such release, because it did not know of the assignment of the patent until the five years and the contract had expired.

The Appellate Term reversed the order and judgment of the City Court, and reinstated and ordered judgment upon the verdict, upon the ground that the defendant had the full benefit of the contract for its entire period without molestation of any kind.

The Appellate Division reversed the determination of the Appellate Term and affirmed the order of the City Court, upon the grounds: (a) The agreement of the defendant to pay the minimum royalty and the agreement of Seligstein to protect the patent were concurrent and dependent. When Seligstein assigned the patent, he put it out of his power to protect the patent (because the owner of the patent alone had a standing to sue on account of an infringement), and therein and thereby committed a breach of the contract which relieved the defendant from the obligation of full performance on its part. (b) Defendant did not waive this breach, because, in the first place, it was ignorant of it, and, in the second place, plaintiff's complaint alleges full performance by Seligstein of this agreement; and (c) the contract was personal to Seligstein and unassignable.

We take up first the question whether or not the agreement of the defendant to pay the minimum royalty and the agreements of Seligstein to protect the letters patent from substantial infringement, and to refrain from selling, within the designed territory, any box manufactured under the patent, or any rights for any clothing, millinery, or suit box to any one for the territory were dependent or independent of each other. In Kingston v. Preston, cited at the bar in Jones v. Barkley, 2 Douglas, 684, Lord Mansfield expressed himself to the following effect:

"There are three kinds of covenants: (1) Such as are called mutual and independent, where either party may recover damages from the other, for the injury he may have received by a breach of the covenants in his favor, and where it is no excuse for the defendant, to allege a breach of the covenants on the part of the plaintiff. (2) There are covenants which are conditions and dependent, in which the performance of one depends on the prior performance of another, and therefore, till this prior condition is performed, the other party is not liable to an action on his covenant. (3) There is also a third sort of covenants, which are mutual conditions to be performed at the same time; and in these, if one party was ready and offered to perform his part, and the other neglected or refused to perform his, he who was ready, and offered, has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other; though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act."

The complexities of modern industrial and commercial transactions have not rendered the classification inaccurate or inadequate. By a long series of decisions, the rule has been established that the question whether covenants are to be held dependent or independent of each other is to be determined by the intention and meaning of the parties, as expressed by them, and by the application of common sense to each case submitted for adjudication. Stavers v. Curling, 3 Bingham's N. C. 355; Tipton v. Feitner, 20 N. Y. 423; Pollak v. Brush Electric Association, 128 U. S. 446, 9 Sup. Ct. 119, 32 L. Ed. 474; Loud v. Pomona Land & Water Co., 153 U. S. 564, 14 Sup. Ct. 928, 38 L. Ed. 822; Griggs v. Moors, 168 Mass. 354, 47 N. E. 128; Leonard v. Dyer, 26 Conn. 172, 68 Am. Dec. 382. The efforts put forth in judicial opinions and by text-writers to define or formulate the distinctions of dependence and independence of promises or covenants have revealed their comparative futility and served, in the main, to strengthen the rule. Parties have the right to contract as they will for any lawful purpose, and the problem for the courts is to ascertain, in accordance with established rules of interpretation, the real contract or agreement. If they make their promises dependent or independent throughout, or dependent in part and independent in part, it is not for the courts to thwart them. Their expressed intention and meaning, ascertained from the whole instrument, rather than from technical or conventional expressions, are the guides in determining the character and force of their respective covenants.

In the contract under consideration the intention of the parties is not obscure. They contemplated that the letters patent prohibited to all persons except Seligstein, in the absence of his authorization, the manufacture and sale or the manufacture or sale of any box incorporating the patented invention or inventions and that the contract secured to the defendant the exclusive right, as against the whole world, to manufacture and sell, within the prescribed territory, the box. This exclusive right the defendant sought and Seligstein sold to it. The continued exclusiveness of the right throughout the period of five years was the root of the transaction. The defendant, presumably, could not, in the intention of the parties, pay Seligstein for the right to manufacture and sell a product which others, without price, were manufacturing and selling. It was essential to the purpose of the contract that the protection to and the exclusiveness of the right sold the defendant should be coexistent or concurrent with its ownership of it, and they were so created. The promises of Seligstein were to be kept and performed concurrently with those of the defendant. They were to be performed at all times during the licensed period. The promises of the defendant were dependent or conditional upon those of Seligstein. It is not reasonable to presume that the defendant intended to pay for the exclusive right through the five years without having it throughout the period. They intended that if it did not have the right it should not pay for it. Performance by the defendant was conditioned upon and subject to performance by Seligstein. The reciprocal promises were therefore concurrent and dependent.

The case of Wilfley v. New Standard Concentrator Co., 164 Fed. 421, 90 C. C. A. 543, has a close resemblance to that at bar. The agreements of the owners of the patent in the Wilfley case were broader than those of Seligstein here. They were to protect the claims of the patent (and not merely to protect it from substantial infringement), and the rights of the licensees to its use, and to prosecute infringers of it. The principles upon which the decision was grounded are, if sound, applicable in part, here. A case of contrary import in Hard v. Seeley, 47 Barb. 428, in which, as it seems to us, there is fallacious reasoning. The promises there were held independent for the reason that the vendee of the perpetual exclusive right to make, sell, and use a proprietary medicine was to pay the vendor a sum annually, and therefore the vendor's rights to the money could not depend upon his fulfilling his covenant not to ever communicate the art of compounding the medicine itself. The reasoning was applied through the principle that performance on the part of the vendee was, by agreement, to precede performance by the vendor. It overlooked, however, the fact, which barred the principle, as we think, that the reciprocal performances were to be co-existent and to proceed in equal pace. Continuous performance by the vendor conditioned his right to the continuous payments of the vendee. In their nature and effect the covenants were to be performed at the same time, and are not within the rule that, where the acts stipulated to be done are to be done at different times, the covenants are generally construed to be independent. See Delaware Trust Co. v. Calm, 195 N. Y. 231, 88 N. E. 53.

The general rule exists that a covenant which goes to only a part and not to the whole consideration of the contract is not a dependent and is an independent covenant. Graves v. Legg, 9 Exch. R 709. It expresses one of the weighty considerations by which to determine whether covenants were intended as dependent or independent. It is inferior, and submissive, however, to the rule that the expressed intention of the parties is controlling.

When the promises of the parties are concurrent and dependent, either party defaulting in performance cannot, in the course of performance, sustain an action against the other because he has also defaulted. Neither party can maintain the action until he has performed or tendered performance of his part of the agreement. A plaintiff must aver and prove performance, or a tender or waiver of performance, or a fact excusing nonperformance. Dunham v. Pettee, 8 N. Y. 508; Morris v. Sliter, 1 Denio, 59; Oakley v. Morton, 11 N. Y. 25, 62 Am. Dec. 49.

The instant case is, however, presented to us in such a condition and form that those rules are not invocable to the defendant, as a further statement of the facts will disclose. The five-year period of the license contract expired on the last day of February, 1914. Throughout it, the defendant continued to manufacture and sell the boxes under the license and pay the prescribed royalty of $1 per thousand boxes. The defendant had not notice or knowledge of the assignment of January 22, 1912, of Seligstein to the plaintiff, until after the expiration of the license and the last payment of royalty, or until after March 1, 1914. This action was commenced February 4, 1915. Upon the trial the assignment of Seligstein to the plaintiff was received in evidence, and the making of it and its legal effect were the grounds of the decision of the City Court. There was not for the purpose of, or within, our consideration, an actual infringement of the patent, or molestation or interference by infringers or infringements, or by Seligstein or his assignee, of the patent, or of the defendant's exclusive licensed right. The defendant had and enjoyed the whole interest or right Seligstein sold him.

We are to determine, under those facts, whether or not the sale and assignment by Seligstein to the plaintiff, on January 22, 1912, of his entire right, title, and interest in, to, and under the letters patent and the contract between Seligstein and the defendant in and of itself is a bar to this action. The sale and assignment by Seligstein put it out of his power to perform his covenants. In virtue of them he became a stranger to the patent and the contract. He conveyed to the plaintiff the entire and unqualified monopoly which he held. As to infringers and infringements of the patent, he became a person without interest and remediless. Pope Manufacturing Co. v. Gormully & J. Manufacturing Co., 144 U. S. 248, 12 Sup. Ct. 641, 36 L. Ed. 423; Littlefield v. Perry, 21 Wall. 205, 22 L. Ed. 577. The defendant, nevertheless, cannot have the aid of the doctrine that, where a party to an executory contract puts it out of his power to perform, as did Seligstein, the other party may regard the contract as terminated and demand whatever damages he has sustained. Lovell v. St. Louis Mutual Life Ins. Co., 111 U. S. 264, 274, 4 Sup. Ct. 390, 28 L. Ed. 423. The license contract ceased, by its terms and execution, to be executory on the last day of February, 1914. While the inexcusable breach of the contract by Seligstein conferred upon the defendant the right to terminate it while executory, the defendant did not exercise the right. It used the license to the contracted termination. The object of the agreement became fully performed.

Manifestly, the defendant could not, after the purpose and object of the contract were accomplished, regard it as executory; it could not rescind it; it could not deem itself deprived of the results accruing through the continuance of the contract and performance upon its part; it could only claim such damages, if any, as had been caused by the breach. Where a party to an executory contract, containing mutual obligations, disables himself from performing it during its performance, the other party has the option to treat the contract as ended, so far as further performance is concerned, and maintain an action at once for the damages occasioned by such anticipatory breach, or to wait until there was to be final performance. Ga Nun v. Palmer, 202 N. Y. 483, 96 N. E. 99; Central Trust Co. of Ill. v. Chicago Auditorium Ass'n, 240 U. S. 581, 589, 36 Sup. Ct. 412, 60 L. Ed. 811, L. R. A. 1917 B, 580. The opinions in those cases state that the rule has its exceptions. The other party may, however, decline to deem the contract terminated and may insist that it shall continue in force up to the time fixed for its final performance. A contract thus kept alive exists for the benefit of both parties. The party who refuses to regard it as terminated by the breach remains liable to all his obligations and liabilities under it. Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285; Bernstein v. Meech, 130 N. Y. 354, 29 N. E. 255; Johnstone v. Milling, L. R. 16 Q. B. D. 460; Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. v. Richards, 152 Ill. 59, 80, 38 N. E. 773, 30 L. R. A. 33; Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, 20 Sup. Ct. 780, 44 L. Ed. 953.

This doctrine also has its exceptions, none of which is relevant here. The action of Seligstein left the defendant free to continue as it did in the performance of the contract. The absence of notice to or knowledge of the defendant that Seligstein had assigned the contract does not affect the rights of the parties as presented to us. Seligstein did not violate a legal obligation or duty in keeping it unknown to the defendant.

By the terms of the contract the right of the defendant to manufacture and sell the boxes and its obligation to pay the rated or minimum royalty were conditioned upon the agreements of Seligstein and his performance of them. Seligstein's action gave it the option to cease performance and recover damages. It did not give it the option to manufacture and sell, and not pay the royalties. It manufactured and sold, and thus nullified the conditional quality of Seligstein's promises. Having kept alive the contract and secured the results, it cannot maintain that it is not subject to its obligations and liabilities, for the reason that Seligstein had renounced it. Its remedy is the recovery, in counterclaim or action, of the damages, if any, Seligstein's action or nonperformance caused it.

The assignment transferred to the plaintiff the cause of action and constituted it the real party in interest. Seligstein assigned to the plaintiff all of his "right, title, and interest in, to, and under" the contract. The contract did not, in terms, forbid the assignment. The fact that the promises of the defendant ran to Seligstein, and not to him and his assigns, is indecisive of the assignability of the contract. The general rule now prevailing (as the successor of the archaic view that a contract created strictly personal obligations between the parties and non-assignability was a logical attribute), that any property right, not necessarily personal, is assignable, is overcome only by agreement of the contracting parties or a principle of law or public policy. New York Bank Note Co. v. Hamilton Bank Note E. & P. Co., 180 N. Y. 280, 73 N. E. 48; Smith v. Craig, 211 N. Y. 456, 105 N. E. 798, Ann. Cas. 1915 B 937; Quinn v. Whitney, 204 N. Y. 363, 97 N. E. 724. In this jurisdiction the statute, in effect so provides. Code of Civil Procedure, §§ 1909, 1910. Seligstein's disqualification from a performance of the contract, consequent upon the assignment by him of the letters patent, casts serious doubt upon the legality, as to the defendant, of the assignment of the letters patent. Devlin v. Mayor, etc., of

New York, 63 N. Y. 8; Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers, Limited, [1902] 2 K. B. 660; New England Iron Co. v. Gilbert Elevated R. R. Co., 91 N. Y. 153.

There is not, however, cause for impeaching the assignment by Seligstein of his right and interest under the contract in the fact that it and the letters patent were assigned to the plaintiff by the same instrument. American Lithographic Co. v. Ziegler, 216 Mass. 287, 103 N. E. 909. The action of the plaintiff is based upon the contract and the assignment relating to it alone. The contract was not purely personal. Its subject did not involve the personal relation, integrity, or skill of Seligstein. In case he, owning the patent, had died during the performance, his executor or administrator could have performed. The assignment did not absolve him from its obligations. Resort could still be made to him for the stipulated protection or damages for a breach. There is not a reason for holding the assignment unlawful or inoperative. Devlin v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 63 N. Y. 8; Citizens' Loan Ass'n v. Boston & Maine R. R. Co., 196 Mass. 528, 82 N. E. 696, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1025, 124 Am. St. Rep. 584, 13 Ann. Cas. 365; Knevals v. KISSACK ET AL. v. BOURKE.

Action by William Kissack, trustee, and others against William Bourke. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

HAND, J. This was a bill in chancery, filed in the circuit court of Cook county by the appellants against the appellee, to enforce the specific performance of the following contract in writing for the sale of the tract of land described therein: "In consideration of $100 to me in hand paid by William Kissack, trustee, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I agree to sell and convey to said William Kissack, trustee, the remaining seventy-nine acres of land, more or less of the farm owned by me in the town of Algonquin, in McHenry county, Illinois (after deducting the portion thereof heretofore sold by me to said William Kissack, trustee), for the sum of $9,900, provided said William Kissack deposits said sum of $9,900 for said land with the First National Bank of Elgin, Illinois, within sixty days after the date hereof, to be delivered to me by said bank on receipt of a warranty deed from me to said William Kissack, trustee, of said seventy-nine acres of land, more or less, free and clear of all incumbrances, with the abstract of title to said premises now owned by me brought down to date; but in case said William Kissack, trustee, shall fail to deposit said sum of $9,900 with said bank, as aforesaid, within sixty days from this date, this instrument is to be returned to me by said bank, where it is to be deposited and held in the meantime. Dated this 27th day of October, A. D. 1905. William Bourke. [Seal.]” The bill, as amended, alleged that appellee, on December 4, 1905, delivered the possession of the premises, in pursuance of the terms of said contract, to the appellants, and that the appellants have continued to be, and now are, in possession thereof and have made valuable improvements thereon; that the appellant William Kissack and the appellee, on the 26th day of December, 1905, met in the city of Elgin by appointment for the purpose of closing said sale; that on that occasion the appellee presented to said appellant an abstract of title to said premises which showed the title of appellee to said premises to be defective, and that by mutual agreement between the parties the time in which said transaction was to be closed was extended 30 days from that date; that subsequently, and within said 30 days, the parties met in the city of Chicago, where they all resided, when the appellants offered to pay to the appellee the balance due upon said contract of sale and to accept his warranty deed for said premises, or to deposit the money for his benefit in the bank in the city of Elgin, where said contract of sale had been deposited in escrow, if he would make to them a deed; that the appellee refused to accept either of said propositions or to carry out said contract of sale, and asked the appellants the sum of $16,000 for said premises, whereupon this bill was filed. The appellee filed a general and special demurrer to the bill, which was sustained, and the bill was dismissed, and the complainants have prosecuted this appeal.

The first contention made by the appellee in support of the decree is that the bill does not aver that the appellants deposited said sum of $9,900 in the First National Bank of Elgin, in accordance with the terms of said contract; that the deposit of said sum of money was a condition precedent to the right of the appellants to receive a conveyance of said premises from the appellee; and that for want of such averment in said bill the demurrer thereto was properly sustained. We are of the opinion that the deposit of the balance of said purchase money in said bank was a condition precedent to appellants’ right to a deed to said premises, and that the contention of the appellee in that regard would have been properly sustained, had it not been for the averments of the bill, which showed that the deposit of said purchase money in said bank had been waived by the appellee. The bill avers that when the parties met on the 26th of December, 1905, in the city of Elgin, the abstract of title presented to said appellants by the appellee was not brought down to the date of said contract of sale, and in the condition in which it then was showed appellee's title to said premises to be defective, and that by mutual consent the time of closing the sale was extended 30 days from that date.

It is, however, urged that said agreement of extension was invalid, as the bill does not show said extension agreement was supported by a valuable consideration and was evidenced in writing. We think the mutual agreement of the parties a sufficient consideration to support the agreement for an extension of the time in which to close the sale under said contract, and that to permit the appellee, according to the averments of said bill, to escape the performance of his contract upon the ground that no money consideration was paid by him for such extension, would be a fraud upon the appellants. In Thayer v. Meeker, 86 Ill. 470, on page 473, it was said: "It is also claimed that, even if the extension was given, it was not founded on any consideration. In equity a party is not permitted to deceive and defraud another by agreeing to such an extension, and then disregard it, and thus gain an unjust and inequitable advantage." And generally a promise for a promise is a good consideration and will support a contract.

It is also urged the agreement of extension was not evidenced in writing, and it is said for that reason to be within the statute of frauds and void. In Vroman v. Darrow, 40 Ill. 171, on page 173, it was said: "Any party has a right to waive a strict compliance with the terms of a contract, and proof of such waiver may consist of acts in pais." And in Moses v. Loomis, 156 Ill. 392, 395, 40 N. E. 952, 953, 47 Am. St. Rep. 194: "Rights arising under sealed instruments may be waived by parol." And in Ebert v. Arends, 190 Ill. 221, 232, 60 N. E. 211, 214: "While it is true that a court of equity has no more right than a court of law to dispense with an expressed stipulation of parties in regard to time in contracts of this nature, yet, when the vendee has failed to make payment of any part of the purchase money at the stipulated time, a court of equity will interfere in his behalf if any fraud, accident, or mistake has intervened. Relief, in such cases, from a strict, technical performance of the contract at the time stipulated will be granted if by reason of mistake, or for any other cause falling within its legitimate province, a court of equity can see that essential justice demands the exercise of its jurisdiction."

It appears that prior to the expiration of the period covered by the extension the parties met in Chicago, and the appellants offered to pay appellee the balance of the purchase money and to accept his warranty deed for the premises, or to deposit the money in the first National Bank of Elgin, if he would convey to them the premises, and that the appellee declined to accept either proposition and repudiated the agreement, and refused to convey said premises to the appellants unless they would pay him therefor the sum of $16,000. We think, when the appellee declined to accept the purchase money or to permit it to be deposited in the First National Bank of Elgin within the time covered by said extension and make a deed conveying said premises to appellants, and repudiated his contract and raised the price of said premises to $16,000, he waived the right to have said purchase money deposited in said First National Bank of Elgin, and that the appellants might maintain a bill for a specific performance of said contract of sale without averring and proving a compliance with said condition precedent, which required said $9,900 to be deposited in the First National Bank of Elgin prior to the delivery by appellee to appellants of a deed to said premises, as a court of equity will not generally require a party to do a useless thing, and in view of the fact that the appellee had repudiated his contract and refused to convey unless he was paid the sum of $16,000, it would have been a useless act for the appellants to have deposited the balance of said purchase money in said Elgin bank. In Monson v. Bragdon, 159 Ill. 61, 65, 42 N. E. 383, 384, the court said: "It is well settled by our previous decisions that, although the vendor in a contract like this may have the right to declare a forfeiture for noncompliance with its terms in making prompt payment, time being made of the essence of the contract, that right may be waived by his conduct in dealing with the vendee."

It is also said the bill is defective in this: that it does not aver that appellants were able to perform their contract of sale by paying the balance of the purchase money to the appellee or by depositing the same in the First National Bank of Elgin. The bill averred the appellants were "ready, eager, and willing to comply with the terms of said contract," which was sufficient. Hoyt v. Tuxbury, 70 Ill. 331; Morse v. Seibold, 147 Ill. 318, 35 N. E. 369; Forthman v. Deters, 206 Ill. 159, 69 N. E. 97, 99 Am. St. Rep. 145. In the Forthman Case, on page 168 of 206 Ill., and page 100 of 69 N. E. (99 Am. St. Rep. 145), it was said: "In a proceeding for specific performance the complainant must prove that he has been ready, willing, and eager to perform, and the burden is upon him to show a full and complete performance, or offer to perform, on his part." We are of the opinion if the appellants can establish the allegations of their bill they are entitled to a specific performance of said contract of sale, even though it be optional in its character. We think, therefore, the bill should be answered by the appellee, and that the circuit court erred in sustaining a demurrer thereto.

The decree of the circuit court will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to overrule said demurrer.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.⁸⁷

SMITH v. BUTLER.

(Court of Appeal. [1900] 1 Q. B. 694.)

Appeal from the judgment of Bucknill, J., at the trial of the cause without a jury.

The defendant was lessee for a term of years of a public-house. The lessor, who was the owner, had lent the defendant a sum of 900*l.* upon mortgage of the house, the money being payable on demand, and there being an understanding that the loan should be diminished by an annual payment of 50*l.* Only one such payment had been made, so that the loan stood at 850*l.* On September 10, 1898, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant, whereby, for a certain sum of money, the defendant agreed to assign to the plaintiff the lease of the public house and all the defendant's interest therein for the residue of the unexpired term, and November 10, 1898, was fixed as the date for the completion of the purchase; 100*l.* was paid by the plaintiff as a deposit, and the agreement contained a provision that in case of default by the purchaser the deposit money should be forfeited, and also a clause stating that the agreement was entered into on the condition that the mortgagee would consent to the transfer of the existing loan of 850*l.* to the plaintiff. On October 4 the plaintiff, the defendant, and a broker acting for both parties, had an interview with the mortgagee, at which the latter refused to allow more than 700*l.* to remain on the mortgage. The plaintiff thereupon said that the contract with the defendant was at an end. Later in the day the broker again saw the mortgagee, who, after some discussion, agreed to transfer the loan of 850*l.* upon the existing conditions, including the understanding that it should be reduced by payment of 50*l.* per year. The plaintiff was informed of this, but he adhered to his view that the contract had come to an end, and on November 11, he brought this action to recover the deposit.

The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

not be waived. The authorities are quite uniform in holding that, notwithstanding such a provision, the parties may make subsequent independent oral agreements which, when executed, have the effect of modifying the original contract, and the rule has been recognized in this jurisdiction. Wortman v. Kleinschmidt, 12 Mont. 316, 30 Pac. 280; Piper v. Murray, 43 Mont. 230, 115 Pac. 669; Interstate Lumber Co. v. Western M. & W. T. Co., 51 Mont. 190, 149 Pac. 975." Halloway, J., in Roberts v. Sinnott, 55 Mont. 369, 177 Pac. 252, 253 (1918).

"The contract provided that extra work should not be paid for, except on written order from the architects, countersigned by the owner, and also that no provision of the contract or specifications 'can be waived by either party unless such waiver is expressed in writing and duly signed.' There would seem to be no valid legal reason, however, for holding this provision could not in turn be waived, if the parties saw fit to do so. Bartlett v. Stanchfield, 148 Mass. 394, 19 N. E. 549, 2 L. R. A. 625; Headley v. Cavileer, 82 N. J. L. 635, 82 Atl. 908, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 564." Fraser, J., in Cramp & Co. v. Central Realty Corp. (Pa.), 110 Atl. 763, 766 (1920).

A. L. SMITH, L. J.²² * * * The question is whether the plaintiff after the interview of October 4th had a right to say that the contract was off. In my opinion he had not that right, because the defendant had until November 10th, the day fixed for completion, to procure the consent of the lessor to the condition as to the mortgage. The plaintiff might have receded from the position that he took upon October 4th when he found that the condition had been agreed to by the lessor. It was in this power to say that he was ready and willing to complete, and had he done so there would have been nothing to prevent him from suing the defendant if there were a breach of contract on his part. The plaintiff never did recede from the position he had taken up. It was through his default that the contract was not completed, and therefore he cannot be entitled to recover back the deposit. The appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L. J. But for the arguments that have been adduced to us, I should have thought that the law on this matter was sufficiently settled. Such conditions as that which occur in this case are not uncommon in cases of the purchase of real estate, the contract being that the vendor shall procure that persons who have lent money on the security of the property should accept the purchaser as mortgagor instead of the vendor. To my mind it is reasonably clear that the vendor has until the time fixed for completion, or, if no time for completion is fixed, then a reasonable time, in which to procure the assent of the mortgagee to the acceptance of the purchaser as mortgagor. Though the condition is one that may be fulfilled at any time before completion, yet the purchaser is not always bound to wait until that date. I can suggest four such cases, though I by no means say that the list is exhaustive. One case is that the purchaser may be able to show by sufficient evidence that the condition cannot be practically fulfilled by the date fixed. A second case is where the vendor has substantially admitted that the condition is incapable of fulfilment. The third case is that there may be an agreement between the vendor and the purchaser that a particular refusal of the mortgagee to accept the purchaser as mortgagor should be taken as conclusive, and this agreement may be implied from the circumstances and need not be express. The fourth case is that of a refusal by the mortgagee so treated by the vendor as to justify the purchaser in regarding the matter as at an end. It lies upon the purchaser to establish an agreement or special circumstances which justify him in treating the contract as at an end, and, if he goes back from his contract, without sufficient justification, the vendor may treat the purchaser as having broken his contract, and would be relieved from further carrying it out or performing the condition. The purchaser in that case cannot recover the deposit. I need not consider what might happen if the purchaser retired from the position which he had taken up after ascertaining that the vendor refused to treat the repudiation of the contract as justifiable.

All the cases that were cited were, with one exception, cases in which the purchaser ascertained before the time for completion that the vendor had not the title which he professed to have, and had no legal means then available to complete the contract. In such cases the purchaser is entitled at once to treat the contract as at an end, because the vendor cannot ask the purchaser to wait on the chance that the former may acquire the property. These cases have no bearing on the one before us. * * *

It seems to me clear that the present case does not come within any of the illustrations that I have given, and it is plain that the vendor did not treat the refusal of the mortgagee as final. The purchaser under these circumstances was not entitled to treat the contract as determined, and that makes an end of the case.

As to the stipulation that the existing arrangement as to paying off by instalments the money secured by the mortgage should remain in force, it is sufficient to point out that the money was payable on demand, and the stipulation imposed no burden on the plaintiff.

I agree therefore that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

GRANT v. JOHNSON

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1851. 5 N. Y. 247.)

This was an action of covenant to recover the second instalment of purchase money of land sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, by a contract, under seal, bearing date the 24th August, 1845.

By this agreement, Grant, the plaintiff, contracted to sell to Johnson, the defendant, a piece of land, lying in the town of Neversink, known as part of the Reed Farm, and therein particularly described, for the consideration of $950, to be paid as follows. $200 the 1st day of April, then next; $200, on the 1st of April, 1847; and the residue in two annual payments, of equal amount, to be paid on the 1st of April of the two succeeding years, with interest from the 1st of April, 1846. The vendor also thereby agreed to give the purchaser the quiet and peaceable possession of the premises on the 1st November, then next, with the exception of certain privileges granted to third persons; and to give him a good and sufficient deed for the same, on the 1st May, 1846, "if the above conditions are complied with."

This suit was brought to recover the instalment of $200, which fell due on the 1st of April, 1847. The plaintiff, in his declaration averred, that he gave the defendant possession of the premises, on the 1st November, 1845, and was ready to convey, according to the true intent and meaning of the articles of agreement, on the 1st May, 1846; but there was no averment of a tender of a deed, or of a readiness or willingness to execute one. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant took this appeal.

GARDINER, J.^{} The question in this case is, whether the plaintiff can sustain an action for the second instalment of the purchase money secured by the agreement, without averring and proving the delivery, or an offer to deliver, a deed of the premises. The parties have declared that certain payments were to be made, and certain acts performed by them, respectively at the times specified in the agreement. They must be held to have intended the performance of these acts, when, and, of course, in the order of time indicated in their covenants. The plaintiff was to give the defendant possession, on the first of November, 1845. The performance of this requirement preceded anything to be done by the defendant, and it might, consequently have been enforced, without any offer upon the part of the defendant; but if no possession had been given, the plaintiff could not have recovered the $200 to be paid by the vendee on the first of April, 1846.

The possession, however, was given, and the first $200 was paid, and on the first of May, 1846, the vendee was entitled to his deed, as the thing next to be done, in the order prescribed by the parties in their agreement. It was not executed, nor a willingness to execute it, either averred or proved. The payment of the $200 for which the suit is brought, was fixed upon a day subsequent to that agreed upon for the delivery of the deed. The case is, therefore, brought directly within the letter and spirit of the second rule suggested by Seargent Williams in his note to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 320 b, that, "when a day is appointed for the payment of money, &c., and the day is to happen after the thing which is the consideration is to be performed, no action for the money can be sustained, without averring performance."

The plaintiff relies upon the third rule of Seargent Williams in his note to the case above cited, that, "where a covenant goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be maintained, without averring performance." The rule is not free from obscurity. It was given by Lord Mansfield, originally, in Boone v. Eyre, (1 H. Black. 273, Note a). The defendants in that suit, after having received a conveyance of the equity of redemption of a plantation, and the negroes upon it, when sued for a part of the consideration, set up a breach of a collateral covenant on the part of the plaintiff, relating to the title and possession of the negroes, in bar of the action. The warranty extended both to the estate and negroes. (4 Mees. & Welsb. 311). The covenant of the plaintiff, it will be perceived, embraced the whole and every part of the subject conveyed. If the title failed to a single negro, or the defendant was evicted from an acre of land, the covenant was intended to afford redress, and enable a jury to apportion the damages, according to the agreement of the parties. A "breach of the plaintiff's covenant might be paid for in damages," because a failure of title as to any part of the consideration could be compensated for, according to the standard fixed by the parties. In other words, the consideration for the defendant's promise was divisible and the damages arising from a breach of the covenant of warranty were apportioned to each parcel of that consideration, by the agreement itself. This, it is supposed, is what is meant by the expression above quoted, that the breach may be paid for in damages. (5 Mees. & Welsb. 701). Accordingly, it is stated in the note to Pordage v. Cole, supra, that "when the consideration for the payment of the money is entire and indivisible, so that the money payable is neither apportioned by the contract, nor capable of being apportioned by a jury, an action is not maintainable."

The doctrine is thus stated in Chanter v. Leese, 4 Mees. & Welsb. 311: "The party contracting to pay his money, is under no obligation to pay for a less consideration than that for which he has stipulated. If, indeed, he does accept a partial performance, and to a certain extent enjoys the benefit of that for which he has stipulated, it may become a question, whether he may not be liable upon an implied contract to pay for what he has had. And when the consideration is in its nature capable of being divided, and the payment apportioned by the terms of the contract, there may be still a right to recover the portion due on the original contract." This decision was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber (5 Mees. & Welsb. 701), in 1839, and may be considered as the established doctrine in England at that day.

The rule of Lord Mansfield, according to its original application, and as expounded in the decision above mentioned, is reasonable; it brings us back to the contract, to learn the intention of the parties. Courts are not required to speculate upon the inequality of loss to the parties, nor to look beyond the agreement, to its performances, in order to ascertain its character, as suggested by some judges and commentators. (1 Saund. 320 a). These inquiries are proper, where the question arises, whether the plaintiff has any remedy for what he has done, or parted with, or whether the defendant is not estopped by his acts, subsequent to the agreement, from insisting upon a condition precedent in his favor. Much of the confusion in the books, it is believed, arises from confounding the doctrine of waiver by matters ex post facto, with a rule of construction applicable to the agreement as it came from the hands of the parties. (Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East 555). A defendant may waive the performance by the plaintiff, in case of a covenant clearly dependent, and thus render himself liable in some form of action (Mitchell v. Darthez, 2 Bing. N. C. 555; Lucas v. Godwin, 3 Id. 737), but it is only when the consideration is divisible, and the payments are apportioned by the agreement to the different parts of the consideration, that the covenant becomes independent, and a recovery can be had upon the original contract without averring performance, or an excuse for non-performance.

A covenant, therefore, which goes only to a part of the consideration, is not, necessarily, independent; nor is it conclusive upon this point, that the consideration is divisible in its own nature, or that a part of it has been received by the defendant; nor will the circumstance, that one or any number of covenants in an agreement are independent, render others so. In Chanter v. Leese, (5 Mees. & Welsb. 311), the agreement was, that the defendants should have the exclusive use and sale of six different patents, and they were to pay 400*l.* in half-yearly payments, for one of which payments the action was brought. The defense was a failure of title as to one of the patents. The grant of the exclusive right was an independent covenant, which the defendants could have enforced, without any averment; the consideration for the undertaking of the defendants was divisible in its own nature. The undertaking upon which the action was brought, went only to a part of the consideration to be paid; and the court remarked, that although it had appeared affirmatively that the other five patents had been enjoyed by the defendants, the plaintiff could not have recovered on the contract. Terry v. Duntze (2 H. Bl. 389), which was followed in our supreme court, in Sears v. Fowler, (2 Johns 272), in Havens v. Bush (Id. 387), and in Wilcox v. Ten Eyck (5 Id. 77), to be the contrary, is not law in this state or in England. * * *

The question then returns, was the consideration in this case divisible, and were the payments apportioned by the agreement to the different parts of the consideration, within the principles above stated? According to the contract, the $950 to be paid by the defendant, as therein stipulated, was the entire consideration, for a complete title to the premises. The possession was incident to the title, the whole of which the defendant was to receive, as the consideration for his payments. He received one element of a complete title, to wit, the possession, on the first of November, 1845; he then paid on the first of the following April all that he was to advance by the terms of the agreement, until the fee should be added to the possession, by a conveyance from the plaintiff, and the title of the defendant be then perfected. The plaintiff refuses or neglects to convey, and yet, by this action, claims the purchase money of the defendant.

If we assume that the consideration of the defendant's undertaking was divisible, yet, by the terms of the agreement, he was to receive both the possession and a deed of the premises, before he could be called upon for the payment of the instalment in controversy. These things were "to be done to him," according to the rule of Lord Holt, adopted in 10 Johns. 206; he was not to trust to the personal responsibility of the plaintiff. (9 Wend. 134.) The plaintiff had covenanted that the thing stipulated should be performed, before the defendant could be required to pay; nor, by the contract, were the payments to be made by the defendant apportioned to any particular part of the consideration. He was not to pay anything for the possession, as distinguished from the fee of the land, but a gross sum for both, by separate instalments. If he had refused to accept a deed, all that the plaintiff could have recovered would have been the balance of the purchase money with interest. On the contrary, had the plaintiff refused to convey, the recovery on the part of the defendant would have been confined to the difference between the contract price and the actual value of the land, with interest. In a word, the covenant sought to be enforced against the defendant in this action, went to the whole consideration, on the other side, and depended on it. The judgment of the Supreme Court should be reversed.

Foot, J. The question is, whether the covenants to pay the second and subsequent instalments are dependent.

So many decisions have been made on the vexed question of what are, and what are not, dependent covenants, and so many of them are irreconcilable, that they rather perplex than aid the judgment, in determining a given case. One rule is universal, and that is, that the intent of the parties is to control. On reading the covenant in this case, it is clear to my mind, that giving the deed was to precede the payment of the second and subsequent instalments; the parties have said so in so many words. The deed was to be given on the first of May, 1846; and the second and subsequent instalments paid on the first day of April, in the following years. If each had fulfilled his contract, the appellant would have had his deed, when the second instalment was payable. The clause, "If the above conditions are complied with," can only apply to such conditions as were to be performed by the appellant, before the deed, by the terms of the contract, was to be given. The possession is a mere incident which follows the title, and cannot be retained independently of it.

Judgment reversed.

BEECHER v. CONRADT.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1855. 13 N. Y. 108, 64 Am. Dec. 535.)

Action commenced in the Supreme Court, in 1851, to recover the amount agreed to be paid by the defendant in and by the contract hereinafter mentioned. The complaint alleged the making of the contract; that it had been duly transferred to the plaintiff; that the party of the first part to the contract and the plaintiff had always fulfilled and kept all things therein contained on their part to be performed; that the defendant had neglected to pay the amount agreed to be paid by him, and that the whole amount of the principal and interest, named in the contract, was due and unpaid, and judgment for this amount was demanded. The answer put all the allegation of the complaint in issue. The cause was tried at the Oneida County Circuit, held by Gridley, J. The plaintiff read in evidence the contract mentioned in the complaint. It was dated January 3d, 1839, and executed by Abraham Varick, as surviving executor of the will of one Walker, deceased, as party of the first part, and by the defendant as party of the second part. By the terms of this contract the party of the first part, in consideration of one cent to him paid, and "upon the express condition that the party of the second part shall, and do well and faithfully perform the covenants hereinafter mentioned, and to be performed on his part," covenanted for himself and his assigns to execute and deliver to the party of the second part a deed of conveyance in fee, containing covenants of warranty against the acts of the grantor, of and for a parcel of land which was described in the contract; and the defendant, the party of the second part, covenanted to pay to the party of the first part or his assigns "the sum of three hundred and ninety-six dollars in five equal annual payments, with interest, annually on all sums unpaid." The plaintiff further proved that the land mentioned in the contract was conveyed, and the contract assigned to him in December, 1850, and rested. Thereupon the counsel for the defendant moved the court to nonsuit the plaintiff, on the ground, among others, that inasmuch as the action was brought to recover the whole amount of the purchase-money, after the same had become due by the contract, the plaintiff could not recover without proving that he tendered a conveyance of the land, or offered to convey the same to the defendant before the commencement of the action. The court overruled the objection, refused to nonsuit the plaintiff, and decided that he was entitled to recover the amount of the purchase-money mentioned in the contract. The counsel for the defendant excepted. The judgment, rendered at the circuit, was affirmed by the Supreme Court at a general term, held in the fifth district. The defendant appealed to this court.

GARDINER, C. J. The plaintiff has neither averred nor was there proof of any other breach of the contract upon the part of the defendant, except the non-payment of the purchase-money. The plaintiff had a right to sue for each instalment as they severally became payable; but this right he has waived, and now seeks to recover the whole purchase-money in this action, without an averment or proof of a tender of a conveyance, or a readiness or willingness to convey. It is not denied by the court below, that if the several payments had been made as they fell due, and the suit had been commenced for the last instalment alone, that the plaintiff must have made such an averment and sustained it by proof, if questioned; the point is too plain to admit of discussion. It is, however, said that a right of action accrued as the instalments became payable, which the nonperformance of the plaintiff would not discharge. This doctrine assumes a right, upon the part of the plaintiff, to divide his cause of action into as many suits as there were instalments. The first answer to this suggestion is, that the consideration for the conveyance by the vendor was an entire sum, to be paid by instalments; that the whole was due at the commencement of the action, and the plaintiff has sued for the whole purchase-money without attempting to distinguish, in his complaint or evidence, between the different instalments. The second answer is, that the plaintiff having elected to wait until the fifth and last instalment became due, and upon the payment of which, as this case stands, the defendant would be entitled to a deed, cannot now sustain his action for either instalments, without proof of performance or readiness to perform on his part. The covenants, as to the four first instalments, were originally independent; but the plaintiff, by his omission to insist upon a strict performance by the defendant, has lost the right to bring more than one suit for the money, which formed the consideration for his conveyance. The defendant, by a tender of the whole, which he has now a right to pay, would be entitled to his deed. The plaintiff, on the other hand, must establish his right to the consideration as an entirety, or he cannot recover anything. If he recovered in this action for $50, the judgment would be a complete bar to any further claim for the purchase-money, and when that judgment was paid the defendant would be entitled to his deed.

The defendant could not protect himself against an action by an offer to pay the first, or all of the four first instalments; as the consideration was entire, and all due, the plaintiff could insist upon the whole. And yet, if because the covenants were originally independent they must always continue so, the defendant must have the right to discharge by payments what the plaintiff could enforce by action.

The truth is, the parties, by lapse of time, are in the same situation as though the purchase-money was all payable at one time. The defendant has lost his right to pay the instalments separately, and the plaintiff his right to enforce collection by separate suits. There is but a single cause of action, one and indivisible. The defendant, if he would obtain his deed, must pay all; and the plaintiff, if he would recover, must show such a performance on his part as would entitle him to all the unpaid consideration. The condition attaches to the whole debt and every part of it. The judgment of the Supreme Court should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

DENIO, JOHNSON, MARVIN, and DEAN, JJ., concurred.

CRIPPEN, J. (Dissenting.) The first and fifth grounds on which the motion for a nonsuit was asked may properly be resolved into one and considered together, as they both present the same identical question. If the plaintiff was bound to prove the tender of a deed or an offer to give such a deed to the defendant as the contract called for, prior to bringing his action to recover the purchase-money, then he failed to maintain the action, and the court in that event erred in refusing the nonsuit. In order to determine this question, it will be necessary to refer with care to the terms of the agreement between Varick, the trustee, and the defendant. By this contract Varick agreed to convey lot No. 3, in Walker's patent, on the condition of a full and faithful performance of all the covenants contained in the contract to be performed by the defendant. On the part of the defendant, the first covenant made by him was that he would pay the trustee, Mr. Varick, his heirs or assigns, the just and full sum of $396 in five equal annual payments, with interest annually on all sums unpaid. The contract bears date on January 3d, 1839; consequently, the last annual payment became due on January 3d, 1844. This covenant of the defendant is not made to depend on any contingency or act of the other party, or on any condition to be found in the contract. When, then, let us inquire, did the defendant become entitled to the deed of said premises? The parties, by the plain language of the contract, have said that the defendant shall be entitled to such deed on the express condition that he shall pay the sum of $396, in five equal annual payments from January 3d, 1839, with annual interest. It is not easy to mistake the meaning of parties when they use language so plain and emphatic in making their contracts.

The defendant, most clearly, was not entitled to a deed when the first, second, third, or fourth instalments became due, even if they had been punctually paid by him. So also in relation to the last instalment, the time for its payment was fixed by the agreement; when the time arrived the money became due and payable from the defendant. No act was agreed to be performed on the part of the trustee or the plaintiff as assignee of the contract, in order to entitle him to the money due on the last payment. The premises were to be conveyed on the express condition of the payment of the whole amount of the purchase-money.

No act whatever was agreed to be done by the trustee to entitle him to the money; or, in other words, the defendant agreed that he had no right to call for a conveyance except upon the express condition that he paid the whole amount of the purchase-money. The case is clearly distinguishable from that of Grant v. Johnson, 1 Selden, 247. In that case the contract did not require the defendant to pay the whole amount of the purchase-money before obtaining a deed. He was entitled, by the terms of the agreement, to receive both the possession of the premises and a deed thereof before he could be called upon for the payment of the instalment in controversy in that action. Not so in the case at bar, and in this particular the cases are manifestly and clearly different. The defendant in this action had no right to ask for a deed, except upon the express condition that he first paid the full amount of the purchase-money. I have not been able to find any adjudged case conflicting with the plaintiff's right to recover, in this action, the amount due upon the contract.

The judgment should be affirmed.

HAND, J. (Dissenting.) I am of the opinion that the covenants to pay the purchase-money and to convey the land are independent. The defendant agreed to pay the purchase-money, and at certain specified times; and the vendor agreed to convey "upon the express condition" that he did so. No suit was commenced until all of the purchase-money became due. But that circumstance did not make the covenants dependent which before were independent. Where the last payment and the conveyance are to be simultaneous acts, and the prior payments have not been made, in a suit for the purchase-money, a performance, or an offer to perform, is necessary. Johnson v. Wygant, 11 Wend. 48; Grant v. Johnson, 1 Seld. 247. But that is not this case as I understand this contract. The payment of all the purchase-money was a condition precedent to the right of the defendant to demand a conveyance. Having covenanted absolutely to pay certain sums at the expiration of certain fixed periods, and the vendor having promised a deed on condition that the payments were made, the clear intention of the parties must have been that payment of all the money should precede the conveyance. There was no duty for the vendor to perform until the vendee had performed all the covenants on his part. By inserting the word "condition" or "sub conditione," a condition is created. 10 Co. 42 a; 2 Bac. Abr., "Condition," (A.); Platt on Covenants, 72 "Upon condition" is an expression from which a condition precedent usually arises. (Platt on Covenants, supra.) The agreement here was not merely to convey "upon" payment being made, but "upon the express condition" that the vendee should perform; while the covenant to pay is without condition. And besides, the meaning of the words "upon condition" has been settled by construction, which should not be disturbed.

For this reason I think the judgment should be affirmed.

*Judgment reversed.*¹⁰⁰

"But when, after the instalments are all due, the vendor brings an action for the purchase-money, he is not entitled to recover without proving an offer before suit to convey the land to the defendant on receiving the purchase-price. When the last instalment falls due the payment of the whole of the unpaid

SHEEREN v. MOSES.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1877. 84 Ill. 448.)

SHELDON, C. J. This was a suit brought on June 10th, 1876, by the executors of the estate of Robert McCracken, deceased, against Patrick Sheeren, upon three promissory notes, under seal, made by the latter, for the sums, respectively, of $500, $500, and $1,000, bearing date September 17th, 1870, payable to Robert McCracken, the first on December 10th, 1870, the second on December 10th, 1873, the third on December 10th, 1875, all with six per cent interest from June 10th, 1870, and ten per cent interest after due.

The only question raised is as to the sufficiency of two pleas, to which demurrers were sustained by the court below.

One plea sets up that the notes were given as the consideration of an agreement entered into between the plaintiffs' testate, Robert McCracken, of the first part, and the defendant, Patrick Sheeren, of the second part, as follows:

"The party of the first part doth sell to the party of the second part an eighty-acre lot of land, known and described as follows—viz.: The west half of the southeast quarter of section three (3), township thirteen (13), range eleven (11) west, containing eighty (80) acres, in Scott county, and state of Illinois; and for and in consideration of said land, and a clear deed for the same, as soon as the last payments are made, the party of the second part engages to pay the party of the first part $25 per acre, in the following payments—viz.: In six months from this date, five hundred dollars ($500); five hundred dollars in three years from date, and one thousand dollars in six years from date, with interest commencing from this date, to be paid yearly on all the notes, at six per cent, and when the cash payment is made, the party of the first part, his heirs or assigns, shall execute a clear deed for said land, this 10th June, 1870; and the party of the second part is to pay the taxes."

purchase-money and the conveyance of the land become dependent acts. Beecher v. Conradt, 13 N. Y. 108.

"And the same rule applies when an action is brought for any instalment payable at or after the term fixed for the delivery of the deed. Grant v. Johnson, 5 N. Y. 247; Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 320b, Sergeant Williams' note." Brown, J., in Eddy v. Davis, 116 N. Y. 247, 252 (1889).

"It is a well established proposition of law that if a contract provides for payment by instalments, due at different times, the instalments may, of course, be successively sued on as they become payable, but each action should include every instalment due when it is commenced, unless a suit is, at the time, pending for the recovery thereof or other special circumstances exist." Woodward, J., in Seed v. Johnson, 63 N. Y. App. Div. 340, 343 (1901).

On successive actions for breach of a contract performable in instalments, see 6 Ann.-Cas. 63, note; 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1042, note.

The plea averring the defendant, in pursuance of the agreement, had ever been ready and willing to pay the notes, but there had never been any offer or tender to him of a deed for the land described in the agreement.

The other plea alleges that the notes were given as the consideration for the purchase of the above described tract of land; that previous to the making of the notes there had been made, and at that time existed, between the defendant and Robert McCracken, an agreement in writing, setting it out as above, and that on September 17th, 1870, in pursuance of such agreement, the defendant executed the notes declared upon; that the first one was correctly drawn, but that the second and third notes were, by the scrivener, incorrectly and improperly drawn as to their times of payment, in this, that the scrivener drew the last two notes as maturing on December 10th, 1873, and on December 10th, 1875, when the same should have been written to mature as by the terms of the above agreement, and as was the intention of the parties—viz., on June 10th, 1873, and on June 10th, 1876, respectively; that the defendant, in pursuance of the agreement, had entered into the possession of said premises, but there had never been offered or tendered to him a clear deed to the land, although the defendant had always been ready and willing to pay the notes.

The notes appear, by the averments of the pleas, to have been given for the moneys due and payable by the agreement of June 10th, 1870. They were given, then, for the purchase money of land, the deed for the land to be given, as we understand the agreement, upon making the last payment, which is represented by the last note. The payment of the last note, and the making of the deed, we must regard as mutual and dependent acts, and that to maintain an action upon that note there should have been a tender of a deed before bringing suit. Headley v. Shaw, 39 Ill. 354; Hunter v. Bilyeu, 39 Ill. 368; Johnson v. Wygant, 11 Wend. 48.

But it is different with the two other notes. They were to be paid before the time fixed for the conveyance of the land, and as respects them, the agreements were independent of each other, and tender of a deed before suit was not necessary. If a day be appointed for payment of money, or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the money or other act is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act, before performance, for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent. 1 Saund. 320, note 4. The obligation of the defendant to pay the first two notes at the times stipulated, was absolute and unconditional. A cause of action accrued upon each note as soon as it became payable, and there is nothing in the agreement to defeat the right of action afterward.

By neglecting to enforce payment of the first two notes when they became due, and by waiting until the last note became due and the time for making the conveyance had elapsed, the promises to pay the first two notes, once absolute and independent, did not become mutual and dependent. This was so expressly decided in Duncan et al. v. Charles, 4 Scam. 561.

That was a parallel case, and decided the exact point made upon these pleas. Under its authority, the first two notes, here, are recoverable without a tender of a conveyance, and the pleas must be held bad, as respects them.

The demurrers to the pleas were, then, properly sustained, and the judgment is affirmed.

EWING v. WIGHTMAN.

Action by Henry O. Ewing, receiver of the Cardiff Coal & Iron Company, against George B. Wightman. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (65 N. Y. Supp. 187) affirming a judgment in favor of defendant rendered on a report of the referee, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

CULLEN, J. * This action is brought to recover on a series of promissory notes made or indorsed by the defendant to the Cardiff Coal & Iron Company under a number of contracts by which said company contracted to sell and convey to Wightman certain parcels of land in the state of Tennessee. One of the defenses pleaded by the respondent was that these notes were delivered to represent the deferred payments to be made for said lands, upon the payment of which the lands were to be conveyed to him, and that the company at the day fixed for the conveyance of the land was unable to give the respondent title thereto, and tendered no deed or conveyance to him. The following are the forms of the contract and of the note, which bear the same date: "For and in consideration of the sum of four hundred and sixteen and $\frac{7}{100}$ dollars (\$416.70) in hand paid on the delivery of this instrument, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the further sum of eight hundred and thirty-three and $\frac{30}{100}$ dollars (\$833.30) to be paid in equal instalments in six and twelve months from date, to be evidenced by two notes executed by the said bargainor hereinafter named, due and payable, respectively, six and twelve months after date, with interest from date, the Cardiff Coal and Iron Company, a body corporate under the laws of the state of Tennessee, has bargained and sold, and hereby agrees and binds itself to convey by deed in fee simple, with covenants of general warranty, on payment in full of the purchase money at the times and in the manner hereinbefore set forth, unto George B. Wightman, his heirs or assigns, a lot or parcel of lands lying in the 13th civil district of Roane county, Tennessee, being lot No. five in block thirty-four in the town of Cardiff, as shown by the plat of said town in the register's office of Roane county." Note: "\$416 $\frac{60}{100}$. Twelve months after date, I promise to pay the Cardiff Coal and Iron Company, or order, four hundred and sixteen and $\frac{60}{100}$ dollars, for value received, with interest from date. This note is given in part consideration for land this day bought of the said Cardiff Coal and Iron Company, and a lien is retained on said land to secure the payment of this note. If this note is not paid at maturity, and is placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, ——— agreed to pay ten per cent attorney's fees, to be taxed as costs. This 30th day of April, 1890. George B. Wightman." The referee before whom the cause was tried rendered a short form of decision, in which he held that the agreements to convey the land and pay the notes were concurrent and dependent, and that the plaintiff could not maintain the action on the notes, as no tender of conveyance had been made to the defendant.

The unanimous affirmance by the Appellate Division leaves open for our determination but one question,—whether the payment of the notes and the conveyance of the land were dependent covenants. The law is firmly established in this state that, in a contract for the purchase of lands or for the sale of chattels, the covenant to convey or to deliver possession and the covenant to pay the purchase money, when concurrent in time, are dependent (Glenn v. Rossler, 156 N. Y. 161, 50 N. E. 785; Vandegrift v. Engineering Co., 161 N. Y. 435, 55 N. E. 941, 48 L. R. A. 685), and that, even in case the purchase money is payable in instalments, if the vendor awaits the maturity of the last instalment, upon the payment of which a conveyance is due, he cannot maintain an action to recover any instalment without first putting the vendee in default by tendering him a deed. Beecher v. Conradt, 13 N. Y. 108, 64 Am. Dec. 535; Morange v. Morris, *42 N. Y. 48; Thomson v. Smith, 63

N. Y. 301; Eddy v. Davis, 116 N. Y. 247, 22 N. E. 362. The contract of the Cardiff Company was not a present conveyance of the land, but an executory agreement to convey in the future on the payment of the purchase money; and the defendant agreed to pay in consideration of the actual conveyance of the land, and not in consideration of the mere obligation or executory contract of the vendor. Therefore, if the action had been brought on the contract, it could not, within the rule stated, have been maintained, because of the failure of the vendor to tender a deed; and the only question remaining is whether a different rule applies where, as in the present case, separate obligations in the shape of promissory notes are given for the purchase money.

Some learned text writers have asserted the doctrine that promises contained in unilateral contracts cannot be dependent, though each is given in consideration of the other, and have criticised the cases in this country holding a contrary rule. Whatever may be the force of the arguments of those writers, or whatever the rule in England (Spiller v. Westlake, 2 Barn. & Adol. 155; Moggridge v. Jones, 14 East, 486), the general current of authority in this and other states is opposed to that doctrine. * * *

In Hunt v. Livermore, 5 Pick. 395, it was held that an action could not be maintained on a non-negotiable promissory note given for the purchase money on an executory contract for the sale of land, without a previous tender of the deed. The same principle seems to have been recognized, though the question was not necessarily involved, in Murphy v. Lockwood, 21 Ill. 610. No American case has been cited to us holding a contrary rule, except that of Lewis v. McMillen, hitherto discussed. We think the weight of authority justified the decisions of the courts below. Nor do we think the doctrine established by this decision is subject to criticism on principle. "It is a familiar rule that several instruments made between the same parties at the same time, and relating to the same subject-matter, are to be read as one instrument." Marsh v. Dodge, 66 N. Y. 533; Draper v. Snow, 20 N. Y. 331, 75 Am. Dec. 408. And, if one of the writings is a negotiable instrument, the same rule applies in an action between the parties to it, or their representatives. Rogers v. Smith, 47 N. Y. 324. "In contracts of this description, the undertakings of the respective parties are always considered dependent, unless a contrary intention clearly appears. A different construction would in many cases lead to the greatest injustice, and a purchaser might have payment of the consideration money enforced upon him, and yet be disabled from procuring the property for which he paid it." Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 1 Pet. 455, 464, 7 L. Ed. 223, cited with approval by Martin, J., in Glenn v. Rossler, supra. These rules are firmly settled in our jurisprudence, and I think it follows as a necessary corollary from those rules that the law is the same where a promissory note is given for the purchase money on an executory contract for the sale of lands or chattels as obtains in a case where the only military station at Tongue River, in the Yellowstone region, on or before a specified day. He furnished the wood, but failed to furnish the hay, which was furnished by other parties at an increased expense. The accounting officers of the government claimed the right to deduct from the claimant's wood account the increased cost of the hay. Whether this could lawfully be done was the principal question in the case.

The court, upon an examination of the contract and of the surrounding circumstances of the case, were of opinion that the contracting parties, in stipulating relating to hay, contemplated hay to be cut in the Yellowstone valley, and specially at the Big Meadows near the mouth of Tongue River,—which was, indeed, the only hay which the claimant would not be able to carry out his contract, and it being absolutely known he relied on. The government officers, fearing that the claimant could have procured within hundreds of miles, and which it was necessary that the hay should be had, allowed other parties to cut the hay at Big Meadows, and therewith to supply the Tongue River station. The claimant complained of the double injury: First, of giving the hay which he relied on to other parties; and, secondly, of charging him for the increased expense of getting it. The question was whether the surrounding circumstances could be taken into consideration in the claimant's excuse, although the contract made no mention of the source from which he was to procure the hay to be supplied by him to the government.

BRADLEY, J. We think that the facts of the case clearly bring it within the rules allowing the introduction of parol evidence: First, for the purpose of showing, by the surrounding circumstances, the subject-matter of the contract, namely, hay to be cut and gathered in the region where it was to be delivered; secondly, for the purpose of showing the conduct of the agents of the defendants by which the claimant was encouraged and led on to rely on a particular means of fulfilling his contract until it was too late to perform it in any other way; and then was prevented by these agents themselves from employing those means. The supply of hay which he depended on, and which under the circumstances he had a right to depend on, was taken away by the defendants themselves. In other words, the defendants prevented and hindered the claimant from performing his part of the contract.

That the subject-matter of a contract may be shown by parol evidence of the surrounding circumstances, see Bradley v. Washington, Alexandria, & Georgetown Steam Packet Co., 13 Pet. 89; Thorington v. Smith, 8 Wall. 1; Maryland v. Railroad Company, 22 Id. 105; Reed v. Insurance Company, 95 U. S. 23; 1 Greenl. Evid. sect. 277; Taylor, Evid. sect. 1082. And that the conduct of one party to a contract which prevents the other from performing his part is an excuse for non-performance, see Addison, Contracts, sect. 326; Fleming v. Gilbert, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 528. In the case last cited, the defendant was sued on a bond obliging him by a certain time to procure and cancel a mortgage of the plaintiff and deliver the same to him. The defendant was allowed to prove by parol that he procured the mortgage, and, having inquired of the plaintiff what he should do with it, was directed to place it in the hands of a third person. This was held to be an excuse for not having fully performed the condition. Judge Thompson said: "It is a sound principle that he who prevents a thing being done shall not avail himself of the non-performance he has occasioned. Had not the plaintiff dispensed with a further compliance with the condition of the bond, it is probable that the defendant would have taken measures to ascertain what steps were requisite to get the mortgage discharged of record, and would have literally complied with the condition of the bond." So when A gave to B a bond to convey certain premises, but they subsequently agreed by parol to rescind the contract, and A thereupon sold the premises to a third person, it was held that though the bond was not cancelled or given up, nor any of the papers changed, yet by the parol agreement and the acts of the parties under it the bond was discharged. Dearborn v. Cross, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 48; and see 2 Cowen & Hill's Notes to Phillips on Evid. 605. The principle involved in these cases is applicable to the present.

LEVENSON v. LIBMAN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1920. 128 N. E. 13.)

Suits by Louis Libman against Joseph Levenson and by Joseph Levenson against Louis Libman. On report to the Supreme Judicial Court.

¹⁰⁴In Anvil Min. Co. v. Humble, 153 U. S. 540 (1894), Brewer, J., said: "A party who engages to do work has a right to proceed free from any let or hindrance of the other party, and if such other party interferes, hinders, and prevents the doing of the work to such an extent as to render its performance difficult and largely diminish the profits, the first may treat the contract as broken, and is not bound to proceed under the added burdens and increased expense. It may stop and sue for the damages which it has sustained by reason of the nonperformance which the other has caused."

In Deborich v. Emeric, 12 Cal. 171 (1859), where there was a contract for the sale of fruit on the trees with a provision that the buyer should be allowed to gather it without molestation, and where the buyer found that the parties in possession would let him have part but would not let him have the rest without a fight, it was held that he might refuse to take any and might recover damages as for a total breach.

In the suit of Libman v. Levenson, decree ordered dismissing the bill; in that of Levenson v. Libman, decree ordered for plaintiff.

RUGG, C. J. These are cross-suits in equity. On March 31, 1920, the parties entered into a contract in writing whereby Libman agreed to sell a tract of real estate for $2,000 above an existing mortgage and Levenson agreed to purchase and pay for the same, "papers to pass on or before April 10, 1920." The real estate "as described in the agreement consists of a parcel of land numbered 202-208a Washington Street, Dorchester district of Boston, comprising 7,030 square feet of land and a one-story brick block of six (6) stores thereon," built in 1916.

On or about April 5, 1920, a retaining wall on the rear of the premises, without any fault on the part of Libman, collapsed on account of erosion and other natural causes, and fell onto and across a yard about fifteen feet in width situated between the retaining wall and the building, and onto and against the rear of the building, causing the greater part of the rear wall of four of the stores to collapse and breaking the windows in the front of the four stores.

No repairs were made on the premises after the collapse, and the building and premises have since remained and now are in the same damaged condition as they were immediately following the collapse.

The question is whether Levenson can be compelled to take conveyance and pay for the real estate under these circumstances or whether he is entitled to cancellation of the contract and recovery from Libman of the money already paid on account of the contract.

It is manifest from the facts that there has been a destruction or loss of a substantial part of the real estate constituting the subject matter of the contract occurring before the time fixed for performance without the fault of either party. The real question is where that loss must fall.

This hardly can be regarded as an open question in this commonwealth. In Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134, a contract had been made for the purchase and sale of land but before the time for performance the house thereon was burned. It was said at page 138:

"Nor could this contract be enforced by a court of equity having jurisdiction of the subject matter, for by the destruction of the house the defendant is no longer able to perform his part of the contract. He may make compensation for the destruction of the house, but generally a purchaser, independently of special circumstances, is not to be compelled to take an indemnity, but he may elect to recover back the purchase money, if paid in advance, and if the vendor refuses or is unable on his part to perform the contract, and the purchaser has no legal remedy to recover damages."

It is true that this was an action of contract and the contract was not enforceable under the statute of frauds, but with the amplitude of discussion of legal questions lying within the field of the point actually involved customary with the court of that day, the whole subject was surveyed in the opinion. The statement above quoted appears to have been accepted as the law of the commonwealth. In Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514, 9 Am. Rep. 65, an action of contract was before the court for breach of a written agreement to purchase land, where the buildings were destroyed before the deed was tendered. It was said by Mr. Justice Gray, relying in part upon Thompson v. Gould as well as upon other previous decisions fully reviewed by him:

"When property, real or personal, is destroyed by fire, the loss falls upon the party who is the owner at the time; and if the owner of a house and land agrees to sell and convey it upon the payment of a certain price which the purchaser agrees to pay, and before full payment the house is destroyed by accidental fire, so that the vendor cannot perform the agreement on his part, he cannot recover or retain any part of the purchase money."

The question again was presented in an action for breach of contract in Hawkes v. Kehoe, 193 Mass. 419, where at pages 424 and 425, 79 N. E. 766, 767 (10 L. R. A. [N. S.] 125, 9 Ann. Cas. 1053), occurs this statement:

"We need spend no time upon the numerous cases in England and in this country which the industry of counsel has brought to our notice as to the rights of parties to such agreements upon a total or partial destruction of the buildings by fire. See the cases collected in 29 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law (2d Ed.) 712 et seq., and in Ames, Cases in Eq. Jur. 228, note 2. We are of opinion that in this commonwealth, when, as in this case, the conveyance is to be made of the whole estate, including both land and buildings, for an entire price, and the value of the buildings constitutes a large part of the total value of the estate, and the terms of the agreement show that they constituted an important part of the subject-matter of the contract, it is now settled by the decision in Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514, that the contract is to be construed as subject to the implied condition that it no longer shall be binding if, before the time for the conveyance to be made, the buildings are destroyed by fire. The loss by the fire falls upon the vendor, the owner; and if he has not protected himself by insurance, he can have no reimbursement of this loss; but the contract is no longer binding upon either party. If the purchaser has advanced any part of the price, he can recover it back. Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134, 138. If the change in the value of the estate is not so great, or if it appears that the buildings did not constitute so material a part of the estate to be conveyed as to result in an annulling of the contract, specific performance may be decreed, with compensation for any breach of agreement, or relief may be given in damages. Kares v. Covell, 180 Mass. 206; Davis v. Parker, 14 Allen, 94."

See also Adams v. North Am. Ins. Co., 210 Mass. 550, 96 N. E. 1094.

It seems to us that the weight of authority in other jurisdictions is to the same effect.¹⁰⁵ Phinizy v. Guernsey, 111 Ga. 346, 36 S. E. 796, 50 L. R. A. 680, 78 Am. St. Rep. 207; Gould v. Murch, 70 Me. 288, 35 Am. Rep. 325; Wilson v. Clark, 60 N. H. 352; Smith v. McCluskey, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 610; Wicks v. Bowman, 5 Daly (N. Y.) 225; Powell v. Dayton, Sheridan & Grande Ronde R. R., 12 Ore. 488, 8 Pac. 544; Huguenin v. Courtenay, 21 S. C. 403, 53 Am. Rep. 688; Elmore v. Stephens-Russell Co., 88 Ore. 509, 171 Pac. 763; Kinney v. Hickox, 24 Neb. 167, 38 N. W. 816.

There are decisions to the contrary collected in an article in 33 H. L. R. 813, 822 to 834. In view of the positive statements of the law already quoted from our own decisions, it does not seem necessary to review those not in harmony with them. In the suit of Libman v. Levenson decree is to be entered dismissing the bill, and in that of Levenson v. Libman decree is to be entered declaring the agreement terminated, for the repayment to the plaintiff of the $200 paid by him on account of the contract and for his costs.

*So ordered.*¹⁰⁶

TURNER v. SAWDON & CO.

(Court of Appeal. [1901] 2 K. B. 653.)

Application by the defendants for judgment or for a new trial in an action tried by Kennedy, J., with a jury.

The defendants carried on business as cotton-warp agents at Bradford, Yorkshire, and in March, 1898, an agreement was entered into by them with the plaintiff, who was in their employment, which contained the following clauses: "(1) The said G. E. Sawdon & Co. agree to continue to engage and employ the said Ernest Turner as their servant and representative salesman from the 1st day of March, 1898, for a period of four years ending February 28, 1902. * * * (2) The said G. E. Sawdon & Co. further agree to remunerate the said Ernest Turner for his services by a payment to him of a salary of 200*l.* per annum, ¹⁰⁵ Professor Williston disagrees with this statement as to the weight of authority. See 2 Williston on Contracts, § 928. A satisfactory estimate is difficult.

to be paid in monthly instalments, for the space of two years, and 250*l.* per annum for the remaining two years. * * * (3) The said Ernest Turner agrees to devote the whole of his time to the business of the said G. E. Sawdon & Co., to faithfully serve them as heretofore in soliciting orders and generally in aiding to conduct the business, and not to divulge to any competitor or other person any of the business secrets of the said G. E. Sawdon & Co. whilst in their service, and to carefully obey their directions from time to time, and will keep, protect, and promote the success of the said business as far as he can. * * *

The plaintiff acted as salesman for some time; but on December 31, 1900, a letter was handed to him by the defendants, which was as follows: "We have decided that you shall take a month's holiday—that is to say, that although you will still be in the employ of the firm and at their disposal, you will not after today be required to perform any duties. You will please call for your salary on January 31, when any further instruction will be given you." The plaintiff came to the office of the firm on the following day, but was requested to leave. Immediately afterwards circulars were issued by the defendants to their customers stating that the plaintiff had no authority to transact any business on their behalf. The plaintiff then commenced business on his own account, and brought this action against the defendants for damages for breach of the agreement of March, 1898, on the ground that the defendants "after the 31st December, 1900, have neglected and refused, and still neglect and refuse, to continue to engage and employ the plaintiff as their servant and representative salesman, in accordance with the terms of the said agreement."

The learned judge left the following questions to the jury:

(1) Was the plaintiff ready and willing to perform the agreement according to its terms? Answer, Yes.

(2) Did the defendants' conduct on December 31, 1900, and January 1, 2, 3, and 4, 1901, constitute a breach of their obligations under their contract towards the plaintiff? Answer, Yes.

(3) Was it such a substantial breach as to justify the plaintiff in treating it as a refusal on the part of the defendants to perform and abide by the contract? Answer, Yes.

(4) If the above questions are answered in the affirmative, what damages is the plaintiff entitled to? Answer, 125*l.*

On further consideration, the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the damages found by the jury.

The defendants appealed.

A. L. SMITH, M. R. This is an action tried before my Brother Kennedy with a special jury. The matter has given rise to some complication, chiefly, as it appears to me, because the learned judge left the construction of an agreement to the jury. There was no term of art and no question of custom the meaning or the existence of which might properly be left to the jury. It was for the judge at the trial to construe the written agreement, and we have now to say what construction should be put upon it. I do not say that the meaning of the document is clear, but I have arrived at the conclusion that the result of the trial was not right. The action is by a man who was in the employment of the defendants, and it was not brought for wages, because it is clear that the defendants were always ready and willing to pay all that was due under the contract. The real question which the plaintiff thought to raise, and which was raised, was whether beyond the question of remuneration there was a further obligation on the masters that, during the period over which the contract was to extend, they should find continuous, or at least some, employment for the plaintiff. In my opinion such an action is unique—that is an action in which it is shown that the master is willing to pay the wages of his servant, but is sued for damages because the servant is not given employment. In Turner v. Goldsmith, [1891] 1 Q. B. 544, the wages were to be paid in the form of commission, and that impliedly created a contract to find employment for the servant. This contract is different, being to employ for wages which are to be paid at a certain rate per year. I do not think this can be read otherwise than as a contract by the master to retain the servant, and during the time covered by the retainer to pay him wages under such a contract. It is within the province of the master to say that he will go on paying the wages, but that he is under no obligation to provide work. The obligation suggested is said to arise out of the undertaking to engage and employ the plaintiff as their representative salesman. It is said that if the salesman is not given employment which allows him to go on the market his hand is not kept in practice, and he will not be so efficient a salesman at the end of the term. To read in an obligation of that sort would be to convert the retainer at fixed wages into a contract to keep the servant in the service of his employer in such a manner as to enable the former to become au fait at his work. In my opinion, no such obligation arose under this contract, and it is a mistake to stretch the words of the contract so as to include in what is a mere retainer an obligation to employ the plaintiff continuously for the term of his service. I asked whether the employment must be de die in diem, and the answer was that this was not necessary, but I could not gather what, short of this, was the suggested obligation. It seems to me that the only argument open to the plaintiff was that his employment should be continuous, and I cannot find that obligation in the contract.

I think, therefore, that the case should not have been left to the jury, and that we ought to direct that judgment be entered for the defendants.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L. J. I entirely agree. In my opinion, if the facts are taken to be exactly in accordance with the plaintiff's evidence, there was no case to go to the jury. So far as the pleadings are concerned, the action is for breach of the terms contained in a written contract. It was put on behalf of the plaintiff that the action was based on a repudiation by the master of the contract with the plaintiff, and it was said that the plaintiff had a right to treat the case as if it were an action for wrongful dismissal, and is entitled to recover damages on that footing none the less because the master has been ready and willing to pay the wages agreed upon. For the purposes of my judgment I accept that suggested basis of action, but I still say that there was no case to go to the jury.

The first clause of the agreement contains the words "engage and employ," and the argument for the plaintiff is that because these words are used some obligation is thrown on the master which is not ordinarily created by the relation of master and servant. If it is said that the word "employ" must be so construed, the authority against this view is conclusive. In Emmens v. Elderton, 13 C. B. 495; 4 H. L. 624, the plaintiff, who was an attorney, was to receive 100*l.* a year as attorney and solicitor of a company. The promise set out in the second count was to "retain and employ" the plaintiff as attorney. The only matter that had to be argued in that case was whether the expression "retain and employ" added anything to the duty of the company towards their solicitor as expressed in the earlier part of the count. If it did, then the count was a bad one, and though the verdict of the jury had been for the plaintiff the defendant would have been entitled to have the verdict set aside. If, however, the words added nothing to the ordinary obligation on the company, the count was good. It was held in the Exchequer Chamber and in the House of Lords that the words did not of necessity add a jot to the contractual obligation of the employer. This is clearly set out in the opinions delivered by Crompton and Wightman, J.J., in the House of Lords. We have to consider in the present case whether there is anything in this agreement to engage and employ the plaintiff which places on the defendants a wider obligation than that which a master ordinarily incurs towards his servant. I think that the first clause of the agreement is merely a clause of engagement or retainer. The second clause relates to remuneration, and the third to the duties to be performed by the servant in return for the remuneration. Of course, when a servant is engaged the capacity in which he is engaged is mentioned, and I do not think that the expression "representative salesman" which occurs in the agreement makes the case any stronger or throws any further obligation on the master. The case of a servant who is to be paid by commission as in Turner v. Goldsmith, is entirely different. There the master is bound to give the opportunity of earning the remuneration. In Bunning v. Lyric Theatre, Limited, 71 L. T. 396, there is a good deal in the terms of the contract to show that the having an opportunity of appearing as musical director was one of the considerations which the servant bargained that he should have from the master.

As my Lord has said, it was the duty of the judge to construe this contract, and we must now put a construction upon it. Looking at the matter in the way that is most favorable to the plaintiff, I think that there was no case to go to the jury, and that judgment should be entered for the defendants.

STIRLING, L. J. Throughout the argument and at the present moment I feel more doubt as to the construction of this contract than my learned brethren. It is an agreement by which the defendants agreed to engage and employ the plaintiff, and the plaintiff agreed to devote the whole of his time to their service. The question is, 'What is the meaning of the word "employ" as used in this agreement? It seems to me clear, and if authority be required we find it in the case of Emmens v. Elderton, that the word "employ" is capable of two meanings—to retain in service, or to give actual work to be done by the person employed. There are many cases in which the nature of the work to be done shows which of these meanings should be adopted. Take the case of a medical man engaged for a term at a fixed payment. No one would say that employment must be found for him. On the other hand, in the case of an actor who accepts an engagement, it may be an important consideration with him to have an opportunity of displaying his abilities before the public, and it may be that there is an implied obligation on the part of the master to afford such an opportunity: Fetcher v. Montgomery (1863), 33 Beav. 22. So in the case of a commission agent, to which reference has been made. The term "employ" being one with a flexible meaning, I feel the force of the argument that the plaintiff was to be employed in the capacity of salesman to serve and to solicit orders, and so there should be a correlative duty on the employers to give him the opportunity of doing this. There was evidence given at the trial that in order that a salesman may duly perform his duties he must be in constant contact with the market. In that state of things there is some approximation to the case of an actor; but, as there are other elements pointed out by my learned brethren to which they attach weight, I am not prepared to differ from the conclusion at which they have arrived.

*Appeal allowed.*¹⁰⁷

¹⁰⁷ In Turpin v. Victoria Palace, [1918] 2 K. B. 539, 551, McCardie, J., said of the contract before him for the defendants to pay plaintiff, a music hall artiste, 25*l.* per week under the contract which engaged her to perform at their well known and engagement sought place of amusement. "I have arrived at the conclusion that there was no implied obligation on the defendants to permit the plaintiff to appear at their hall during the contract periods. I state this result with regret, and I trust that a new form of contract may be devised which will give a wider measure of protection to the legitimate interests of music hall artistes." COOPER v. STRONGE & WARNER CO.

Action by Maude E. Cooper against the Stronge & Warner Company. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

O'BRIEN, J. Defendant is a manufacturer and retailer of millinery goods. In part, its business consists in maintaining millinery departments in stores located in different localities. Plaintiff had been employed by defendant as manager of one of those departments, maintained by it in Dubuque, and claims to have subsequently entered into a contract with defendant for similar employment from March 1 to August 1, 1909, at a salary of $25 per week. In February, 1909, plaintiff was directed to take charge of a millinery department conducted by defendant in a store at Duluth. She continued in that position for two weeks, when she was superseded by another woman, but requested to remain in the department as a sales clerk at the same salary. This she refused to do, insisting that her contract with the defendant was that she be employed as the manager of some one of the departments owned by the defendant, and offered to accept such position in any locality defendant might designate. The defendant failed to furnish plaintiff with a position as manager, and on the trial insisted that the contract was only to pay the plaintiff $25 per week between the dates mentioned, without reference to the particular grade of the position in which the plaintiff should be employed. It further appeared that plaintiff was offered another position as a saleswoman by another firm at $20

[1918] 1 K. B. 315, 324, where the plaintiff was to receive a commission upon net profits of the business he was appointed to manage and where, accordingly, he was allowed to recover for wrongful dismissal, although the defendants were not found to be unwilling to continue the payment of the plaintiff's salary, the same judge said of Turner v. Sawdon & Co., supra: "I need not point out the serious results which might follow if Turner v. Sawdon & Co. were to apply to all cases of employment. The judgment of Sterling, L. J., recognizes that the decision of the Court of Appeal may not apply to certain occupations, e. g., to an actor or public singer. In many cases, moreover, a man may enter into the service of another for a long period and at a low wage for the direct purpose of gaining business experience or mechanical skill. It will suffice to say that in my view Turner v. Sawdon & Co. does not apply to the present case. There the servant was paid by salary only. Here the plaintiff might become entitled to a large commission on the net profits (if made) of the company. He had, therefore, the right to ask that he should have a full opportunity of earning such commission. The defendants wholly deprived him of such opportunity. A vital distinction, therefore, exists between the facts here and the facts in Turner v. Sawdon & Co." Compare Meyer-Bridges Co. v. American Warehouse Co., 94 Kans. 288 (1915), where an employer of one who was engaged to sell on commission was held obligated to fix reasonable prices so that the sales might be made and commissions earned.

per week, which she refused to accept. The action was tried by a jury in the municipal court of Duluth, and a judgment in plaintiff's favor was affirmed on appeal to the district court.

The contentions of the respective parties as to the terms of the contract were fully submitted to the jury; but the instructions were to the effect that, if the contract of hiring was that plaintiff was to be employed as manager, she was not required to accept employment as saleswoman. Defendant claims this as error, arguing that there is practically no difference in such employments, inasmuch as the manager of the department acts also as a saleswoman, her duties as manager being merely additional responsibilities, and that relieving the plaintiff of them involved no degradation or loss of caste, and imposed upon her no duties which were dissimilar to some of those formerly performed by her.

The authorities seem to support the conclusions upon this subject given in Wood's Master & Servant, § 127. The servant, discharged in violation of the contract of hiring, prima facie is entitled to recover the agreed wages for the full term, subject to his duty to be reasonably diligent in seeking other employment of a similar kind, and, if obtained, the compensation received therefor is to be deducted from the aggregate agreed amount. "By other employment is meant employment of a character such as that in which he was employed, or not of a more menial kind." Id. § 127; Bennett v. Morton, 46 Minn. 113, 48 N. W. 678; Wilkinson v. Black, 80 Ala. 329; Farrell v. School District, 98 Mich. 43, 56 N. W. 1053; Costigan v. Mohawk & Hudson R. R. Co., 2 Denio (N. Y.) 609, 43 Am. Dec. 758; Fuchs v. Koemer, 107 N. Y. 529, 14 N. E. 445; Kramer v. Wolf Cigar Store, 99 Tex. 597; 91 S. W. 775; Leatherberry v. Odell, Ragan & Co. (C. C.) 7 Fed. 641.

Under the evidence in this case, we consider it a very close question whether the positions of manager and saleswoman in one of defendant's departments are so dissimilar that an employé, when tendered the same salary, is not required to accept either (Squire v. Wright, 1 Mo. App. 172), but have concluded that, if the master deliberately enters into a contract providing for the employment of another as manager, the employé has a right to insist upon retaining that grade, in the absence of any showing which would justify the master in reducing the rank of the servant. The grade of the employment may have been the inducing cause for this contract. When the change was proposed, the season for obtaining positions of that character had advanced, and while, perhaps, a very slight cause might have been sufficient to have justified defendant's action, we think, in the absence of a showing of some cause, the defendant must be held to have broken the contract.

Order affirmed.

EX PARTE CHALMERS.

IN RE EDWARDS.

(Court of Appeal in Chancery, 1873. L. R., 8 Ch. App., 289.)

This was an appeal from a decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. On the 19th of October, 1870, Messrs. Hall Brothers & Shaw, of Widnes, contracted to sell to the bankrupt Edwards 330 tons of bleaching-powder, upon terms which were stated in the following letter written by their agent:—

“Dear Sir,—I have this day sold to you, on account of Messrs. Hall Brothers & Shaw, Widnes, 330 tons of bleaching-powder, 35 per cent, at 8s. 6d. per cwt., free on board here, to be delivered thirty tons per month from February to December, 1871 both inclusive. To be packed in oak casks, and to be unbranded. Payment by cash in fourteen days from date of each delivery, deducting 2½ discount.”

Under the terms of this contract the monthly instalments up to and including the October instalment were delivered and paid for. The November instalment was delivered, but was not paid for.

On the 20th of December, 1871, Edwards called a meeting of his creditors, at which he declared himself insolvent. Messrs. Hall & Co. attended this meeting, and on the 23d of December they wrote a letter to Edwards in the following terms:—

“We give you notice that we refuse to deliver any more bleaching-powder upon contract.”

Accordingly, the December instalment of bleaching-powder was never delivered.

On the 1st of January, 1872, Edwards filed petition for liquidation by arrangement; but on the 19th of January it was resolved to proceed in bankruptcy, and he was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 8th of February following. Mr. Chalmers was subsequently appointed trustee.

Under these circumstances the trustee claimed the delivery of the thirty tons of bleaching-powder, and on Hall & Co. refusing to deliver them, he claimed, in the County Court of Liverpool, damages amounting to £150 against Hall & Co., for their breach of the contract. The County Court Judge having refused his application, the trustee applied to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, who affirmed the decision of the County Court Judge. The trustee now renewed the application before the Court of Appeal.

SIR G. MELLISH, L. J. The first question that arises is, what are the rights of a seller of goods when the purchaser becomes insolvent before the contract for sale has been completely performed? I am of opinion that the result of the authorities is this—that in such a case the seller, notwithstanding he may have agreed to allow credit for the goods, is not bound to deliver any more goods under the contract until the price of the goods not yet delivered is tendered to him; and that, if a debt is due to him for goods already delivered, he is entitled to refuse to deliver any more till he is paid the debt due for those already delivered, as well as the price of those still to be delivered. In Bloxam v. Sanders, 4 B. & C. 941, 948, Bayley, J., says: "If goods are sold upon credit, and nothing is agreed upon as to the time of delivering the goods, the vendee is immediately entitled to the possession, and the right of possession and the right of property vest at once in him; but his right of possession is not absolute, it is liable to be defeated if he becomes insolvent before he obtains possession. Whether default in payment when the credit expires will destroy his right of possession if he has not before that time obtained actual possession, and put him in the same situation as if there had been no bargain for credit, it is not now necessary to inquire, because this is a case of insolvency, and in a case of insolvency the point seems to be perfectly clear: Hanson v. Meyer, 6 East, 614. If the seller has despatched the goods to the buyer, and insolvency occurs, he has a right, in virtue of his original ownership, to stop them in transitu. Why? Because the property is vested in the buyer so as to subject him to the risk of any accident; but he has not an indefeasible right to the possession, and his insolvency, without payment of the price, defeats that right. And if this be the case after he has despatched the goods, and whilst they are in transitu, a fortiori is it when he has never parted with the goods, and when no transitus has begun. The buyer, or those who stand in his place, may still obtain the right of possession if they will pay or tender the price, or they may still act upon their right of property if anything unwarrantable is done to that right."

In Wentworth v. Outhwaite, 10 M. & W. 436, 452, Parke, B., says: "What the effect of stoppage in transitu is, whether entirely to rescind the contract or only to replace the vendor in the same position as if he had not parted with the possession, and entitle him to hold the goods until the price be paid down, is a point not yet finally decided, and there are difficulties attending each construction. If the latter supposition be adopted (as most of us are strongly inclined to think it ought to be, on the weight of authority), the vendor is entitled to retain the part actually stopped in transitu till he is paid the price of the whole, but has no right to retake that which has arrived at its journey's end. His right of lien on the part stopped is revested, but no more."

And in Griffiths v. Perry, 1 E. & E. 680, 688, Crompton, J., says: "A vendor's lien on specific goods sold is gone when a bill is given for the price, but revives if that bill is dishonored before he has parted with possession of the goods; or rather, he then acquires, not a lien, strictly speaking, but a right of withholding delivery, analogous to the right of an unpaid vendor to stop in transitu. Miles v. Gorton, 2 Cr. & M. 504, and many other cases, show that a part delivery of the goods does not do away with the right to withhold delivery of the rest, unless such part delivery is intended as a delivery of the whole. Then does it make any difference here that the goods were not specific goods? I think that Valpy v. Oakeley, 16 Q. B. 941, is conclusive to show that it does not; and I consider that case to have been rightly decided. * * * When, then, is the position of the parties upon the bill becoming dishonored and the vendee insolvent? According to Lord Abinger's view of the law in Miles v. Gorton, the contract to deliver is thereby put an end to altogether. I am not inclined to go so far as to say that; but I think that, at all events, the vendor has a right, in such a state of things, to say to the vendee, 'I will not deliver the goods until I see that I shall get my price paid.' So, in the present case the plaintiff, or his assignees in bankruptcy, could not, I think, call upon the defendant to deliver the rest of the iron without paying him for it."

In both Bloxam v. Sanders and Wentworth v. Outhwaite there had been a sale of specific goods, not merely an agreement to sell goods to be delivered by instalments; but it would be strange if the right of a vendor, who had agreed to deliver goods by instalments were less than that of a vendor who had sold specific goods; and the judgment of Crompton, J., in Griffiths v. Perry, to which I have referred, shows clearly that there is no difference between the two cases.

I am, therefore, of opinion that, in the present case, when the insolvency of the purchaser had been declared, the vendor was not bound to deliver any more goods until the price of the goods delivered in November, as well as those which were to be delivered in December, had been tendered to him. The only question then is, what was the effect of the vendor's letter of the 23d of December? Mr. Russell argued that the refusal to perform a contract before the time arrives for its performance is in itself a breach of the contract. But that can only be the case where the person who refuses to perform the contract is not entitled to refuse. Had the vendor in this case a right to refuse? In my view that depends upon the question whether the insolvent purchaser was ready and willing to pay the price both of the November and December instalments. It is clear that he was not. I admit that the mere non-payment of the price of the November instalment did not of itself give a right to the vendor to refuse to perform the contract; and I agree with what was said by Crompton, J., in Griffiths v. Perry, that the mere fact of the insolvency of the purchaser did not put an end to the contract. It certainly would be very unfair if it had that effect; for if the insolvent had any beneficial contracts remaining, it would be hard on him as well as on his creditors if they could not have the benefit of those contracts. But if an insolvent has any such beneficial contracts, it is his duty to inform his creditors or the Court of Bankruptcy, if the case be within its jurisdiction, of the fact, and he can then apply to have a sufficient part of his assets applied for the completion of the contracts, and if the contracts were beneficial this would, without doubt, be allowed by his creditors or by the court. If this were done, and due notice were given to the vendor, I entertain no doubt that he would be bound to complete the contract on his part, and would not be allowed to take advantage of the insolvency of the other party to put an end to the contract. But where the insolvent or his trustee does nothing of the kind, he practically gives notice to his creditors and those with whom he has contracted that he does not mean to pay any of his debts or perform any of his contracts. In the present case, Edwards, by calling his creditors together and informing them of his insolvency, practically gave notice to Hall & Co. that he did not mean to pay them either for the November or the December instalment. Indeed he could not pay for the November instalment without the consent of the other creditors; it would have been a fraudulent preference. Both parties knew that he had no intention of paying any further sum; and Hall & Co.'s letter of the 23d of December only means that on the assumption, which assumption they were, under the circumstances, justified in making, that the November and December instalments would not be paid, they refused to deliver any more bleaching-powder. In my opinion they had a right to say that, and they committed no breach of the contract by writing the letter. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.¹⁰⁰

"The insolvency of one party to a contract does not release the other from its obligations, provided always the consideration promised, if money, be paid, or if the consideration be the note or other obligation of the insolvent, money be tendered in its place." Field, J., in Florence Mining Co. v. Brown, 124 U. S. 385, 389 (1888). See Pratt v. Mfg. Co., 115 Wis. 648 (1902).

"The only question of difficulty is concerning the duty of the solvent party to tender performance on the chance that the trustee in bankruptcy may wish to assume the contract. It has been held that bankruptcy does not discharge the solvent party from making such a tender. It seems, however, that this rule is a harsh one. In most cases contracts made by bankrupts are not carried out, and it seems a justifiable assumption for the solvent party in a particular case that the contract is not going to be carried out, in the absence of an assertion by the trustee in bankruptcy of his intention to adopt the contract." Williston on Sales, sec. 662, p. 1112.

In Hanna v. Florence Iron Co., 222 N. Y. 290, 295 (1918), Hiscock, C. J., for the majority of the court, said of receivers of a company which had become involved in financial difficulties: "It would not have been enough that after their appointments they did not repudiate and refuse to carry out said contract. It was necessary for them to do more than this and under authority of the court affirmatively indicate their election to proceed with the same and hold the other party to the obligations thereof."

On the rights of a trustee in bankruptcy with respect to executory contracts of the bankrupt, see L. R. A. 1917 F, 657, note.

In Hobbs et al. v. Columbia Falls Brick Co., 157 Mass. 109 (1892), Morton, J., in an action on a contract for the sale and delivery of brick, where the buyers had become insolvent and had made a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, of which they gave notice to the seller, said for the court: "The jury

CRUMMEY v. RAUDENBUSH.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1893. 55 Minn. 426, 56 N. W. 1113.)

Action by George B. CrummeY against S. W. Raudenbush for breach of contract of sale. Judgment was ordered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

MITCHELL, J. Stated according to its legal effect, the contract, upon which this action was brought, was an executory one for the sale of a piano by defendant to plaintiff, a part of the price being paid at the date of the contract, and the balance to be paid in quarterly installments from and after the date of the delivery of the piano. The action is for damages for a refusal to supply the piano according to the contract. It is not alleged that the balance of the price has ever been paid or tendered, the plaintiff standing on the terms of the contract that it was to be furnished on credit. Much of the answer consists of entirely irrelevant matters, the only defense alleged being that since the making of the contract the plaintiff had become, and still is, insolvent, and the only important question in the case is whether the defendant has established a defense justifying his refusal to deliver the piano on that ground. Where a vendor contracts to sell personal property on credit, he thereby agrees to waive his lien for the purchase money; but he does so on the implied condition that the vendee shall keep his credit good. If, therefore, before payment, and while the vendor still retains possession of the property, he discovers that the vendee is insolvent, he may hold the goods as could properly have regarded the giving of the notice of the assignment as equivalent to the plaintiffs saying that they could not go on with the contract, especially when taken in connection with all the other circumstances. Morgan v. Bain, L. R., 10 C. P. 15; In re Steel Co., 4 Ch. Div. 108; Ex parte Stapleton, 10 Ch. Div. 586; Ex parte Chalmers, L. R., 8 Ch. App. 289.

"While the fact that the plaintiffs became insolvent after entering into the contract would of itself not have terminated the contract, it was competent for the jury to find that the notice which they gave to the defendant of the assignment, and their subsequent conduct [in failing to list the contract among their assets], justified the defendant in the assumption that they had abandoned the contract. The conduct of the assignees, assuming that the contract passed to them, does not put the matter in any better shape for the plaintiffs. It was their duty within a reasonable time after the assignment to elect whether to proceed or not with the contract, and to notify the defendant accordingly. Ex parte Chalmers, supra; Ex parte Stapleton, supra. They did not do this. On the contrary, when the defendant's treasurer inquired whether they were going to claim the contract, the reply which he got left on his mind the impression that they were not. They did nothing to indicate that they were going to claim it, and did not offer to pay or in any way secure the defendant for the performance of the contract. They continued to hold the property assigned to them till April 17th [more than three months after the notice of the assignment], without taking any action in reference to the contract, when they reconveyed it to the plaintiffs, who could derive no higher right from the assignees than they themselves possessed."

security for the price. The insolvency of the vendee does not rescind the contract, and is not of itself a ground for rescission. It merely entitles the vendor to demand payment in cash before parting with possession of the property. Courts have differed as to the name to be given to this right, but they all recognize its existence. Like the analogous right of stoppage in transitu, it grows out of the vendor's original ownership and dominion, and is founded on the equitable principle that one man's property ought not to go to pay another man's debt. The right is not limited to cases where the insolvency of the vendee occurred after the date of the contract, but exists also even where the insolvency existed at that time, but was not discovered by the vendor until afterwards; and, as the presumption of both reason and law is that, where a vendor sold goods on credit, he believed that the purchaser was solvent and able to pay, the burden is on the vendee to prove that the vendor had knowledge of the insolvency at the time, and entered into the contract with that knowledge. The right is not affected by the fact that part of the price has been paid; and it makes no difference whether the sale was of a specific article appropriated to the contract, or, as in this case, a contract to supply an article of a certain description. The term "insolvent" is not used in any technical sense. It is not necessary that the vendee should have been adjudged a bankrupt or insolvent, or have made an assignment of his property. Insolvency, as applied to this branch of law, means a general inability to pay one's debts or to meet one's financial engagements. Passing to the facts of this case, an examination of the evidence satisfies us that it amply justified the trial court in finding that the plaintiff was insolvent in the fullest sense of the term. It follows that defendant had a right to refuse to deliver the property without payment in full of the price, provided he properly asserted that right, and had not in some way waived it.

The contract was made in April, 1889. The evidence is practically undisputed that for some two years afterwards the defendant was not only able and ready to furnish the piano, but repeatedly urged the plaintiff to come and select an instrument, but that he failed to do so, giving as a reason his inability to meet the payments. Finally, in the winter or early spring of 1893, after defendant had ceased to represent that make of piano in the trade, and hence no longer kept it in stock, the plaintiff for the first time formally demanded the delivery of the instrument within a specified time. Failing in some efforts to induce plaintiff to accept a piano of another kind, the defendant required some assurance that, if he procured a piano of the kind called for by the contract, the plaintiff would be ready to pay for it in cash, or give a mortgage on the instrument to secure the purchase price. The plaintiff positively refused to agree to do either, and insisted on the terms of the original contract for the delivery of the property on credit, which defendant as positively refused to do. The evidence would fully justify the conclusion that the defendant was always willing to furnish the piano if plaintiff would pay the price in cash, or secure it by mortgage on the property, and that his refusal merely went to the extent of refusing to furnish it on credit without security. But at no time during the negotiations did defendant assign the insolvency of the plaintiff as his reason for demanding cash or security, or give any special reason for doing so, except that when demanding the mortgage he said it was the custom of the trade. On this ground plaintiff's counsel invoke the doctrine that if a person, when called upon to deliver, places his right to retain the goods upon a ground inconsistent with a claim by virtue of a special lien, this is a waiver of the lien; and that on the trial he will not be permitted to rest his refusal on a different and distinct ground from that on which he claimed to retain the property at the time of the demand. An examination of the authorities on the subject, from the early case of Boardman v. Sill, 1 Camp. 410, down, satisfies us that they all proceed upon principles essentially of equitable estoppel, and limit the application of the doctrine invoked by counsel to cases where the refusal to deliver the property was put on grounds inconsistent with the existence of a lien, or on grounds entirely independent of it, without mentioning a lien. Thus it has been repeatedly held that a lien is not waived by mere omission to assert it as the ground of refusal, or by a general refusal to surrender the goods, without specifying the ground of it, except in certain cases, where the lien was unknown to the person making the demand, and that fact was known to the person on whom the demand was made. In such cases, if the ground of the refusal is one that can be removed, the other party ought in fairness to have an opportunity to do so. But no such state of facts exists in this case. While defendant did not specify his vendor's lien by reason of plaintiff's insolvency as the ground of his refusal, yet he never placed his refusal on any ground inconsistent with or independent of it. On the contrary, from first to last, what he insisted on was payment of, or security for, the price of the property; and the ground of his refusal was the refusal of plaintiff to give either. True, at the last, he announced his positive refusal to furnish the piano unless plaintiff would agree to give a chattel mortgage on it,—a thing which he had no legal right to insist on; but it is very evident that this demand on defendant's part was merely an alternative for payment in cash, which he had a right to demand, but which plaintiff had refused. The plaintiff probably had a right to be informed, as he was, that the property was held for the purchase money, for that was a matter which he could remedy by payment, but it would have availed him nothing to be informed that defendant's right to retain the property for the price was based on his insolvency, for that was a fact which he could not have changed. We can see nothing in defendant's acts of omission or commission that amounted to a waiver of his title, or which should estop him from now asserting it.

The rulings of the trial court on the admissibility of evidence as to plaintiff's insolvency were not always correct, or even consistent; but the only error of which plaintiff could complain is that, in one instance, the defendant was allowed to give his opinion that plaintiff was insolvent. We think, however, that this was error without prejudice, for the reason that the other evidence, such as plaintiff's own admission of inability to pay; the inability of others, after search and inquiry, to find any property belonging to him; and that he was not in any business in this state, of which he had practically ceased to be a resident,—was such as, in the absence of any rebutting evidence, to require a finding that he was insolvent.

WITHERS v. REYNOLDS.

(Court of King's Bench, 1831. 2 Barnewall & Adolphus, 882.)

ASSUMPSIT for not delivering straw to the plaintiff pursuant to agreement. At the trial before Lord Tenterden, C. J., the agreement proved was as follows:

"John Reynolds undertakes and agrees to supply Joseph Withers with wheat straw of good quality sufficient for his use as a stablekeeper, and delivered on his premises as above" (that is, at Long Acre, London) "till the 24th of June, 1830, at the sum of thirty-three shillings per load of thirty-six trusses, to be delivered at the rate of three loads in a fortnight, in a dry state and without damage. And the said J. W. hereby agrees to pay to the said J. R. or his order the sum of thirty-three shillings per load for each load of straw so delivered on his premises from this day till the 24th of June, 1830, according to the terms of this agreement.

(Signed.) "JOSEPH WITHERS, JOHN REYNOLDS."

The straw was regularly sent in from October 20th, 1829, when this agreement was made, till the end of January, 1830. At that time the plaintiff being in arrear for several loads of straw, the defendant called ¹⁰⁰ "We do not deny that under some circumstances a refusal to accept goods for a stated reason may operate as a waiver of other objections which might have been properly made. This may be so in cases where the silence of the purchaser and his conduct operate to mislead the seller and prevent him from protecting himself, in other words, where the conduct of the buyer would raise an estoppel against him. See Johnson v. Oppenheim, 55 N. Y. 280, 291; Smith v. Pettie, 70 N. Y. 13, 16-17. But when the buyer has absolutely rejected the goods, for whatever reason, his silence as to other objections which would justify his refusal to accept, when unaccompanied by conduct which may have misled and prejudiced the vendor, cannot be construed as a waiver of the buyer's right to insist on his plea of nonperformance on those grounds." Davis, J., in The List & Sons Co. v. Chase, 80 Oh. St. 42, 50-51 (1909).

In Green v. Edgar, 21 Hun (N. Y.) 414 (1880), it was held, "that a servant may be discharged by the master from his employment, provided a sufficient cause actually exists, whether the same was known to or assigned by the master at the time of the discharge or not."

upon him for the amount, and he thereupon tendered to the defendant £11 11s., being the price of all the straw delivered except the last load, saying that he should always keep one load in hand. The defendant objected to this; but was at length obliged to take the sum offered, and he then told the plaintiff that he would send no more straw unless it was paid for on delivery, and accordingly no more was sent. On the part of the defendant it was submitted that there must be a non-suit, inasmuch as the plaintiff, on his own showing, had not performed his own part of the contract, which was, in effect, to pay for each load on delivery. Lord Tenterden, C. J., was of this opinion, but directed a verdict for the plaintiff, reserving the point. A rule nisi was afterward obtained for entering a nonsuit.

LORD TENTERDEN, C. J. I am of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. There is, I think, no doubt that by the terms of this agreement the plaintiff was to pay for the loads of straw as they were delivered. If that were not so, the defendant would have been liable to the inconvenience of giving credit for an indefinite length of time, and, in case of non-payment, bringing an action for a very large sum of money, which does not appear to have been intended by the contract. Then the only question is, whether upon the plaintiff's saying, "I will not pay for the goods on delivery" (for that was the effect of his communication to the defendant), it was incumbent on the defendant to go on supplying straw; and he clearly was not obliged to do so.

PARKE, J. The substance of the agreement was, that the straw should be paid for on delivery. The defendant clearly did not contemplate giving credit. When, therefore, the plaintiff said that he would not pay on delivery (as he did in substance, when he insisted on keeping one load in hand), the defendant was not obliged to go on supplying him.

TAUNTON, J. The contract does not say merely that so much straw shall be supplied at thirty shillings a load, but it adds, that the plaintiff shall pay that sum "for each load of straw delivered on his premises," from the date of the agreement till June 24th, 1830. That prima facie imports that each load was to be paid for as delivered.

PATTESON, J. If the plaintiff had merely failed to pay for any particular load, that, of itself, might not have been an excuse to the defendant for delivering no more straw, but the plaintiff here expressly refuses to pay for the loads as delivered; the defendant, therefore, is not liable for ceasing to perform his part of the contract.

*Rule absolute.*¹¹⁰

¹¹⁰ "The question then arises whether the persistent maintenance of an untenable construction of a contract on a matter of essential substance should be regarded as not consistent with a continuing intention to observe the contractual obligations. I think that the answer should be in the affirmative." Lord Parmoor in Morris v. Baron & Co., [1908] A. C. 1, 41.

"Making a demand that defendants give a guaranty for future fulfillment of

HJORTH ET AL. v. ALBERT LEA MACHINERY CO.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1919. 142 Minn. 387, 172 N. W. 488.)

Action by William Hjorth and others, co-partners under the name and style of Wm. Hjorth & Co., against the Albert Lea Machinery Company, the contract, 'and without which we shall consider the contract at an end,' was a repudiation of it." Eakin, C. J., in Armsby v. Grays Harbor Commercial Co., 62 Ore. 173, 181 (1912).

"It is a familiar principle of law that a valid contract cannot be abrogated or modified unless both parties assent, and if one of the parties, when the other is not in default, manifests in unequivocal language his intention not to perform the contract unless it is modified, he breaches the contract, and is liable therefor." Roraback, J., in Trowbridge v. Jefferson Auto Co., 92 Conn. 569, 573 (1918).

In Chess & Wymond Co. v. La Crosse Box Co. (Wis.), 181 N. W. 313 (1921), there were two orders, treated as resulting in one contract for eleven cars of material and after six cars were delivered the buyer, who was to pay for each shipment within 30 days, but who insisted that the material was defective in quality, sent word through its bank that to make sure that the remaining cars would be shipped it would hold a balance of about $400 due to be paid on the arrival of another car. The seller first refused to go on with deliveries until paid and then wrote cancelling the contract. In affirming a judgment for the seller, in denial of any right of the buyer to counterclaim for failing to deliver, Rosenberry, J., for the court, said:

"Prior to the enactment of the Uniform Sales Act, the great weight of authority in this country sustained the proposition that failure to pay for one installment by the buyer excuses the seller from delivering the rest, and this generally without regard to the reason for the buyer's failure. 2 Williston on Contracts, 867, and cases there cited; 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 2, note. The matter is thoroughly treated in 5 Page on Contracts, at paragraphs 3008-3022. A renunciation by one party of the terms of a contract of sale is, under all the authorities, a breach of the contract, and justifies the opposite party in treating the contract as broken and rescinding and avoiding it at his election. Murphy v. Sagola Lumber Co., 125 Wis. 363, 103 N. W. 1113; 5 Page on Contracts, 3013.

"In this case we are not dealing with the mere inadvertence of the buyer to make payment for an installment, nor with a situation where payment is delayed by reason of some controversy as to quantity or quality, but with a straight-out refusal to pay in accordance with the terms of the contract.

"This, as was held in Ambler v. Sanaiko, 168 Wis. 286, 170 N. W. 270, constitutes, as a matter of law, a breach of the contract. This is true both under the Uniform Sales Act and under the law as it stood prior to the passage of that act. While in a particular case, whether the breach by reason of the failure to deliver an installment or to accept and pay for it is a material breach or not, is generally a question for the jury (Dupont v. United Zinc Co., 85 N. J. Law, 416, 89 Atl. 992), where the conduct of the buyer amounts to a renunciation of the contract, the seller may elect to treat it as a breach.

"In this case the buyer not only refused payment, but proposed to hold the moneys then in his hands belonging to the plaintiffs as security for the further performance of the contract. This constituted a clear departure from the contract, and amounted, as was said in Murphy v. Sagola Lumber Co., to an announcement that the buyer had declined to carry out the contract according to its terms, and justified the plaintiff in its refusal to further perform. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366. See, also, with counterclaim by defendant. From a judgment allowing counterclaim, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

HALLAM, J.¹¹¹ Plaintiff sued to recover $966.51, the price of merchandise sold and delivered. Defendant admitted the sale and the price, but set up two counterclaims, one for damages for failure to deliver other merchandise which plaintiff contracted to sell, and the other for breach of warranty of quality of some of the merchandise delivered.

As to the first counterclaim: Plaintiff is a manufacturer of tools at Jamestown, N. Y., and defendant is a jobber of tools at Albert Lea, Minn. From time to time during the year 1916 defendant ordered from plaintiff wrenches and pliers. Plaintiff accepted these orders. The contract relation was therefore complete. A large quantity of the articles so sold plaintiff failed to deliver. The court found that the failure was without excuse. * * *

4. Plaintiff claims that it was relieved of the obligation to make the deliveries which it failed to make because defendant had failed to pay for the merchandise that plaintiff had delivered, in accordance with the contract of sale. The contract provided that defendant should pay for all goods shipped within 30 days from the date of invoice. The orders for the goods involved were given and accepted between March 7 and October 13, 1916. During the early months payments were made in a manner satisfactory to plaintiffs. On the last day of September $126.67 fell due, and on October 13th $286.73 more. On this latter date plaintiff commenced making insistent demands for payment. On November 10th it informed defendant it would ship no more unless payment was made for indebtedness past due. Defendant refused to pay.

The attitude of both parties is expressed in the following correspondence: On November 7th defendant wrote:

"We absolutely refuse to make payment on your past-due invoice until you have made us shipments that will cut down the goods that we have coming from you." "In proportion to what your shipments of goods to us from this on cut down the unfilled orders, we would cut down your past due invoices to us by making remittances to you to apply on them." "We are willing to allow you to ship us goods from now on, draft with bill of lading."

In reply to this plaintiff wrote on November 10th:

"We are not going to ship you any goods with sight draft and bill of lading attached or any other way until you have taken care of the accounts that are now past due."

There is much conflict in authority as to the effect, in case of contracts calling for installment deliveries and installment payments, of failure of the vendee to pay an installment when due. We need discuss the law only as it pertains to the state of facts presented in this case. This court said in one case that the vendee's failure "without excuse" to make an instalment payment when due relieves the vendor from making further instalment deliveries. Robson v. Bohn, 27 Minn. 333, 346, 7 N. W. 357. See Palmer v. Breen, 34 Minn. 39, 24 N. W. 322; Beatty v. Howe Lumber Co., 77 Minn. 272, 79 N. W. 1013. See, also, Uniform Sales Act (Laws 1917, c. 465) § 45 (Gen. St. Supp. 1917, § 6015-45).

Such language would seem to mean that, though an instalment is due, failure to pay may be based on so just an excuse that it will not relieve the vendor from further deliveries, and this we conceive to be the law. But what is a just excuse for refusal to pay an instalment that has become due?

In Union Pressed Brick Co. v. Fultonham Brick & Drain Tile Co., 112 Fed. 920, 50 C. C. A. 615, the court pointed out one excuse which was considered sufficient when it said that failure to make an installment payment absolved the plaintiff from obligation to make further deliveries "unless such failure was justified by plaintiff's failure to fill orders required by the contract."

In Freeth v. Burr, L. R. 9 C. P. 208, the buyer's refusal to pay for the first instalment, claiming a right to withhold to cover loss due to delay in delivery, was held not to be such a refusal on his part to comply with the contract as to set the seller free.

In Myer v. Wheeler, 65 Iowa, 309, 21 N. W. 692, plaintiffs sold defendant ten carloads of barley. Defendants were to pay 70 cents per bushel for each carload when delivered. On receipt of the first carload, the defendants refused to pay, upon the ground that the barley was not equal to the sample, but stated that they had given the plaintiffs credit for 65 cents per bushel, and would withhold payment until the 10 cars were delivered, and urged shipment of the remainder. It was held that plaintiffs were liable for damages resulting from nondelivery of the remainder.

In Winchester et al. v. Newton, 2 Allen (Mass.) 492, a seller agreed to deliver timber within a certain time. The price was to be paid six months after delivery. Later the time for delivery of a part was extended. The buyer refused to pay for the part first delivered, contending that he was not liable to so pay until six months after the delivery of all. The court said the buyer was wrong in his contention, but there was no prospective refusal to pay for goods to be later shipped. The refusal to pay was based on what the buyer conceived to be the legal effect of the contract, and did not discharge the seller from his promise to deliver the later instalment.

In this case the court found in substance that defendant did not owe the full amount claimed. It had been subjected to substantial damages from plaintiff's default. Unless further deliveries were made, the damage would virtually wipe out plaintiff's claim. Defendant offered to pay cash on delivery for all goods to be subsequently shipped, and so far as appears it was solvent and able to do so. But plaintiff insisted on payment of the face of its account in full. Defendant was willing to do even this, waiving all damages for past default, if at that late day its orders could be filled. But it could get no satisfactory assurance as to future deliveries. It was not willing to pay plaintiff's demand in full with the prospect of being compelled to assert its claim for damages far from home. Our opinion is that defendant was justified in its position, and that plaintiff's refusal to make further delivery was a breach of contract and rendered plaintiff liable in damages. * * *

Order affirmed.

HOARE AND OTHERS v. RENNIE AND ANOTHER.

(Court of Exchequer, 1859. 5 Hurlstone & Norman, 19.)

Declaration. First count: That, on the 21st of April, A. D. 1857, the defendants agreed to buy of the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs then agreed to sell to the defendants, about 667 tons of hammered Swede bar iron of certain sizes, then agreed on between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the said iron to be shipped from Sweden in the months of June, July, August, and September next, and in about equal portions each month, at 15*l.* 10*s.* per ton, delivered in good condition ex ship, on arrival in the port of London; and it was thereby then further agreed, amongst other things, that no shipment should exceed 150 tons, which should be in proportionate quantities of each size; but that, if any variation therein, it should not exceed one ton, and such variation to be corrected in subsequent shipments; that sellers should have the option of commencing shipments in May, 1857, and also of completing the whole by the end of July, 1857; that ships' names should be declared as soon as known to the sellers; that if any should be lost on the voyage the quantity lost should be null and void; and that there should be discount at the rate of two and a half per cent for cash against each delivery. Averments: That plaintiffs had done all things necessary on their part to be done, &c.; and though all things had happened and all times had elapsed to entitle them to have the said iron accepted, yet the defendants have wholly refused to accept the said iron or any part thereof, or to pay for the same according to the terms of the said agreement, whereby the plaintiffs lost divers profits, &c.

Second count: That on the 21st of April, A. D. 1857, the plaintiffs agreed to sell to the defendants, and the defendants agreed to buy of the plaintiffs, about 667 tons of hammered iron, upon the terms in the first count mentioned; and that from the time of the making the agreement continually until after the refusal, notice, and discharge herein-after mentioned, the plaintiffs did and performed all conditions precedent, and all things were done, and all times elapsed, necessary to entitle them to the performance of the agreement on the part of the defendants; and that at and after the refusal, notice, and discharge hereinafter mentioned, they were ready and willing to perform the agreement on their part; and although the plaintiffs, in part performance of said agreement, did, in June, A. D. 1857, ship a certain portion of the said iron, and did, in further performance of such agreement, and within a reasonable time after such shipment, tender to the defendants, and offered to deliver to them the said portion of iron so shipped as aforesaid, yet the defendants refused to accept the said portion of iron so tendered and offered, and thenceforth wholly refused to accept the same or any of the residue of the said iron, and gave notice to the plaintiffs that they would not accept the residue of the said iron; and the defendants thenceforth wholly refused to observe the agreement on their part, and wholly discharged the plaintiffs from the further execution and performance of the agreement by them; and wholly waived such execution and performance, whereby, etc.

Third plea to the first count. That the plaintiffs did not avail themselves of the option given to them by the agreement of commencing shipments of the iron in the month of May; and that the plaintiffs in the month of June shipped from Sweden, on board a certain vessel, a quantity of the said iron so contracted for, to-wit, 21 tons, 6 cwt., 1 qr., being a much less quantity than was required to be shipped during the said month of June, according to the terms of the said contract, and gave notice to the defendants that the said iron was to be part of the iron so agreed to be sold as aforesaid; that the plaintiffs failed to complete the shipment for the month of June according to the terms of the contract, and were never ready and willing to deliver to the defendants such a quantity of iron, shipped from Sweden in June, as is specified in the said contract, although none of the iron was lost during the voyage; and were not ready and willing to deliver to the defendants the said small quantity of iron which had been shipped during the month of June, until after the month of June had elapsed, and until after the defendants had notice that the plaintiffs were not ready and willing, and were unable to fulfil their part of the said agreement with reference to the quantity of iron to be shipped in June; and that the defendants, having notice of all the premises in this plea mentioned, did afterward refuse to receive the said quantity of iron so shipped as aforesaid during the month of June, and did give notice to the plaintiffs that they refused to receive the residue of the said iron.

The sixth plea, to the second count, was similar to the third plea.

The plaintiffs demurred to the third and sixth pleas, and the defendants joined in demurrer.

POLLOCK, C. B.¹¹² We are all agreed that the defendants are entitled to judgment upon the pleas. The foundation of my opinion is shortly this, that a man has no right to say that which is a breach of an agreement is a performance of it. On that ground this case is distinguishable from almost every other which has been cited. It does not turn upon any question of condition precedent. The only question is whether, if a man who is bound to perform his part of a contract does not do so, he can enforce the contract against another party. The plaintiffs contracted with the defendants to ship a large quantity of iron in June, July, August, and September, about one-fourth part in each month: but instead of shipping about 160 tons in June, as they should have done, they shipped little more than twenty tons as a performance of the contract. * * * The only question we have to deal with is whether, on a contract like this, if the sellers at the outset send a less quantity than they are bound to send, so as to begin with a breach, they can compel the purchasers to accept and pay for that, the sending of which was a breach and not a performance of the agreement. The argument on the part of the plaintiffs is that this was not a condition precedent. I do not think that is the test. It was said that if the plaintiffs had sent the one-hundredth part instead of one-fourth part in June, the defendants' remedy would have been by a cross action. The case was put of the plaintiff's sending a short quantity after one shipment had been accepted. Possibly that might have made a difference. Where a person has derived a benefit from a contract, he cannot rescind it because the parties cannot be put in statu quo. Probably, therefore, in such case, the defendants could not have repudiated the contract and must have been left to their cross action. Here; however, the defendants refused to accept the first shipment, because, as they say, it was not a performance but a breach of the contract. Where parties have made an agreement for themselves, the courts ought not to make another for them. Here they say that, in the events that have happened, one fourth shall be shipped in each month, and we cannot say that they meant to accept any other quantity. At the outset the plaintiffs failed to tender the quantity according to the contract: they tendered a much less quantity. The defendants had a right to say that this was no performance of the contract, and they were no more bound to accept the short quantity than if a single delivery had been contracted for. Therefore the pleas are an answer to the action.

CHANNELL, B. On the pleas the defendants are entitled to judgment. The substantial question is, whether the defendants were bound to accept the portion which was tendered at the time at which it was tendered. That does not depend on the month in which it was tendered, but on the position of the parties at the time of the tender, by which the defendant was placed in the same situation as if, at the time of the tender, notice had been given to him that there would be no further shipment in all June. I think that there was not in the month of June such a shipment as was made necessary by the contract. * * * There are options to vary the time of performance, which gave the plaintiffs the right to accelerate but not to delay it. The plaintiffs have not performed their part of the contract, and the defendants have not accepted anything which can be construed as an imperfect execution of the contract by the plaintiffs. The defendants were thus at liberty to rescind the contract, and our judgment must therefore be for the defendants upon the demurrer to the pleas.

THE MERSEY STEEL AND IRON CO. (LIMITED), APPELLANT, v.
NAYLOR, BENZON, & CO., RESPONDENTS.

(House of Lords, 1884. 9 App. Cas. 434.)

Appeal from an order (dated June 13, 1882) of the Court of Appeal reversing an order of Lord Coleridge, C. J.

The respondents bought from the appellant company 5,000 tons of steel of the company's make to be delivered 1,000 tons monthly commencing January, 1881, payment within three days after receipt of shipping documents. In January the company delivered part only of that month's instalment, and in the beginning of February made a further delivery. On the 2d of February, shortly before payment for these deliveries became due, a petition was presented to wind up the company. The respondents, bonâ fide, under the erroneous advice of their solicitor that they could not without leave of the court safely pay pending the petition, objected to make the payment then due unless the company obtained the sanction of the court, which they asked the company to obtain. On the 10th of February the company informed the respondents that they should consider the refusal to pay as a breach of contract, releasing the company from any further obligations. On the 15th of February an order was made to wind up the company by the court. A correspondence ensued between the respondents and the liquidator, in which the respondents claimed damages for failure to deliver the January instalment, and a right to deduct those damages from any payments then due; and said that they always had been and still were ready to accept such deliveries and make such payments as ought to be accepted and made under the contract, subject to the right of set-off. The liquidator made no further deliveries, and brought an action in the name of the company for the price of the steel delivered. The respondents counter-claimed for damages for breaches of contract for non-delivery. The referee having found that the damages due to the defendants for non-delivery amounted to £1723, being in excess of the £1713 admitted to be due to the plaintiffs for the price of the steel delivered, the Court of Appeal, by an order dated the 13th of April, 1883, gave judgment for the defendants with costs. The plaintiffs appealed from this order also.

EARL OF SELBORNE, L. C.¹¹⁴ * * * I am content to take the rule as stated by Lord Coleridge in Freeth v. Burr, L. R. 9 C. P. 208, which is in substance, as I understand it, that you must look at the actual circumstances of the case in order to see whether the one party to the contract is relieved from its future performance by the conduct of the other; you must examine what that conduct is, so as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation, to an absolute refusal to perform the contract, such as would amount to a rescission if he had the power to rescind, and whether the other party may accept it as a reason for not performing his part;¹¹⁵ and I think that nothing more is necessary in the present case than to look at the conduct of the parties, and see whether anything of that kind has taken place here. Before doing so, however, I must say one or two words in order to show why * * * to me it is plain beyond the possibility of controversy, that upon the proper construction of this contract it [the payment by the respondents for the iron delivered] is not and cannot be a condition precedent. The contract is for the purchase of 5,000 tons of steel blooms of the company's manufacture; therefore it is one contract for the purchase of that quantity of steel blooms. No doubt there are subsidiary terms in the contract, as to the time of delivery, "Delivery 1,000 tons monthly commencing January next;" and as to the time of payment, "Payment, net cash within three days after receipt of shipping documents;" but that does not split up the contract into as many contracts as there shall be deliveries for the purpose, of so many distinct quantities of iron. It is quite consistent with the natural meaning of the contract, that it is to be one contract for the purchase of that quantity of iron, to be delivered at those times and in that manner, and for which payment is so to be made. It is perfectly clear that no particular payment can be a condition precedent of the entire contract, because the delivery under the contract was most certainly to precede payment; and that being so, I do not see how, without express words, it can possibly be made a condition precedent to the subsequent fulfilment of the unfulfilled part of the contract, by the delivery of the undelivered steel.

But quite consistently with that view, it appears to me, according to the authorities and according to sound reason and principle, that the parties might have so conducted themselves as to release each other from the contract, and that one party might have so conducted himself as to leave it at the option of the other party to relieve himself from a future performance of the contract. The question is whether the facts here justify that conclusion? Now the facts relied upon, without reading all the evidence, are these. The company at the time when the money was about to become payable for the steel actually dethe decisions in these cases must rest. There has been some conflict among them. But I think it may be taken that the fair result of them is as I have stated—viz., that the true question is whether the acts and conduct of the party evince an intention no longer to be bound by the contract. Now, non-payment on the one hand, or non-delivery on the other, may amount to such an act, or may be evidence for a jury of an intention wholly to abandon the contract and set the other party free. That is the true principle on which Hoare v. Rennie, 5 H. & N. 19, was decided, whether rightly or not upon the facts, I will not presume to say. Where by the non-delivery of part of the thing contracted for the whole object of the contract is frustrated, the party making default renounces on his part all the obligations of the contract."

And Keating, J., said: "It is not a mere refusal or omission of one of the contracting parties to do something which he ought to do that will justify the other in repudiating the contract; but there must be an absolute refusal to perform his part of the contract."

livered fell into difficulties, and a petition was presented against them. There was a section in the Companies Act, 1862 (§ 153), which appeared to the advisers of the purchasers to admit of the construction, that until in those circumstances the petition was disposed of by an order for the company to be wound up or otherwise, there would be no one who could receive, and could give a good discharge for, the amount due. There is not, upon the letters and documents, the slightest ground for supposing either that the purchasers could not pay, or that they were unwilling to pay, the amount due; but they acted as they did, evidently bona fide, because they doubted, on the advice of their solicitor, whether that section of the act, as long as the petition was pending, did not make it impossible for them to obtain the discharge to which they had an unquestionable right. And therefore the case which I put during the argument is analogous to that which according to the advice they received they supposed to exist—namely, the case of a man who has died between the delivery and the time when payment ought to be made, he being the only person to whom payment is due; and, of course, until there is a legal personal representative of that person no receipt can be given for the money. By the Act of Parliament, in the event of a winding-up order being made, it would date from the time when the petition was presented; and this clause, which no doubt, according to its true construction, only deals with alienations of the property of the company, was supposed by the solicitor of the purchasers to make it questionable whether the payment of a debt due to the company, to the persons who if there had been no petition would have had a right to receive it, might not be held, in the event of a winding-up order being made, to be a payment of the property of the company to a wrong person and therefore an alienation. I cannot ascribe to their conduct, under these circumstances, the character of a renunciation of the contract, a repudiation of the contract, a refusal to fulfil the contract. It is just the reverse; the purchasers were desirous of fulfilling the contract; they were advised that there was a difficulty in the way, and they expressed anxiety that that difficulty should be as soon as possible removed, by means which were suggested to them, and which they pointed out to the solicitors of the company. The company evidently took up the attitude, in that state of things, of treating the default as one which released them from all further obligation. On the 10th of February, which was before the winding-up order was made, and while that state of things still continued, the company by their secretary wrote to say that they thought (being so far correct and thinking rightly) that the objection was not well founded in law; and they added: "We shall therefore consider your refusal to pay for the goods already delivered as a breach of contract on your part and as releasing us from any further obligations on our part." I think that they were wrong in that conclusion, and that there is no principle deducible from any of the authorities which supports that view of such—I hardly like to call it a refusal—of such a demur, such a delay or postponement, under those circumstances.

The company, until they were wound up, never receded from that position which they took up on February 10th, 1881; and it appears to me to be clear that the liquidator adopted it, and never departed from it, and that the repudiation of the contract on insufficient grounds on the part of the company, which had taken place while the petition was pending and before the winding-up order was made, was adhered to after the winding-up order was made, on the part of the liquidator. On the other hand, it seems to me that, fairly and reasonably considered, the conduct of the respondents was justifiable. Upon the 17th of February, 1881, after the making of the winding-up order, they state that there are instalments which ought to have been delivered, but which have not been delivered, in respect of which they would have a claim for damages, and that they apprehend that they would have a right to deduct those damages from any payment then due from them; and, according to the view which has been taken in the Court of Appeal of the effect of the 10th section of the Act of 1875, and in which view I believe your Lordships agree, that was the right way of looking at the matter. Then the respondents go on to say, that they are prepared to accept all deliveries which the liquidator may make under the contract, and to pay everything due, only requesting that those payments may be considered as made upon this understanding, in substance, that the right to the set-off which exists in law for the damages shall not be prejudiced—a perfectly reasonable, defensible, and justifiable proposal. And the solicitor who writes the letter adds, "Or I think it probable that my clients would consent to accept delivery now and waive the damages," a thing which in a later letter they express their willingness to do. In my judgment, they have not in any portion of the proceeding acted so as to show an intention to renounce or to repudiate the contract, or to fail in its performance on their part.

Therefore I think that the judgment of the court below is right, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, and I so move your Lordships.

LORD BLACKBURN. * * * As to the first point, I myself have no doubt that Withers v. Reynolds, 2 B. & Ad. 882, correctly lays down the law to this extent, that where there is a contract which is to be performed in future, if one of the parties has said to the other in effect, "If you go on and perform your side of the contract I will not perform mine," (in Withers v. Reynolds it was, "You may bring your straw, but I will not pay you upon delivery as under the contract I ought to do. I will always keep one bundle of straw in hand so as to have a check upon you"), that in effect amounts to saying, "I will not perform the contract." In that case the other party may say, "You have given me distinct notice that you will not perform the contract. I will not wait until you have broken it, but I will treat you as having put an end to the contract, and if necessary I will sue you for damages, but at all events I will not go on with the contract." That was settled in Hochster v. De la Tour, 2 E. & B. 678, in the Queen's Bench, and has never been doubted since; because there is a breach of the contract although the time indicated in the contract has not arrived. That is the law as laid down in Withers v. Reynolds. That is, I will not say the only ground of defence, but a sufficient ground of defence. * * *

The rule of law, as I always understood it, is that where there is a contract in which there are two parties, each side having to do something (it is so laid down in the notes to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 548 (Ed. 1871), if you see that the failure to perform one part of it goes to the root of the contract, goes to the foundation of the whole, it is a good defence to say, "I am not going on to perform my part of it when that which is the root of the whole and the substantial consideration for my performance is defeated by your misconduct." But Mr. Cohen [of counsel for appellants] contended that whenever there was a breach of the contract at all (I think he hardly continued to contend that after a little while, but he said whenever there was a breach of a material part of the contract) it necessarily went to the root of the matter. I cannot agree with that at all. I quite agree that when there were a certain number of tons of the article delivered, it was a material part of the contract that the man was to pay, but it was not a part of the contract that went to the root of the consideration in the matter. There was a delay in fulfilling the obligation to pay the money, it may have been with or without good reason (if that would have made any difference), but it did not go to the root or essence of the contract, nor do I think that there is any sound principle upon which it could do so. I repeatedly asked Mr. Cohen whether or not he could find any authority which justified him in saying that every breach of a contract, or even a breach which involved in it the non-payment of money which there was an obligation to pay, must be considered to go to the root of the contract, and he produced no such authority. There are many cases in which the breach may do so; it depends upon the construction of the contract. With regard to the case of Hoare v. Rennie, 5 H. & N. 19, it has been said that the Chief Baron there went so far as to say that it was the essence and substance of the contract that the whole of the 166 tons of iron, and no less, should be delivered. If it was so, it would follow that when in the present case the January shipment had not been made, and the company could only deliver part of the quantity, it went to the essence of the contract. The question depends upon whether the whole and no less is the essence of it. * * *

The circumstances being as I have said, the contract not being such as to make this payment a condition precedent, or to make punctual payment for one lot of iron which has been delivered a matter causing the contract to deliver other iron afterwards to be a dependent contract, being of opinion that that is not the meaning of the contract, I think that the decision of the Court of Appeal was right.

LORD WATSON. My Lords, I am of the same opinion. I think it would be impossible for your Lordships to sustain the appeal unless your Lordships are prepared to hold that any departure whatever from the terms of the contract by one of the parties must be sufficient to entitle the other to set it aside. I think the correspondence shows that the delay in making payment of that part of the contract price which ought to have been paid on the 5th of February, was due to these two causes; in the first place, a very natural desire on the part of the purchasers to see that they were safe against being called upon to make second payment of the price, and in the second place an obvious desire on the part of the sellers to get rid of the contract altogether. There was no controversy as to the terms of the contract. There was no unwillingness on the part of the respondents to pay the price due under the contract, except for the circumstance that there had been a change in the constitution of the company, because they had gone into liquidation on the 2d of February and the respondents' firm were advised by their law agent that they were not in safety to pay until the liquidator was appointed.

That brings us down to the 15th of February. At that date this had taken place, the company had given notice on the 10th of February of their resolution to repudiate the contract in consequence of the failure of the respondents to pay, and to that repudiation the liquidator, I think, consistently adhered. In these circumstances it appears to me that the judgment appealed from must be affirmed.

*Orders appealed from affirmed and appeal dismissed with costs.*¹¹⁶

NORRINGTON v. WRIGHT.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1885. 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366.)

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by Arthur Norrington, a citizen of Great Britain, trading under the name of A. Norrington &

See C. B. Morison, Rescission of Executory Contracts for Partial Failure in Performance, 29 Law Quar. Rev. 61.

Co., against James A. Wright and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, trading under the name of Peter Wright & Sons, upon the following contract “PHILADELPHIA, January 19, 1880.

“Sold to Messrs. Peter Wright & Sons, for account of A. Norrington & Co., London, five thousand (5000) tons of old T iron rails, for shipment from a European port or ports, at the rate of about one thousand (1000) tons per month, beginning February, 1880, but whole contract to be shipped before August 1st, 1880, at forty-five dollars ($45) per ton of 2240 pounds custom-house weight, ex ship Philadelphia. Settlement cash on presentation of bills accompanied by custom-house certificate of weight. Sellers to notify buyers of shipments with vessels' names as soon as known by them. Sellers not to be compelled to replace any parcel lost after shipment. Sellers, when possible, to secure to buyers right to name discharging berth of vessels at Philadelphia.

“EDWARD J. ETTING, Metal Broker.”

The declaration contained three counts. The first count alleged the contract to have been for the sale of about 5000 tons of T iron rails, to be shipped at the rate of about 1000 tons a month, beginning in February, and ending in July, 1880. The second count set forth the contract verbatim. Each of these two counts alleged that the plaintiffs in February, March, April, May, June, and July shipped the goods at the rate of about 1000 tons a month, and notified the shipments to the defendants; and further alleged the due arrival of the goods at Philadelphia, the plaintiff's readiness to deliver the goods and bills thereof, with custom-house certificates of weight, according to the contract, and the defendants' refusal to accept them. The third count differed from the second only in averring that 400 tons were shipped by the plaintiff in February and accepted by the defendants, and that the rest was shipped by the plaintiffs at the rate of about 1000 tons a month in March, April, May, June, and July. The defendants pleaded non assumpsit. The material facts proved at the trial were as follows:

The plaintiff shipped from various European ports 400 tons by one vessel in the last part of February, 885 tons by two vessels in March, 1571 tons by five vessels in April, 850 tons by three vessels in May, 1000 tons by two vessels in June, and 300 tons by one vessel in July, and notified to the defendants each shipment.

The defendants received and paid for the February shipment upon its arrival in March, and in April gave directions at what wharves the March shipments should be discharged on their arrival; but on May 14th, about the time of the arrival of the March shipments, and having been then for the first time informed of the amounts shipped in February, March, and April, gave Etting written notice that they should decline to accept the shipments made in March and April, because none of them were in accordance with the contract; and, in answer to a letter from him of May 16th, wrote him on May 17th as follows: "We are advised that what has occurred does not amount to an acceptance of the iron under the circumstances and the terms of the contract. You had a right to deliver in parcels, and we had a right to expect the stipulated quantity would be delivered until the time was up in which that was possible. Both delivering and receiving were thus far conditional on there being thereafter a complete delivery in due time and of the stipulated article. On the assumption that this time had arrived, and that you had ascertained that you did not intend to, or could not, make any further deliveries for the February and March shipments, we gave you the notice that we declined accepting those deliveries. As to April, it is too plain, we suppose, to require any remark. If we are mistaken as to our obligation for the February and March shipments, of course we must abide the consequences; but if we are right, you have not performed your contract, as you certainly have not for the April shipments. There is, then, the very serious and much debated question, as we are advised, whether the failure to make the stipulated shipments in February or March has absolved us from the contract. If it does, we of course will avail ourselves of this advantage."

On May 18th Etting wrote to the defendants, insisting on their liability for both past and future shipments, and saying, among other things: "In respect to the objection that there had been a complete delivery in due time of the stipulated article, I beg to call your attention to the fact that while the contract is for 5000 tons, it expressly stipulates that deliveries may be made during six months, and that they are only to be at the rate of about 1000 tons per month." "As to April, while it seems to me 'too plain to require any remark,' I do not see how it can seem so to you, unless you intend to accept the rails. If you object to taking all three shipments made in that month, I shall feel authorized to deliver only two of the cargoes, or, for that matter, to make the delivery of precisely 1000 tons. But I think I am entitled to know definitely from you whether you intend to reject the April shipments, and, of so, upon what ground, and also whether you are decided to reject the remaining shipments under the contract. You say in your last paragraph that you shall avail yourselves of the advantage, if you are absolved from the contract; but as you seem to be in doubt whether you can set up that claim or not, I should like to know definitely what is your intention."

On May 19th the defendants replied: "We do not read the contract as you do. We read it as stipulating for monthly shipments of about 1000 tons, beginning in February, and that the six months' clause is to secure the completion of whatever had fallen short in the five months. As to the meaning of 'about,' it is settled as well as such a thing can be; and certainly neither the February, March, nor April shipments are within the limits." "As to the proposal to vary the notices for April shipments, we do not think you can do this. The notice of the shipments, as soon as known, you were bound to give, and cannot afterward vary it if they do not conform to the contract. Our right to be notified immediately that the shipments were known is as material a provision as any other, nor can it be changed now in order to make that a performance which was no performance within the time required." "You ask us to determine whether we will or will not object to receive further shipments because of past defaults. We tell you we will if we are entitled to do so, and will not if we are not entitled to do so. We do not think you have the right to compel us to decide a disputed question of law to relieve you from the risk of deciding it yourself. You know quite as well as we do what is the rule and its uncertainty of application."

On June 10th Etting offered to the defendants the alternative of delivering to them 1000 tons strict measure on account of the shipments in April. This offer they immediately declined.

On June 15th Etting wrote to the defendants that two cargoes, amounting to 221 tons, of the April shipments, and two cargoes, amounting to 650 tons, of the May shipments (designated by the names of the vessels), had been erroneously notified to them, and that about 900 tons had been shipped by a certain other vessel on account of the May shipments. On the same day the defendants replied that the notification as to April shipments could not be corrected at this late date, and after the terms of the contract had long since been broken.

From the date of the contract to the time of its rescission by the defendants, the market price of such iron was lower than that stipulated in the contract, and was constantly falling. After the arrival of the cargoes, and their tender and refusal, they were sold by Etting, with the consent of the defendants, for the benefit of whom it might concern.

At the trial the plaintiff contended, first, that under the contract he had six months in which to ship the 5000 tons, and any deficiency in the earlier months could be made up subsequently, provided that the defendants could not be required to take more than 1000 tons in any one month. Second, that if this was not so, the contract was a divisible contract, and the remedy of the defendants for a default in any month was not by rescission of the whole contract, but only by deduction of the damages caused by the delays in the shipments on the part of the plaintiff.

But the court instructed the jury that if the defendants, at the time of accepting the delivery of the cargo paid for, had no notice of the failure of the plaintiff to ship about 1000 tons in the month of February, and immediately upon learning that fact gave notice of their intention to rescind, the verdict should be for them.

The plaintiff excepted to this instruction, and, after verdict and judgment for the defendants, sued out this writ of error.

GRAY, J.¹¹⁷ In the contract of merchants time is of the essence.¹¹⁸ The time of shipment is the usual and convenient means of fixing the prob-

¹¹⁷ Parts of the opinion are omitted.

¹¹⁸ In Hartley v. Hyams, [1920] 3 K. B. 475, 484, McCardie, J., said: "Now if time for delivery be of the essence of the contract, as in the present case, it follows that a vendor who has failed to deliver within the stipulated period cannot prima facie call upon the buyer to accept delivery after that period has expired. He has himself failed to fulfill the bargain and the buyer can plead the seller's default and assert that he was not ready and willing to carry out his contract. That this is so seems clear. It is, I take it, the essential juristic result when time is of the essence of the contract. This is cogently shown by the judgment in Plevins v. Downing, 1 C. P. D. 220, where the plaintiff vendors agreed to deliver iron in the month of July; as Brett, J., put it (Ibid. 226), when delivering the opinion of the court: 'The day after the end of July they could not have insisted on an acceptance of iron then offered to the defendant.'"

But the words "time is of the essence" in Justice Gray's sentence do not bear that literal meaning. As Professor Williston has pointed out, "it is evident that what is meant is that, the element of time is material, not that a day's delay will be fatal." 2 Williston on Contracts, p. 1624, note 72.

In Beck & Pauli Lithographing Co. v. Colorado Milling & Elevator Co., 52 Fed. 700, 702-703 (1892), Sanborn, J., said: "It is a general principle governing the construction of contracts that stipulations as to the time of their performance are not necessarily of their essence, unless it clearly appears in the given case from the express stipulations of the contract or the nature of its subject-matter that the parties intended performance within the time fixed in the contract to be a condition precedent to its enforcement, and, where the intention of the parties does not so appear, performance shortly after the time limited on the part of either party will not justify a refusal to perform by the party aggrieved, but his only remedy will be an action or counterclaim for the damages he has sustained from the breach of the stipulations. In the application of this principle to the cases as they have arisen, in the promulgation of the rules naturally deduced from it, and in the assignment of the various cases to the respective classes in which the stipulation as to time of performance is, or is not, deemed of the essence of the contract, the controlling consideration has been, and ought to be, to so decide and classify the cases that unjust penalties may not be inflicted, nor unreasonable damages recovered. Thus, in the ordinary contract of merchants for the sale and delivery, or the manufacture and sale, of marketable commodities within a time certain, it has been held that performance within the time is a condition precedent to the enforcement of the contract, and that a failure in this regard would justify the aggrieved party in refusing performance at a later day. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188-203, 6 Sup. Ct. 12. This application of the general principle commends itself as just and reasonable, on account of the frequent and rapid interchange and use of such commodities made necessary by the demands of commerce, and because such goods, if not received in time by the vendee, may usually be sold to others by the vendor at small loss, and thus he may himself measure the damages he ought to suffer from his delay by the difference in the market value of his goods. On the other hand, it has been held that an express stipulation in a contract for the construction of a house, that it should be completed on a day certain, and that, in case of failure to complete it within the time limited, the builder would forfeit $1,000, would not justify the owner of the land on which the house was constructed in refusing to accept it for a breach of this stipulation when the house was completed able time of arrival, with a view of providing funds to pay for the goods, or of fulfilling contracts with third persons. A statement descriptive of the subject-matter, or of some material incident, such as the time or place of shipment, is ordinarily to be regarded as a warranty, in the sense in which that term is used in insurance and maritime law—that is to say, a condition precedent, upon the failure or non-performance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the whole contract; Behn v. Burness, 3 B. & S. 751; Bowes v. Shand, 2 App. Cas. 455; Lowber v. Bangs, 2 Wall. 728; Davison v. Von Lingen, 113 U. S. 40.

The contract sued on is a single contract for the sale and purchase of 5000 tons of iron rails, shipped from a European port or ports for Philadelphia. The subsidiary provisions as to shipping in different months, and as to paying for each shipment upon its delivery, do not split up the contract into as many contracts as there shall be shipments or deliveries of so many distinct quantities of iron. Mersey Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434, 439. The further provision, that the sellers shall not be compelled to replace any parcel lost after shipment, simply reduces, in the event of such a loss, the quantity to be delivered and paid for.

The times of shipment, as designated in the contract, are “at the rate of about 1000 tons per month, beginning February, 1880, but whole contract to be shipped before August 1st, 1880.” These words are not satisfied by shipping one-sixth part of the 5000 tons, or about 833 tons, shortly after the time fixed, nor even in retaining the penalty stipulated in the contract, but that he must perform his part of the contract, and that he could retain from or recover of the builder the damages he sustained by the delay and those only. Tayloe v. Sandiford, 7 Wheat. 13, 17. This application of the general rule is equally just and reasonable. The lumber and material bestowed on a house by a builder become of little comparative value to him, while they are ordinarily of much greater value to the owner of the land on which it stands, and to permit the latter to escape payment because his house is completed a few days later than the contract requires would result in great injustice to the contractor, while the rule adopted fully protects the owner, and does no injustice to any one. The cases just referred to illustrate two well-settled rules of law which have been deduced from this general principle, and in accordance with which this case must be determined. They are:

“In contracts of merchants for the sale and delivery or for the manufacture and sale of marketable commodities a statement descriptive of the subject-matter, or some material incident, such as the time of shipment, is a condition precedent, upon the failure or non-performance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the whole contract. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 203, 6 Sup. Ct. 12; Rolling Mill v. Rhodes, 121 U. S. 255, 261, 7 Sup. Ct. 882. But in contracts for work or skill, and the materials upon which it is to be bestowed, a statement fixing the time of performance of the contract is not ordinarily of its essence, and a failure to perform within the time stipulated, followed by substantial performance after a short delay, will not justify the aggrieved party in repudiating the entire contract, but will simply give him his action for damages for the breach of the stipulation. Tayloe v. Sandiford, 7 Wheat. 13, 17; Hambly v. Railroad Co., 21 Fed. 541, 544, 554, 557.”

in each of the six months which begin with February and end with July. But they require about 1000 tons to be shipped in each of the five months from February to June inclusive, and allow no more than slight and unimportant deficiencies in the shipments during those months to be made up in the month of July. The contract is not one for the sale of a specific lot of goods, identified by independent circumstances, such as all those deposited in a certain warehouse, or to be shipped in a particular vessel, or that may be manufactured by the seller, or may be required for use by the buyer, in a certain mill, in which case the mention of the quantity, accompanied by the qualification of "about," or "more or less," is regarded as a mere estimate of the probable amount, as to which good faith is all that is required of the party making it. But the contract before us comes within the general rule: "When no such independent circumstances are referred to, and the engagement is to furnish goods of a certain quality or character to a certain amount, the quantity specified is material, and governs the contract. The addition of the qualifying words 'about,' 'more or less,' and the like, in such cases, is only for the purpose of providing against accidental variations, arising from slight and unimportant excesses or deficiencies in number, measure, or weight." Brawley v. United States, 96 U. S. 168, 171-172.¹¹⁹

¹¹⁹ "It will be noticed that defendant did not agree to deliver 3,000 tons of coal, but only '3,000 tons more or less.' This is an indefinite quantity, and especially subjects the contract to the rule that—

"Every agreement should be interpreted with reference to the circumstances under which the parties contract and in the light of the objects to be accomplished." McKeesport Machine Co. v. Ben Franklin Insurance Co., 173 Pa. 53, 34 Atl. 16; Myers' Estate, 238 Pa. 195, 211, 86 Atl. 89.

"It is true the words '3,000 tons more or less' ordinarily would be construed to mean that the amount should be approximately that stated, because usually that is the intention of the parties; but in ascertaining the intention this is not always so. If those words follow an alleged quantity of land which is also described by metes and bounds, or an estimated quantity of personal property in bulk, the vendor is obliged to give and the purchaser to take whatever there is, even if it is considerably more or less than that stated; or if the real purpose of the provision is to enable the vendee to get the article desired for a particular use, as for instance to operate a plant during a specified period, it can require enough for that use and need take no more, though it is considerably more or less than the amount named. Glen v. Glen, 4 Serg. & R. 488; Ashcom v. Smith, 2 Pen. & W. 211, 21 Am. Dec. 437; Petts v. Gaw, 15 Pa. 218; Coughenour's Adm'rs v. Stauff, 77 Pa. 191; McCullough v. Manning, 132 Pa. 43, 18 Atl. 1080; Lobenstein v. United States, 91 U. S. 324, 23 L. Ed. 410; Brawley v. United States, 96 U. S. 168, 24 L. Ed. 622; 35 Cyc. 206-7; Williston on Sales, § 464. The latter point is well illustrated in Brawley v. United States, supra, where it is said:

"If it be agreed to furnish so many bushels of wheat, more or less, according to what the party receiving it shall require for the use of his mill, then the contract is not governed by the quantity named, nor by that quantity with slight and unimportant variations, but by what the receiving party shall require for the use of his mill; and the variation from the quantity named will

The seller is bound to deliver the quantity stipulated, and has no right either to compel the buyer to accept a less quantity, or to require him to select part out of a greater quantity; and when the goods are to be shipped in certain proportions monthly, the seller's failure to ship the required quantity in the first month gives the buyer the same right to rescind the whole contract that he would have had if it had been agreed that all the goods should be delivered at once.

The plaintiff, instead of shipping about 1000 tons in February and about 1000 tons in March, as stipulated in the contract, shipped only 400 tons in February, and 885 tons in March. His failure to fulfil the contract on his part in respect to these first two instalments justified the defendants in rescinding the whole contract, provided they distinctly and seasonably asserted the right of rescission.

The defendants, immediately after the arrival of the March shipments, and as soon as they knew that the quantities which had been shipped in February and in March were less than the contract called for, clearly and positively asserted the right to rescind, if the law entitled them to do so. Their previous acceptance of the single cargo of 400 tons shipped in February was no waiver of this right, because it took place without notice, or means of knowledge, that the stipulated quantity had not been shipped in February. The price paid by them for that cargo being above the market value, the plaintiff suffered no injury by the omission of the defendants to return the iron; and no reliance was placed on that omission in the correspondence between the parties.

The case wholly differs from that of Lyon v. Bertram, 20 How. 149, in which the buyer of a specific lot of goods accepted and used part of them with full means of previously ascertaining whether they conformed to the contract.

The plaintiff, denying the defendants' right to rescind, and asserting that the contract was still in force, was bound to show such performance on his part as entitled him to demand performance on their part, and, having failed to do so, cannot maintain this action.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the judgment below should be affirmed. But as much of the argument at the bar was devoted to a discussion of the recent English cases, and as a diversity in the law, as administered on the two sides of the Atlantic, concerning the interpretation and effect of commercial contracts of this kind, is greatly to depend upon his discretion and requirements, so long as he acts in good faith.

"In the present case the evidence shows, and appellee says in its paper book, 'It is admitted the appellee was contracting for the year's supply of coal for this factory;' and its manager testified that the reason why the language '3,000 tons more or less' was used was 'to note the fact that if we wanted more coal we could get it,' and of course, if they did not require so much, that they need not take beyond their needs. It follows that herein plaintiff was entitled to receive only sufficient coal to run its plant." Simpson, J., in Ruth-Hastings Glass Tube Co. v. Slattery, 286 Pa. 288, 109 Atl. 695, 696 (1920).

be deprecated, it is proper to add that upon a careful examination of the cases referred to they do not appear to us to establish any rule inconsistent with our conclusion. * * *

The plaintiff in the case at bar greatly relied on the very recent decision of the House of Lords in Mersey Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434, affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal, in 9 Q. B. D. 648, and following the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Freeth v. Burr, L. R. 9 C. P. 208.

But the point there decided was that the failure of the buyer to pay for the first instalment of the goods upon delivery does not, unless the circumstances evince an intention on his part to be no longer bound by the contract, entitle the seller to rescind the contract and to decline to make further deliveries under it. And the grounds of the decision, as stated by Lord Chancellor Selborne in moving judgment in the House of Lords, are applicable only to the case of a failure of the buyer to pay for, and not to that of a failure of the seller to deliver, the first instalment. * * *

Being of opinion that the plaintiff's failure to make such shipments in February and March as the contract required prevents his maintaining this action, it is needless to dwell upon the further objection that the shipments in April did not comply with the contract, because the defendants could not be compelled to take about 1000 tons out of the larger quantity shipped in that month, and the plaintiff, after once designating the names of vessels, as the contract bound him to do, could not substitute other vessels. See Busk v. Spence, 4 Camp 329; Graves v. Legg, 9 Exch. 709; Reuter v. Sala, [4 C. P. D. 239], above cited.

¹²⁰ Most American decisions are in accord with Norrington v. Wright. But see Quarton v. American Law Book Co., 143 Ia. 517 (1909). Even the New Jersey cases have been brought into line by the Uniform Sales Act. E. I. Dupont etc. Co. v. United Zinc Co., 85 N. J. L. 416 (1914). By § 45 (2) of that act it is provided that "Where there is a contract to sell goods to be delivered by stated instalments, which are to be separately paid for, and the seller makes defective deliveries in respect of one or more instalments, or the buyer neglects or refuses to take delivery of or pay for one or more instalments, it depends in each case on the terms of the contract and the circumstances of the case whether the breach of contract is so material as to justify the injured party in refusing to proceed further and suing for damages for breach of the entire contract, or whether the breach is severable, giving rise to a claim for compensation, but not to a right to treat the whole contract as broken." By the English Sale of Goods Act, on the other hand, the English repudiation test is enacted.

"The American authorities are in irreconcilable conflict upon the question as to whether or not the seller may terminate the contract on account of a default in the payment of an instalment, when the contract provides for the sale and delivery of a given commodity in stated instalments, which are to be separately paid for. In this country it is probably accurate to say that the weight of judicial opinion is now to the effect that, if the buyer defaults in the payment of a given instalment, the seller may treat the default as a breach and terminate the contract, without incurring any liability for damages for the failure to make delivery of subsequent installments. Ross-Meehan Foundry Co. v. Royer Wheel Co., 113 Tenn. 370, 83 S. W. 167, 68 L. R. A. 829, 3 Ann. Cas. 898; Ohio Valley Buggy Co. v. Anderson Forging Co., 168 Ind. 593, 81 N. E. 574, 11 Ann. "According to what is probably the minority view, the failure of the buyer to pay an installment does not give the seller an absolute right to terminate the contract, unless, in addition to the naked act of failure or refusal to pay, the conduct of the buyer shows an intention on his part to abandon or no longer be bound by the terms of the contract, as, for example, where the default is accompanied with a deliberate demand insisting upon new terms different from the original agreement. Johnson Forge Co. v. Leonard, 3 Pennewill (Del.) 342, 51 Atl. 305, 57 L. R. A. 225, 94 Am. St. Rep. 86. Prior adjudications are our warrant for declaring that Oregon may be included among the jurisdictions where the minority view prevails. Barnes v. Leidigh, 46 Or. 43, 45, 79 Pac. 51; Longfellow v. Huffman, 55 Or. 481, 486, 104 Pac. 961; Krebs Hop Co. v. Livesley, 59 Or. 574, 114 Pac. 944, 118 Pac. 165, Ann. Cas. 1913 C 758; Armaby v. Grays Harbor Commercial Co., 62 Or. 173, 183, 123 Pac. 32; Walker v. Warring, 65 Or. 149, 156, 130 Pac. 629.

"According to the rule which governs in this jurisdiction, the failure of the buyer to pay an installment does not alone and of itself enable the seller to terminate the contract, so as to avoid liability for failure to make subsequent deliveries called for by the contract; but, in addition to the bare fact of failure to pay, the conduct of the buyer must indicate an intention on his part to abandon the contract, or a design no longer to be bound by the terms agreed upon. In some of the states, including Oregon, legislation has been enacted governing the subject. However, the instant case is not controlled by chapter 91, Laws 1919, for the reason that it is expressly provided in section 76a of the statute that the act shall not apply to any sale or contract to sell 'made prior to the taking effect of this act.'

"Of course, the parties may expressly stipulate that payment for one delivery shall be a condition precedent; and, consequently, if a contract for the continuing delivery of wares contains such a stipulation, the failure of the buyer to pay a given installment enables the seller to rescind, regardless of what the rule might be in the absence of such a stipulation. West v. Bechtel, 125 Mich. 144, 163, 84 N. W. 69, 51 L. R. A. 791; Johnson Forge Co. v. Leonard, 3 Pennewill (Del.) 342, 51 Atl. 305, 57 L. R. A. 225, 94 Am. St. Rep. 86, 91. If, therefore, the payment of each invoice was by agreement made a condition precedent as to subsequent orders, then the plaintiff had the absolute right to terminate the contract, if the defendant refused to pay any installment within the time fixed for payment." Harris, J., in H. R. Wyllie China Co. v. Vinton, 97 Ore. 350, 364-366 (1920).

to their broker in New Orleans, authorizing him to sell 200,000 yards of sheeting, of two kinds described, to be delivered "25,000 yards weekly of each, commencing February 1st, delivery in New Orleans." He was instructed to give defendant's letter to the plaintiffs, and say to them that they might write an acknowledgment, and that would be all the contract defendant required. It was alleged by the plaintiffs and admitted by the defendant that the former did duly acknowledge the letter, and thus complete the contract for the goods at the prices named. This closed a distinct and unambiguous contract. It fixed the time and place of delivery. * * * In this case the judge acted both as judge and jury. Did he err in deciding that time was of the essence of this contract? The contract was for the sale of 200,000 yards of cotton goods by a factory to purchasers in a distant city. It was specified that 50,000 yards should be delivered each week, commencing February 1st, at stated prices, with payment at thirty days, or five per cent discount for cash. It might well be inferred that it was important to a purchaser of such a quantity of cloth to have it arrive as specified, both in order to prepare for its reception and storage or use and to provide for payments in the time and manner stated, and that this was in contemplation of the parties. It might make a very material difference whether a merchant should receive and be prepared to handle 50,000 yards of cloth, ordered, perhaps, for some special purpose, each week, and commencing at a specified date, or whether he should have 200,000 yards of the cloth delivered to him in one bulk a month or more thereafter, or in instalments commencing some six weeks after the proper time and delivered according as the vendor found himself able to meet the contract. It may also be that a merchant desires, during the season when certain goods are salable, to have them ready for delivery to his customers, or that he may have contracts to make delivery. If such were the case, it would ill suit his purpose to have goods suitable to or salable during a certain season only, and ordered to be delivered in instalments at fixed times during that season, delivered to him in a single lump or shipment at a much later period or after the entire season was over.

If recourse is had in the case before us to the correspondence between the parties, the possible injury from extended delay which has thus been hypothetically stated would apparently have resulted to the plaintiffs. In one of their letters to the defendant it was said that these goods were not bought from the defendant to be sold in cloth, as dry goods people do, but were sold manufactured into bags for a sugar refinery, and that, as the refinery operated night and day, it was compelled to have the goods; and in another letter they stated to the defendant that the latter had not complied with their request to make the shipments, although the plaintiffs had tried to make it clear to the defendant that these goods were sold to the refinery at the place of delivery, and that the latter were obliged to have them for bags for shipment of their product, and that it was not material to be put on the shelf and sold in lots.

See, in this connection, Savannah Ice Co. v. American Refrigerator Co., 110 Ga. 142, 35 S. E. 280; Branch v. Palmer, 65 Ga. 210; Henderson Elevator Co. v. North Ga. Milling Co., 126 Ga. 279, 55 S. E. 50; Gude & Walker v. Bailey Co., 4 Ga. App. 226, 61 S. E. 135; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366; Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Rhodes, 121 U. S. 255, 7 Sup. Ct. 882, 30 L. Ed. 920; McGrath v. Gegner, 77 Md. 331, 26 Atl. 502, 39 Am. St. Rep. 415. The cases in which contracts for purchases of real estate have been held not to be forfeited because of failure to pay the purchase price at the date named therefor, in the absence of anything in the contract making time of the essence thereof, and where the payment of interest has been held, under the circumstances of different cases, to be a sufficient compensation for the failure to pay on the exact date when due, are in no way in conflict with what is here ruled. "Time is not generally of the essence of a contract; but, by express stipulation or reasonable construction, it may become so." Civ. Code, § 3675 (8). But under the facts in this case the judge did not err in finding that time was of the essence of the contract involved. The statement in the opinion of Mr. Justice Gray in Norrington v. Wright, supra, that "in the contracts of merchants time is of the essence," was not laid down as an absolute rule, regardless of what the contract itself might show the intention of the parties to be. This clearly appears from the headnote, in which it is stated that: "In a mercantile contract, a statement descriptive of the subject-matter, or of some material incident, such as the time or place of shipment, is ordinarily to be regarded as a warranty, or condition precedent, upon the failure or nonperformance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the whole contract."

If it were not clear that time was originally of the essence of the contract, nevertheless the judge was authorized to find that the vendee from time to time urged compliance, and finally fixed a time, after that specified in the contract, within which they insisted that delivery of the goods should be made, stating the necessity therefor, and that, if delivery should not be made within that time, they would be compelled to buy material in lieu of that which the vendor had contracted to deliver. If time was not of the essence originally, still the vendor did not have the right indefinitely to postpone compliance, and when the vendees, after a considerable delay, fixed a definite time in advance within which delivery would have to be made, and notified the vendor of that fact, if the time set was reasonable, it was incumbent on the vendor to meet such reasonable demand; and, if it failed to do so, the vendees were authorized to treat such failure as a breach of the contract. In Parker v. Tharold, 16 Beav. 59, Sir John Romilly, Master of the Rolls, said (on page 71): "It is, I consider, the undoubted law of this court that, although time was not originally an essential part of the contract, still that either party may, by a proper notice, bind the other to complete within a reasonable time to be specified in such notice; and if the party receiving such notice do not complete within the time so specified, equity will not enforce a specific performance of the contract, but leave the parties to their remedies and their liabilities at law." See, also, Ellis v. Bryant, 120 Ga. 890, 894, 48 S. E. 352, and authorities cited in note to Johnson v. Evans, (Md.) 50 Am. Dec. 678, 679, and in note to Jones v. Robbins, 50 Am. Dec. 600.

The judge, in passing on both law and facts, could well have found that the time so fixed was reasonable, and that the failure of the vendor to make delivery was a breach. * * *

NATIONAL MACHINE AND TOOL COMPANY v. STANDARD SHOE MACHINERY COMPANY.

HOLMES, C. J. This is an action of contract upon one or two small claims and for the breach of a contract made in March, 1900, by certain letters, in which the plaintiff undertook to manufacture certain portions of a patented machine, according to a schedule attached to the defendant's order. This last is the main source of trouble. With regard to payment the plaintiff wrote: "If you should favor us with an order for a considerable number of these parts, we would bill them up to you as they were finished, and would merely ask that the bills be settled promptly as they came to you." At a later stage of the negotiation the plaintiff wrote that it should expect the defendant "to arrange it so that the bills would be approved promptly, and payment made on same at once, so that we may expect payments coming in rapidly after we have got well started on the contract, thus preventing us from having too large an amount of money tied up in the work." In this letter the plaintiff also wrote that it expected the defendant "to fully protect us from any suits that might be brought against us while we are on this work, on account of patents." It is denied that this letter was a part of the contract. We see no sufficient reason for the denial.

¹²² It is all a question of fact. "It may be said that ordinarily stipulations as to time in commercial contracts are of the essence, and the reason for this is manifest. Merchants carry on business largely through credit. The capital invested is often small compared to the volume of business transacted in a given period, and this results from the constant movement of the merchandise in which they deal; the capital invested continually 'turning over.' As one lot of merchandise goes out to supply the merchant's trade, another comes in to take its place. Where the commodity is such that because of the margin of profit possible on its resale, and the demand for it, it is held for a very short time by the merchant, and is placed in receptacles for convenience in distribution rather than storage, it becomes essential to the existence of his business that the merchant be assured of a steady, constant, and regular supply. And if, as often happens, his storage capacity is limited, the time of the arrivals of the invoices of the commodity in which he deals is of the utmost importance. It is for such reasons that time ordinarily is an essential element where it is stipulated in commercial contracts. Bowes v. Shand, 2 App. Cases, 455; Brantly on Contracts, 180; Barker v. Borzone, 48 Md. 474. And where time is of the essence of the contract, then the parties to it are entitled to require a strict compliance with its terms in that regard." Offcut, J., in Penn. Oil Co. v. Triangle Petroleum & Gasoline Co., 136 Md. 559, 111 Atl. 482, 488 (1920).

About May 1, 1900, the plaintiff was sued and demanded a bond with surety, as protection under its agreement. The defendant agreed to give a bond, but on May 21 declined to furnish a surety, and this is relied on by the plaintiff as one breach of the defendant's undertaking. We think it so plain that the defendant was not bound to give a surety that we dismiss this part of the case without further mention.

On May 17, 1900, the plaintiff having finished one item on the defendant's order, of sixty adjusting screws, sent a bill for the price, $90. The bill bore a stamped notice that "all claims for corrections in this bill must be made within ten days from date." It was understood by the plaintiff that if the bill was approved by the proper man it would be sent on to New York to be paid. Three or four days later there was a conversation in the defendant's Boston office, it was suggested that this bill ought to be paid immediately on presentation, and complaint was made with regard to another overdue account of nearly seven hundred dollars ($697.23). There were apologies and further delays, complaints, and explanations, the defendant's representative always explaining the delay as accidental, and finally, on May 28, stating that the check was ready but had been retained for entry as the bookkeeper was away. This last seems to have been true. On May 29 the plaintiff, hearing that a check had not come on, notified the defendant that "as you have not lived up to your agreement with us in relation to the work we are doing for you, we shall stop all of your work to-day," and stopped. Later efforts to come to an understanding failed.

The plaintiff when it stopped work had finished another small item of $24, and on May 31 offered to deliver these goods as well as those for which the bill for $90 had been sent, but the defendant declined to receive them. May 31 was the date of the writ, and the plaintiff very candidly says that the offer was made after suit was brought. The plaintiff seeks to recover as damages for the defendant's alleged breach the cost of the finished parts, and also the value of stock and castings and a large amount of work upon parts never delivered or completed.

The case was sent to an auditor. He found that the defendant did not repudiate the contract, and that the delay in payment did not justify the plaintiff in stopping work. The judge of the Superior Court adopted his rulings and findings, although finding in addition that the provision for prompt payment of bills for finished work was material, and that payment was not made promptly, and expressing a doubt whether the plaintiff was not justified in refusing to proceed.

Although the contract was not repudiated by the defendant, we are of opinion, notwithstanding Winchester v. Newton, 2 Allen, 492; which perhaps was not intended to establish a different general rule (see also Newton v. Winchester, 16 Gray, 208), that there might have been such a breach by failure to pay, as, however honest and however little it expressed a repudiation, would warrant a refusal to go on with the work. Bloomer v. Bernstein, L. R. 9 C. P. 588. See Stephenson v. Cady, 117 Mass. 6. There is nothing to the contrary in Daley v. People's Building, Loan & Saving Association, 178 Mass. 13, 18. What is said there refers to an attempt to avoid a contract ab initio for a refusal to pay money due upon an executed consideration, when to make that payment is all that remains to be done on that side.

We may say further that for the purposes of this decision it is not necessary to consider Lord Selborne's somewhat sweeping suggestion in Mersey Steel & Iron Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434, 439, that when delivery of an instalment of goods under an entire contract is to precede payment for the goods delivered, as payment cannot be a condition precedent of the entire contract, it cannot be a condition precedent to the deliveries remaining to be made, at least without express words. See Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 210. In this case both parties have assumed that the plaintiff could put the defendant in default without delivery merely by sending a bill for an item when it was finished, so that Lord Selborne's logical difficulty, if there is anything in it, does not apply.

The question before us therefore is whether the defendant's failure to pay $90 promptly was a breach going to the root of the contract,—a breach so important as to warrant the plaintiff in refusing to go on without defeating his own right to recover upon it or rescinding the contract. My Brother Loring and I have not been able to reach a clear conviction that it was such a breach, in view of the smallness of the sum, the indefiniteness of the terms of the contract as to the time for payment (see Harnden v. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co., 164 Mass. 382; Parker v. Middlesex Mut. Ass. Co., 179 Mass. 528, 531), the shortness of the delay, and some other circumstances. Of course not every trifling breach of contract excuses the other side from further performance. Honek v. Muller, 7 Q. B. D. 92, 100; Mersey Steel & Iron Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434, 444; Dubois v. Delaware & Hudson Canal Co., 4 Wend. 285, 289; Wright v. Haskell, 45 Maine, 489, 492; Weintz v. Hafner, 78 Ill. 27, 29; Worthington v. Gwin, 119 Ala. 44, 54.

But my brethren are of opinion, and I dare say wisely, upon the findings, that the plaintiff was warranted in its course. The plaintiff's contract necessitated a considerable preliminary outlay, and would necessitate further expenditures in carrying out its part. At the time it was paying nearly seventy dollars a day. Prompt payment for goods as finished took the place of payments on account. The plaintiff was sensitive, and had a right to be so, at any appearance of uncertainty as to the stipulated payments being made. It had a further ground of anxiety in the suits brought against it for infringement of patents, when it had only the defendant's personal guaranty to protect it. Under such circumstances, the failure to pay the other bill for nearly seven hundred dollars, gave a character to the failure to pay the smaller sum which was due, and imparted a significance to the delay that otherwise it might not have had. A failure to pay a small sum promptly because of difficulty in raising the money is not the same thing as, and may have a greater effect than, a similar failure simply because of the absence of a bookkeeper or of some misunderstanding between the defendant's Boston and New York houses.

The first count was upon a claim for $209.38 outside the contract thus far discussed. The auditor finds for the plaintiff, but for $129.15 only. The plaintiff demands the larger sum, notwithstanding the finding, on the ground that when seeking to reduce the plaintiff's attachment the defendant expressed a willingness to pay for all work that had been completed, that the plaintiff's counsel stated what that work amounted to so far as he knew, that thereupon the judge made an order dissolving the attachment upon the payment of that amount to the sheriff and the giving of a bond for $5,000 more, and that the defendant paid the sum, which included the item of $209.38. This transaction was not a tender, and did not fall within the rule laid down in Currier v. Jordan, 117 Mass. 260, and Bouvé v. Cottle, 143 Mass. 310, 315. It would seem to have been only a substitution of securities in the sheriff's hands, and to have left the correctness of the figures open to trial with the rest of the case.

The second count also was for items outside the contract, and only one of them was disputed. This was for some articles not finished because the defendant, after the plaintiff refused to go on with its contract, took away jigs and tools which it had furnished the plaintiff under the contract, and also the unfinished articles. There is nothing in the report which necessarily implies that the failure to finish the articles was due to the plaintiff's fault, or indeed to any other cause than the defendant's removal of them. Therefore we cannot say that the auditor's finding was wrong.

A part of the damages to be recovered by the plaintiff on the larger contract will be for work done under it. Goodman v. Pocock, 15 Q. B. 576, 580. Therefore one other question requires a few words. The defendant made a tender on May 31 of the amount then due, including the $90 claimed under the contract, which was refused. But this tender has not been pleaded or kept good, even if, as does not appear very clearly, it embraced the sums not recovered. Therefore it does not prevent the recovery of interest and costs. The answer was a general denial. Brickett v. Wallace, 98 Mass. 528, 529; Grover v. Smith, 165

Mass. 132. See Noble v. Fagnant, 162 Mass. 275, 286. The payment to the sheriff was not a payment into court or an admission that the sum paid was due, as we have said and as the plaintiff contends. In Suffolk Bank v. Worcester Bank, 5 Pick. 106, the amount tendered was deposited in a bank to the order of the plaintiff, and in Goff v. Rehoboth, 2 Cush. 475, the defendant was a town, and the treasurer might be presumed to have kept the money on hand in obedience to the order of the selectmen. In both the tender was set up and the money brought into court. See Pub. Sts. c. 168, § 23; Town v. Trow, 24 Pick. 168, 169; Sanders v. Bryer, 152 Mass. 141. There was another tender after suit brought, but that did not comply with Pub. Sts. c. 168, § 24, and is not relied upon.

WITTENBERG ET AL. v. HANSON & PARKER, LIMITED.

Three consolidated actions, two by Hanson & Parker, Limited, against C. J. Wittenberg and others, and a third by C. J. Wittenberg and others

¹²³ "There is a great difference in the authorities in the application of the doctrine of implied conditions precedent in a contract, especially where there has been part performance. This difference appears particularly upon the question as to the measure of performance by one party which is to be regarded as such substantial performance as will protect him from having his defaults considered as breaches of such a condition, and also upon the corresponding question as to the kind of default which so far goes to the essence of the consideration as to justify the other party in refusing to go on with the contract." Hammond, J., in Eastern Forge Co. of Mass. v. Corbin, 182 Mass. 590, 592 (1903).

"While in instalment contracts stipulations of times of delivery are ordinarily material obligations, breaches of which go to the essence of the contract, stipulations of times of payment, in the absence of an express or necessarily implied condition that times of payment shall be of the essence, are not so vital that delay in payment would justify the seller's refusal to deliver the succeeding instalments, unless the delay was of such importance as to work material injury to the seller or fairly expressed the buyer's intention no longer to be bound by his remaining executory agreements. * * * Without an agreement to the contrary, delay in payment may ordinarily be compensated for with interest; but without an agreement to the contrary, delay of delivery of goods beyond the stipulated time violates the fundamental purpose of the buyer in entering into the contract at all." Baker, J., in Vulcan Trading Corporation v. Kokomo Steel & Wire Co., 268 Fed. 913, 916 (1920).

against Hanson & Parker, Limited. From a verdict for Hanson & Parker, Limited, in all the actions, Wittenberg and others excepted. Exceptions overruled.

BRALEY, J.¹²⁴ * * * During the period covered by the transactions the plaintiff corporation was engaged as a jobber in selling coal at wholesale, with its principal office in Boston. If occasional sales were made elsewhere, the bulk of its trade was supplying customers within the territory of which the city is described in the report as the usual commercial center of distribution. After verbal negotiations, it entered into two contracts in writing with the defendant Wittenberg, who resided and did business in another state, for the delivery of 10,000 tons of "steam coal" under each contract. The coal was to be delivered at Newport News, Va., by the railroad as directed by the seller, free on board vessels sent by the buyer, by whom the expenses of transportation were to be paid. By the first contract, an option as to the kinds of coal was given, and although the second contract omits this clause, the auditor reports that the plaintiff contracted only for "New River coal," which the defendant engaged to furnish. In the performance of the first contract, the defendant concedes that the shipments were not of the kind selected, but the cargoes were composed of a mixture of New River coal and Kanawha coal, in which the latter largely predominated. Upon arrival of the first cargo, a part was discharged before the plaintiff ascertained its inferior quality. Interviews followed between the parties, but no adjustment of their differences was reached, and the defendants' agent having stated that the remaining cargoes in transit were similar, the plaintiff notified the defendant it would not accept them. Because of the failure to comply with the terms of the first contract, the corporation recalled the vessel it had sent for the small balance remaining of the first purchase, and for the coal to be shipped under the second contract, and claimed as a defense, in the suit against it by Wittenberg for damages, for the refusal to perform, that this contract had been canceled.

The contracts, as the judge ruled, no doubt were distinct, and not dependent. Turner v. Rogers, 121 Mass. 12. If the first had been broken by the seller, it did not follow he would commit a breach of the second contract, although a refusal to perform would have justified an immediate rescission by the plaintiff. Daniels v. Newton, 114 Mass. 530, 533, 19 Am. Rep. 384; Menage v. Rosenthal, 187 Mass. 470, 73 N. E. 537. But while his conduct tended strongly to weaken confidence in his intention to keep a similar agreement in the future, the plaintiff's anticipation of nonperformance, however reasonable under the circumstances, would not have been a justification for its rescinding or repudiating the second contract. Porter v. American Legion of Honor, 183 Mass. 326, 67 N. E. 238.

An executory bilateral contract, however, may be rescinded or canceled by mutual consent of the parties. They may discharge it in part by a new agreement, modifying its terms, or agree to abrogate it, so that both will be discharged from performance. The original consideration supports the modification, while the agreement of each to annul is a sufficient consideration of an abandonment. Earnshaw v. Whittemore, 194 Mass. 187, 191, 80 N. E. 520, and cases cited; Cutter v. Cochrane, 116 Mass. 408, 410. But where, as in the present case, the parties are not in accord as to what was done, whether they have reached such an understanding is a question of fact. Johnson v. Reed, 9 Mass. 78-84, 6 Am. Dec. 36; Cutter v. Cochrane, 116 Mass. 408, 410; Hobbs v. Columbia Falls Brick Co., 157 Mass. 109, 31 N. E. 756. * * * The auditor, who saw the witnesses and heard the evidence, * * * finds the * * * second contract was cancelled by mutual consent. The judge, having been warranted in finding accordingly, rightly refused to give the plaintiff Wittenberg's thirty-first and thirty-second requests,¹²⁵ and having found for the defendant, the fourth and fifth requests became immaterial. * * *

We find no error of law at the trial, and the exceptions must be overruled.

GEORGE CAHEN, RESPONDENT, v. JOHN R. PLATT ET AL., APPELLANTS.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1877. 69 N. Y. 348, 25 Am. Rep. 203.)

Appeal from judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York, affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff entered upon a verdict. (Reported below, 8 J. & S. 483.)

¹²⁶ "It is argued on behalf of the defendant that as the two contracts were for the successive deliveries of the same article, and covered approximately the same periods of time, it was not necessary for defendant to go through the form of receiving and paying for shipments under the second contract, when plaintiff's failure to comply with the first contract had made it certain that it was engaged in shipping rubber that did not meet the requirements of the contract. Such, however, is not the prevailing rule. On the contrary, the authorities are agreed that, where the contracts are separate and distinct, the breach of one by the seller will not justify the buyer's failure to perform the other. Elliott on Contracts, § 5053; Williston on Sales, § 467; Lestershire Lumber, etc., Co. v. W. M. Ritter Lumber Co. (C. C.) 144 Fed. 568; Ritter Lumber Co. v. Lestershire, 153 Fed. 575, 82 C. C. A. 529; Sleepy Eye Milling Co. v. Hartmann, 184 Ill. App. 308; Hanson v. Wittenberg, 205 Mass. 319, 91 N. E. 333; Stephenson v. Cady, 117 Mass. 6; Hutchens v. Sutherland, 22 Nev. 363, 40 Pac. 409; Bowers Granite Co. v. Farrell, 66 Vt. 314, 29 Atl. 491; Collins v. Swan-Day Lumber Co., 158 Ky. 231, 164 S. W. 813. It is therefore clear that defendant breached the second contract." Clay, C., in Ten Broeck Tyre Co. v. Rubber Trading Co., 186 Ky. 526, 529-530 (1919).

This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract of purchase and sale.

EARL, J.¹²⁷ In September, 1872, at the city of New York, the plaintiff sold to the defendants 10,000 boxes of glass, at seven and one-half per cent discount from the tariff price of July, 1872, to be paid for in gold, at New York upon delivery of invoice and bill of lading, by bills of exchange on Antwerp. The glass was to be of approved standard qualities, and was to be shipped on board of sailing vessels at Antwerp, and to be at the risk of the defendants as soon as shipped, and they were to insure and pay the freight and custom duties. The glass was to be delivered during the months of October, November, and December, 1872, and January, 1873. In pursuance of this contract, the plaintiff delivered to the defendants 4,924 boxes of glass, for which they paid. They refused to receive any more, and this action was brought to recover damages consequent upon such refusal.

The defendants claimed, and gave evidence tending to prove, that the glass delivered was not of approved standard quality, and hence that they had the right to refuse to take the balance.

While some months after the glass was delivered the defendants complained of its quality, they at no time offered to return it, or gave plaintiff notice to retake it. They received it under the contract, and it is not important in this action to determine, as no counterclaim is set up, whether or not a right of action for damages on account of the inferior quality of the glass survived the acceptance. The fact that the glass delivered and received upon the contract was inferior did not give them the right to repudiate the contract altogether. They could demand better glass, and when the plaintiff offered to deliver the balance, if it was inferior, they could refuse to accept it. But if plaintiff was ready and willing to deliver for the balance such glass as the contract called for, they were bound to receive it. Here the plaintiff requested them to take the balance of the glass, and they refused to take any more, and thus repudiated and put an end to the contract. There was no proof that the plaintiff insisted upon delivering inferior glass, or that he was not ready and willing to deliver glass of the proper quality. They did not take the position that they were willing to receive glass of approved standard quality, but refused to take any more glass under the contract. There was, therefore, such a breach of contract as entitled the plaintiff to recover such legal damages as he sustained by the breach. * * *

CASTLEBERRY v. TYLER COMMERCIAL COLLEGE.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, 1919. 217 S. W. 1112.)

Action by Grace Castleberry against the Tyler Commercial College. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

August 20, 1918, appellant entered into a contract with appellee, by the terms of which she became entitled, by complying with appellee's regulations, to a "complete course of shorthand" in its school. The contract was in writing and contained stipulations as follows:

"If a student * * * disregards the regulations of the school, * * * this scholarship will be limited to the average time of 3½ months.

"The school reserves the right at all times to require its students to board in homes approved by the college, and to cancel this scholarship and require the withdrawal of any one deemed by the management injurious to the best interest of the school."

Having secured rooms at Mrs. Alford's, on South College street, and board at Mrs. Christians' on South Broadway, in compliance with appellee's instructions to her, appellant on said August 20, 1918, began to attend appellee's school in the city of Tyler. She continued to room at Mrs. Alford's, and to attend said school until November 21, 1918, when, she alleged, she was expelled from the school by appellee. Afterwards she brought this suit to recover damages she alleged she had suffered as a result of appellee's act, which, she charged, was a breach of the contract. * * *

The trial court * * * instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of appellee. The appeal is from a judgment in accordance with such a verdict.

WILLSON, C. J.¹²⁹ It will be noted that appellee in its contract with appellant reserved "the right at all times to require" her "to board in homes" it approved. As commonly used, the word "board" means lodging as well as food. Century Dictionary; Heron v. Webber, 103 Me. 178, 68 Atl. 744. That it was used in that sense in the contract will not be doubted, when the obvious reason why the reservation was made is kept in mind. The plain meaning of the stipulation was that appellee was to have the right while appellant attended its school to require her to room, as well as to take her meals, at homes it approved. It was not against either the law or public policy for the parties to so contract. Therefore the stipulation was a valid one, and appellee was acting within its lawful right under the contract when it insisted that ap-the same way as defect in quantity and other courts are inclined to make persistence in sending inferior quality the test; but, after all, though there may be a difference in emphasis, the question of whether the breach goes to the essence is the fundamental one, whether quantity or quality is considered.

¹²⁹The statement of facts is abbreviated.

pellant should move from Mrs. Alford's to another rooming house. But appellant insists that, if appellee had such a right, the penalty provided by the contract for a refusal by her to comply with the requirement was only to limit her scholarship to $3\frac{1}{2}$ months, and that appellee had no right to expel her from the school because of such refusal. The answer to that is, we think, that it did not appear from the testimony that appellee expelled appellant from the school. All it did was to insist that she cease her attendance at its school until she complied with the demand it made on her to move to another rooming house. So far as the testimony in the record shows to the contrary, there has never been a time since she was requested to move from Mrs. Alford's when appellant has not been at liberty to resume her attendance at the school on her compliance with the demand she agreed by her contract appellee might make of her.

¹²⁰ In National Contracting Co. v. Vulcanite Portland Cement Co., 192 Mass. 247 (1906), the defendant being much behind in its shipment of cement under the contract and the plaintiff being much behind in payments for cement delivered, the plaintiff wrote demanding prompt shipments, the defendant replied demanding payment of items due and stating that no more shipments would be made until the items were paid, and the plaintiff declined to pay, claiming to hold the money as security for damages already suffered and that might hereafter be suffered from the defendant's breach of contract. In affirming a judgment for the defendant, Knowlton, C. J., for the court, said that while the plaintiff might well be found to have waived any claim for damages up to the time it demanded prompt shipments, nevertheless "It had a right to insist upon perfect performance in the future; but the plaintiff's failure to pay for the cement when the bills were due, left the defendant with a right to insist at any time that these payments should be made. Such payments might be demanded as a condition precedent to the delivery of any more cement. Eastern Forge Company v. Corbin, 182 Mass. 590-593, 66 N. E. 419; National Machine Company v. Standard Company, 181 Mass. 275-279, 63 N. E. 900; Stephenson v. Cady, 117 Mass. 6; Wilkinson v. Blount Manufacturing Company, 169 Mass. 374, 47 N. E. 1020. The defendant made its demand, and stood on its right to have pay before making any more deliveries. The plaintiff sought to hold the money as security for damages from possible breaches of the contract by the defendant in the future.

"We think it quite plain that the plaintiff could not lawfully do this. It could not be known that there would be any breach of the contract of the defendant in the future if the plaintiff made the payments then due and afterwards paid promptly. One who contracts for the purchase of goods by installments cannot lawfully demand performance of the contract, and at the same time withhold payments due for installments already received in order to protect himself from anticipated breaches of the contract by the seller. Stephenson v. Cady, 117 Mass. 6-9, 10; Spaulding v. Backus, 122 Mass. 553, 23 Am. Rep. 391. Wiley v. Bunker Hill National Bank, 183 Mass. 495, 67 N. E. 655."

(High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division and Court of Appeal.

Action tried by McCardie, J., without a jury.

By a contract in writing dated November 9, 1917, the defendant, who was a dealer in silk, agreed to sell to the plaintiffs 200 pieces of crepe de chine at 4s. 6d. a yard and 200 pieces at 5s. 11d. a yard, "delivery as required January to September, 1918; conditions, 2½ per cent 1 month," which meant that payment for goods delivered up to the twentieth day of the month should be made on the twentieth day of the following month, subject to 2½ per cent discount. At the request of the plaintiffs, the defendants delivered, in November, 1917, a certain quantity of the goods under the contract, the price of which amounted to 76*l.* less 2½ per cent discount. On December 21st the plaintiffs drew a cheque in favor of the defendant in payment of these goods, but the cheque was never received by the defendant. Early in January, 1918, the defendant telephoned to the plaintiffs asking why she had not received a cheque. The plaintiffs then drew another cheque, but owing to a delay in obtaining the signature of one of the plaintiffs' directors, this cheque was not sent to the defendant until January 16th. On that day the plaintiffs gave an order by telephone for further deliveries under the contract. The defendant in the belief, which was in fact erroneous, that the plaintiffs' financial position was such that they could not have met the cheque which they alleged had been drawn in December, wrote to the plaintiffs on January 16, refusing to make any further deliveries under the contract, unless the plaintiffs paid cash with each order. The plaintiffs refused to do this, and after some further correspondence brought this action claiming damages for breach of contract. The damages claimed were the difference between the market price in the middle of February 1918, and the contract price of the two classes of goods, the difference alleged being respectively 1s. 3d. and 1s. 4d. a yard.

MCCARDIE, J.¹³¹ * * * It is to be observed that in the present case the contract did not provide for delivery in any particular number of instalments. The deliveries were to be extended over the period from January to September, and it was contemplated that there would be an unspecified number of deliveries and a corresponding number of payments. I may, with diffidence, refer to my own judgment in In re Rubel Bronze and Metal Co. and Vos, [1918] 1 K. B. 315, where I referred to the leading authorities. I recognized that in certain circumstances a single breach of a contract may amount to a repudiation of the whole contract. I adhere to what I said in that case, but in the present case I entertain no doubt whatever that the plaintiffs' failure to make punctual payment for the November delivery did not amount to a repudiation of the contract, nor did it go to the root of the contract; on the other hand, in my opinion, the defendant's letter of January 16 did in fact and in law amount to an unjustifiable refusal by her to carry out her contractual obligations, for she announced in clear terms that she would thenceforth deliver no further goods to the plaintiffs under the contract unless the plaintiffs paid cash to cover each invoice. The market price of these goods was rising from the beginning of January and continued to rise up to the middle of February. The plaintiffs claim to be entitled to damages based on the market price at that date. I find as a fact that the market prices in February were respectively 6*d.* and 7*d.* per yard in excess of the contract prices. The plaintiffs did not in fact purchase goods as against their contract with the defendant. They asserted that the market was so bare of goods as to render purchases impracticable.

Now a serious question of law arises on the question of damages. I find as a fact that the defendant was ready and willing to supply the goods to the plaintiffs at the times and places specified in the contract, provided the plaintiffs paid cash on delivery. Mr. Matthews [of counsel for the plaintiffs] argued with characteristic vigour and ability that the plaintiffs were entitled to ignore that offer on the ground that a person who has repudiated a contract cannot place the other party to the contract under an obligation to diminish his loss by accepting a new offer made by the party in default.

The question is one of juristic importance. What is the rule of law as to the duty to mitigate damages? I will first refer to the judgment of Cockburn, C. J., in Frost v. Knight, (1872) L. R. 7 Ex. 111, 115, where he said: "In assessing the damages for breach of the performance, a jury will of course take into account whatever the plaintiff has done, or has had the means of doing, and, as a prudent man, ought in reason to have done, whereby his loss has been, or would have been, diminished." * * *

The question, therefore, is what a prudent person ought reasonably to do in order to mitigate his loss arising from a breach of contract. I feel no inclination to allow in a mercantile dispute an unhappy indulgence in far-fetched resentment or an undue sensitiveness to slights or unfortunately worded letters. Business often gives rise to certain asperities. But I agree that the plaintiffs in deciding whether to accept the defendant's offer were fully entitled to consider the terms in which the offer was made, its bona fides or otherwise, its relation to their own business methods and financial position, and all the circumstances of the case; and it must be remembered that an acceptance of the offer would not preclude an action for damages for the actual loss sustained. Many illustrations might be given of the extraordinary results which would follow if the plaintiffs were entitled to reject the defendant's offer and incur a substantial measure of loss which would have been avoided by their acceptance of the offer. The plaintiffs were in fact in a position to pay cash for the goods but instead of accepting the defendant's offer, which was made perfectly bona fide, the plaintiffs permitted themselves to sustain a large measure of loss which as prudent and reasonable people, they ought to have avoided. But the fact that the plaintiffs have claimed damages on an erroneous principle does not preclude me from awarding to them such damages as they have in fact suffered, calculated upon the correct bases. See Cory v. Thomas Ironworks and Shipbuilding Co., (1868) L. R. 3 Q. B. 181. They have suffered serious and substantial business inconvenience, and I conceive that I am entitled to award them damages for that. The authorities are conveniently collected in Arnold on Damages, at p. 13. Moreover, even if the plaintiffs had accepted the defendant's offer, they would nevertheless have lost the very useful period of credit which the contract gave them. Taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case I have come to the conclusion that the right sum to award as damages is 50%. I give judgment for the plaintiffs for that amount, and in view of the important points involved, I give costs on the High Court scale.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Appeal on the question of damages.

BANKES, L. J. At the trial of this case the defendant, the present respondent, raised two points: first, that she had committed no breach of the contract of sale, and secondly that, if there was a breach, yet she had offered and was always ready and willing to supply the pieces of silk, the subject of the contract, at the contract price for cash; that it was unreasonable on the part of the appellants not to accept that offer, and that therefore they cannot claim damages beyond what they would have lost by paying cash with each order instead of having a month's credit and a discount of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. We must take it that this was the offer made by the respondent. The case was fought and the learned judge has given judgment on that footing. It is true that the correspondence suggests that the respondent was at one time claiming an increased price. But in this court it must be taken that the offer was to supply the contract goods at the contract price except that payment was to be by cash instead of being on credit.

In these circumstances the only question is whether the appellants can establish that as matter of law they were not bound to consider any offer made by the respondent because of the attitude she had taken up. * * *

It is plain that the question what is reasonable for a person to do in mitigation of his damages cannot be a question of law but must be one of fact in the circumstances of each particular case. There may be cases where as matter of fact it would be unreasonable to expect a plaintiff to consider any offer made in view of the treatment he had received from the defendant. If he had been rendering personal services and had been dismissed after being accused in presence of others of being a thief, and if after that his employer had offered to take him back into his service, most persons would think he was justified in refusing the offer and that it would be unreasonable to ask him in this way to mitigate the damages in action for wrongful dismissal. But that is not to state a principle of law, but a conclusion of fact to be arrived at on a consideration of all the circumstances of the case. Mr. Matthews complained that the respondents had treated his clients so badly that it would be unreasonable to expect them to listen to any proposition she might make. I do not agree. In my view each party was ready to accuse the other of conduct unworthy of a high commercial reputation, and there was nothing to justify the appellants in refusing to consider the respondent's offer. I think the learned judge came to a proper conclusion on the facts, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

SCRUTTON, L. J. I am of the same opinion. Whether it be more correct to say that a plaintiff must minimize his damages, or to say that he can recover no more than he would have suffered if he had acted reasonably, because any further damages do not reasonably follow from the defendant's breach, the result is the same. The plaintiff must take "all reasonable steps to mitigate the loss consequent on the breach," and this principle "debars him from claiming any part of the damage which is due to his neglect to take such steps": British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Co. v. Underground Electric Railways Co. of London, per Lord Haldane L. C. [1912] A. C. 673, 689. Mr. Matthews [of counsel for the appellants] has contended that in considering what steps should be taken to mitigate the damage all contractual relations with the party in default must be excluded. That is contrary to my experience. In certain cases of personal service it may be unreasonable to expect a plaintiff to consider an offer from the other party who has grossly injured him; but in commercial contracts it is generally reasonable to accept an offer from the party in default. However, it is always a question of fact. About the law there is no difficulty.

EVE, J. I agree. But for the difficulty introduced by the respondent's demand for a higher price than that named in the contract, I think this is a plain case. That difficulty is more apparent than real. It was not raised in the court below, and there is not enough evidence to enable us to give effect to it, assuming it to be a matter of substance.

*Appeal dismissed.*¹³³

¹³³ In the United States the general rule is that where the contract calls for credit to the buyer and the seller demands cash, the buyer is under no obligation to pay cash unless he is financially able to do so, unless the seller offers the appropriate discount for cash and unless the demand for cash is made under circumstances which will not prejudice any other contract right or dam-

HERBERT S. GILBERT & CO. v. PATRICK MCGINNIS ET AL.

MULKEY, J. On the 16th of February, 1881, Patrick McGinnis, the appellee, sold to appellants, Herbert S. Gilbert & Co., seven thousand bushels of corn at thirty-nine cents per bushel, to be delivered in the months of August and September following. As a part of the same agreement the appellants promised to make advances on the contract to appellee of what money he might, from time to time, require. A short time after the making of this agreement, appellee called on the appellants, at their business house in Ottawa, and requested an advance on the contract, as per agreement. The clerk in charge of their business told him he could have the money, and commenced writing a note for the amount, whereupon appellee stated to the clerk he would not sign a note remarking, in effect, that if he wanted to obtain money in that way he could get it from the bank. Appellants refused to make the required advance unless appellee would give his note for the amount. This he declined to do, and informed the clerk at the time he would not let appellants have the corn. The corn not having been delivered within the time specified in the agreement, the appellants, on the 3d day of October, 1881, commenced an action of assumpsit, against appellee, in the circuit court of LaSalle county, to recover damages for the non-delivery of the corn, which resulted in a judgment in favor of the defendant, for costs. This judgment having been affirmed by the Appellate Court for the second district, the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

On the trial the plaintiffs offered to show there was a general custom among grain merchants to take notes from the seller for the amount of advances made under contracts for the sale of grain, like the one in question. They also proposed to prove that on previous occasions there had been contracts and dealings similar in character to the one sued upon, and that the manner of dealing between the parties was, when an advance was made, memoranda or notes should be taken for the money advanced. The court declined to admit evidence to the jury in support of either of these positions, and the ruling of the court in this respect presents the only question for determination. The same question is raised by certain refused instructions asked on behalf of the appellants.

Georgia Iron & Coal Co.*, 169 Fed. 578 (1909); Campfield v. Sauer, 189 Fed. 576 (1911). But if those conditions are met, even where the ability to pay cash is because of credit which could be used to get it, the buyer must pay cash or have his damages reduced accordingly. Lawrence v. Porter, 63 Fed. 62 (1894); Deere v. Lewis, 51 Ill. 254 (1869); Plesofsky v. Kaufman, 140 Tenn. 208 (1918). In Campfield v. Sauer, supra, and Plesofsky v. Kaufman, supra, the burden is put on the seller to show the buyer's ability to pay cash.

The rule is well recognized that where a commercial contract is in any respect ambiguous, a particular custom or usage of trade known to the parties, or which, under the circumstances, they are presumed to know, or any previous course of dealing between them that will have a tendency to disclose the real intentions of the parties, and to aid the court in arriving at its true construction, will be admissible in evidence. Such evidence is not only admissible for the purpose of explaining the terms of a contract, but also for the purpose of ingrafting, as it were, new terms into it, subject, however, to the qualification that such new terms are not expressly or impliedly excluded by the express agreement. (1 Smith's Leading Cases, 307, et seq.) To have this effect, however, the usage must be reasonable, and not in conflict with any general rule of law. (Macy et al. v. Wheeling Ins. Co., 9 Met. (Mass.) 354.) The proof offered in this case was clearly not for the purpose of explaining any ambiguity in the contract, or for the purpose of showing that some particular word or phrase in it is used out of its ordinary signification. No claim of this kind is made. It is conceded by both parties that appellants were to make advances—that is, let appellee have money, from time to time, as he might need it, under the contract. So far there is no controversy. But appellants contend that a custom or usage prevailed, not adverted to in the express agreement, which required the appellee to give to them this note upon receiving any such advances. The usage here sought to be shown, it is clear, was for the purpose of aiding a stipulation on the part of appellee which, it is conceded, is not found in the express agreement. This, as we have already seen, may sometimes be done; but whether it could be done in this particular case depends upon whether the stipulation thus to be added is inconsistent or in conflict with that part of the agreement which is expressed, and about which there is no controversy. We are clearly of opinion that it is, and that the trial court therefore ruled properly in excluding the evidence and in refusing the instructions complained of.

An advance or payment of money on a contract of sale, without doubt, is altogether a different thing from that of obtaining money from the purchaser on the seller's own note. The legal effect of the transaction in the first case is to extinguish, pro tanto, the seller's claim and the purchaser's corresponding liability. In the second, no part of either is extinguished. Instead of collecting something on his corn, as provided by the agreement, the seller is offered a loan of money on his individual note, which would be a complete change of the legal relations of the parties. Whereas the seller was, before, a mere creditor of the purchaser, he at once, upon giving such a note, becomes the debtor of the purchaser, and no part of the debt due him on account of the sale is thereby discharged. Thus it is seen the legal effect in the one case is practically the very opposite of what it is in the other, and might in many cases result in the grossest injustice. For instance, had appellee given his note for the required advance, the appellants might, the next hour thereafter, have transferred it to another for value, and appellee would have been compelled to pay it, whether he ever got a cent for his corn or not. This is apparent. That one will not be permitted to prove a custom or usage the effect of which will be to add to an express agreement a condition or limitation which is repugnant to or inconsistent with the agreement itself, will hardly be questioned. This is not only the universally received doctrine on the subject, but it has been often fully recognized by this court. Caldwell v. Meek, 17 Ill. 220; Bissell v. Ryan, 34 id. 566; Deshler v. Beers, 32 id. 368; Wilson v. Bauman, 80 id. 493. In the editor's note to Wigglesworth v. Dalleson, Smith's Leading Cases 309, it is said: "Evidence of usage, though sometimes admissible to add to or explain, is never to vary or to contradict, either expressly or by implication, the terms of a written instrument,"—citing in support of the proposition, Magie v. Atkinson, 2 M. & W. 442; Adams v. Worldley, 1 id. 374; Freeman v. Loeder, 11 A. & E. 589, and Gates v. Pym, 6 Taunt. 445. The rule here stated is equally applicable to a verbal contract, where the terms of it are definitely fixed, as they are in the present case.

It follows from what we have said, and the authorities cited, the judgment of the appellate court must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

CRESSWELL RANCH & CATTLE CO., LIMITED, v.
MARTINDALE ET AL.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, 1894. 63 Fed. 84, 11 C. C. A. 33.)

SANBORN, J.¹²³ If the vendee of personal property, to be delivered and paid for in instalments, refuses, upon the demand of the vendor, to accept and pay for a substantial part of an instalment according to the contract, will the fact that he does so in good faith, and in the belief that he is not required by the contract to receive any of the property so rejected, deprive the vendor of his right to refuse to further perform the contract on his part? This is the principal question presented by this case.

September 19, 1892, the Cresswell Ranch & Cattle Company, Limited, a corporation, the plaintiff in error, sold to William Martindale and Thomas J. Price, the defendants in error, 5,021 steers, 1,321 of which were to be delivered not later than October 20, 1892, and the remaining 3,700 at the rate of 1,000 each week, commencing October 24, 1892. The vendees agreed to pay $28 per head for the cattle, and at the date of the contract paid $5,000, which was to be applied to the payment for the cattle as they were delivered at the rate of $1 per head. The 3,700 cattle were part of a herd of cattle owned by the vendor that was on a range in Texas, 40 miles square and the contract provided that when any instalment of these cattle was ready to load upon the cars the vendees should be notified, and might cut out any of the steers gathered that did not weigh 900 pounds. After the 1,321 cattle and two instalments of the 3,700 had been delivered and paid for, making in all 2,289 steers, the parties met on November 14, 1892, for the fourth delivery, and the vendor tendered, and demanded that the vendees should receive, 980 steers that weighed over 900 pounds each, and that complied with the other requirements of the contract. The vendees cut out and refused to accept or pay for 282 of these cattle, on the ground that they did not weigh 900 pounds each, but accepted and paid for the remaining 698. Before the time for another delivery arrived, the vendor notified the vendees that they had violated the contract on their part by rejecting the 282 steers, and that the cattle company would deliver no more cattle to them thereunder. The vendees then brought this suit for damages for the failure of the vendor to deliver the remainder of the cattle specified in the contract, and for the balance of the $5,000 not yet applied to the payment for the cattle already delivered. The vendor answered that the vendees had committed the first breach by failing to receive and pay for the 282 cattle tendered November 14, 1892. At the close of the trial the court instructed the jury, in effect, that the mere fact that the vendees refused to accept the steers that complied with the contract on November 14, 1892, did not relieve the vendor of its obligation to make tender of the remainder of the 5,021 steers due under the contract, if the jury further found that the vendees made the rejection in good faith, in the belief that the rejected steers did not come up to the requirements of the contract. The court also refused to charge, as requested by the vendor, that the rejection of these steers entitled it to treat this action as a breach of the contract, and that, if the vendor notified the vendees that it so elected in a reasonable time after the rejection, the latter could not recover. The court also instructed the jury that, although they found that the vendor tendered and the vendees refused to accept cattle that fulfilled the requirements of the contract, yet, if the vendor had subsequently waived that breach of the contract, the vendees could recover damages for the failure of the vendor to make the subsequent deliveries. There was a verdict and judgment for the vendees for damages for the failure of the vendor to deliver the steers due subsequent to November 14, 1892. But the jury found that the 282 steers tendered and rejected on that day fulfilled the requirements of the contract, and gave the vendees no damages on account of those steers. The verdict does not disclose whether the jury found that the vendees' breach of the contract on November 14, 1892, was excused because they made it in good faith or because the vendor had waived it.

The contract on which this action was based was an entire contract. It was a contract for the sale of 5,021 cattle for $140,588, and the $5,000 earnest money paid at the time the contract was made was paid on account of the entire purchase. The subsidiary provisions of the contract, that the price was $28 for each steer, and that there were to be five deliveries of the cattle, no more made as many contracts of this one as there were to be instalments of cattle delivered than it made as many as there were cattle to be delivered. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 203, 6 Sup. Ct. 12; Iron Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434, 439. Nor was the vendees' breach of this contract slight or in an immaterial part. It was substantial, and went to the very root of the contract. It consisted in their refusal to accept 282 cattle, and to pay $7,896 for them, at the time and place they agreed to accept and pay for them under the contract. These cattle had been gathered by the vendor from a range 40 miles square by the labor of many men for many days and driven near to the railroad station to be delivered to the vendees. Their refusal to take them imposed upon the vendor the necessity of gathering other cattle from this extended range in the same manner to carry out its contract in the face of the fact that the vendees had refused to accept nearly three hundred cattle that complied with its provisions. A plaintiff cannot maintain his action for the breach of a contract made with him by a defendant unless he can establish such performance on his part as will entitle him to demand performance of the defendant. A prior substantial breach of the contract on the plaintiff's part is ordinarily a conclusive answer to an action for a subsequent breach on the defendant's part. In their complaint the vendees recognized this principle, and alleged that they "have in all things kept and performed the said contract upon their part," but that the cattle company, on November 19, 1892, refused to perform on its part.

The verdict does not rest, however, upon proof of this prior performance on the part of the vendees, but upon the facts that, before they charge any breach upon the cattle company, they had themselves failed to perform a substantial part of the contract, but that they then in good faith believed that they were not so failing. Nor was this exercise of good faith and belief by mistake, or without notice of the fact. It was a willful and determined exercise of faith. The vendor insisted, at the time, that these cattle weighed over 900 pounds each, weighed some of them in the presence of one of the vendees on some defective scales that indicated that its claim was well founded, and demanded that the vendees should accept them. All this may not have demonstrated the weight of the cattle, though it seems to have proved it to the satisfaction of the jury, but, although the judgment of the vendor's agent was liable to be at fault, and although the scales were defective, this was ample warning to the vendees to determine the weight of these cattle in some way correctly before they rejected them. They had, by the express terms, reserved to themselves the exclusive privilege of rejecting cattle that did not in fact weigh 900 pounds, and by that very provision they had imposed upon themselves the duty of determining the fact, and of rejecting, at their peril, those whose weight exceeded that amount. The provision of the contract which presents this question is that the vendees may cut out "any objectionable steer that may not weigh 900 pounds." It was perfectly competent for these parties to this contract to have provided in it that the vendees might cut out and reject any steer that in their judgment weighed less than 900 pounds, or any steer that they in good faith believed weighed less than 900 pounds. This they did not do. They provided that the vendees might cut out those steers that in fact weighed less than 900 pounds each. There is a well-known and accurate standard and method for measuring the weight of cattle and most mercantile commodities, and contracting parties know when they make their contracts what the standard is, and what the method is, and that neither of them will probably change. But there is no accurate test, standard, or method by which the belief of vendees as to the weight of the articles they purchase can be measured, and no one can know in advance what such a belief may be. The belief of the defendants in error in this case was, according to the verdict of the jury, too far from the fact to authorize its substitution in this contract for the actual weight, for out of 980 cattle that weighed over 900 pounds each they believed that more than 28 per cent. of them weighed less. To substitute in this contract, for the actual weight, the judgment or belief in good faith of the vendees on that subject as the standard by which to determine what steers were heavy enough to comply with the terms of the contract, would be to make a new contract for these parties,—a contract they neither made nor intended to make, and one which the verdict shows would have been far more beneficial to the vendees than was the actual contract. It is not claimed that this can be done.

But it is insisted that, although the good faith and belief of the vendees cannot be made the standard to determine the existence of the breach of this contract, yet they may be interposed to deprive that breach some of its ordinary legal effects. But that as effectually makes a new contract for the parties as to substitute the vendees' belief as to the weight for the actual weight. The established rights and remedies for the breach of an agreement are as effectually contracted for as the performance of the acts stipulated. One of the rights of the vendor under this contract was to refuse to perform subsequent acts stipulated after the vendees had refused to perform a substantial part of the contract on their part. This right is given by the law for his protection to the party to a contract against whom the first breach has been committed. No sound reason occurs to us why its existence should be made dependent on the good faith or belief of him who first breaks the contract. On the other hand, there are cogent reasons to the contrary.

First. It is the breach itself, and not the good faith or belief of the party who commits it, that causes and measures the damage of the injured party. The injury to the vendor in the case before us was not less because the vendees broke the contract in good faith, in the belief that they were not breaking it. Nor did the fact that they broke it in good faith, in the belief that they were complying with it, raise any presumption that they would not continue to do so. On the other hand, this fact presented the guaranty of word and of act that they would continue to break it.

Second. The rights and remedies of parties for breaches of civil contracts ought not to depend on the good faith and belief of those who violate them, because these are so difficult to ascertain. The proof of the existence or absence of such good faith and belief is peculiarly within the knowledge and control of the violators themselves. Frequently they alone know what they believe, and whether or not they are acting in good faith. It would always be difficult, and often impossible, to establish their bad faith or their belief that they were violating their contracts, without their testimony, and generally impossible to do so with it. The rights and remedies of parties for the breach of civil contracts ought not to be so placed at the mercy of those who break them. It would be intolerable that parties to continuing contracts should be compelled to perform them on their part until they could prove that the other contracting parties, who were constantly breaking them, were doing so in bad faith, and in the belief that they had no right to do so.

Our conclusion is that the right of a party to a continuing contract to refuse to make subsequent performance on his part, after the other contracting party has refused, upon full notice and demand, to perform a substantial part of the contract on his part, is not dependent on the good faith of the latter, nor on his belief that he is not violating the contract, but rests solely upon the fact whether or not he has violated or failed to perform a substantial part of the contract that the agreement required him to perform. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 204, 205, 6 Sup. Ct. 12; Filley v. Pope, 115 U. S. 213, 6 Sup. Ct. 19; Rolling-Mill v. Rhodes, 121 U. S. 255, 261, 264, 7 Sup. Ct. 882; Beck & Pauli Lithographing Co. v. Colorado Milling & Elevator Co., 3 C. C. A. 248, 52 Fed. 700, 703, 10 U. S. App. 465, 470; Philip Mills v. Slater, 12 R. I. 82; Smith v. Lewis, 40 Ind. 98; Hoare v. Rennie, 5 Hurl. & N. 19; Pope v. Porter, 102 N. Y. 366, 371, 7 N. E. 304; Dwinel v. Howard, 30 Me. 258; Robson v. Bohn, 27 Minn. 333, 344, 7 N. W. 357; Reybold v. Voorhees, 30 Pa. St. 116, 121; Stephenson v. Cady, 117 Mass. 6, 9; Branch v. Palmer, 65 Ga. 210; Fletcher v. Cole, 23 Vt. 114, 119. * * *

The reason why the vendor could not recover in Norrington v. Wright was that he had committed the first breach of the contract, and that relieved the vendee from subsequent performance on his part. For the same reason the breach committed November 14, 1892, relieved the cattle company from any subsequent performance on its part. If a default on the first instalment by one party relieves the other contracting party from the performance of all the stipulations of the contract, by so much the more will a default on a later instalment relieve him from all subsequent performance. It is the first breach which he commits, and not the number of the particular instalment to which it relates, that defeats the plaintiff, in these actions. Thus in Robson v. Bohn, supra, a contract was made May 19, 1873, for the sale of 425,000 feet of lumber, to be delivered at the rate of 20,000 feet per week from the date of the contract, and the defendant agreed to give his promissory note for $3,000 at that time, to pay $2,000 in cash August 1, 1873, and to pay the balance on the full delivery of the lumber. He gave his note for $3,000. The vendor delivered the lumber weekly until August 1, 1873. The vendee then failed to pay the $2,000 in cash, and the court held that the refusal of the vendee to pay the $2,000 excused the vendor from the delivery of any lumber subsequent to August 1st. To the same effect are Dwinel v. Howard and Reybold v. Voorhees, supra. The rule is general that he who commits the first substantial breach of a contract cannot maintain an action against the other contracting party for a subsequent failure to perform, and it rules this case.

Finally, it is contended that the cattle company waived the breach committed by the vendees, and, that, even if there was error in the instruction we have been considering, it was error without prejudice, and the judgment should be affirmed. * * * But it is unnecessary to determine that question here, * * * because it may be that the jury founded their verdict upon the very issue to which the erroneous ruling related, and that they were controlled in their finding by that ruling. Coal Co. v. Johnson, 6 C. C. A. 148, 56 Fed. 810; State of Maryland v. Baldwin, 112 U. S. 490, 492, 5 Sup. Ct. 278. * * *

The judgment is accordingly reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions to grant a new trial.¹²⁴

One who refuses to perform on the ground that the other party cannot or will not perform does so, of course, at the peril of proving the inability or uncertainty. "The case comes down to this, as far as the rule of law governing it is concerned: Plaintiff believed and perhaps had reasonable cause to believe the city would be unable to carry out its part of the contract; that is to say, would be unable promptly to furnish a right of way for the sewer system, and in consequence he might sustain loss; but this was by no means certain, and the law does not relieve a man from a contractual obligation because he believes with good cause the person with whom he has contracted will be unable to perform." Goode, J., in Coonan v. City of Cape Girardeau, 149 Mo. App. 609, 129 S. W. 745, 748 (1910).

On right to repudiate because of anticipated inability of the other party to perform within the time limit, see 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) '60, note.

TIPTON v. FEITNER.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1859. 20 N. Y. 423.)

Appeal from the Supreme Court. Action to recover the price of certain slaughtered hogs, sold by the plaintiffs to the defendants. It was defended on the ground that they were purchased under a special contract with the plaintiffs, which had been violated on their part. The case, according to the finding of the referee, before whom it was tried, was as follows: On the 3rd day of February, 1855, at the city of New York, the plaintiffs agreed with the defendant, by parol, by one and the same contract, to sell the defendant eighty-eight dressed hogs, then at the slaughter house of a third person, in the city, at 7 cents per pound; and also certain live hogs of the plaintiffs, which were being driven and were then on their way from the state of Ohio to New York at $5\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound live weight, the defendant agreeing on his part to buy dressed and live hogs at these prices. The dressed hogs were to be delivered immediately after the sale, and the live ones on their arrival in the city, where they were expected, and did arrive some days afterwards. The dressed hogs were delivered on the same day, but were not paid for by the defendant. The live hogs arrived five days afterwards; they were not delivered to the defendant, but were slaughtered by the plaintiffs, and by them sold to other parties. The defendant insisted that the plaintiffs could not recover for the dressed hogs, on the ground that they had failed to perform their agreement as to the live ones. The referee, however, held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the price of the dressed hogs, deducting the damages which the defendant had sustained for the breach of the other branch of the contract; and he reported accordingly. The dressed hogs came to \$1,182.57; deducted for defendant's damages, \$401, leaving \$780.38, for which judgment was given, which was affirmed at a general term. The defendant appealed.

DENIO, J.¹²⁵ It is not universally true that a party to a contract who has himself failed to perform some of its provisions is thereby precluded from recovering damages for a breach committed by the other party. The question in such cases is, whether the stipulation which the plaintiff has failed to observe was a condition precedent to the performance by the defendant; and whether it is of that character or not depends upon the general scope and intention of the agreement, to be gathered from its several provisions. If the parties have in terms stipulated that the defendant's performance shall be dependent or conditional upon something to be done by the plaintiff, the case is a plain one. It is equally so where the act to be done by the plaintiff must naturally precede, in the order of time what the defendant is called upon to do, and where the former is necessary to be done to enable the defendant to perform; and also where the defendant's performance is the payment or equivalent for something which he is to receive from the plaintiff, unless, in the latter case, it is provided that such equivalent is to be rendered in advance of what is to be received on account of it, credit being given for the latter.

In contracts for the purchase of property, real or personal, where there is no stipulation for credit or delay on either side, the delivery of the property (or its conveyance where it is of a nature to pass by grant), and the payment of the price are each conditions of the other, and neither party can sue for a breach without having offered performance on his part. Such was the nature of the contract in this case. The plaintiff had slaughtered hogs and also live hogs to dispose of, and the defendant agreed to purchase the whole of both kinds, and to pay a certain price per pound; discriminating, however, as to price between the two species of property. There was no agreement for credit for any part of the property for any time; and in the absence of such a stipulation, we must consider that it was to be paid for on delivery, and that the delivery of the property and the payment of the price were to be concurrent acts. But a question then arises, whether the contract was entire in the sense that a delivery of the whole—the live hogs as well as the dressed meat—was to precede, the payment of the latter; and it is upon the answer to that inquiry, as I think, that this case depends. And I am of the opinion that the bargain respecting the several kinds of property, in regard to the payment for each, is to be taken distributively. The dressed hogs were to be delivered immediately while those which were alive, and were on their way from Ohio, were to be delivered when they should arrive. It would not be unreasonable for the parties to have agreed that payment for those first delivered should be postponed until the others came to hand, so that there should be one settlement for the whole; but it would be a more probable mode of adjustment for the purchaser to agree to pay for the parcel which he was to receive at once, and for the other when he should receive it. In that way neither of the parties would be called upon to trust the other—and there being nothing in the contract which looked to credit, we cannot, I think, reasonably hold that any was contemplated. The difference in the kind of property, in the price, and in the time of delivery showed such a diversity in the two operations as to preclude any necessary or probable inference that the one first to be consummated by delivery was to be suspended, as to its liquidation for the period, more or less uncertain, which might elapse before the other would be ready for adjustment. Upon the construction of so peculiar an agreement a precise precedent is not to be expected. But there is a modern case in the Court of King's Bench, which somewhat confirms the opinion to which I have arrived. [Stating Withers v. Reynolds, 2 Barn. & Adol. 882.] * * *

of the opinion that the defendant cannot refuse to pay for the dressed hogs delivered, on the ground that the plaintiff has broken his contract relative to the live ones. The only condition upon which the payment for the former depended was their delivery. The payment might have been required to be made concurrently with the delivery; but that being waived, the plaintiff might have sued immediately afterwards, and before the time for the delivery of the other property had arrived. It is true, that before this action was commenced the plaintiff was in default for not delivering the other parcel of the property; but for that wrong the defendant had his remedy, either by separate action or by a recoupment in the plaintiff's action; and the referee has allowed him the benefit of it in the latter form. The law no doubt intends to discourage men from breaking their engagements, but this is not generally accomplished by visiting them with a penalty beyond the damages sustained by the party injured. If I am right in my construction of the agreement, there can be no pretence that the delivery of the hogs coming from Ohio was a precedent condition to the payment for the others; and if this were not so, when the agreement was made, it did not become so by the facts which afterwards took place. * * *

The position that one who has violated a contract on his own part cannot recover for the breach of any of its stipulations by the other party, however disconnected with the one he has broken, cannot be sustained. There are many cases the other way; and the rule would be one of needless severity. (Boon v. Eyre, 1 H. Black. 273, note; Campbel v. Jones, 6 Term R. 570; Carpenter v. Cresswell, 4 Bing. 409; Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East 555; Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 Id., 381;) The cases in our own courts, in which covenants have been adjudged to be independent, show that there may be provisions in contracts available to the party in whose favor they are made, though he is unable to aver performance of other provisions of the same contract binding on him. (Bobb v. Montgomery, 20 Johns. 15; Slocum v. Despart, 8 Wend. 615; Morris v. Sliter, 1 Denio, 59.)

I am in favor of affirming the judgment appealed from.

*Judgment affirmed.*¹²⁶

SHINN ET AL. V. BODINE ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1869. 60 Pa. St. 182, 100 Am. Dec. 560.)

Action of assumpsit, brought by Frank L. Bodine and J. Minor Bodine, trading as F. & J. Bodine, against Charles H. Shinn and William C.

¹²⁶ It has been suggested that Tipton v. Feltner, supra, is an instance of severing performance so as to make a party accept other than performance according to the contract's terms "in a state where, if a contract is entire, the rule that all must be tendered before anything is due has been very stoutly

Shinn, trading as Charles H. Shinn & Son. The cause of action alleged in the plaintiff's declaration was that the defendants had refused to deliver 800 tons of coal, as they had contracted to do. The contract was contained in the following letter:

"128 S. Front St., July 31st, 1865.

"Messrs. C. H. Shinn & Co.:

"Gentlemen—We accept your offer for eight hundred (800) tons Greenwood Co.'s coal, broken size, at six (12½-100ths) dollars per ton, 2,240 lbs. Coal to be delivered on board vessels as sent for during months of August and September; to be of as good quality as we have heretofore received. Should we be unable to get all away by close of September, it is understood you can keep over on wharf or bring down later, as you prefer, as much as 300 tons of above quality.

"Yours truly, F. & J. Bodine."

Under this contract the defendants delivered one cargo of coal. The plaintiffs refused to pay for that till the whole was delivered, and the defendants refused to complete the contract. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs and defendants removed the case to the court in banc.

AGNEW, J.¹⁸⁷ The entirety of a contract depends upon the intention of the parties and not on the divisibility of the subject. The severable nature of the latter may often assist in determining the intention, but will not overcome the intent to make an entire contract, when that is shown. Nor will the mode of measuring the price, as by the bushel, ton or pound, change the effect of the agreement, when it is entire. If a party should agree to deliver one bullock, at a certain price per pound, and on a certain day, no one would doubt the entirety of the contract, notwithstanding the mode of measuring the price. But the indivisibility of the contract was not to be less, if he had contracted in the same terms to deliver two. Precisely the same rule would apply to an agreement to deliver 100 bushels of wheat by a certain day for a certain price per bushel, and the entirety of the contract would not be disproved if the agreement required it to be delivered by the wagon-load.

Just so, here, the contract for the delivery of 800 tons of coal at a stated price per ton, is in language clearly denoting an entire contract for that much coal, the price measured by the ton indicating an intent to sever in payment. Nor does the provision for delivery on board vessels sent for the coal during August and September, indicate an intent to sever the payment, for delivery by the vessel-load was a necessity grow-applied. Catlin v. Tobias, 26 N. Y. 217." Francis H. Bohlen, Breach of One Installment of a Divisible Contract, 39 Am. L. Reg. (N. S.) at p. 483, n.

The principal case should be considered in the light of the test laid down by Window, C. J., in National Knitting Co. v. Bouton & Germain Co., reported post, p. 940.

¹⁸⁷ The statement of facts is abbreviated.

ing out of the quantity to be delivered and the distance of transportation. And the last clause was but a provision against inability to send for all the coal in the prescribed time, and fails to indicate any intent to sever the payment. No part of the agreement disclosing an intent to sever in the payment, the legal presumption drawn from the entire contract to deliver 800 tons of coal remains, that it was to be paid for on delivery.

On authority the case is not less clear: Shaw v. Badger, 12 S. & R. 275; Shaw v. Turnpike Co. 2 Penna. R. 454; Harris v. Ligget, 1 W. & S. 301; Davis v. Maxwell, 12 Metc. 286. The authorities cited by the plaintiff in error are all distinguishable. Lester v. McDowell, 6 Harris 92, was a question in replevin, of title dependent on delivery. The same question arose in Welsh v. Bull, 8 Casey 13, the action there being trespass. In Reybold v. Vorhees, 6 Casey 116, the contract clearly indicated a severance in the payments. Mayor v. Pyne, 2 Car. & P. 91, was put on the ground of the refusal of the purchaser to take the undelivered numbers of the work subscribed for. The idea thrown out by Best, C. J., that though the contract was entire for the whole work in numbers, yet there was a subordinate contract to pay for each number on delivery, is plainly founded on what he understood to be a custom of the trade. The contract in Withers v. Reynolds, 2 Barn. & Adol. 882, was for no specific quantity of straw, but a running agreement for the delivery of wheat straw for the use of the stables, until a certain day, at a specified price per load, with an agreement to pay the price for each load. The intention to sever the payment was clear. The other English cases cited need no notice more than to say they are clearly distinguishable from this. We are of the opinion that the contract here for the delivery of 800 tons of coal was entire, and payment of the price waited on the fulfilment.¹³⁸ It was, therefore, not in the ¹³⁸ "It has often been held that a contract is not entire and indivisible because embraced in one instrument (Straus v. Yeager, 48 Ind. App. 448, 93 N. E. 877; Edgerton v. Power, 18 Mont. 350, 45 Pac. 204), and that it is not necessarily severable because embraced in more than one instrument (Spriggs v. R. Ry. Co., 77 Vt. 347, 60 Atl. 148; Waldron v. Can. Pac. Ry. Co., 22 Wash. 253, 60 Pac. 653). Referring to this question, the court in Timber Co., v. Windmill & Pump Co., 135 Iowa, 308, 112 N. W. 771, said:

"As a general rule, it may be said that a contract is entire when by its terms, nature, and purpose it contemplates and intends that each and all of its parts and the consideration shall be common each to the other and 'interdependent.' On the other hand, it is the general rule that a severable contract is one in its nature and purpose susceptible of division and apportionment. The question whether a given contract is entire or separable is very largely one of intention, which intention is to be determined from the language the parties have used and the subject-matter of the agreement. The divisibility of the subject-matter or the consideration is not necessarily conclusive, though of aid, in arriving at the intention." Stevens, J., in B. F. Sturtevant Co. v. Le Mars Gas Co. (Ia.), 176 N. W. 338, 341 (1920).

power of the defendants below to demand payment on each vessel-load, and to rescind on a refusal to pay in this mode.

Judgment affirmed.

In Munsey et al. v. Tadella Pen Co., 38 N. Y. Supp. 159 (1895), the action was on the following accepted offer: "Please insert our one-quarter page advertisement in Munsey's Magazine for one year. This advertisement is to appear in every issue (not less than twelve) of Munsey's Magazine during the year following its first insertion hereunder, beginning with August, 1894. To appear always on back cover page. Matter is to be changed as often as we direct, and proof is always to be submitted to and approved by us before publication. Every term of this offer is material, and a condition upon the strict performance whereof we are to pay you one hundred and eighty dollars per quarter page at our office in New York. This price you warrant to be the lowest at which you sell advertising space on back cover in said publication, and if hereafter, during the continuance of this contract, you sell space on back cover page for a lower price, then the price to us shall be reduced to equal such lowest price. On business which you place through advertising agents, the term 'price' includes the commission which you pay or allow such agent." The action was for $540 for insertion of the advertisement for three months. The defendant Pen Company claimed that the contract is an entire one, to publish the advertisement for one year, and that, if the plaintiff failed to publish the advertisement for the full year, it would not be entitled to recover anything. Lawrence, J., said: "After examining the contract, I am of the opinion that the contention of the defendant is correct. The contract does not say that $180 becomes due every month, but requires a one-fourth page advertisement for one year, to appear in every issue, 'not less than twelve,' during the year beginning August, 1894. It also provides that 'every term of this offer is material, and a condition upon the strict performance whereof we are to pay you one hundred and eighty dollars for one-quarter page.' The term of publication for one year is certainly a material matter. It was a condition which the parties agreed upon, and the court ought not, by construction, to substitute a different condition. The authorities cited by the defendant seem to me fully to sustain its contention. In Davis v. Maxwell, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 286, Davis contracted to work on Maxwell's farm 'seven months at $12 per month.' It was held that the contract was entire, and required merely payment of $84 at the end of seven months, not $12 at the end of each month, and that Davis, by voluntarily quitting before seven months elapsed, lost the right to recover anything for the time he worked. In Baker v. Higgins, 21 N. Y. 397, the contract was, 'I will deliver 25,000 pale brick for $3 per M., and 50,000 hard brick at $4 per M., cash.' The offer was accepted, but after delivering 10,000 pale and 10,500 hard brick, in one delivery, payment therefor was demanded and refused. In the action for the price it was held that the delivery of the entire quantity was a condition precedent to any payment. In Casten v. Decker, 3 N. Y. St. Rep. 429, the plaintiff made an agreement with the defendant that he and his wife would work for him for a stated term at a fixed compensation per month. Before the end of the term agreed upon the plaintiff ceased work under the contract, alleging as a reason the sickness of his wife. It was held that the agreement was an entire and indivisible one, for services, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover without complete performance, unless such performance was in some manner excused, but that the sickness of his wife was an adequate excuse. To the same effect is the case of Fahy v. North, 19 Barb. 341. * * * Upon these authorities, I am of the opinion that the contract was entire, and that the plaintiff could not legally demand payment for any portion

VIGERS v. COOK.

(High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division. [1919] 2 K. B. 475.)

A. T. LAWRENCE, J.¹³⁹ This is an unpleasant case and not a simple one. The plaintiff, an undertaker, sued the defendant for services rendered in connection with the funeral of his son. The claim was for 57*l.* 15*s.* Of that sum 8*l.* 15*s.* for the hire of carriages, which was the subject of a separate contract, was admitted to be recoverable. The balance of 49*l.* was disputed. The county court judge disallowed certain of the items claimed, but gave judgment for the plaintiff for 42*l.* The question is whether he was right in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover any of the items claimed. The plaintiff, through his manager, took an order for the funeral. He admitted that it was his duty in the contract of that funeral to take the body into the church in order that the funeral services might be read over it, and that duty he admittedly did not perform. It appears that a lead coffin was provided, and the body was placed in it and removed to a mortuary, where it remained for three days. It seems to be the universal practice in the case of the lead coffins to make a pinhole in the lid to allow of the escape of the gas resulting from decomposition. That was done in this case, but the plaintiff, having received a complaint from the mortuary officials of a smell from the coffin, caused the pinhole to be closed, and he proceeded to conduct the funeral with the coffin sealed up. He knew quite well that it was not unlikely that the coffin might burst, but he was content to take the risk. The natural consequence happened, and by the time the funeral procession reached the church the coffin had burst and was leaking, so that it became impossible to take it into the church and the service inside the church had to be read without the body being present. Under those circumstances, is the plaintiff entitled to recover for the services which he in fact rendered? I think he is not. The contract was to conduct the funeral in a reverent manner such as to conform with the sentiments of the family. It was an essential part of the funeral that the body should be taken into the church so that the service might be read in its presence. The various items of which the plaintiff's bill is made up are mere accidentals, and if he fails to carry out the essential part of his contract he fails to carry it out altogether. * * * In my opinion the plaintiff's case fails, and there must be judgment for the defendant.¹⁴⁰ of the advertisements until the expiration of the year, and that the mere fact of the defendant's having made one payment to the plaintiff is, not such a practical construction of the contract by the parties as to take the case out of the general rule."

BARRIE v. EARLE.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1886. 143 Mass. 1, 8 N. E. 639, 58 Am. Rep. 126.)

This was an action of contract brought to recover a balance of $120 upon a special contract, the substance of which was as follows:

MAY 24, 1883.

"I hereby subscribe for one copy of the Art Treasures of America, in ten portfolios, at $15 each, as published, on the following terms of subscription, which terms cannot be altered or modified: (1) The Art Treasures of America, to be completed in ten portfolios, at $15 each. (2) Each portfolio to contain sixteen impressions of photogravure plates, and fifty pages of text or full-page wood engravings. (3) The portfolios to be issued at intervals of about two months. (4) This edition is limited to 1,200 copies; but no more copies shall be issued than are subscribed for, and the publisher reserves the right, at any time, to advance the price to new subscribers. (5) Each copy of the work to contain a special title, bearing name and address of its subscriber; and the publisher guaranties to furnish impressions and paper equal in all respects to the specimens shown. (6) Portfolios to be delivered, carriage prepaid; payment only to be made for each portfolio after such delivery. (7) No terms, conditions, or representations other than here printed will be binding on subscriber or publisher, and the subscriber hereby acknowledges receipt of a copy of these terms.

[Signed]

"ENOCH EARLE."

The plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that he delivered the first portfolio, under said contract, by the Adams Express Company, at the house of the defendant, some time in July, 1883, and received, some time afterwards, the defendant's check for $15; that, some time in August or September following, the plaintiff, by said express company, delivered a second portfolio, under said contract, at the defendant's house, for which he afterwards received the defendant's check for $15; that, some time in October following, the plaintiff sent, in the same way, another portfolio, which the defendant refused to take; that the remaining seven portfolios were never delivered to the defendant, but that the plaintiff had been ready to deliver the same, but the defendant refused to accept them, and notified the plaintiff of his refusal.

The defendant offered evidence to show that the defendant's signature to said contract was obtained by certain false and fraudulent entire contract; that it was an essential term thereof that the coffin should be taken into the church for a part of the service, subject to the condition that the body was in such a state as to permit of that being done; that the onus lay on the plaintiff to prove that it was not owing to his default that this term of the contract could not be carried out, and he had not discharged that onus; and that he was not entitled to recover."

representations made by the plaintiff's duly-authorized agent to the defendant, upon which representations the defendant relied; but, it being admitted by the defendant that he had neither returned nor offered to return the portfolios received as above stated by him, the court excluded the evidence, and the defendant excepted.

FIELD, J.¹⁶¹ The first exception is to the exclusion of evidence that the defendant's signature to the contract was obtained by the false and fraudulent representations. This evidence was excluded upon the ground that the contract was entire, and the defendant could not avoid it except by returning the two portfolios which he had received and paid for. The same question of law is involved in the last exception. A majority of the court think that this is such a contract as is described in Badger v. Titcomb, 15 Pick. 409, 413, where, "although the agreement is entire, the performance is several;" or, as is said in Denny v. Williams, 5 Allen, 1, 4, a contract "one and entire in its origin, and yet, looking to the performance of different things at different times, it may be divisible in its operation;" that an action under it could be maintained for the price of each portfolio when each was delivered, but that the contract is one entire agreement to take one copy of a publication made up of ten parts or portfolios, which together should constitute the Art Treasures of America, and that it is not a contract containing ten distinct and independent agreements to take ten different portfolios, one under each agreement. See Vinton v. King, 4 Allen, 562.

The defendant's evidence went to the whole contract, and was offered for the purpose of avoiding the whole contract, and he could only avoid the contract, for fraud in its inception, by rescinding it in toto, and by restoring to the plaintiff the portfolios which he already received. If the defendant had a right to avoid the contract, and exercised that right, he had a defense to this action, and could recover, in an action brought by him, the $30 he had paid, and the portfolios would all belong to the defendant; but the defendant could not retain part of the portfolios under the contract, and avoid the contract as to the rest. Clark v. Baker, 5 Metc. 452; Morse v. Brackett, 98 Mass. 205; Mansfield v. Trigg, 113 Mass. 350; Young v. Wakefield, 121 Mass. 91. It does not follow from this that the defendant is required to receive any portfolios that are not such as the contract calls for, or that if plaintiff did not from time to time offer to the defendant ten portfolios, each of which satisfied the description contained in the contract, the defendant might not recover damages for a breach of the contract by the plaintiff. * * *

Exceptions overruled.

NATIONAL KNITTING CO. v. BOUTON & GERMAIN CO.

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1909. 141 Wis. 63, 123 N. W. 624.)

Action by the National Knitting Company against the Bouton & Germain Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff corporation is a manufacturer and dealer in knitted goods at Milwaukee, and the defendant corporation is a jobber in the same line of goods at Ripon. In November, 1905, the defendant ordered of the plaintiff, in writing, a quantity of gloves of different kinds at fixed prices, aggregating $322.86, delivery to be made in the following May, bill to be dated as of November 1, 1906, payable in thirty days. The order was accepted, and in April the plaintiff delivered the greater part of the goods ordered, but never delivered one item of eighteen dozen gloves, and another item of six dozen gloves. The plaintiff sues to recover for the goods actually delivered at contract prices. The defendant contends that the contract is entire, and hence that nothing is due, because the contract has never been fully performed. The defendant also sets up a counterclaim for damages because of nondelivery of said two items, in case the court should hold the contract to be severable. The trial court held the contract to be severable, and awarded judgment for the plaintiff for the contract price of the items delivered, less damages, consisting of the loss of profits, on the items not delivered. From this judgment, defendant appeals.

WINSLOW, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). We think that the business world would be astonished to learn that whenever an order for a bill of merchandise is accepted the contract thus made is entire, and requires delivery of every article before there can be recovery of any part of the purchase price. Such would be the practical effect of the defendant's contention here, if it should be upheld. We cannot so hold. The question of entirety is a question of intention. Severability of the subject-matter and measurement of consideration by units may assist in determining, but do not of themselves necessarily determine, the question. In case of a contract naturally and accurately severable (such as a contract for the sale of a bill of goods at certain prices for each article), courts incline to hold the contract severable, and to grant a recovery for that portion of the goods actually delivered, less damages for the nondelivery of any portion not delivered. Under all ordinary circumstances, this course will result in exact justice. The vendor will receive pay for his goods, which the vendee has retained, and the vendee will receive compensation for any damage which he has actually suffered.

If, however, it appears by express terms or by necessary implication from the terms of a contract that the intention of the parties was to make payment of the consideration depend upon delivery of all the articles, the contract will be held entire, though the consideration may be measured in units and be actually severable. Goodwin v. Merrill, 13 Wis. 658; Shinn v. Bodine, 60 Pa. 182, 80 Am. Dec. 560. Thus, when a contract required the delivery of 2,000 yards of crushed stone for the purpose of building a bridge, it was held to be entire, notwithstanding the payment was to be at a certain rate per yard. Prautsch v. Rasmussen, 133 Wis. 181, 113 N. W. 416. So contracts to tow a given quantity of logs at so much per 1,000 feet, and to carry 5,000 barrels of salt at so much per barrel, have been held entire, upon the idea that the terms of the contract, in the light of the surrounding facts, showed that the parties evidently intended to contract for one entire job, and only used the unit of measurement of the consideration for convenience, and not as indicating any contemplation of severability. Boutin v. Lindsley, 84 Wis. 644, 54 N. W. 1017; W. & B. S. Co. v. Galvin, 96 Wis. 523, 71 N. W. 804, 65 Am. St. Rep. 57. See, also, Widman v. Gay, 104 Wis. 277, 80 N. W. 450.

The principle here decided is that contracts for the sale of goods like the present, which are naturally severable, will not be held entire contracts, in the absence of express or implied provision to that effect in the contract, or persuasive circumstances showing the intention of the parties to make it entire.

GRAY v. HINTON AND OTHERS.

(United States Circuit Court, D. Nebraska, 1881. 7 Fed. 81.)

Demurrer to Petition. The facts, as they appear by the allegations of the petition, are as follows:

The Nebraska Railway Company was a corporation organized for the purpose of constructing a road from Brownsville to Lake City. The precincts of Ohio and Falls City, in the county of Richardson, had voted ¹⁴² "Primarily the question whether a contract is entire or separable is one of intention. But the general rule is that where the part to be performed by one party consists of several distinct and separate items and the price to be paid is apportioned to each item according to the value thereof, and not as one unit in the whole or a part of a round sum, the contract may and will be regarded as severable. And this rule holds true, even though the contract may be in a sense entire, if what is to be paid is clearly and distinctly apportioned to the different items as such, and not to them as parts of one whole." Morton, J., in Barlow Manufacturing Co. v. Stone, 200 Mass. 158, 160 (1908). See also, Regent Waist Co. v. O. J. Morrison Department Store Co. (W. Va.), 106 S. E. 712 (1921).

to subscribe for a certain amount of the capital stock of said railway company, for the purpose of aiding the construction of said railroad. The railway company contracted for the construction of the road through the said precincts of Ohio and Falls City. Litigation being threatened by parties adverse to the policy of granting aid by the precincts above mentioned, the defendants in this suit, 150 in number, signed the contract upon which this suit is brought.

The contract, in so far as it is material to be considered, is as follows:

The consideration for its execution on the part of the defendant is stated to be "the sum of one dollar, to us in hand paid by the Nebraska Railway Company, and the advantages thereafter to accrue by the construction of said railway through the precincts of Ohio and Falls City."

And the defendants agree as follows:

To pay jointly and severally to the Nebraska Railway, or its order, the sum of $65,000, in lawful money of the United States of America, to be paid in instalments as follows, to-wit: $10,500 thereof when said railway company shall have graded its road-bed and built its culverts through the precinct of Ohio according to the terms of the foregoing proposition; $35,000 thereof when the said Nebraska Railway Company shall have graded its road-bed and built its culverts through the precinct of Falls City according to the terms of the foregoing proposition; $19,500 when said Nebraska Railway Company shall have graded, tied, and ironed its roadway through the precincts of Ohio and Falls City, according to the foregoing propositions,—each instalment of which shall be truly and promptly paid.

The "foregoing proposition" referred to in this agreement, among other things, provided that the railroad should be constructed before December 1, 1876. The petition alleges that the grading was completed in accordance with the contract, but there is no allegation that the road has ever been completed. The time for the completion of the road, according to the terms of the agreement, had elapsed before the commencement of this suit. The defendant files a general demurrer to the petition, under which he insists—First, that the contract is not binding on the defendants for want of mutuality; second, that the contract is an entirety, and as the plaintiff has commenced this action after expiration of the time within which the railroad company was to have completed the railroad, he cannot recover without alleging and proving a full performance of the contract on the part of the company, or, in other words, that it has finished the road; third, that the plaintiff cannot recover without alleging performance of all the stipulations of the contract to be performed upon the part of the railroad company.

MCCRARY, C. J. The demurrer raises the question whether suit can be maintained on the contract upon the facts disclosed by the petition. The plaintiff sues after the expiration of the time within which, by the terms of the contract, the road was to have been finished. It is alleged that the grading was completed according to the contract, but it is not alleged that the road was finished. The question is whether, under the contract, plaintiff can recover for the grading without alleging that he has finished the road, or offering some sufficient excuse for his failure to do so; or, in other words, we are to consider whether the agreement to do the grading was a contract separate and distinct from and independent of the agreement to finish the road, so that the plaintiff can sue upon the contract and recover for the grading without alleging compliance, or readiness to comply, with the other part of the agreement. Speaking of the "entirety of contracts," Mr. Parsons says:

"The question whether a contract is entire or separable is often of great importance. Any contract may consist of many parts, and these may be considered as parts of one whole, or as so many distinct contracts entered into at one time and expressed in the same instrument, but not thereby made one contract. No precise rule can be given by which this question in a given case may be settled. Like most other questions of construction, it depends upon the intention of the parties, and this must be discovered in each case by considering the language employed and the subject-matter of the contract." 2 Pars. Con. 517.

From what appears upon the face of this contract we are to determine whether it was the intention of the parties to make one contract for the construction of a railroad, or two separate contracts,—one for the grading, and the other for the bridging, tying, and ironing of the roadway through the precincts of Ohio and Falls City. It seems pretty clear that the subject-matter of the contract was an entirety, to-wit, a completed railroad. The case is not like many we find cited in the books, in which two or more separate and distinct articles of property are sold and conveyed by a single instrument, for separate and distinct prices, at one and the same time. In such cases it often appears that the purchase of each article was a separate and distinct transaction, and intended to be so regarded by the parties to the contract. There is in such cases no necessary connection between the several articles sold and conveyed. There is nothing from which it can be inferred that it was not the intention of the purchaser to secure one without also securing the others. The case before us, however, is quite different. It cannot be supposed that the defendants would have employed the railroad company to do the grading alone, without it had at the same time agreed to go on and complete the road. The contract itself declares that the consideration for the contract, on the part of the defendants, was the benefits they were to receive by the construction of the road through the two precincts named. Suppose the railroad company, or its contractors, after completing the grading, had failed or refused to go on and complete the road upon the demand of the defendants. Would it be contended that the plaintiff, under such circumstances, could maintain an action upon the contract? This is probably the test. See Robinson v.

Green, 3 Met. 159. If it were alleged in the petition that the railroad company, or the contractors, completed the grading, and were ready, able, and willing to go on and finish the road; that they offered to do so, and were prevented by the act or fault of defendants,—a very different question would arise. But an allegation that the grading was completed, without more, is insufficient, because it is manifest that the defendants did not intend to bind themselves to pay for grading, and leave the contractors at liberty to finish the road or not, at their option. The parties must have understood that the defendants were binding themselves to pay a large sum of money to secure the construction of the railroad through the precincts in which they resided and held property. If the proposition upon which this action is based, to-wit, that the defendants were to pay the price named for the grading whether the road was completed or not, had been suggested at the time of the execution of the contract, no one of the defendants would have assented to it. They undoubtedly regarded the contract as an entirety. Such was the intention; and the construction of the contract, as to its being several or entire, depends upon the intention of the parties to it.

But, independently of this consideration, there can, I think, be no doubt upon another question which is presented by this record. The contract itself shows no mutuality. The defendants bound themselves to pay a certain sum of money, provided plaintiff's assignor, the railroad company, would complete a certain railroad; but there is nothing in the contract to bind the company to complete the road. The performance of the contract by the railroad company would avoid this objection. The rule is that where one party agrees to pay a certain sum of money if another party will do certain acts, the latter is not bound; but the agreement of the former may be considered as a request to the latter to do the acts named, and the doing of the acts is an assent, and the promise thereby becomes mutual and obligatory. But this case presents the question whether a performance of a part of the acts specified, and a failure to perform another part, will answer the objection that there is no mutuality. The rule is that performance is an assent to the terms proposed; but I know of no authority for the proposition that part performance will amount to an assent. See 13 Ohio St. 94, where it is distinctly held that "this rule does not appear to be applicable where the act done only constitutes a part of the consideration, and shows no assent to the terms of the contract." The performance by the party to whom the offer is made takes the place of a formal acceptance of a proposition to contract; but a part performance, without an offer to make full performance, is not an acceptance, no more than an acceptance in writing of a part of a proposition could be regarded as an acceptance of the whole. In such a case, whatever the rights of the plaintiff might be in a suit upon the quantum meruit, he has no right of action upon the contract itself.

The demurrer to the petition is sustained.

STOCKSTILL v. BYRD.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana, 1913. 132 La. 404, 61 La. 446.)

Action by W. A. Stockstill against J. R. Byrd. From a judgment dismissing the suit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

SOMMERVILLE, J. Plaintiff sues for damages ex contractu; and defendant filed an exception of no cause of action to the petition. The exception was sustained; the suit was dismissed; and plaintiff appeals.

Plaintiff attaches to, and makes part of, his petition the contract sued upon. It therein appears that plaintiff agreed to go upon the land of the defendant and there erect and locate a sawmill for the purpose of manufacturing into lumber certain described timber located on defendant's land. Plaintiff further agreed to operate said mill continuously, and as regularly as practicable, until the timber on said land was manufactured into lumber. He further agreed that defendant was to be the sole logger of the mill. He agreed to use the property of defendant for no other purpose than was necessary and proper for operating said sawmill. He further agreed to give orders and bills for logs in such manner as to make it practicable for defendant to deliver with the exercise of due diligence, and to purchase said timber and pay to defendant $5 per 1,000 feet thereof.

Defendant, on his part, agreed to sell all of the timber described in contract to plaintiff and deliver it at the ramps of the sawmill of plaintiff, according to orders and bills furnished by the latter.

The parties to the contract mutually agreed that:

"This contract is not to be assignable by either party hereto without the consent of both."

Plaintiff alleges in his petition that he had sold his sawmill to Eddins & Stockstill, and that, upon the consummation of said sale, defendant wrongfully and without cause refused to haul or deliver any more of said timber to petitioner, although requested so to do; that, in thus refusing, defendant has breached the contract, and this to the extent of $17,150, for which amount plaintiff asks judgment.

No precise rule can be laid down for the solution of the question whether a contract is divisible or indivisible, separable or entire. The question is one of construction.

Article 2108 of the Civil Code provides that: .

"An obligation is divisible or indivisible, according as it has for its object either the thing which, in its delivery, or a fact which, in its execution, is or is not susceptible of division, either material or intellectual."

And article 2109 is as follows:

"The obligation is indivisible, though the thing or the fact which is the object of it be by its nature divisible, if the light in which it is considered in the obligation does not admit of its being partially executed."

The courts at the present day incline strongly against the construction of promises as independent; and, in the absence of clear language to the contrary, promises which form the consideration for each other will be held to be concurrent or dependent, and not independent, so that a failure of one party to perform will discharge the other, and so that one cannot maintain an action against the other without showing the performance or tender of performance on his part. Where acts are to be performed by each party at the same time, neither party can maintain an action against the other without performance, or tender of performance, on his part. So where a party sues on a certain contract to recover compensation due on its performance, he must show performance on his part, or a legal excuse.

"The contract may be entire or separable, according to the circumstances in each particular case; and the criterion is to be found in the question whether the whole quantity—all of the things as a whole—is of the essence of the contract. If it appear that the purpose was to take the whole or none, then the contract would be entire; otherwise it would be separable." 9 Cyc. 643, 649; Lowber v. Bangs, 2 Wall. 728, 736 (17 L. Ed. 768).

In construing the contract under consideration, we must determine which of the numerous provisions are conditions precedent, and which are mutual and independent stipulations.

"It seems to be well settled that, when there is a stipulation amounting to a condition precedent, the failure of one party to perform such condition will excuse the other party from all further performance of stipulations depending upon such prior performance. But a failure to perform an independent stipulation, not amounting to a condition precedent, though it subjects the party failing to damages, does not excuse the party on the other side from the performance of all stipulations on his part." Mill Dam Foundry v. Hovey, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 417, 437.

This is a contract of sale by defendant to plaintiff of the timber standing on defendant's premises to be manufactured into lumber by plaintiff on defendant's premises; the real property and the material belonging to defendant. The plaintiff was to enter upon the property of defendant, under a contract in the nature of a lease, for the express purpose of erecting a sawmill thereon to do the work of converting defendant's timber into lumber, and to use defendant's premises for the purposes of the contract. The condition precedent in this contract is that plaintiff was to enter upon the land of defendant, and to thereon erect a sawmill, ramps, and appurtenances for the purpose already indicated; and he agreed to operate the sawmill continuously and as regularly as practicable until the timber on the land referred to was manufactured into lumber; plaintiff agreeing not to use the property of defendant for any other purpose than was necessary and proper for operating the said sawmill, together with the necessary right of way and passage over and across the land for hauling purposes. It was further agreed that defendant should be the sole logger of the sawmill, and that the contract was not assignable without the consent of both parties.

Plaintiff has made these obligations on his part impossible of performance. He erected the sawmill as agreed to by him, but sold the same to some third persons, so that he had no mill to operate continuously until all the timber belonging to defendant on the land in question had been converted into lumber. The sale of the mill to third persons is equivalent to not having erected the mill at all, under the circumstances of this contract. Further, he has avoided and set at naught the stipulation that defendant was to be the sole logger of his sawmill; the management of the mill was exclusively in the control of the purchasers of the mill; and he has permitted the land of defendant to be used by these purchasers, after stipulating that defendant's land was not to be used for any other purpose than of operating his sawmill.

These various stipulations all go to show that the contract sued upon cannot be partially executed, and it is therefore indivisible or entire.

Plaintiff argues that he has not violated the contract by selling his sawmill to third persons; that his agreement was not to assign the contract; that he has not assigned the contract to the purchasers of the sawmill; that he is willing to receive and pay for the logs purchased by him from the defendant; that, because of the failure and refusal of defendant to sell the logs to him (plaintiff), he (plaintiff) "was unable to sell and deliver said logs to the said Eddins & Stockstill;" and that said action on the part of defendant caused the purchasers of the sawmill to purchase other logs, and that they have refused to pay plaintiff for the mill, and that he has taken the sawmill back.

We think that it is quite clear, from the actions of the purchasers of the mill, that the contract between plaintiff and defendant was assigned to them at the same time that the mill was, although plaintiff alleges to the contrary.

Be this as it may be, plaintiff has put himself into a different position altogether from that contemplated by the terms of the contract. He is a nonresident, residing in Hancock county, Miss.; and defendant might well be unwilling to sell his timber on credit to a nonresident who owned no property in this state, and who was to immediately transfer the timber of defendant to third persons, who were operating a sawmill located on land not belonging to them, or leased by them, and who might, at any time, be treated as trespassers, and who could exercise the right to saw timber belonging to third persons, and thus bring about a confusion of goods belonging to defendant, and thus deprive defendant of a vendor's lien. The purchasers were not obligated in any way to defendant; he had not dealt with them; they had not promised to take all of his timber, or to manufacture it into lumber within a specified time; he may not have known them to be prompt in the fulfillment of engagements, which is said to be the life of commercial success; he may have known nothing of their solvency, or of the various other cir-circumstances which go to control the issues of profit or loss—all of which are important in trade. Lowber v. Bangs, 2 Wall. 728, 737 (17 L. Ed. 768).

We do not deem it needful to review the numerous authorities, because we hold the general principle to be clear that covenants are to be considered divisible or indivisible, dependent or independent, separable or entire, according to the intention of the parties, which is to be deduced from the whole instrument; and in this case we find no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the covenants are dependent throughout. The intention of the parties was that the contract was not to be assignable, in whole or in part, and that when plaintiff sold his sawmill to third persons, and brought them onto the land of defendant and established them there, without the consent of defendant, and thus rendered the contract impossible of performance by himself, he violated the contract in its entirety; that he is in default and cannot claim damages for nonperformance by defendant. C. C. art. 2109.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

BARNETT v. ROSEN ET AL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1920. 126 N. E. 386.)

Suit in equity by Nathan Barnett against Sarah Rosen and others, resulting in order dismissing the bill, and plaintiff excepts. Exceptions overruled.

BRADLEY, J. The plaintiff, a judgment creditor, brings suit under R. L. c. 159, § 3, cl. 7, to reach and apply in satisfaction of a judgment recovered against the defendant Rosen the amount coming to her under a policy of fire insurance issued by the co-defendant. The defendant having paid into court a certain sum to abide the final decree, the bill by stipulation of parties has been dismissed against the company; and the trial court having ordered a decree dismissing the bill the case is before us on the plaintiff's exceptions to the admission of evidence, to the refusal to rule as requested, and to the order of dismissal. We perceive no error in the admission of evidence. The answer avers that by an accord and satisfaction the judgment has been satisfied and she was properly allowed to introduce evidence of the negotiations and of the settlement which included the obtainment of the necessary funds to make payment as well as the form in which payment was made. Way v. Greer, 196 Mass. 237, 81 N. E. 1002. The remaining question is whether as matter of law the defendant under the agreement had been discharged from all further liability. The evidence not being reported, the findings of fact of the presiding judge are conclusive. It appears that, before judgment against her was obtained, the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant's husband on which execution issued and he was cited for examination as a poor debtor. The proceedings, however, were terminated by the failure of the judgment creditor to appear at the time and place to which the proceedings had been continued for his further examination. The plaintiff previously had cited the defendant for examination as a poor debtor and after she had defaulted and a capias issued the plaintiff in person and the defendant by counsel orally agreed that if the defendant would pay "thirty-five dollars" he would receive that amount in full satisfaction of both executions. The defendant borrowed $20, which was paid to the plaintiff, who thereupon signed and delivered the following receipt:

"Received of Mrs. Sarah Rosen twenty and no/100 dollars and upon payment to me within one month of a balance of fifteen dollars I will indorse a statement of satisfaction in full upon an execution which I have against Sarah Rosen and a similar indorsement upon an execution against Harry Rosen and I will execute general release of all demands against said Harry and Sarah Rosen."

It further appears that "the balance of fifteen dollars" was paid to the plaintiff, who thereupon indorsed upon each execution that full satisfaction had been received and delivered them to the defendant.

A further finding, in justice to the plaintiff, should be referred to, namely:

That "at the time of making said oral contract and the execution of said written instrument the plaintiff told the defendant's attorney that the receipt of said sum and his agreement referred to in said receipt was a nudum pactum and that he was not bound by his oral agreement or his signed receipt and that the defendant would still be liable for the balance of her judgment, notwithstanding he had agreed to accept a smaller sum in satisfaction thereof."

The judge, however, was satisfied and expressly finds that the defendant's attorney, acting in her behalf and knowing the plaintiff to be a member of the bar, did not understand or believe that the plaintiff proposed to collect the balance due upon the execution against her "notwithstanding his agreement and his written promise and did not expect him to do so."

The requests all rest upon the single proposition that the promise of the plaintiff is unenforceable because it is unsupported by any valuable consideration. We are of opinion that the judge properly refused to give any of the requests and correctly ruled that the bill should be dismissed. The borrowing by the defendant from her counsel of a part of the amount agreed upon, who gave his check therefor to the plaintiff, does not bring the case within the rule that, where the creditor receives in full satisfaction of his debt the promissory note of a third person for a smaller sum than the amount of the debt, it is a good accord and satisfaction. Brooks v. White, 2 Mete. 283, 37 Am. Dec. 95; Guild v. Butler, 127 Mass. 386; Bidder v. Bridges, 37 Ch. D. 406. The money, furthermore, was not borrowed at the plaintiff's request; nor did he know from what source it was to be obtained. Harriman v. Harriman, 12 Gray, 341; Specialty Glass Co. v. Daley, 172 Mass. 460, 52 N. E. 633. Compare Bunge v. Koop, 48 N. Y. 225, 229, 8 Am. Rep. 546. It also is settled in this commonwealth that neither the payment of a part of the debt by the debtor when the entire indebtedness is due and payable, nor a partial payment by him of the debt in consideration that such payment shall operate as a discharge of the debt of a third person to the creditor, is sufficient to support a promise not made under seal to release the promisee from all further liability on the remainder of the principal obligation. Weber v. Couch, 134 Mass. 26, 45 Am. Rep. 274; Slade v. Mutrie, 156 Mass. 19, 20, 30 N. E. 168, and cases cited; Specialty Glass Co. v. Daley, 172 Mass. 460, 52 N. E. 633; Gilman v. Cary, 198 Mass. 318, 320, 84 N. E. 312; Smith v. Johnson, 224 Mass. 50, 112 N. E. 644; Lait v. Sears, 226 Mass. 119, 125, 115 N. E. 247. But the judge further found that—

“Thereafter, on March 21, 1916, the plaintiff personally, and the attorney representing the defendant, conferred in regard to the adjustment of the claim of the plaintiff against the defendant, and on or about that date it was orally agreed between plaintiff and said attorney that if the defendant would pay to the plaintiff $35, the plaintiff would receive the same in full satisfaction of his execution against the defendant and against Harry Rosen; and the defendant then and there, acting through her said attorney, agreed to pay said amount in full satisfaction of both executions.”

The plaintiff in return for the payment to him of any sum on her husband's debt could make a binding and enforceable agreement, and the agreement found cannot as matter of law be differentiated. It was not to pay the plaintiff a less sum in full satisfaction of her own liquidated and overdue debt of a larger amount, but it is an agreement also to pay this amount in satisfaction of the execution against Harry Rosen, her husband, to whom she was a stranger and on which she was not liable, as well as the execution against herself. The plaintiff, as we have said, having indorsed on both executions satisfaction in full, the indorsement was of itself an application by him not merely in satisfaction of the defendant's debt, but of the debt of her husband. It follows that, the contract being entire and not severable at the option of the plaintiff, her agreement to pay any sum whatever on the execution against her husband was a sufficient consideration for a valid agreement by the plaintiff to discharge her own debt. Brooks v. White, 2 Metc. 283, 286, 37 Am. Dec. 95; Bowker v. Childs, 3 Allen, 434; Hastings v. Lovejoy, 140 Mass. 267, 2 N. E. 776, 54 Am. Rep. 462; Marshall v. Bullard, 114 Iowa, 462, 87 N. W. 427, 54 L. R. A. 862; Melroy v. Kemmerer, 218 Pa. 381, 384, 67 Atl. 699, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018, 120 Am. St. Rep. 888; 1 R. C. L. p. 182, § 11; 1 C. J. 537, § 37, note 31, and page 545, § 51, note 27, where many authorities are collected. It is enough that the consideration is valuable; it need not be adequate. Train v. Gold, 5 Pick. 380; Perkins v. Lockwood, 100 Mass. 249, 250, 1 Am. Rep. 103; Hastings v. Lovejoy, 140 Mass. 261, 264, 2 N. E. 776, 54 Am. Rep. 462.

Exceptions overruled.

BRADFORD v. WILLIAMS.

Declaration alleging breach of a charter-party dated May 26th, 1871, under which the defendant's ship should carry coals for the plaintiff between certain ports for specified freight, "Vessel to load with Gollop & Co., or Gould & Co., till end of September, with captain's option; after September, at Gould & Co."

Fourth plea, that after the commencement, and long before the end of September, and before breach, the vessel was ready to load, according to the terms of the charter-party, and the captain exercised his option by electing to load from Gollop & Co., of all which premises the plaintiffs had notice, and although all things happened, etc., necessary to entitle the defendant to have the vessel loaded in the month of September by the plaintiffs from Gollop & Co., yet the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to cause the said vessel to be loaded in the said month or at any subsequent time from or with Gollop & Co., according to the terms of the agreement, but, on the contrary, absolutely refused so to do in violation of the terms of the charter-party, and gave notice to the defendant thereof, wherefore the defendant, as he lawfully might, refused further to perform the said charter-party, which are the alleged breaches.

Demurrer and joinder.

BRAMWELL, B.¹⁴³ * * * The contract was for a continuous employment from May, 1871, to March, 1872. But in September, 1871, the plaintiffs in effect said, "We do not mean to go on loading you, the defendant, for a month;" whereupon the defendant said, "Then I shall not go on under the charter-party at all;" and I think he had a right to say so. Suppose the plaintiffs had said they would not load till some distant date—December, for example; but that afterward they would again proceed with loading, what ought the defendant to do in such a case? He would clearly be bound to find some occupation for his ship; otherwise when he brought his action for damages the plaintiffs would have good cause to complain. Then is he entitled only to do the best he can with the ship until the time named for loading by the plaintiffs, or is he not entitled to do the best he can once for all? In other words, is he not entitled to treat the charter-party at an end? In my opinion he may take the latter course, and thus do what is best for himself, and, at the same time, mitigate as far as possible the damages which the plaintiffs would otherwise be liable to pay for their breach of contract.

Take another illustration. A ship is chartered out and home, say from London to New York, the charterer to load a cargo at both places. Then he declines to load in London; but still insists that the shipowner is to go to New York for the home cargo. Surely this would not be reasonable. Yet the case seems almost exactly analogous to the present. I think, therefore, the plea is good.

Judgment for the defendant.

RIPLEY v. M'CLURE.

(Court of Exchequer, 1849. 4 Exch., 345.)

Assumpsit. At the trial before Coleridge, J., the following facts appeared in evidence: The plaintiff was a merchant carrying on business at Liverpool in his own name, and also with another person in Shanghai, in China, as commission agents, under the firm of Thomas Ripley & Co. The defendant carried on business as a merchant and general commission agent at Belfast, under the firm of William M'Clure & Son. On the 20th of June, 1846, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a joint adventure for importing a cargo of tea from China, in which the defendant was to have one-third interest. An investment in goods was to be made to purchase the tea, which was to be brought by the ship Mary Ann Webb; and consigned to the defendant at Belfast for sale at the customary commission. On the 7th of October, 1846, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, inclosing invoice of shipment to China, and stating "the proceeds to be invested in tea for the Belfast market, in which you are to take one-third interest." The plaintiff subsequently wrote to the defendant, representing that the adventure was likely to prove a loss, and offering to release him from his engagement. Some correspondence then took place, and ultimately this contract was annulled by mutual consent, and on the 16th of March, 1847, the agreement set out in the declaration was substituted. The defendant became dissatisfied with this agreement, and proposed to the plaintiff to cancel it, and set up the first contract. A long correspondence ensued, in which the defendant alleged, that he had been induced to abandon the first contract and enter into the subsequent agreement by reason of the misrepresentations of the plaintiff. On the 1st of July, 1847, the plaintiff sent to the defendant copies of the invoices of the tea, in a letter containing the following passage: "I have had it from yourself, that you do not intend to comply with the conditions of the contract for the purchase of one-third of this cargo, a threat which I am inclined to believe you do not intend to act upon. On this subject you will please give me your opinion in writing, and I shall be glad if you will assign your reasons for choosing such a course, when the contract on my part will be fulfilled to the letter." No answer having been returned to this letter, the plaintiff, on the 26th of August again wrote to the defendant thus: "As regards the Mary Ann Webb, there is nothing left for me to do but to send her to some other port than Belfast, since you have declined to fulfill your contract." On the 30th, the defendant wrote in reply: "As to the cargo of the Mary Ann Webb, to one-third of which we still think we are entitled under our first contract, we observe you now intend to send it to a different port, I am willing, and, such being the case, I am glad this unpleasant matter should be thus ended; and I am willing to waive any claim I may have under either the first or second contract." In reply, the plaintiff wrote that it was not his intention to release the defendant from his contract of purchase. On the 1st of September, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff as follows: "I give you notice, that I am entitled to have these teas delivered at Belfast, either under the first or second contract, and that, if you fail to deliver them accordingly, I shall hold myself released from all contracts respecting them." On the 21st of September, the Mary Ann Webb arrived in Belfast Lough with the cargo of tea on board; and the defendant, having been informed of it, wrote to the plaintiff, stating that he was "willing to dispose of the cargo and appropriate the proceeds according to the interests of both parties therein." The defendant also on the same day served the captain of the vessel with a copy of this letter. In consequence, however, of directions from the plaintiff, the vessel sailed from Belfast on the 24th of September for London, without delivering any portion of her cargo to the defendant. The copy of the invoice sent to the defendant was headed thus: "Invoice of congou tea shipped on board the 'Mary Ann Webb,' Silk, master, for Belfast, and consigned to Thomas Ripley, Esq., Liverpool." It afterwards appeared that, in the heading of the original invoice, the words "on account and risk of Messrs. M'Clure & Son and Thomas Ripley" were inserted after the word "Belfast." The bills of lading stated that the goods were bound for Belfast market, and consigned unto Thomas Ripley or his assignee.

It was submitted, on the part of the plaintiff, that the above correspondence proved that the defendant had refused to perform the contract declared on, and had discharged the plaintiff from delivering the tea at Belfast. On behalf of the defendant it was contended, that he had not refused to perform the contract in question, and that, so far from discharging the plaintiff from delivering the tea at Belfast, he had insisted on the plaintiff delivering it there.

With respect to the second issue, the learned judge told the jury that the fact of the teas being stated to be shipped on the joint account did not preclude them for finding that they were consigned to the plaintiff, the invoicing them on the joint account having been done by mistake by the correspondent in China, who was ignorant of the fact of the first contract having been rescinded, and of the goods being consigned to the plaintiff, and coming home on the plaintiff's sole account.

The following questions were put by the learned judge, in writing, to the jury, who returned the accompanying answers:—

First, Was the plaintiff guilty of any misrepresentation as to the circumstances connected with the former contract, by which the defendant was induced to enter into the second? No.

Second, Did the defendant at any time refuse to perform the second contract? Yes, by implication.

Third, Did the defendant ever withdraw that refusal before the ship arrived at Belfast? No.

Fourth, Was the plaintiff willing to deliver, according to the second contract, down to the time of the defendant's refusal to perform the contract? Yes, but not after the arrival of the vessel at Belfast, the defendant having repudiated the contract.

Fifth, To and on whose account were the teas consigned? Thomas Ripley.

On these findings, the learned judge directed a verdict for the defendant on the issue raised by the fifth plea, and for the plaintiff on the other issues.

Knowles, in Easter Term last, obtained a rule on the part of the defendant for a new trial, on the ground of the verdict being against evidence, and also upon the following alleged grounds of misdirection: First, that the learned judge had told the jury, with reference to the letter of the first of July, in which the plaintiff demanded that the defendant should state in writing whether he intended to comply with the contract, that the plaintiff had a right to an answer from the defendant. Secondly, that the learned judge was wrong in putting the question to the jury whether the defendant at any time refused to perform his contract; but the question ought to have been, whether he did so refuse, after the arrival of the vessel at Belfast, and that the learned judge was not correct in directing a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff on the third issue, upon the answers which had been returned by the jury. Thirdly, that the mode in which the question was put to the jury, as to the consignment of the teas to the plaintiff, was improper. A rule was also obtained to arrest the judgment, on the ground that the fifth plea was found for the defendant, and was a complete answer to the action.

PARKE, B.¹⁴⁴ * * * It was contended, for the defendant, that to constitute a breach of the contract, a refusal at any time was insufficient; that it must be a refusal after the arrival of the cargo; and that the supposed refusal in July, to which the attention of the jury was said to have been directed, and which was long before the contract to buy became absolute, was no breach, and nothing more than an expression of an intention to break the contract, not final, and capable of being retracted. And we think, that if the jury had been told that a refusal before the arrival of the cargo was a breach, that would have been incorrect. We think that point rightly decided in Phillpotts v. Evans.

But we cannot collect that the learned judge ever told the jury that a refusal at any time was a breach. He left the question in writing, whether there was a refusal at any time, and whether that refusal had been subsequently retracted; and the jury having found, as we think they were warranted by the evidence to do, that it had not, there was certainly evidence of a continued refusal down to and inclusive of the time when the defendant was bound to receive, which would render the defendant liable, if all the conditions precedent had been performed or waived. But then it was said, and rightly, that the delivery of the cargo being a condition precedent, the plaintiff was bound to perform it, unless the defendant waived or discharged him from so doing. In the declaration there is an allegation, though informal, of such waiver or discharge, coupled with the allegation of refusal, and an issue upon it in the third plea, and the plaintiff no doubt was bound to prove that waiver or discharge: we do not feel any difficulty in saying that there was ample evidence of such waiver in the conversation referred to in the plaintiff's letter of the 1st of July, coupled with the whole tenor of the defendant's letters.

By an express refusal to comply with the conditions of the contract of purchase, the defendant must be understood to have said to the plaintiff, "You need not take the trouble to deliver the cargo to me when it arrives at Belfast, as purchaser, for I never will become such;" and this would be a waiver at that time of the delivery; and, if unretracted, would dispense with the actual delivery after arrival.

And if we look to the correspondence, it is to be inferred from it that the defendant never did mean to perform the contract of purchase at all; and, consequently, never retracted the waiver of the delivery by the plaintiff as a vendor. It is true that the defendant insists that the cargo shall be delivered at Belfast; and even the alleged parol refusal was probably not intended to be, as Mr. Mellish [of counsel for the defendant] in his able and ingenious argument with truth contended, any waiver of the delivery at Belfast; it may be taken that the defendant always meant that; but the true question is not whether the delivery at Belfast was waived, but whether the delivery under the second contract, that is, the contract of purchase and sale, was waived; and we feel no doubt that the defendant, after he had formed the opinion that he had been deluded into a contract of purchase by false representations of the prospects of the original adventure in the first instance, wholly refused to be bound by the contract of sale, and thereby intended to waive the delivery under that contract, and never afterwards retracted the waiver.

This was a question for the jury; and we do not see any reason to think, from the report and the statements of the learned counsel on both sides, that the jury were not in substance properly directed as to the question for their decision; and we are all quite satisfied with their verdict. As to the issue with respect to the consignment to the plaintiff, we think that the learned judge's direction was quite right.

With respect to the motion in arrest of judgment, we think that the verdict on the issue as to the residue is immaterial. If this residue is that part of the breach which is not answered either by the third plea or the fourth, it is in effect no part of the breach at all, for the third plea answers all; there is nothing to plead to, and the plea is idle and irrelevant. If it means the residue not answered by the fourth plea, it is only the readiness and the willingness to deliver after the time that the delivery was excused, and the defendant refused to receive; and readiness and willingness after that time is wholly immaterial. The verdict for the defendant is, therefore, upon an immaterial averment in the declaration.¹⁴⁵

CORT & GEE v. AMBERGATE, &c. RAILWAY CO.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1851. 17 Q. B. 127.)

Assumpsit for breach of contract by defendant to take and pay for railway chairs to be manufactured by plaintiffs. The defendant company was found by the jury to have notified plaintiffs that the company did not wish to have any more chairs and would not accept any more. The plaintiffs accordingly did not make and tender the rest of the chairs called for by the contract, but sued for loss of profits, etc. Verdict for plaintiffs and rule nisi for a new trial.

LORD CAMPBELL, C. J.† We are of opinion that the verdict found for the plaintiffs ought not to be disturbed. * * *

Next we have to consider whether the plaintiffs were entitled to a verdict on the issue whether they were ready and willing to execute and perform the said contract according to the said conditions and ¹⁴⁵ In M'Clure v. Ripley, 5 Ex. 140 (1850) the judgment in Ripley v. M'Clure, supra, was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber upon this last ground.

† The foregoing brief statement is substituted for the elaborate statement of pleadings and facts in the original report, and portions of the opinion are omitted.

stipulations, in manner and form, etc.; and on the issue whether the defendants did refuse to accept or receive the residue of the chairs, or prevent or discharge the plaintiffs from supplying the said residue, and from the further execution and performance of the said contract. It is not denied that if the defendants would have regularly accepted and paid for the chairs, the plaintiffs would have gone on regularly making and delivering them according to the contract; the objection is that, although the plaintiffs were desirous that the contract should be fully performed, yet, after receiving the notice that the company did not wish to have any more chairs, and would not accept any more, they ceased to make any more, insomuch that the residue which the company are alleged to have refused to accept never were made. The defendants contend that, as the plaintiffs did not make and tender the residue of the chairs, they cannot be said to have been ready and willing to perform the contract; that the defendants cannot be charged with a breach of it; that, after the notice from the defendants, which in truth amounted to a declaration that they had broken and thenceforward renounced the contract, the plaintiffs, if they wished to have any redress, were bound to buy the requisite quantity of the peculiar sort of iron suited for these railway chairs, to make the whole of them according to the pattern, with the name of the company upon them, and to bring them to the appointed places of delivery and tender them to the defendants, who, from insolvency, had abandoned the completion of the line for which the chairs were intended, desiring that no more chairs might be made, and declaring, in effect, that no more should be accepted or paid for. We are of opinion, however, that the jury were fully justified upon the evidence in finding that the plaintiffs were ready and willing to perform the contract, although they never made and tendered the residue of the chairs. In common sense the meaning of such an averment of readiness and willingness must be that the non-completion of the contract was not the fault of the plaintiffs, and that they were disposed and able to complete it if it had not been renounced by the defendants. What more can reasonably be required by the parties for whom the goods are to be manufactured? If, having accepted a part, they are unable to pay for the residue, and have resolved not to accept them, no benefit can accrue to them from a useless waste of materials and labor, which might possibly enhance the amount of damages to be awarded against them.

Upon the last issue, was there not evidence that the defendants refused to accept the residue of the chairs? If they had said, "Make no more for us, for we will have nothing to do with them," was not that refusing to accept or receive them according to the contract? But the learned counsel for the defendants laid peculiar stress upon the words "nor did they prevent or discharge the plaintiffs from supplying the said residue" of chairs "and from the further execution and performance of the said contract." We consider the material part of the allegation which the last plea traverses to be, that the defendants refused to receive the residue of the chairs. But, assuming that the whole must be proved, we think there is evidence to show that the defendants did prevent and discharge the plaintiffs from supplying the residue of the chairs, and from the further execution of the contract. It is contended that "prevent" here must mean an obstruction by physical force; and, in answer to a question from the court, we were told it would not be a preventing of the delivery of goods if the purchaser were to write, in a letter to the person who ought to supply them, "Should you come to my house to deliver them, I will blow your brains out." But may I not reasonably say that I was prevented from completing a contract by being desired not to complete it? Are there no means of preventing an act from being done, except physical force or brute violence? Again, we are told there can be no "discharge" by a corporation unless by deed under the corporate seal. Of a discharge in one sense of the word this is true. A discharge is sometimes used as equivalent to a release, which must be under seal; Brymer v. Thames Haven Dock & Railway Company, 2 Exch. 549. But we conceive that, in the allegation traversed by the last plea, discharge only means, like prevent, that the act of the defendants was the cause of the residue of the chairs not being delivered, and of the contract not being further executed or performed. Taking the language employed in its natural and reasonable sense, there was abundant evidence to support the finding of the last issue for the plaintiffs.

It is averred, however, that there are express authorities to show that there could be no readiness and willingness to perform the contract unless all the chairs were finished and tendered; that to prevent must be by positive physical obstruction, and that there can be no discharging unless by instrument under seal. * * * In Roll. Abr. 453, and in 5 Vin. Abr. 242, 3, tit. Condition (M. c.) will be found various instances of a covenant being discharged without deed by the act of the covenantee. * * *

The most recent case cited by the defendants' counsel was Ripley v. McClure, 4 Exch. 345. This case is very complicated in its circumstances; but the second point decided in it is the only one applicable to the question which we have to consider. There being an executory contract, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant to buy, on arrival, certain goods, to be delivered at Belfast at a certain price, payable on delivery, it was held that a refusal by the defendant before the arrival of the cargo to perform the contract was not of itself necessarily a breach of it, but that such refusal, unretracted down to and inclusive of the time when the defendant was bound to receive the cargo, was evidence of a continuing refusal and a waiver of the condition precedent of delivery, so as to render the defendant liable for the breach of contract. But, in the case at bar, the refusal never was retracted; and therefore there was a continuing breach down to the time when this action was commenced.

Upon the whole, we think we are justified, on principle and without trenching on any former decision, in holding that, when there is an executory contract for the manufacturing and supply of goods from time to time, to be paid for after delivery, if the purchaser, having accepted and paid for a portion of the goods contracted for, gives notice to the vendor not to manufacture any more as he has no occasion for them and will not accept or pay for them, the vendor having been desirous and able to complete the contract, he may, without manufacturing and tendering the rest of the goods, maintain an action against the purchaser for breach of contract; and that he is entitled to a verdict on pleas traversing allegations that he was ready and willing to perform the contract, that the defendant refused to accept the residue of the goods, and that he prevented and discharged the plaintiff from manufacturing and delivering them.

We are likewise of opinion that in this case, the damages are not excessive, as the jury were justified in taking into their calculation all the chairs which remained to be delivered, and which the defendant refused to accept. They were all included in the declaration and in the issues joined; the time mentioned in the proposal for the delivery of some of them had arrived before the notice was given; but the time of delivery was not of the essence of the contract; and the obligation was still incumbent upon the defendants to accept the whole of the residue.

The rule must therefore be discharged.

*Rule discharged.*¹⁴⁶

HOCHSTER v. DE LA TOUR.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1853. 2 Ellis & Blackburn, 678.)

Assumpsit. On the trial, before Erle, J., at the London sittings in last Easter Term, it appeared that plaintiff was a courier, who, in April, ¹⁴⁶ "While the pleading omits the averment that the plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to perform its part of the contract, which consisted in receiving and paying for the corn after its delivery at Whittman's Landing, it repeatedly charges that the defendant Royster announced to the agent of the plaintiff that he would not comply with his contract by delivering the corn, and this is borne out by the evidence. In such cases, which of themselves amount to a breach of the contract which entitles the plaintiff to maintain an action for damages, it is unnecessary for the plaintiff to allege in bringing his action that he was ready, able, and willing to perform his part of the contract, and this is one of the exceptions often enlarged upon by text-writers. It was therefore not necessary for the plaintiff to have alleged that it was ready, able, and willing to perform its part of the contract in order to maintain its action." Sampson, J., in Royster v. A. Waller & Co., 186 Ky. 476, 478 (1920).

"As the contract had been finally repudiated by the defendant both by letter 1852, was engaged by defendant to accompany him on a tour to commence on June 1st, 1852, on the terms mentioned in the declaration. On May 11th, 1852, defendant wrote to plaintiff that he had changed his mind, and declined his services. He refused to make him any compensation. The action was commenced on May 22d. The plaintiff, between the commencement of the action and June 1st, obtained an engagement with Lord Ashburton, on equally good terms, but not commencing till July 4th. The defendant's counsel objected that there could be no breach of the contract before June 1st. The learned judge was of a contrary opinion, but reserved leave to enter a non-suit on this objection. The other questions were left to the jury, who found for plaintiff.

Rule nisi to enter a non-suit or arrest the judgment.

LORD CAMPBELL, C. J.¹⁴⁷ On this motion in arrest of judgment, the question arises, Whether, if there be an agreement between A and B, whereby B engages to employ A on and from a future day for a given period of time, to travel with him into a foreign country as a courier, and to start with him in that capacity on that day, A being to receive a monthly salary during the continuance of such service, B may, before the day, refuse to perform the agreement and break and renounce it, so as to entitle A before the day to commence an action against B to recover damages for breach of the agreement; A having been ready and willing to perform it, till it was broken and renounced by B. The defendant's counsel very powerfully contended that, if the plaintiff was not contented to dissolve the contract and to abandon all remedy upon it, he was bound to remain ready and willing to perform it till the day when the actual employment as courier in the service of the defendant was to begin; and that there could be no breach of the agreement before that day to give a right of action. But it cannot be laid down as a universal rule that, where by agreement an act is to be done on a future day, no action can be brought for a breach of the agreement till the day for doing the act has arrived. If a man promises to marry a woman on a future day, and before that day marries another woman, he is instantly liable to an action for breach of promise of marriage. Short v. Stone, 8 Q. B. 358. If a man contracts to execute a lease on and from a future day for a certain term, and before that day executes a lease to another for the same term, he may be immediately sued for breaking the contract. Ford v. Tiley, 6 B. & C. 325. So, if a man contracts to sell and deliver specific goods on a future day, and before the day he sells and delivers them to another, he is immediately liable to and conduct before payment was due, it could not be found that the failure of the plaintiff to pay excused the defendant from performing the contract. See Ballou v. Billings, 136 Mass. 307; Randall v. Peerless Motor Car Co., 212 Mass. 352, 377, 99 N. E. 221." Carroll, J., in Wellington Piano Case Co. v. Garfield & Proctor Coal Co. (Mass.), 129 N. E. 285, 287 (1920).

¹⁴⁷ The pleadings and part of the opinion are omitted.

an action at the suit of the person with whom he first contracted to sell and deliver them. Bowdell v. Parsons, 10 East, 359. One reason alleged in support of such an action is, that the defendant has, before the day, rendered it impossible for him to perform the contract at the day, but this does not necessarily follow; for prior to the day fixed for doing the act, the first wife may have died, a surrender of the lease executed might be obtained, and the defendant might have repurchased the goods so as to be in a situation to sell and deliver them to the plaintiff. Another reason may be that, where there is a contract to do an act on a future day, there is a relation constituted between the parties in the meantime by the contract, and that they impliedly promise that in the meantime neither will do anything to the prejudice of the other inconsistent with that relation. As for example, a man and woman engaged to marry are affianced to one another during the period between the time of the engagement and the celebration of the marriage. In this very case of traveller and courier, from the day of the hiring till the day when the employment was to begin, they were engaged to each other; and it seems to be a breach of an implied contract if either of them renounces the engagement. This reasoning seems in accordance with the unanimous decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Elderton v. Emmens, 6 Com. B. 160, which we have followed in subsequent cases in this court. The declaration in the present case, in alleging a breach, states a great deal more than a passing intention on the part of the defendant which he may repent of, and could only be proved by evidence that he had utterly renounced the contract, or done some act which rendered it impossible for him to perform it. If the plaintiff has no remedy for breach of the contract unless he treats the contract as in force, and acts upon it down to June 1st, 1852, it follows that, till then, he must enter into no employment which will interfere with his promise "to start with the defendant on such travels on the day and year," and that he must then be properly equipped in all respects as a courier for a three months' tour on the Continent of Europe. But it is surely much more rational, and more for the benefit of both parties, that, after the renunciation of the agreement by the defendant, the plaintiff should be at liberty to consider himself absolved from any future performance of it, retaining his right to sue for any damage he has suffered from the breach of it. Thus, instead of remaining idle and laying out money in preparations which must be useless, he is at liberty to seek service under another employer, which would go in mitigation of the damages to which he would otherwise be entitled for a breach of the contract. It seems strange that the defendant, after renouncing the contract, and absolutely declaring that he will never act under it, should be permitted to object that faith is given to his assertion, and that an opportunity is not left to him of changing his mind. If the plaintiff is barred of any remedy by entering into an engagement inconsistent with starting as a courier with the defendant on June 1st, he is prejudiced by putting faith in the defendant's assertion, and it would be more consonant with principle, if the defendant were precluded from saying that he had not broken the contract when he declared that he entirely renounced it. Suppose that the defendant, at the time of his renunciation, had embarked on a voyage for Australia, so as to render it physically impossible for him to employ the plaintiff as a courier on the Continent of Europe in the months of June, July, and August, 1852, according to decided cases, the action might have been brought before June 1st; but the renunciation may have been founded on other facts, to be given in evidence, which would equally have rendered the defendant's performance of the contract impossible. The man who wrongfully renounces a contract into which he has deliberately entered cannot justly complain if he is immediately sued for a compensation in damages by the man whom he has injured; and it seems reasonable to allow an option to the injured party, either to sue immediately, or to wait till the time when the act was to be done, still holding it as prospectively binding for the exercise of this option, which may be advantageous to the innocent party, and cannot be prejudicial to the wrongdoer. An argument against the action before June 1st is urged from the difficulty of calculating the damages, but this argument is equally strong against an action before September 1st, when the three months would expire. In either case, the jury in assessing the damages would be justified in looking to all that had happened, or was likely to happen, to increase or mitigate the loss of the plaintiff down to the day of trial. We do not find any decision contrary to the view we are taking of this case. * * * If it should be held that, upon a contract to do an act on a future day, a renunciation of the contract by one party dispenses with a condition to be performed in the meantime by the other, there seems no reason for requiring that other to wait till the day arrives before seeking his remedy by action; and the only ground on which the condition can be dispensed with seems to be, that the renunciation may be treated as a breach of the contract.

Upon the whole, we think that the declaration in this case is sufficient. It gives us great satisfaction to reflect that, the question being on the record, our opinion may be reviewed in a Court of Error. In the meantime we must give judgment for the plaintiff.

Judgment for plaintiff.

FROST v. KNIGHT.

(Court of Exchequer Chamber, 1872. L. R., 7 Exch., 111.)

COCKBURN, C. J.¹⁴⁸ This case comes before us on error, brought on a judgment of the Court of Exchequer arresting the judgment in the action on a verdict given for the plaintiff.

The action was for breach of promise of marriage. The promise, as proved, was to marry the plaintiff on the death of the defendant's father. The father still living, the defendant announced his intention of not fulfilling his promise on his father's death, and broke off the engagement, whereupon the plaintiff, without waiting for the father's death, at once brought the present action. The plaintiff having obtained a verdict, a rule nisi was applied for to arrest the judgment, on the ground that a breach of the contract could only arise on the father's death, till which event, no claim for performance could be made, and, consequently, till its occurrence, no action for breach of the contract be maintained. A rule nisi having been granted, a majority of the Court of Exchequer concurred in making it absolute, Martin, B., dissenting; and the question for us is, whether the judgment of the majority was right. * * *

The law with reference to a contract to be performed at a future time, where the party bound to performance announces prior to the time his intention not to perform it, * * * may be thus stated. The promisee, if he pleases, may treat the notice of intention as inoperative, and await the time when the contract is to be executed, and then hold the other party responsible for all the consequences of non-performance; but in that case he keeps the contract alive for the benefit of the other party as well as his own; he remains subject to all his own obligations and liabilities under it, and enables the other party not only to complete the contract, if so advised, notwithstanding his previous repudiation of it, but also to take advantage of any supervening circumstance which would justify him in declining to complete it.

On the other hand, the promisee may, if he thinks proper, treat the repudiation of the other party as a wrongful putting an end to the contract, and may at once bring his action as on a breach of it; and in such action he will be entitled to such damages as would have arisen from the nonperformance of the contract at the appointed time, subject, however, to abatement in respect of any circumstances which may have afforded him the means of mitigating his loss.

Considering this to be now settled law, notwithstanding anything that may have been held or said in the cases of Phillpotts v. Evans, 5 E. & B. 714 and Ripley v. McClure, 4 Ex. at p. 359, we should have had no difficulty in applying the principle of the decision in Hochster v. De la Tour to the present case, were it not for the difference which undoubtedly exists between that case and the present—namely, that, whereas there the performance of the contract was to take place at a fixed time, here no time is fixed, but the performance is made to depend on a contingency—namely, the death of the defendant's father during the lifetime of the contracting parties. It is true that in every case of a personal obligation to be fulfilled at a future time, there is involved the possible contingency of the death of the party binding himself, before the time of performance arrives; but here we have a further contingency depending on the life of a third person, during which neither party can claim performance of the promise. This being so, we thought it right to take time to consider whether an action would lie before the death of the defendant's father had placed the plaintiff in a position to claim the fulfilment of the defendant's promise.

After full consideration we are of opinion that, notwithstanding the distinguishing circumstance to which I have referred, this case falls within the principle of Hochster v. De la Tour, and that, consequently, the present action is well brought.

The considerations on which the decision in Hochster v. De la Tour is founded are that the announcement of the contracting party of his intention not to fulfil the contract amounts to a breach, and that it is for the common benefit of both parties that the contract shall be taken to be broken as to all its incidents, including nonperformance at the appointed time; as by an action being brought at once, and the damages consequent on nonperformance being assessed at the earliest moment, many of the injurious effects of such nonperformance may possibly be averted or mitigated.

It is true, * * * that there can be no actual breach of a contract by reason of nonperformance so long as the time for performance has not yet arrived. But, on the other hand, there is—and the decision in Hochster v. De la Tour proceeds on that assumption—a breach of the contract when the promisor repudiates it and declares he will no longer be bound by it. The promisee has an inchoate right to the performance of the bargain, which becomes complete when the time for performance has arrived. In the meantime he has a right to have the contract kept open as a subsisting and effective contract. Its unimpaired and unimpeached efficacy may be essential to his interests. His rights acquired under it may be dealt with by him in various ways for his benefit and advantage. Of all such advantage the repudiation of the contract by the other party, and the announcement that it never will be fulfilled, must of course deprive him. It is therefore quite right to hold that such an announcement amounts to a violation of the contract in omnibus, and that upon it the promisee, if so minded, may at once treat it as a breach of the entire contract, and bring his action accordingly.

The contract having been thus broken by the promisor, and treated as broken by the promisee, performance at the appointed time becomes excluded, and the breach by reason of the future nonperformance becomes virtually involved in the action as one of the consequences of the repudiation of the contract; and the eventual nonperformance may therefore, by anticipation, be treated as a cause of action, and damages be assessed and recovered in respect of it, though the time for performance may yet be remote.

It is obvious that such a course must lead to the convenience of both parties; and though we should be unwilling to found our opinion on grounds of convenience alone, yet the latter tend strongly to support the view that such an action ought to be admitted and upheld. By acting on such a notice of the intention of the promisor, and taking timely measures, the promisee may in many cases avert, or at all events materially lessen, the injurious effects which would otherwise flow from the nonfulfilment of the contract; and in assessing the damages for breach of performance, a jury will of course take into account whatever the plaintiff has done, or has had the means of doing, and, as a prudent man, ought in reason to have done, whereby his loss has been, or would have been, diminished.

It appears to us that the foregoing considerations apply to the case of a contract the performance of which is made to depend on a contingency, as much as to one in which the performance is to take place at a future time; and we are, therefore, of opinion that the principle of the decision of Hochster v. De la Tour is equally applicable to such a case as the present.

It is next to be observed, that the law as settled by Hochster v. De la Tour and Danube & Black Sea Co. v. Xenos is obviously quite as applicable to a contract in which personal status or personal rights are involved, as to one relating to commercial or pecuniary interests. Indeed, the contract of marriage appears to afford a striking illustration of the expediency of holding that an action may be obtained on the repudiation of a contract to be performed in futuro. On such a contract being entered into, not only does a right to its completion arise with reference to domestic relations and possibly pecuniary advantages, as also to the social status accruing on marriage, but a new status, that of betrothment, at once arises between the parties. This relation, it is true, has not, by the law of England, the same important consequences which attached to it by the canon law and the law of many other countries. Nevertheless, it carries with it consequences of the utmost importance to the parties. Each becomes bound to the other; neither can, consistently with such a relation, enter into a similar engagement with another person; each has an implied right to have this relation continued till the contract is finally accomplished by marriage. To the woman, more especially, it is all-important that the relation shall not be put an end to. Independently of the mental pain occasioned by the abrupt termination of such an engagement, the fact of its existence, if followed by such a termination, must necessarily operate to her serious disadvantage. During its continuance others will naturally be deterred from approaching her with matrimonial intentions; nor could she admit of such approaches, if made; while the breaking off of the engagement is too apt to cast a slur upon one who has been thus treated. We see, therefore, every reason for applying the principle of Hochster v. De la Tour to such a case, and for holding the contract, if repudiated, to be broken, not only in its present, but also in its ultimate obligations and consequences. To hold that the aggrieved party must wait till the time fixed for marrying shall have arrived, or the event on which it is to depend shall have happened, would have the effect of aggravating the injury, by preventing the party from forming any other union, and by reason of advancing age rendering the probability of such a union constantly less. It has been suggested, indeed, that the desire of marrying and the happiness to be expected from it diminish with advancing years, and, therefore, that when by the terms of the contract marriage is only to take place at a remote time, the value of the marriage and the damages to be recovered for a breach of the promise would be less if the refusal were made when the time for marrying was accomplished; and that, consequently, an action ought not to be allowed till the time when the fulfilment of the contract could have been claimed. We cannot concur in this view. We think that, in estimating the amount of injury done and of the compensation to be made for it, if the contract were broken when the time for marrying had arrived, the wasted years and the impossibility of forming any other engagement during the intermediate time should be taken into account, and not merely the age of the parties and the then existing value of the marriage. It is, therefore, manifest that it is better for both parties—for the party intending to break the contract, as well as for the party wronged by the breach of it—that an express repudiation of the contract should be treated as a violation of it in all its incidents, and should give the right to the party wronged to bring an action at once, and have the damages assessed at the earliest moment. No one can doubt that, morally speaking, a party who determines to break off a matrimonial engagement acts far more commendably if he at once gives notice of his intention, than if he keeps that intention secret till the time for fulfilling the promise has come. The reason is that the giving such notice at the earliest moment tends to mitigate, while the delay in giving it necessarily aggravates, the injury of the party wronged.

It has been urged that there must be great difficulty in thus assessing damages prospectively. But this must always be more or less the case whenever the principle of Hochster v. De la Tour comes to be applied. It would equally exist where one of the parties, by marrying another person, gave rise, as in the case of Short v. Stone, to an immediate right of action. It cannot be said that the difficulty is by any means insuperable, and the advantages resulting from the application of the principle of Hochster v. De la Tour are quite sufficient to outweigh any inconvenience arising from the difficulty of assessing the damages. * * *

We are therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer must be reversed.

*Judgment reversed.*¹⁴⁰

SYNGE v. SYNGE.

(Court of Appeal. [1894] 1 Q. B. 466.)

The claim in this action was on an ante-nuptial promise, made by the defendant in consideration of marriage, to leave by will to the plaintiff a certain house and land for her lifetime. It was alleged that the defendant had conveyed his whole estate and interest in the property to third persons, and thereby incapacitated himself from keeping his promise; and the plaintiff claimed a declaration that she was entitled to a life estate in the premises commencing on the death of her husband, and that the conveyance thereof was subject to her life estate, and in the alternative, the plaintiff claimed damages for breach of agreement. Mathew, J., gave judgment for the defendant and plaintiff appealed.

KAY, J. L.¹⁴⁰ * * * We are of opinion * * * that accordingly there was a binding contract on the defendant's part to leave to his wife the house and land at Ardfield for her life. * * * Counsel elect to ask for damages only. Sir R. Synge had all his lifetime to perform this contract; but, in order to perform it, he must in his lifetime make a disposition in favour of Lady Synge. If he died without having done so, he would have broken his contract. The breach would be omitting in his lifetime to make such a disposition. True, it would only take effect at his death; but the breach must take place in his lifetime, and as by the conveyance to his daughters he put it absolutely out of his power to perform this contract, Lady Synge, according to well-known decisions (Hochester v. De La Tour, 2 E. & B. 678; Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Ex. 111), had a right to treat that conveyance as an absolute breach of contract, and to sue at once for damages; and as this court has both legal and equitable jurisdiction, we are of opinion that such relief should be granted.

We have not before us the materials for assessing such damages. The amount must depend on the value of the possible life estate which Lady Synge would be entitled to if she survived her husband. Their comparative ages, would, of course, be a chief factor in such a calculation. There must be an inquiry as to the proper amount of damages.

Sir R. Synge must pay the costs of the action here and in the court below.

ZUCK & HENRY v. M'CLURE & CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1881. 98 Pa. St. 541.)

Assumpsit by Zuck & Henry against G. T. Rafferty et al., trading as McClure & Co. The action was brought Nov. 29, 1879, the writ served and narr. filed the same day.

The jury found a verdict for the defendants, and certified a balance in their favor of $36,150.12, and judgment was entered thereon. The plaintiff thereupon took this writ of error.

PAXON, J.¹⁵² This action was commenced in the court below on the 29th day of November, 1879, and was to recover about $1,500 for coke delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants during the previous October. There was no serious dispute as to either the delivery of the coke or the amount; but the defendants set up as a defence the breach of a [subsequent] contract on the part of the plaintiffs for future deliveries of coke. To state said contract briefly, the plaintiffs had agreed to sell and deliver to the defendants the entire product of their Eldorado works, comprising forty ovens, at a fixed price per ton, and also the product of all other ovens built by them during the continuance of the contract. This contract plainly appears by the correspondence between the parties, and was finally closed on Nov. 11, 1879. On the 19th of the same month the plaintiffs notified the defendants in writing that they would not deliver the coke. On the 4th of December, four days after the delivery was to have commenced under the contract, the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs as follows:

"We beg to draw your attention to contract between us by which you agree to furnish us the product of the Eldorado Coke Works (forty ovens); also product of ovens that may be built during the continuance of the contract from December 1, 1879, to May 31, 1880, inclusive, and to advise you that we have been and are now prepared to receive the said coke under said contract. If shipments on our account are not at once commenced, we will go into the market and buy an equal amount of coke which you fail to deliver us, and will hold you responsible for any difference in price which we may have to pay, and will retain the balance which we now have in our hands to secure us against any loss or damage which we may sustain from your failure to comply with contract."

The defendants upon the trial below were allowed to set off their damages by reason of the breach of the above contract; and the jury found a verdict in their favor for $36,150. The single specification of error raises the question whether there was any breach at the time the suit was commenced.

A mere notice of an intended breach is not of itself a breach of the contract. It may become so if accepted and acted on by the other party. If the defendants had accepted the plaintiffs' notice of breach contained in their letter of November 19 and acted upon it, there would plainly have been a breach of the contract.¹⁵⁸ The plaintiffs in such case could not have relieved themselves by commencing to deliver the coke on December 1, but must have been held to all the legal consequences of the breach. The defendants, however, on December 4, still insist upon compliance. They say they "are now prepared to receive said coke under said contract." This certainly kept the contract alive as to both parties. The plaintiffs could have gone on and delivered the coke on December 4, in which case there would have been no breach and no damages. The notice of an intention not to perform the contract, if not accepted by the other party as a present breach, remains only a matter of intention, and may be withdrawn at any time before the performance is in fact due; but if not in fact withdrawn it is evidence of a continued intention to refuse performance down to and inclusive of the time appointed for performance. Ripley v. McClure, 4 Ex. 345; Leake on the Law of Contracts, 873. The promisee may treat the notice of intention as inoperative, and await the time when the contract is to be executed, and then hold the other party responsible for all the consequences of nonperformance. But in that case he keeps the contract alive for the benefit of the other party as well as his own; he remains subject to all his own obligations and liabilities under it, and enables ¹⁵⁸ "The intention to abandon the contract at some future date is no breach of it, but, when that intention is declared in positive terms and unconditionally, it has the effect, in so far as the promisor is able to do so, to repudiate the contract itself and to terminate the contractual relations between the parties. This affords to the other party the opportunity to accept the declarations, if he chooses to do so, and thus make effective the declarations of intention not to perform, rendering the contract thereby one that is broken on the part of the promisor himself. But to have this effect the declaration of an intention not to perform the contract in the future must be unconditional in its terms. * * * The ground upon which it is held that when one declares that he will not perform a contract, the performance of which is to begin in the future, the other party may accept this declaration as a breach is that the contract is thus repudiated, and, so far as one party can do so, the contractual relation between the parties is destroyed. Clark on Contracts, 645; Zuck v. McClure, 98 Pa. 545." Brown, J., in Kilgore v. N. W. T. Baptist Educational Ass'n, 90 Tex. 139, 142-144 (1896).

the other party not only to complete the contract, if so advised, notwithstanding his previous repudiation of it, but also to take advantage of any supervening circumstance which would justify him in declining to complete it. Leake on Contracts, supra.¹⁴⁴

It follows from the foregoing principles that on November 29 when the action was commenced below, there was no breach of the contract which the defendants could set up as a set-off to the plaintiffs' claim. Nor does it help the defendants that when the cause was tried the breach was complete. The date of the commencement of the suit is the obvious test in such cases. Morrison v. Moreland, 15 S. & R. 61; Carpenter v. Butterfield; 3 Johns. Cases, 144.

There was error in not affirming the plaintiffs' eighth point.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

WESTER ET AL. v. CASEIN CO. OF AMERICA.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1912. 206 N. Y. 506, 100 N. E. 488, Ann. Cas. 1914 B, 377.)

The plaintiffs, residents of the Argentine Republic, sued the defendant, a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey but having its principal place of business in New York, for breach of a contract for the defendant to buy and the plaintiffs to sell the total product of casein of the plaintiffs. At a time when each was dissatisfied as to the performance by the other, the defendant, though fully aware that under the contract it was for the plaintiffs to tender the casein in Buenos Ayres and for the defendant then to decline or accept, without waiting for such tender, and in reply to a cablegram from the plaintiffs asking for an answer by cablegram, sent from New York a cablegram which the court construed as an unqualified repudiation of the contract. The defendant's cablegram was sent November 29, 1904, and on December 30, 1904, plaintiffs sent an answer which left open for a reasonable time performance by defendant. The defendant did not, however, modify its repudiation of the terms of the contract. This action was brought March 28, 1906, and the question was as to the jurisdiction of the court, which depended on whether the cause of action "arose within the state" within the appropriate code provision, i. e., "whether the breach of said contract" occurred in New York. The plaintiffs had judgment in the Supreme Court, but the Appellate Division reversed the judgment ¹⁴⁴ "Mr. Manisty [counsel for appellants, who were plaintiffs below] * * * argued that whenever a party, within the time which he has for doing an act, refuses to do it a right of action immediately accrues to the other party, although the breach may indeed be afterwards healed by a performance within the time: but that, if before the expiration of the time anything happens which makes the performance illegal, then the contract may be considered to have been substantially broken within the time. I am of opinion that this is not a correct view of the law." Pollock, C. B., in Reid v. Hoskins, 6 E. & Bl. 953, 972 (1856).

(140 App. Div. 442, 125 N. Y. Supp. 335). Plaintiffs appealed. Reversed and remanded.

CHASE, J.† * * * We are of the opinion as we have stated that the delivery of the cablegram to the telegraph company should be treated as a delivery to the plaintiffs. It is deemed to be a delivery to the plaintiffs, whether received by them or not, for the same reason that when one person, by letter or telegram, makes an offer to another, and the other person accepts such offer, either by post or telegraph, the contract springs into existence at the time of such mailing or sending, because of implied authority in the carrier of the message to receive the reply. Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441; Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307, 93 Am. Dec. 511; Crown Point Iron Co. v. Boatman's Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 127 N. Y. 608, 28 N. E. 653, 14 L. R. A. 147.

The breach of the contract occurred in this case upon the delivery of the cablegram to the telegraph company, and constituted a breach, not only at that time, but also at that place. It was unnecessary for the defendant to have anticipated the action it would take in case of formal tender in Buenos Ayres. It did, however, anticipate such action by its cablegram of November 29th.

An anticipatory breach of a contract precedes the time prescribed for its performance, or at least the time when tender of performance has been proffered. If it does not precede the time of performance or actual tender, it is not anticipatory. Where, as in this case, it precedes a formal tender under the contract, and is in anticipation of such tender, it is as voluntary; and its effect is the same as when it precedes the time when performance is required, in whole or in part by the contract.

The defendant having voluntarily anticipated its action and repudiated the contract, it should be treated the same, so far as the breach is concerned, as it would if the plaintiffs had in New York tendered the case in to the defendant, and the defendant had then waived the place of delivery, but wholly refused to accept it, and wholly repudiated the contract. It would in that case have been a breach of the contract in New York, although the place of performance, as provided by the contract, was Argentina.

The place where a cause of action for a breach of contract arises is generally, almost universally, the place where the contract is to be performed. The reason why the place of the breach of contract is generally the place of its performance is that unless the place of performance is waived or performance is anticipated, it is only at such place that there is a breach, or that it can be determined whether there is a breach.

An anticipatory breach of contract is not necessarily confined to the place of performance named in the contract. It depends upon the facts and circumstances in each case. In determining the place of the breach, the time of the breach is important. Hamilton v. Barr, 18 L. R. Ir. 297; Matthews v. Alexander, 7 Ir. R. C. L. 575; Cherry v. Thompson, L. R. (7 Q. B.) 73. Although the doctrine of anticipatory breach is not applicable in all cases (see Kelly v. Security Mut. L. Ins. Co., 186 N. Y. 16, 78 N. E. 584, 9 Ann. Cas. 661), it is applicable to the case now under consideration.

In Hibernia National Bank v. Lacombe, 84 N. Y. 367, at page 383 (38 Am. Rep. 518), this court, in considering the place where a cause of action arose, and quoting from Durham v. Spence, L. R. 6 Ex. Cas. 46, say: "I understand by cause of action that which creates the necessity for bringing the action. No doubt, to make the act or omission complained of a cause of action, a contract must have preceded; but so also a negotiation must have preceded the making of the contract. Yet I should not include that negotiation, nor any of the other circumstances that might form part of the necessary evidence in the cause, as the groundwork of the cause of complaint, but only the cause of complaint itself; that is the breach." * * * "The cause of action must have reference to some time as well as some place. Does, then, the consideration of the time when the cause of action arises give us any assistance in determining the place where it arises? I think it does. The cause of action arises when that is not done which ought to have been done, or that is done which ought not to have been done. But the time when the cause of action arises determines, also, the place where it arises; for when that occurs which is the cause of action the place where it occurs is the place where the cause of action arises." "

If the defendant wholly repudiated the contract, the plaintiffs were at liberty, at least at their option, to rescind the whole contract and sue for the damages arising from a complete breach. Wolfert v. Caledonia Springs Ice Co., 195 N. Y. 118, 88 N. E. 24, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 864; Pakas v. Hollingshead, 184 N. Y. 211, 77 N. E. 40, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1042, 112 Am. St. Rep. 601, 6 Ann. Cas. 60; Pope v. Porter, 102 N. Y. 366, 7 N. E. 304; Ga Nun v. Palmer, 202 N. Y. 483, 96 N. E. 99, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 922; Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, 20 Sup. Ct. 780, 44 L. Ed. 953.

The defendant, which has its principal place of business in this state, should not feel aggrieved if the plaintiffs, in reliance upon its cablegram, are enabled to sustain the jurisdiction of the courts of this state and thus come to the place of the defendant's convenience to fight its and their battle.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed. * * *

*Judgment reversed, etc.*¹⁵⁵

¹⁵⁵ "It appears that the plaintiff, in New York, made a contract by interchange of letters, whereby defendant undertook to manufacture at its factory in Ridgeway, Pa., and deliver materials to plaintiff, f. o. b. Youngstown, Ohio. At a subsequent time, by letter sent from Ridgeway, Pa., to the plaintiff in New York, defendant repudiated farther performance of the contract

TRAVER v. HALSTED.

Question on sale of real estate. On the twenty-fifth day of December, 1837, an agreement under seal was entered into between the parties, whereby it was stipulated on the part of Halsted to sell to Traver a farm containing about 163 acres of land, to be conveyed as described in his deed without survey, at the rate of $70 per acre, and that on or before the fifth of April then next, on receiving from Traver the price of $70 per acre, that he would, at his own costs and expense, execute a proper conveyance for the conveying and assuring the fee simple of the premises to Traver, free from all incumbrances, except a mortgage, executed by him to Seth Lawton for securing the payment of $5,000—the conveyance to contain a general warranty and the usual full covenants. On the part of Traver, it was stipulated, that on or before the fifth day of April ensuing the date of the agreement, on the execution of such conveyance by Halsted, to pay the sum of $70 per acre for the farm, in manner following; that he would assume and pay the mortgage of $5,000 when due, and secure the balance to be paid in cash on or before the first day of May ensuing the date of the agreement. The parties bound themselves each to the other for the performance of their respective stipulations, in the penalty of $1,500, which were declared liquidated damages. In May, 1838, Traver brought an action of covenant against Halsted, claiming the recovery of the $1,500 stipulated damages. After setting forth the agreement in his declaration, the plaintiff averred that on the 5th April, 1838, he tendered to the defendant an agreement in writing under his hand and seal, whereby he assumed to pay, when due, the mortgage to Lawton, and covenanted to pay the moneys thereby secured, and to indemnify the defendant from the payment thereof; and on the same day tendered to the defendant a bond in the penal sum of $14,000, executed by the plaintiff and canceled the same. Having been sent by mail, the carrier was but defendant's agent, and it was necessary in order to repudiate the contract, to have such notice reach the plaintiff. Under the circumstances, the breach of contract occurred in this state, and the cause of action, therefore, arose within the jurisdiction of our courts [within a statute permitting service on certain corporation agents if the cause of action 'arose' in the state.]

"Defendant's reliance upon Wester v. Casein Co. of America, 206 N. Y. 506, is misplaced, for that decision was placed upon the fact that the plaintiff there, in order to put an end to a controversy which had arisen by their own telegram, sought a reply, and made the chosen means of communication their agent to receive it." Wagner, J., in Glynn v. Hyde-Murphy Co., 184 N. Y. Supp. 462, 463 (1920). But, as Professor Williston has pointed out, Wester v. Casein Co., supra, still remains a decision that an anticipatory breach is a breach before its acceptance as such by the other party. 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1332, p. 2385. Although he does not agree, such a view would seem to present fewer difficulties of theory than does the view of Zuck v. McClure, ante, p. 968.

and two other persons as sureties, conditioned to pay on the first day of May then next the balance of what should be due to the defendant, according to the terms of the agreement of 25th December, 1837; and that the sureties were severally worth $7,000, over and above all debts owing by them. He also averred that the defendant did not and would not execute the conveyance on the said fifth day of April, according to the terms of the agreement; and on the contrary thereof, that he had no title whatever to the premises, and wholly neglected and refused to execute any conveyance whatever to the plaintiff conveying and assuring to him the fee simple, etc.

The defendant interposed several pleas in bar. * * * In the eighth plea, the defendant alleged in bar of recovery, that "before 5th April, 1838, to-wit, on the fourth day of said April, said plaintiff wholly refused to accept any deed of conveyance of said premises on the said fifth day of April, under and in pursuance of said articles of agreement, and to perform and keep the covenants and agreements in said articles of agreement on his part to be kept and performed, at the times in the manner prescribed in said articles of agreement," without this, etc. (traversing the refusal to execute the conveyance).

The plaintiff * * * demurred separately to the pleas. * * *

COWEN, J.¹⁵⁶ * * * The eighth plea supposes that a refusal by the plaintiff on the fourth, discharged the defendant from all obligation to convey on the fifth of April. * * *

2. As to the refusal of the plaintiff on the 4th, to receive a conveyance on the day appointed by the contract, or, as we will read it for the present, notice to the defendant that it would [not] be received, I agree that this might have operated as an excuse for the defendant not being ready, and perhaps would have wholly discharged him, had the matter stopped here. Jones v. Barkley, 2 Doug. 684, 694, per Ld. Mansfield, Ch. J., and Buller, J. But the refusal on the 4th was not conclusive on the plaintiff. He had a right to change his mind, as he avers that he did, which is not denied by the plea, and still present himself and offer to perform on the fifth. This was equivalent to a revocation of what he had before said, which could not operate as more than a mere license or excuse to the defendant for not being ready. The refusal did not discharge the covenant; but we would not allow the plaintiff thus to play a trick on the defendant. Franchot v. Leach, 5 Cowen. 506, 508. He does not, however, say he had been thrown off his guard, and that he merely wanted time, therefore. He admits, by not denying, what the plaintiff avers in his declaration, that when he did come, and tender a performance, the defendant met him with a general refusal; and would not even receive the securities. Non constat that he had parted with the title, or taken any other steps in consequence of the notice of the day before, so as to be prejudiced by it. If he had, then the plaintiff ought to be estopped from insisting on performance. But he recanted his refusal within the time fixed by the covenant, and the defendant still continued, for aught we hear, on the 5th and up to the time of the recantation, in all respects as able to perform as he would have been had the plaintiff said nothing. * * *

The pleas demurred to are, we think, all bad; and the judgment must be for the plaintiff, with leave, etc.

THOMAS J. DANIELS v. SAMUEL F. J. NEWTON ET AL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1874. 114 Mass. 530,
19 Am. Rep. 384.)

WELLS, J.¹⁸⁷ This action is for breach of an agreement in writing, under seal, for the purchase of certain land from the plaintiff by the defendants. The time for performance is indicated by two clauses,—one that “said premises are to be conveyed within thirty days from this date;” the other that “in case the said parties of the second part should fail to sell their estate at the expiration of the thirty days, then we agree to extend this agreement for thirty days.” The inference from the latter clause is that the defendants were to have the whole thirty days for performance on their part, and, in the contingency mentioned, thirty days more. Such was the effect given to the terms of the written instrument, by the ruling at the trial, and we think correctly.

The plaintiff relied upon a supposed breach of the agreement by the defendants within the thirty days; to-wit, May 29,—the writing being dated May 15,—and thereupon had brought his action May 30. The ruling of the court upon this point was that if the defendants “fixed a day, within said thirty days, for the performance of said agreement by the respective parties, and the plaintiff was then ready to perform his part, and the defendants then refused absolutely to perform said agreement on their part, then or at any other time, that would be a breach of the agreement on their part for which the plaintiff can maintain this action.” * * *

The action having been brought immediately upon the refusal, and within the time allowed for performance by the terms of the written contract sued upon, the effect of the ruling was that an absolute refusal of performance, purporting and intended to be a refusal to fulfil the contract at any time, would be of itself a breach of a contract for acts to be done within a time not yet expired, so that an action would lie forthwith. The proposition involved in this ruling, to-wit, that there may be a breach of contract, giving a present right of action, before the performance is due by its terms, seems to have been adopted by recent English decisions. Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Ex. 111 (1872); Hochster v. De la Tour, 2 E. & B. 678 (1853).

It is said to be applicable, not only in cases where performance has been rendered impossible by the voluntary conduct of the party, as in agreements for marriage or conveyance of land by marriage or conveyance to another, and by way of exception to the general rule formerly maintained, but to the full extent of a general rule; so that an absolute and unqualified declaration of a purpose not to fulfil or be held by the contract, made by one party to the other, may be treated as of itself a present breach of the contract by repudiation, as well before as after the time stipulated for its fulfilment by such party. The point was elaborately discussed in Frost v. Knight by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn; and the principle evolved is expressed in these propositions on page 114:

"The promisee has an inchoate right to the performance of the bargain, which becomes complete when the time for performance has arrived. In the mean time he has a right to have the contract kept open as a substituting and effective contract. Its unimpaired and unimpeached efficacy may be essential to his interests. His rights acquired under it may be dealt with by him in various ways for his benefit and advantage."

"The contract having been thus broken by the promisor and treated as broken by the promisee, performance at the appointed time becomes excluded, and the breach by reason of the future non-performance becomes virtually involved in the action as one of the consequences of the repudiation of the contract; and the eventual non-performance may therefore, by anticipation, be treated as a cause of action, and damages be assessed and recovered in respect of it, though the time for performance may yet be remote."

The first of these two propositions would apply with peculiar force to commercial paper, especially if its repudiation by the maker were made public. We see no reason for a distinction which should exclude it from the same rule that applies to other promises in writing, in respect to what will constitute a breach of the principal contract between the maker and payee. We are not aware, however, that any decision has carried out the rule by applying it to such contracts; and we doubt if the learned jurists who propounded it would have been willing to follow it to that extent.

The doctrine has never been adopted in this commonwealth, nor has it received any recognition, so far as we are able to learn, beyond that in Heard v. Bowers, 23 Pick. 455, 460. The court in that case refer to Ford v. Tiley, 6 B. & C. 325, 327, and 5 Vin. Ab. 224; the doctrine announced in Ford v. Tiley being, as it appears to us, an erroneous application of the maxims contained in Viner.

A renunciation of the agreement by declarations or inconsistent conduct, before the time of performance, may give cause for treating it as rescinded, and excuse the other party from making ready for performance on his part, or relieve him from the necessity of offering performance in order to enforce his rights. It may destroy all capacity of the party, so disavowing its obligations, to assert rights under it afterwards, if the other party has acted upon such disavowal. But we are unable to see how it can of itself constitute a present violation of any legal rights of the other party, or confer upon him a present right of action. An executory contract ordinarily confers no title or interest in the subject-matter of the agreement. Until the time arrives when, by the terms of the agreement, he is or might be entitled to its performance, he can suffer no injury or deprivation which can form a ground of damages. There is neither violation of right nor loss upon which to found an action. The true rule seems to us to be that in order to charge one in damages for breach of an executory personal contract, the other party must show a refusal or neglect to perform, at a time when and under conditions such that he is or might be entitled to require performance. Frazier v. Cushman, 12 Mass. 277; Pomroy v. Gold, 2 Met. 500; Hapgood v. Shaw, 105 Mass. 276; Carpenter v. Holcomb, 105 Mass. 280. Such undoubtedly was the interpretation of the common law in all the earlier decisions. Phillpotts v. Evans, 5 M. & W. 475; Ripley v. M'Clure, 4 Exch. 345; Lovelock v. Franklyn, 8 Q. B. 371. * * *

We have examined with care the opinions of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in Frost v. Knight, and of Lord Campbell in Hochster v. De la Tour, and we are not convinced that the conclusions at which they arrive are founded in sound principles of jurisprudence, or sustained by the authorities cited in their support. * * *

Throughout the whole discussion both in Hochster v. De la Tour and Frost v. Knight, the question as to what conduct of the defendant will relieve the plaintiff from the necessity of showing readiness and an offer to perform at the day, in order to make out a breach by the other, appears to us to be confounded with that of the plaintiff's cause of action; or rather, the question, in what consists the plaintiff's cause of action, is lost sight of,—the court dealing only with the conduct of the defendant in repudiating the obligations of his contract.

Much argument is expended in both cases upon the ground of convenience and mutual advantage to the parties from the rule sought to be established. But before that argument can properly have weight, the point to be reached must first be shown to be consistent with logical deductions from the strictly legal aspects of the case. The legal remedy must be founded on some present legal right, and must conform to the nature of that right. Until the plaintiff has either suffered loss or wrong in respect of that which has already vested in him in right, or has been deprived of, or prevented from, acquiring that which he is entitled to have or demand, he has no ground on which to seek a remedy by way of reparation. The conduct of the defendant is no wrong to the plaintiff until it actually invades some right of his. Actual injury and not anticipated injury is the ground of legal recovery. The plaintiff's rights are invaded by repudiation of the contract only when it produces the effect of non-performance, or prevents him from entering upon or completing performance on his part, at a time when and in the manner in which he is entitled to perform it or to have it performed.

That this is the natural and ordinary rule seems to be recognized by Lord Campbell, when he declares that "it cannot be laid down as a universal rule," and proceeds to point out exceptions. And Lord Chief Justice Cockburn concedes it to be true "that there can be no actual breach of a contract by reason of non-performance, so long as the time for performance has not yet arrived." L. R. 7 Ex. 114. But preceding "inchoate right" is discovered, and a corresponding obligation implied, upon which there may be held to be "a breach of the contract when the promisor repudiates it and declares he will no longer be bound by it."

In Hochster v. De la Tour, Lord Campbell assigns, as one reason for the decision, that in case of employment as courier, and of promise to marry, a relation is established between the parties by the contract, even before the time of performance; "they impliedly promise that in the mean time neither will do anything to the prejudice of the other inconsistent with that relation;" and "it seems to be a breach of an implied contract if either of them renounces the engagement." In Frost v. Knight, the Lord Chief Justice remarks of the promise to marry: "On such a contract being entered into, not only does a right to its completion arise with reference to domestic relations and possibly pecuniary advantages, as also to the social status accruing on marriage, but a new status, that of betrothment, at once arises between the parties." "Each becomes bound to the other; neither can, consistently with such a relation, enter into a similar engagement with another person; each has an implied right to have this relation continued till the contract is finally accomplished by marriage."

These, however, are considerations which touch the interpretation and effect of the particular kind of contract; and so far as they tend to sustain the decisions upon the ground of implied obligations arising and requiring observance at once upon entering into the relation by means of such a contract, they also tend to remove the decisions themselves out of the range of the question we are now discussing. If there be sound reason to deduce from a promise to marry, or to employ in a special capacity, at a future time, present obligations of implied contract, upon which an action may be founded, in which the breach of the entire agreement "by reason of the future non-performance" will be "virtually involved," "as one of the consequences of the repudiation of the contract," it surely is not sound reasoning by means of that process to arrive at the conclusion that all contracts, having a future day for their performance, include like rights and obligations, so as to enable one party to sue at once, as for a breach, whenever the other announces beforehand his purpose of future non-fulfilment. If this is the result, as it appears to be, of the English decisions referred to, or of the reasoning in those cases, we cannot accede to it. We have no occasion now to determine what may be the rule where the contract may fairly be interpreted as establishing between the parties a present relation of mutual obligations, because we are of opinion that no such implied obligations can be engrafted upon the contract in the present case. It simply binds the defendants to receive a deed of real estate and pay or secure the purchase money; and its written provisions, by which alone their obligations are to be ascertained, allow them thirty days at least, within which to fulfil their agreement. The plaintiff could require nothing of them until the expiration of that time; and no conduct on their part or declaration, whether of promise or denial, could give him any cause of action in respect of that agreement of sale. This action therefore cannot be maintained.

ISAAC PARKER v. ELECTA P. RUSSELL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1882. 133 Mass. 74.)

Contract. At the trial the evidence tended to show that, in March, 1873, the defendant, for a good consideration [a conveyance of land], agreed to support the plaintiff during his life; that she did support him in her house from that time till about October 1, 1878, when her house was destroyed by fire; and that since the fire the defendant had furnished no aid or support to the plaintiff.

The defendant requested the judge to rule that damages could only ¹⁵⁶ North Dakota at first supported this case, which has very small following, in Stanford v. McGill, 6 N. Dak. 536 (1897), but later accepted the anticipatory breach doctrine to the extent that "defendant had the right to tender a breach of the contract by notice that he would never perform, which repudiation plaintiff might have elected to accept as a present and immediate breach." Hart-Parr Co. v. Finley, 31 N. Dak. 130 (1915).

In Miller v. Jones, 68 W. Va. 526 (1911) it is held that a vendee could sue for specific performance immediately on notice of repudiation, as he had a right "to compel defendant to maintain the contractual relation until the time for executing the deed should arrive" (p. 527), but that the court could not compel defendant to receive the purchase money or give the deed until the time fixed in the contract, as it could not make a contract for the parties. See Long v. Wright (Colo.) 197 Pac. 1016 (1921).

On the remedies of a party to a contract upon the anticipatory breach thereof or prevention of performance, see 1 Ann. Cas. 427, note; 12 Ann. Cas. 1108, note; Ann. Cas. 1913 C, 384, note; Ann. Cas. 1917 E, 712, note; 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 408, note.

be recovered in this action for failure to furnish support to the plaintiff prior to the date of the writ; and that damages for such failure since the date of the writ must be sought in another action. The judge declined to so rule, and instructed the jury that if the defendant, for a period of about two years, neglected to furnish aid or support to the plaintiff, without any fault of the plaintiff, the plaintiff might treat the contract as at an end, and recover damages for the breach of the contract as a whole; and that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover compensation for the past failure of the defendant to furnish him aid and support and full indemnity for his future support.

The defendant also requested the judge to rule that the plaintiff, under his declaration, could not recover damages for any period subsequent to the date of the writ; but the judge declined so to rule.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $972.25; and found specially that the support of the plaintiff, under the terms of the contract, from the date of the fire to the date of the writ, was of the value of $377.40, and that the same from the date of the fire to the date of the trial was of the value of $473.60. In case the plaintiff should not be entitled to damages under the rule laid down by the judge, judgment was to be entered for the one sum or the other, as this court should determine the rule of damages to be. The defendant alleged exceptions.

FIELD, J.¹⁵⁹ In an action for a breach of a contract to support the plaintiff during his life, if the contract is regarded as still subsisting, the damages are assessed up to the date of the writ, and not up to the time when the verdict is rendered. Fay v. Guynon, 131 Mass. 31.

But if the breach has been such that the plaintiff has the right to treat the contract as absolutely and finally broken by the defendant, and he elects so to treat it, the damages are assessed as of a total breach of an entire contract. Amos v. Oakley, 131 Mass. 413; Schell v. Plumb, 55 N. Y. 592; Remelee v. Hall, 31 Vt. 582; Fales v. Hemenway, 64 Maine, 373; Sutherland v. Wyer, 67 Maine, 64; Lamoreaux v. Rolfe, 36 N. H. 33; Mullaly v. Austin, 97 Mass. 30; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362.

Such damages are not special or prospective damages, but are the damages naturally resulting from a total breach of the contract, and are suffered when the contract is broken, and are assessed as of that time. From the nature of the contract they include damages for not performing the contract in the future as well as in the past. The value of the contract to the plaintiff at the time it is broken may be somewhat indefinite because the duration of the life of the plaintiff is uncertain, but uncertainty in the duration of a life has not, since the adoption of life tables, been regarded as a reason why full relief in damages should not be afforded for a failure to perform a contract which by its terms was to continue during life.

When the defendant, for example, absolutely refuses to perform such a contract after the time for entering upon the performance has begun, it would be a great hardship to compel the plaintiff to be ready at all times during his life to be supported by the defendant, if the defendant should at any time change his mind; and to hold that he must resort to successive actions from time to time to obtain his damages piecemeal, or else leave them to be recovered as an entirety by his personal representatives after his death.

Daniels v. Newton, 114 Mass. 530, decides that an absolute refusal to perform a contract before the performance is due by the terms of the contract is not a present breach of the contract for which any action can be maintained; but it does not decide that an absolute refusal to perform a contract after the time and under the conditions in which the plaintiff is entitled to require performance, is not a breach of the contract, even although the contract is by its terms to continue in the future.

The cases cited by the defendant are not inconsistent with these views. In Pierce v. Woodward, 6 Pick. 206, the declaration was for a breach of a negative promise, namely, "not to set up the business of a grocer" within certain limits; and it was held that the damages could be assessed only to the date of the writ. The defendant might at any time, without the consent of the plaintiff, stop carrying on the business, when the plaintiff's damages would necessarily cease. * * *

In this case, the declaration alleges in effect a promise to support the plaintiff during his life, from and after receiving the conveyance of certain real estate, an acceptance of such conveyance, and a neglect and refusal to perform the agreement. These are sufficient allegations to enable the plaintiff to recover damages as for a total breach. The court instructed the jury that, "if the defendant for a period of about two years neglected to furnish aid or support to the plaintiff, without any fault of the plaintiff, the plaintiff might treat the contract as at an end, and recover damages for the breach of the contract as a whole." We cannot say that this instruction was erroneous as applied to the facts in evidence in the cause, which are not set out.

The jury must have found that the plaintiff did treat the contract as finally broken by the defendant, and the propriety of this finding on the evidence is not before us.

Judgment on the verdict for the larger sum.

GA NUN v. PALMER.

Action by Mary F. Ga Nun, on behalf of herself and all other creditors of Jane M. Sands, deceased, against Mary E. Palmer, individually and as executrix of Jane M. Sands, deceased. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (139 App. Div. 910, 123 N. Y. Supp. 1117) affirming a judgment dismissing the complaint on the merits, plaintiff by permission appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

See, also, 141 App. Div. 918, 125 N. Y. Supp. 1121.

HAIGHT, J.¹⁰⁰ This action was brought to recover the sum of $20,000, alleged to be due and owing the plaintiff from the defendant's testatrix, and also to set aside certain transfers of property by the testatrix in her lifetime, alleged to have been made in fraud of the rights of creditors. The answer admits the making of a will by the defendant's testatrix and its admission to probate, and denies the other allegations of the complaint, and then alleges that if any cause of action existed it is barred by the statute of limitations.

The contract upon which the plaintiff seeks to recover is as follows: "November 23, 1899—I, Mary F. Ga Nun, do promise to care for Jane M. Sands in sickness and health as long as she lives. I, Jane M. Sands, do promise to pay Mary F. Ga Nun $70.00 a month for the support of the house and her clothes as long as I live, and at my death she is to have $20,000 that she will find in the safe deposit in New York, and she is to take my keys and distribute the packages in box as they are marked, and all my clothing and wearing apparel and silver. In short, everything in the house shall be Mary F. Ga Nun's. [Signed] Jane M. Sands. Louis W. Jansen, A. S. Leonard, M.D., W. G. Bouvier, Witnesses."

The trial court found as facts that, in pursuance of such contract, the plaintiff undertook the care and maintenance of Miss Sands, and continued the same until May, 1900, when Miss Sands left her, and removed from the plaintiff's home in Brooklyn to the defendant's residence in Poughkeepsie, with whom she some time afterwards entered into a similar oral contract with defendant, but for less compensation; that she continued to reside with the defendant until she died on August 17, 1906, leaving a will in which she made the defendant her sole legatee and devisee, and appointed her sole executrix; which will was duly admitted to probate by the surrogate of Westchester county, who issued letters testamentary to the defendant, who thereupon duly qualified, and since has acted as such executrix. The court also found that there was a breach of the contract by decedent in the early part of May, 1900, at which time she left the house of the plaintiff with the intention of never returning to reside with the plaintiff, and with the intention of never permitting the plaintiff to care for her, all of which was well known to the plaintiff at the time decedent left her house and went to live with the defendant at Poughkeepsie; that the plaintiff then employed a lawyer to enforce her claim against the decedent, and he presented bills for the $70 per month up to May 1, 1900, and wrote to the decedent, demanding payment, and threatening action if payment was not made.

This action was brought on the 31st day of May, 1907, after the death of Miss Sands, and the court found as conclusions of law that, more than six years having elapsed after the breach of the contract, the plaintiff's right to action was barred by the statute of limitations.

None of the other issues raised by the pleadings have been tried out or determined, and consequently the only question brought up for review is that upon which the trial court has based its judgment.

The clause of the contract in which Miss Sands agreed to pay the plaintiff $70 a month for the support of the house and her clothes, for which the plaintiff presented a bill up to the 1st of May, 1900, presents no question in dispute. There can be no doubt but that such payments were due and payable monthly, and that the amount thereof, at the time the bill was presented, then being due and payable, the statute commenced to run, and, six years having elapsed before her death, the plaintiff's claim, therefore, became barred by the statute. We do not understand, however, that the plaintiff in this action claims to recover for the monthly allowance specified, but bases her right of action upon the further promise of Miss Sands that at her death the plaintiff is to have the $20,000, which she would find in the safe deposit box.

The trial court, as we have seen, was of the opinion that there was a breach of the contract in its entirety at the time the decedent left the plaintiff's house, and that the statute also ran as to claim for $20,000. In reaching this result, the learned justice in his opinion refers to the case of Henry v. Rowell, 31 Misc. Rep. 384, 64 N. Y. Supp. 488, affirmed on the opinion below, 63 App. Div. 620, 71 N. Y. Supp. 1137, as an authority upon this subject, which he was bound to follow. That was an action on quantum meruit to recover for the value of 12 years board and lodging furnished by the plaintiff to the decedent in her lifetime, under an agreement to board and lodge her in his household as long as she should live; she agreeing to leave him by will all of the property she should own at the time of her death. After receiving board and lodging from the plaintiff for 12 years, the decedent left his abode and went elsewhere, and lived for 14 years thereafter, and then died, leaving a will in which she disposed of her property to other persons. Subsequently that action was brought. In that case it was held that there was a breach of the contract at the time that the decedent left the plaintiff's residence, and that the statute of limitations commenced to run at that time; that there was but one cause of action available to the plaintiff, and that was for the value of the board and lodging furnished by him up to that time. In that case there was no agreement to pay a definite sum for board and lodging per month or by the year; the only agreement to pay therefor being the promise of the decedent to make a will giving the plaintiff all of her property. It is therefore apparent that but one cause of action existed in that case. But whether the court correctly held that the action could not be maintained after the testatrix's death by reason of the running of the statute, we now express no opinion.

The case we have now under review differs from the above case, for under the agreement the decedent promised to pay the plaintiff $70 a month for the support of the house, etc., that being a definite, fixed amount, payable monthly, for which an action could have been maintained therefor at the end of each month. With reference to the other provision of the agreement, instead of the decedent promising to make a will giving the plaintiff all of her property, she agreed at her death that the plaintiff is to have the $20,000 in her safe deposit box, and, instead of this action being brought for the value of services rendered on quantum meruit, it is brought upon the contract; the plaintiff claiming the stipulated sum expressed therein. It may be that one cause of action exists in favor of the plaintiff for the breach of the $20,000 clause of the contract, and that such an action could have been maintained at the time the decedent left the plaintiff's house and went to reside elsewhere. But, in view of the fact that the plaintiff might meet with misfortune, disabling her from carrying out her part of the contract to care for the decedent "in sickness and in health as long as she lives," thus rendering the determination of the amount of her damages uncertain and difficult to prove, she saw fit to wait until the amount specified in the contract became due by the terms thereof. Did she have the right to do this? In answering this question, we shall assume, for the purposes of this review only, that the breach of the testatrix's contract was of such a character as to amount to a notice to the plaintiff that she would not carry out the provision with reference to the giving her $20,000 at the testatrix's decease, and that an action for damages could have been maintained immediately after such breach. The question thus arises as to whether the plaintiff was bound to treat the contract as broken and bring her action, or might she, at her option, treat the contract as still in force, and wait until the sum specified became due under its terms?

In this case, as we have seen, the breach occurred after partial performance. This fact was deemed of importance in the case of Henry v. Rowell, supra, but we fail to see how it affects the right of the plaintiff to exercise her option. It is quite true that there is a distinction made in the authorities with reference to contracts which still are wholly executory, and are to be performed in the future; but the distinction pertains to that which would constitute a breach of such contracts. Where the contract is wholly executory, there must be some express and absolute refusal to perform, or some voluntary act on the part of the individual which renders it impossible for him to perform, in order to constitute an anticipatory breach for which an action will lie; whereas, by a partially executed contract, the breach may result from a failure to perform some of the provisions of the contract. But in either case, after a breach by one party, the rights of the other party and his remedies are the same as to the unexecuted provisions of the contract. Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285. * * * [The opinion here quoted from Hochster v. De La Tour, Frost v. Knight and Roehm v. Horst.]

In the case of Heery v. Reed, 80 Kan. 380, 102 Pac. 846, it was held that the fact that there was a renunciation of the contract by the decedent before his death did not compel plaintiff to end the contract relation. She was at liberty to keep the contract alive, and await the time for final performance specified in the contract.

In the case of Foss-Schneider Brewing Co. v. Bullock, 59 Fed. 83, 8 C. C. A. 14, Taft, J., said: "It is true that, where a contracting party gives notice of his intention not to comply with the obligation of his contract, the other contracting party may accept this as an anticipatory breach of the contract, and sue for damages without waiting until the time mentioned for the completion and fulfilment of the contract by its terms; but, in order to enable the latter to sue on such an anticipatory breach, he must accept it as such, and consider the contract at an end."

In the case of Pakas v. Hollingshead, 184 N. Y. 211, 77 N. E. 40, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1042, 112 Am. St. Rep. 601, it was held that, where the vendor of goods to be delivered and paid for in instalments refuses to deliver an instalment, a breach of the entire contract is thereby established, for which the vendee, if he so elects, may immediately recover all his damages; or he may wait until the expiration of the time for the delivery of all the goods, and then recover. While Cullen, C. J., filed a dissenting opinion in this case, he did not dissent as to so much of the decision as is stated above; but, on the contrary, expressly stated that the aggrieved party had the option to treat the contract as still continuing in force, notwithstanding the breach thereof by the other party.

A further citation of authority hardly seems necessary, for the general rule is that a right of action does not accrue upon a contract until it is executed, or payment thereunder becomes due by its terms, and the statute of limitations does not commence to run until that event happens. The right to bring an action previous to that event is exceptional, and is only permitted in cases of a breach of a contract by one of the parties which permits the aggrieved party at his option, to maintain an action for such breach, and recover the damages he has suffered on account thereof. In reaching this conclusion, we have assumed, as above stated, that the breach was of such a character as to permit the bringing of an action for damages. We do not, however, wish to be understood as deciding that question, for the rule that renunciation of a continuous executory contract by one party before the day of performance, giving the other the right to sue at once for damages, is usually applied only to contracts of a special character; and the question whether it applies to such a contract as we have under review we leave undetermined. Kelly v. Security Mutual Life Ins. Co., 186 N. Y. 16, 78 N. E. 584; Adenaw v. Piffard, 202 N. Y. 122-129, 95 N. E. 555; 25 Cyc. 1074.

We do not deem it our duty to undertake a construction of the contract at this time, and determine whether it contains an absolute promise to pay a specified sum upon the death of the testatrix, or whether it be in the nature of a specific legacy, as defined in the case of Crawford v. McCarthy, 159 N. Y. 514-519, 54 N. E. 277, or the intention of the parties with reference thereto. * * *

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

ROEHM v. HORST ET AL.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1900. 178 U. S. 1, 20 Sup. Ct. 780, 44 L. Ed. 953.)

Action for breach of four certain contracts. Judgment for plaintiffs in United States Circuit Court, affirmed by Circuit Court of Appeals. The case was taken on certiorari to the Supreme Court. Affirmed.

FULLER, C. J.¹⁶² It is conceded that the contracts set out in the finding of facts were four of ten simultaneous contracts for 100 bales each, covering the furnishing of 1,000 bales of hops during a period of five years, of which 600 bales had been delivered and paid for. If the transaction could be treated as amounting to a single contract for 1,000 bales, the breach alleged would have occurred while the contract was in the course of performance; but plaintiff's declaration or statement of demand averred the execution of the four contracts, "two for the purchase and sale of Pacific coast hops of the crop of 1896, and two for the purchase and sale of Pacific coast hops of the crop of 1897," set them out in extenso, and claimed recovery for breach thereof, and in this view of the case, while as to the first of the four contracts the time to commence performance had arrived, and the October shipment had been tendered and refused, the breach as to the other three contracts was the refusal to perform before the time for performance had arrived.

The first contract falls within the rule that a contract may be broken by the renunciation of liability under it in the course of performance and suit may be immediately instituted. But the other three contracts involve the question whether, where the contract is renounced before performance is due, and the renunciation goes to the whole contract, and is absolute and unequivocal, the injured party may treat the breach as complete and bring his action at once. Defendant repudiated all liability for hops of the crop of 1896 and of the crop of 1897, and notified plaintiffs that he should make (according to a letter of his attorney in the record that he had made) arrangements to purchase his stock of other parties, whereupon plaintiffs brought suit. The question is therefore presented, in respect of the three contracts, whether plaintiffs were entitled to sue at once or were obliged to wait until the time came for the first month's delivery under each of them.

It is not disputed that if one party to a contract has destroyed the subject-matter, or disabled himself so as to make performance impossible, his conduct is equivalent to a breach of the contract, although the time for performance has not arrived; and also that if a contract provides for a series of acts, and actual default is made in the performance of one of them, accompanied by a refusal to perform the rest, the other party need not perform, but may treat the refusal as a breach of the entire contract, and recover accordingly.

And the doctrine that there may be an anticipatory breach of an executory contract by an absolute refusal to perform it has become the settled law of England as applied to contracts for services, for marriage, and for the manufacture or sale of goods. The cases are extensively commented on in the notes to Cutter v. Powell, 2 Smith Lead. Cas. 1212, 1220, 9th edition, by Richard Henn Collins and Arbuthnot. Some of these, though quite familiar, may well be referred to. * * * [The opinion then considers Hochster v. De la Tour; Frost v. Knight, and other English cases and various Federal Court cases, and after citing "the great weight of authority in the state courts" as in favor of the doctrine, continues:]

The rule is disapproved in Daniels v. Newton, 114 Mass. 530, and in Stanford v. McGill, 6 N. Dak. 536, 38 L. R. A. 760, 72 N. W. 938, on elaborate consideration. The opinion of Judge Wells in Daniels v. Newton is generally regarded as containing all that could be said in opposition to the decision of Hochster v. De la Tour, and one of the propositions on which the opinion rests is that the adoption of the rule in the instance of ordinary contracts would necessitate its adoption in the case of commercial paper. But we are unable to assent to that view. In the case of an ordinary money contract, such as a promissory note, or a bond, the consideration has passed; there are no mutual obligations; and cases of that sort do not fall within the reason of the rule. * * *

We think it obvious that both as to renunciation after commencement of performance and renunciation before the time for performance has arrived, money contracts, pure and simple, stand on a different footing from executory contracts for the purchase and sale of goods.

The other proposition on which the case of Daniels v. Newton was rested is that until the time for performance arrives neither contracting party can suffer any injury which can form a ground of damages. Wells, J., said: "An executory contract ordinarily confers no title or interest in the subject-matter of the agreement. Until the time arrives when by the terms of the agreement he is or might be entitled to its performance, he can suffer no injury or deprivation which can form a ground of damages. There is neither violation or right, nor loss upon which to found an action."

But there are many cases in which, before the time fixed for performance, one of the contracting parties may do that which amounts to a breach and furnishes a ground of damages. It has always been the law that where a party deliberately incapacitates himself or renders performance of his contract impossible, his act amounts to an injury to the other party, which gives the other party a cause of action for breach of contract; yet this would seem to be inconsistent with the reasoning in Daniels v. Newton, though it is not there in terms decided "that an absolute refusal to perform a contract, after the time and under the conditions in which plaintiff is entitled to require performance, is not a breach of the contract, even although the contract is by its terms to continue in the future." Parker v. Russell, 133 Mass. 74.

In truth, the opinion goes upon a distinction between cases of renunciation before the arrival of the time of performance and those of renunciation of unmaturing obligations of a contract while it is in course of performance, and it is said that before the argument on the ground of convenience and mutual advantage to the parties can properly have weight, "the point to be reached must first be shown to be consistent with logical deductions from the strictly legal aspects of the case."

We think that there can be no controlling distinction on this point between the two classes of cases, and that it is proper to consider the reasonableness of the conclusion that the absolute renunciation of particular contracts constitutes such a breach as to justify immediate action and recovery therefor. The parties to a contract which is wholly executory have a right to the maintenance of the contractual relations up to the time for performance, as well as to a performance of the contract when due. If it appear that the party who makes an absolute refusal intends thereby to put an end to the contract so far as performance is concerned, and that the other party must accept this position, why should there not be speedy action and settlement in regard to the rights of the parties? Why should a locus pœnitentiæ be awarded to the party whose wrongful action has placed the other at such disadvantage? What reasonable distinction per se is there between liability for a refusal to perform future acts to be done under a contract in course of performance and liability for a refusal to perform the whole contract made before the time for commencement of performance?

As Lord Chief Justice Cockburn observed in Frost v. Knight, the promisee has the right to insist on the contract as subsisting and effective before the arrival of the time for its performance, and its unimpaired and unimpeached efficacy may be essential to his interests, dealing as he may with rights acquired under it in various ways for his benefit and advantage. And of all such advantage, the repudiation of the contract by the other party, and the announcement that it never will be fulfilled, must, of course, deprive him; while, by acting on such repudiation and the taking of timely measures, the promisee may in many cases avert, or, at all events, materially lessen, the injurious effects which would otherwise flow from the non-fulfilment of the contract.

During the argument of Cort v. Amersgate, N. & B. & E. Junction R. Co., 17 Q. B. 127, Erle, J., made this suggestion: "Suppose the contract was that plaintiff should send a ship to a certain port for cargo, and defendant should there load one on board; but defendant wrote word that he could not furnish a cargo; must the ship be sent to return empty?" And if it was not necessary for the ship owner to send his ship, it is not perceived why he should be compelled to wait until the time fixed for the loading of the ship at the remote port before bringing suit upon the contract.

If in this case these ten hop contracts had been written into one contract for the supply of hops for five years in instalments, then when the default happened in October, 1896, it cannot be denied that an immediate action could have been brought in which damages could have been recovered in advance for the breach of the agreement to deliver during the two remaining years. But treating the four outstanding contracts as separate contracts, why is it not equally reasonable that an unqualified and positive refusal to perform them constitutes such a breach that damages could be recovered in an immediate action? Why should plaintiff be compelled to bring four suits instead of one? For the reasons above stated, and having reference to the state of the authorities on the subject, our conclusion is that the rule laid down in Hochster v. De la Tour is a reasonable and proper rule to be applied in this case and in many others arising out of the transactions of commerce of the present day.

As to the question of damages; if the action is not premature, the rule is applicable that plaintiff is entitled to compensation based, as far as possible, on the ascertainment of what he would have suffered by the continued breach of the other party down to the time of complete performance, less any abatement by reason of circumstances of which he ought reasonably to have availed himself. If a vendor is to manufacture goods, and during the process of manufacture the contract is repudiated, he is not bound to complete the manufacture, and estimate his damages by the difference between the market price and the contract price, but the measure of damage is the difference between the contract price and the cost of performance. Hinckley v. Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co., 121 U. S. 264. Even if in such cases the manufacturer actually obtains his profits before the time fixed for performance, and recovers on a basis of cost which might have been increased or diminished by subsequent events, the party who broke the contract before the time for complete performance cannot complain, for he took the risk involved in such anticipation. If the vendor has to buy instead of to manufacture, the same principle prevails, and he may show what was the value of the contract by showing for what price he could have made sub-contracts, just as the cost of manufacture in the case of a manufacturer may be shown. Although he may receive his money earlier in this way, and may gain, or lose, by the estimation of his damage in advance of the time for performance, still, as we have seen, he has the right to accept the situation tendered him, and the other party cannot complain.

In this case plaintiffs showed at what prices they could have made sub-contracts for forward deliveries according to the contracts in suit, and the difference between the prices fixed by the contracts sued on and those was correctly allowed.

¹⁶³ "The rule that renunciation of a continuous executory contract by one party before the day of performance gives the other party the right to sue at once for damages, is usually applied only to contracts of a special character, even in the jurisdictions where it obtains at all. It is not generally applied to contracts for the payment of money at a future time and in some states the principle is not recognized in any way whatever. (Daniels v. Newton, 114 Mass. 530; Stanford v. McGill, 6 N. Dak. 536 [reversed in Hart-Parr Co. v. Finley, 131 No. Dak. 130]; Carstens v. McDonald, 38 Neb. 853; King v. Waterman, 55 Neb. 324.) In other states and in the Federal courts the principle is adopted but applied with caution. (Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, 17, 18; Schmitt v. Schnell, 14 Ohio C. C. 153; Brown v. Odell, 104 Tenn. 250; Roebbing's Sons Co. v. Fence Co., 130 Ill. 660; Unexcelled Fire Works Co. v. Polites, 130 Pa. St. 536.) In this state it seems to be limited to contracts to marry (Burtis v. Thompson, 42 N. Y. 246); for personal services (Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362) and for the manufacture or sale of goods (Windmuller v. Pope, 107 N. Y. 674; Nichols v. Scranton Steel Co., 137 N. Y. 471); at least we have not extended it to mutual life insurance policies, perhaps for the reason that the question of fact opened to unscrupulous persons by such extension might undermine the solvency of the company and inflict gross injustice upon the other policy-holders." Vann, J., in Kelly v. Security Mutual Life Ins. Co., 186 N. Y. 16, 19-20 (1906).

In New York it was decided in an early case that the doctrine of anticipatory breach applied to the repudiation of life insurance policies by the company. Fischer v. Hope Mutual Life Ins. Co., 69 N. Y. 161 (1877). This case was not noticed, however, in Langan v. Supreme Council American Legion of Honor,

CENTRAL TRUST COMPANY OF ILLINOIS, TRUSTEE OF FRANK E. SCOTT TRANSFER COMPANY, BANKRUPT, v. CHICAGO AUDITORIUM ASSOCIATION.

Appeal from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit to review a decree which, reversing a decree of the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, allowed, as a provable debt against the bankrupt estate, a part of the damages growing out of the bankrupt's anticipatory breach of an executory contract. Affirmed.

See same case below, 132 C. C. A. 452, 216 Fed. 308.

PITNEY, J.¹⁸⁴ On July 22, 1911, a creditors' petition in bankruptcy was filed against the Frank E. Scott Transfer Company, an Illinois corporation, and it was adjudged a bankrupt on August 7. The act of bankruptcy charged and adjudicated does not appear. When the proceedings were commenced, the bankrupt held contract relations with the Chicago Auditorium Association under a written agreement made between them February 1, 1911, which had been partially performed. By its terms the Association granted to the Transfer Company, for a term of five years from the date of the contract, the baggage and livery privilege of the Auditorium Hotel, in the city of Chicago; that is to say, the sole and exclusive right, so far as it was within the legal capacity of the Association to grant the same, to transfer baggage and carry passengers to and from the hotel and to furnish livery to its guests and patrons. For the baggage privilege the Transfer Company agreed to pay to the Association the sum of $6,000, in monthly instalments of $100 each, and for the livery privilege the sum of $15,000, in monthly instalments of $250 each, and also agreed to furnish to the hotel and its guests and patrons prompt and efficient baggage and livery service at reasonable rates at all times during the continuance of the privileges.

174 N. Y. 266 (1903), which held that the anticipatory breach doctrine does not apply to such contracts and that the insured cannot recover in his lifetime for repudiation by the company. The earlier New York view is held in O'Neill v. Supreme Council American Legion of Honor, 70 N. J. L. 410 (1904). It has been suggested in a note in 24 Harv. L. Rev. 404, that "An immediate action, founded on an actual and not on an anticipatory breach should be given. The peculiar nature of life insurance contracts necessitates co-operation on the part of the insurer; a contract by the company to accept premiums is implied in fact in every case. Hence repudiation and refusal of premiums is a present breach, giving rise to an action for damages for the loss of the whole contract and starting the running of the Statute of Limitations. Williston's, Wald's, Pollock, Contracts, 362-364." Massachusetts, however, refuses to recognize it as a present breach, and not having the anticipatory breach doctrine, denies recovery. Porte v. Supreme Council American Legion of Honor, 183 Mass. 326 (1903).

Coming to the merits: It is no longer open to question in this court that, as a rule, where a party bound by an executory contract repudiates his obligations or disables himself from performing them before the time for performance, the promisee has the option to treat the contract as ended, so far as further performance is concerned, and maintain an action at once for the damages occasioned by such anticipatory breach. The rule has its exceptions, but none that now concerns us. Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, 18, 19. And see O'Neill v. Supreme Council, 70 N. J. L. 410, 412. There is no doubt that the same rule must be applied where a similar repudiation or disablement occurs during performance. Whether the intervention of bankruptcy constitutes such a breach and gives rise to a claim provable in the bankruptcy proceedings is a question not covered by any previous decision of this court, and upon which the other federal courts are in conflict. * * *

The contract with which we have to deal was not a contract of personal service simply, but was of such a nature as evidently to require a considerable amount of capital, in the shape of equipment, etc., for its proper performance by the Transfer Company. The immediate effect of bankruptcy was to strip the company of its assets, and thus disable it from performing. It may be conceded that the contract was assignable, and passed to the trustee under § 70a (30 Stat. at L. 565, chap. 541, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 9654), to the extent that it had an option to perform it in the place of the bankrupt (See Sparhawk v. Yerkes, 142 U. S. 1, 13, 35 L. Ed. 915, 918, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104; Sunflower Oil Co. v. Wilson, 142 U. S. 313, 322, 35 L. Ed. 1025, 1028, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 235); for although there was a stipulation against assignment without consent of the Auditorium Association, it may be assumed that this did not prevent an assignment by operation of law. Still, the trustee in bankruptcy did not elect to assume performance, and so the matter is left as if the law had conferred no such election.

It is argued that there can be no anticipatory breach of a contract except it result from the voluntary act of one of the parties, and that the filing of an involuntary petition in bankruptcy, with adjudication thereon, is but the act of law resulting from an adverse proceeding instituted by creditors. This view was taken, with respect to the effect of a state proceeding restraining a corporation from the further prosecution of its business or the exercise of its corporate franchises, appointing a receiver, and dissolving the corporation, in People v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co., 91 N. Y. 174, cited with approval in some of the federal court decisions above referred to. In that case, it did not appear that the company was the responsible cause of the action of the state, so as to make the dissolution its own act; but, irrespective of this, we cannot accept the reasoning. As was said in Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 19, 44 L. Ed. 960, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 780: "The parties to a contract which is wholly executory have a right to the maintenance of the contractual relations up to the time for performance, as well as to a performance of the contract when due." Commercial credits are, to a large extent, based upon the reasonable expectation that pending contracts of acknowledged validity will be performed in due course; and the same principle that entitles the promisee to continued willingness entitles him to continued ability on the part of the promisor. In short, it must be deemed an implied term of every contract that the promisor will not permit himself, through insolvency or acts of bankruptcy, to be disabled from making performance; and, in this view, bankruptcy proceedings are but the natural and legal consequence of something done or omitted to be done by the bankrupt, in violation of his engagement. It is the purpose of the bankruptcy act, generally speaking, to permit all creditors to share in the distribution of the assets of the bankrupt, and to leave the honest debtor thereafter free from liability upon previous obligations. Williams v. United States Fidelity & G. Co., 236 U. S. 549, 554, 59 L. Ed. 713, 716, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289. Executory agreements play so important a part in the commercial world that it would lead to most unfortunate results if, by interpreting the act in a narrow sense, persons entitled to performance of such agreements on the part of bankrupts were excluded from participation in bankrupt estates, while the bankrupts themselves, as a necessary corollary, were left still subject to action for nonperformance in the future, although without the property or credit often necessary to enable them to perform. We conclude that proceedings, whether voluntary or involuntary, resulting in an adjudication of bankruptcy, are the equivalent of an anticipatory breach of an executory agreement within the doctrine of Roehm v. Horst, supra.

The claim for damages by reason of such a breach is "founded upon a contract, express or implied," within the meaning of § 63a-4, and the damages may be liquidated under § 63b. Frederic L. Grant Shoe Co. v. W. M. Laird Co., 212 U. S. 445, 448, 53 L. Ed. 591, 593, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 332. It is true that in Zavelo v. Reeves, 227 U. S. 625, 631, 57 L. Ed. 676, 678, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 365, Ann. Cas. 1914 D 664, we held that the debts provable under § 63a-4 include only such as existed at the time of the filing of the petition. But we agree with what was said in Ex parte Pollard, 2 Low. Dec. 411, Fed. Cas. No. 11,252, that it would be "an unnecessary and false nicety" to hold that because it was the act of filing the petition that wrought the breach, therefore there was no breach at the time of the petition. As was held by the same learned judge in Re Pettingill, 137 Fed. 143, 147: "The test of provability under the act of 1898 may be stated thus: If the bankrupt, at the time of bankruptcy, by disabling himself from performing the contract in question, and by repudiating its obligation, could give the proving creditor the right to maintain at once a suit in which damages could be assessed at law or in equity, then the creditor can prove in bankruptcy on the ground that bankruptcy is the equivalent of disablement and repudiation. For the assessment of damages proceedings may be directed by the court under § 63b (30 Stat. at L. Ed. 563, chap. 541, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 9647)." It was in effect so ruled by this court in Lesser v. Gray, 236 U. S. 70, 75, 59 L. Ed. 471, 475, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 227, where it was said: "If, as both the bankruptcy and state courts concluded, the contract was terminated by the involuntary bankruptcy proceeding, no legal injury resulted. If, on the other hand, that view of the law was erroneous, then there was a breach and defendant Gray became liable for any resulting damage; but he was released therefrom by his discharge." Of course, he could not be released unless the debt was provable.

We therefore conclude that the Circuit Court of Appeals was correct in holding that the intervention of bankruptcy constituted such a breach of the contract in question as entitled the Auditorium Association to prove its claim. * * *

*Decree [allowing claim] affirmed.*¹⁶⁵

HEISER, v. MEARS ET AL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1897. 120 N. C. 443, 27 S. E. 117.)

Action by Charles Heiser against G. A. Mears & Sons. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. The defendants, retail merchants in Asheville, N. C., on May 21, 1894, contracted with the plaintiff, a wholesale manufacturer of Baltimore, Md., for a lot of shoes, to be soon thereafter manufactured and delivered. On May 26, 1894, the plaintiff received written notice from the defendants not to make the shoes, and that the defendants could not take them. At that time the plaintiff "had cut the leather for the uppers, preparatory to making the shoes, and partly fitted them to the lasts." The plaintiff refused to accept the countermand, finished the shoes, and tendered them to the defendants, who refused to receive and pay for them. The plaintiff now sues for the entire contract price. His honor charged the jury that the measure of the plaintiff's damages was the difference between the contract price and the market value of the goods at the time they were to be delivered. Plaintiff appealed.

In a contract for the sale of specific articles, then in existence and ready for delivery, and the purchaser refuses compliance, the seller has three remedies, at his option: (1) to treat the property as his own, and sue for damages; (2) as the property of the buyer, and sue for the price; (3) as the property of the buyer, and to resell it for him, and sue for the difference between the contract price and that obtained on resale. A contract for specific articles, to be thereafter manufactured and delivered, is executory, and no title to the article passes until finished and delivered, and the buyer has no title to or interest in the material used. The option, in the instance first above stated, is allowed the vendor because he is ready to comply, and the vendee is guilty of a breach of promise. When the contract is executory, and the buyer countermands his order, that is notice to the other party that he elects to rescind his contract and submit to the legal measure of damages, which must result from every breach of contract.

¹⁶⁵ The bankruptcy adjudication is treated as an anticipatory breach whether the proceedings are voluntary or involuntary. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Continental Building & Loan Assoc., 232 Fed. 828 (1916).

On damages for an anticipatory breach of contract as a provable claim in bankruptcy, see L. R. A. 1917 B, 585, note; L. R. A. 1918 A, 545, note.

We think his honor gave the jury proper instruction, except that he should have said "at the time of the breach," instead of "at the time the goods were to be delivered."¹⁶⁶ That error does not hurt the defendants, as they do not appeal. And his honor properly refused the plaintiff's prayer for special instructions. When the plaintiff was notified of the defendants' rescission of the agreement, it seems unreasonable that the plaintiff should continue to manufacture and thus continue to increase his damages. This conclusion assumes that the title to the shoes never passed, as it could not possibly do, before they were finished and put in the condition contemplated by the contractors. Benj. Sales, §§ 1117, 1121, 860, note 9; Hosmer v. Wilson, 7 Mich. 294, 303; Devane v. Fennell, 2 Ired. 36. This was the only question in the case.

In Davis v. Bronson, 2 N. Dak. 300 (1891) the court held that it was the duty of the party notified of repudiation to stop enhancing damages, although the co-obligors of the one giving the notice did not repudiate. But if the co-obligors desire to have performance take place, is not such a decision as in Davis v. Bronson really an unjustifiable recognition of the so-called "right" to break a contract?

In Wigent v. Marrs, 130 Mich. 609 (1902), Hooker, C. J., said: "It is undisputed that defendant unqualifiedly renounced this contract before the monument was completed, and forbade its completion and erection upon her premises. Many authorities hold that she had the right to do this, and thereafter plaintiff's right of recovery would be limited to damages for the breach of the contract involved in the renunciation. * * * This subject is discussed in the case of Hosmer v. Wilson, 7 Mich., at page 305, 74 Am. Dec. 716, where Mr. Justice Christy says:

"And it is certainly very questionable whether the party thus notified has a right to go on after such notice to increase the amount of his own damages.

LEWIS v. SCOVILLE.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1919. 94 Conn. 79, 108 Atl. 501.)

Action by Herbert Cecil Lewis against George C. Scoville.

The defendant, under date of September 2, 1914, signed a written order the material part of which reads as follows:

"Army and Navy Magazine, Washington, D. C.—Gentlemen: Please deliver to any common carrier, addressed to me, one set of the 'Messages and Papers of the Presidents,' * * * bound in full black leather, at $59.50 per set, * * * all in eleven volumes, for which I agree

In Clark v. Marsiglia, 1 Denio (N. Y.) 317, 43 Am. Dec. 670, it was held he had no such right, and that the employer has a right (in a contract for work and labor) to stop the work, if he chose, subjecting himself to the consequences of a breach of his contract; and that the workman, after notice to quit work, has no right to continue his labor, and recover pay for it. This doctrine is fully approved in Derby v. Johnson, 21 Vt. 21. Mr. Justice Christiancy adds that: "This would seem to be good sense, and therefore sound law; and it would seem that any other rule must tend to the injury, and in many cases to the ruin, of all parties." In the case of Danforth v. Walker, 37 Vt. 244, the court said of a similar case: "While a contract is executory, a party has the power to stop the performance on the other side by an explicit direction to that effect by subjecting himself to such damages as will compensate the other party for being stopped in the performance on his part at that point or stage in the execution of the contract. The party thus forbidden cannot afterwards go on and thereby increase the damages, and then recover such increased damages of the other party."

On the right of a party to proceed to execute the contract after his adversary declines to do so on his part, see 33 Am. St. Rep. 791, note; 16 L. R. A. 655, note.

But see those correspondence school cases which permit the school to recover the full contract price against the repudiating pupil. International Text-Book Co. v. Martin, 221 Mass. 1 (1915); International Text-Book Co. v. Martin, 82 Neb. 403 (1908). See La Salle Extension University v. Ogbum, 174 N. Car. 427 (1917). In the Massachusetts case the promises to instruct on the one hand and to pay on the other were treated as independent, but in the Nebraska case it was said that "the contract is entire" and the likelihood of the loss of one pupil diminishing the expense of the school in an appreciable degree was deemed so slight as to put the burden on the pupil to "show some facts that reasonably and definitely tend to mitigate plaintiff's damages." That the promises are dependent, that it must be presumed that it costs the school something to furnish the service, that after notice from the pupil to stop the service the school can recover only damages caused by breach of contract and that unless the school supplies the evidence necessary to fix the damages it is entitled to only nominal damages, see International Text-Book Co. v. Schulte, 151 Mich. 149 (1908); International Text-Book Co. v. Jones, 166 Mich. 86 (1911). The Michigan cases rely on Wigent v. Marrs, supra.

"J. J. Swift,

"For the Army and Navy Magazine, Washington and New York."

On the same day the defendant executed and delivered to the representative of the Army and Navy Magazine a written confirmation of this order by which other payments were to be made at the rate of $5 on the 3d day of each month, beginning on the 3d day of October, 1914 and by which it was provided that

"In the event that any payment as stipulated shall not be made within twenty days thereafter, the entire balance then remaining unpaid shall at once become due and payable."

Under date of September 3, 1914, the defendant wrote the following letter:

"Army & Navy Magazine, New York, N. Y.—Gentlemen: Upon consideration I find that I have no use for the books ordered Sept. 2d from your Mr. J. J. Swift. Kindly cancel this order at once. I am returning receipt given me and request you to return my check for $5.00.

"Respectfully,

G. C. Scoville."

This letter was indorsed as received on September 4, 1914. On October 16, 1914, the defendant's attorney wrote the Army and Navy Magazine, stating that the "defendant absolutely refused to accept the books," giving his reasons, which are not now material. This letter was indorsed as received October 19, 1914. The complaint, in addition to the substance of these letters, alleged prompt shipment, offer of the books to the defendant by the carrier, refusal by defendant to receive the books, and stoppage of payment of the check given with the order in payment of the $5 acknowledged to have been received at the foot of the order. The plaintiff claims payment for the entire purchase price as due him under the terms of the contract.

In the writ the plaintiff is described as "Herbert Cecil Lewis, of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, doing business under the name of 'Army and Navy Magazine.'"

After the plaintiff rested his case the court granted defendant's motion for a judgment as of nonsuit, and denied a motion to set this judgment aside. Plaintiff appealed.

GAGEE, J.¹⁶⁸ The Sales Act (General Statutes, § 4729) provides:

"Where, under a contract to sell or a sale, the property in the goods has passed to the buyer, and the buyer wrongfully neglects or refuses to pay for the goods according to the terms of the contract or the sale, the seller may maintain an action against him for the price of the goods."

The present action is for the price of the goods. The defendant claims that this action will not lie because no proof of delivery has been made, and for the further reason that the proof showed a countermand of the order by the defendant on the day after the order was executed, and apparently before the goods were shipped. Delivery of goods to a carrier for transmission to the buyer pursuant to the terms of a contract requiring delivery to a carrier is a delivery to the buyer. General Statutes, § 4712. The defendant's order was:

"Deliver to any common carrier addressed to me. * * * I agree to pay the cost of transportation."

Under this provision of the contract delivery to the carrier was delivery to the defendant, the property in the goods then passed to the defendant and it became his duty to accept and pay according to the terms of the contract. Kinney v. Horwitz, 93 Conn. 211, 105 Atl. 438; Illustrated Postal Card & Novelty Co. v. Holt, 85 Conn. 140, 81 Atl. 1061; 23 R. C. L. § 248. The evidence upon this point is in substance this: The defendant, having testified to his signature to the order and also to the letter of cancellation, further testified that he gave directions to his bookkeeper to refuse the books in case a package or box came from the Army and Navy Magazine, but that the box had not been tendered to him personally, though he would have refused it had it been so tendered. This latter was confirmed by the letter of the defendant's counsel to the plaintiff. The driver of the Adams Express Company during September and October, 1914, testified that he had delivered a number of parcels at defendant's place of business and that the shipment in question was a box that he offered to deliver, but delivery was refused, and that he took the box back to the express office. The express agent was not produced as a witness because of his absence in the United States military service. In the absence of any contradictory testimony, the court, in view of the contract, and the defendant's direction to his bookkeeper, was justified in not basing the nonsuit on the ground of nondelivery.

The facts, unexplained, would justify the inference of a delivery by the plaintiff to the carrier for the defendant, as the contract required. This, under the Sales Act, was a delivery to the defendant.

The defendant further claims that because, on September 3, 1914, and before the goods were tendered, he wrote to the plaintiff the letter of cancellation, no action to recover the price of goods sold and delivered can be maintained, but that the plaintiff is limited to an action to recover damages for breach of contract. Whether the goods were sent before or after receipt of this letter does not clearly appear. As the goods were manifestly not goods thereafter to be manufactured, this is not material. The attempted cancellation was not accepted or acquiesced in by the plaintiff, and the goods were, pursuant to contract, delivered to the carrier, which, by the contract was defendant's agent. The effect of such an attempted cancellation appears to have been undetermined in this state until the decision in Wells v. Hartford Manilla Co., 76 Conn. 27, 55 Atl. 599. After a careful examination of the English and American authorities, the court there adopted the rule stated in the headnote of the case as follows:

"A breach of an executory contract by anticipation occurs only when there is a distinct, unequivocal, and absolute refusal to perform the promise by one party, before the time for its performance has arrived, and an equally clear acquiescence in or acceptance of such renunciation by the other; in other words, the contract remains a subsisting one until the parties have mutually elected to treat it as broken, and have given unmistakable evidence of such election."

In Home Pattern Co. v. Mertz, 86 Conn. 494, 86 Atl. 19, the same question was presented as to one branch of that case that arises in the present case. There the defendant agreed to buy dress patterns to be manufactured by the plaintiff from time to time, to place them on sale in its store, receiving credit at stated intervals for all discarded undamaged patterns which were returned. After the first instalment of patterns had been manufactured, but before its shipment, the defendant repudiated the contract and refused to accept the goods. The plaintiff declined to treat the repudiation as a breach of the contract, and at the appointed time delivered the goods to the carrier designated by the defendant. The court, citing Wells v. Hartford Manilla Co., supra, and other cases, said at page 501 of 86 Conn., 86 Atl. 21:

"The repudiation of the contract without the acquiescence of the plaintiff did not put an end to the contract. The plaintiff could still treat it as subsisting, and, notwithstanding the notice of repudiation, assume that the defendant would perform its part of the contract when the time for such performance should arrive. Had it chosen to consent to the renunciation, it might have done so and brought an action at once for breach of the contract, but there can be no anticipatory breach of a contract by one party without the acquiescence of the other. A breach by one party alone can only occur after the time for performance has arrived. * * * The repudiation of the contract was not, therefore, a breach of it, and the plaintiff, having declined to acquiesce, was bound to tender performance when the time for delivery of the goods arrived. This it did, and the goods were received in New York by the carrier designated by the defendant. The defendant, by the express terms of the contract, was to pay the freight on the goods from the place of shipment. When the goods were thus received by the carrier, and the bill of lading had been forwarded to the defendant, the plaintiff had fully performed its contract with respect to those goods. The delivery to the railroad was delivery to the defendant, and the title thereby passed to the defendant."

And the court, upon these facts, held that title to the goods had passed to the defendant, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover the contract price of the same.

The same question was again presented upon a retrial of the Home Pattern Company Case, and the rule announced in that case was confirmed and adopted. Home Pattern Co. v. Mertz, 88 Conn. 22, 90 Atl. 33. Our own decisions are so recent and so clear that further examination of the question is unnecessary. Applying our rule to the case in hand, we find that under the contract there was to be a delivery of the goods, apparently already manufactured and ready for shipment, to the defendant by a carrier in general terms designated by the defendant, the defendant to pay transportation charges, a repudiation or attempted cancellation of the contract by the defendant, no acquiescence in this repudiation by the plaintiff, and actual shipment of the goods the carrier designated in the contract, and it does not appear that the goods are not still in the hands of the carrier, by the contract defendant's agent to receive the goods. Repudiation of the contract was not a breach of it. Delivery to the carrier was delivery to the defendant, and the title passed to the defendant upon such delivery. Refusal by the defendant to receive the goods did not revert title in the plaintiff, and he is, under the ruling in the above-named cases, and so far as this case has yet been developed, entitled to recover the contract price. Upon no ground urged by the defendant does it appear that he was entitled to judgment as of nonsuit. * * *

There is error, the judgment is set aside, and a new trial ordered.

L. J. KADISH ET AL. v. A. N. YOUNG ET AL.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by A. N. Young and George Bullen, against J. L. Kadish and Charles Fleischman. A trial was had, resulting in a verdict and judgment of $20,000 damages against the defendants.

SCHOLFIELD, J.¹⁶⁹ This was assumpsit, by appellees, against appellants, to recover damages sustained by the breach of an alleged contract, whereby, on the 15th of December, 1880, appellees sold to appellants 100,000 bushels of No. 2 barley, at one dollar and twenty cents per bushel, to be delivered to appellants, and paid for by them, at such time during the month of January, 1881, as appellees should elect. Appellees tendered to appellants warehouse receipts for 100,000 bushels of No. 2 barley on the 12th of January, 1881, but appellants refused to receive the receipts and pay for the barley. Within a reasonable time thereafter appellees sold the barley upon the market, and having credited appellants with the proceeds thereof, they brought this suit, and on the trial in the circuit court they recovered the difference between the contract price and the value of the barley in the market on the day it was to have been delivered by the terms of the contract. Upon the trial appellants * * * contended, if a contract was shown, then that on the next day after it was made they gave notice to appellees that they did not consider themselves bound by the contract, and they would not comply with its terms, and evidence was given tending to sustain this contention. * * *

The questions of law to which our attention has been directed by the arguments of counsel, arise upon the rulings of the circuit judge in giving and refusing instructions. He thus ruled, among other things, that appellants, by giving notice to appellees on the next day after the making of the contract that they would not receive the barley and comply with the terms of the contract, did not create a breach of such contract which appellees were bound to regard, or impose upon them the legal obligation to resell the barley on the market, or make a forward contract for the purchase of other barley of like amount and time of delivery, within a reasonable time thereafter, and credit appellants with the amount of such sale, or give them the benefit of such forward contract, but that appellees had the legal right, notwithstanding such notice, to wait until the day for the delivery of the barley by the terms of the contract, and then, upon appellants failure to receive and pay for it on its being tendered, to resell it on the market, and recover from appellants the difference between the contract price of the barley and its market value on the day it was to have been delivered.

That in ordinary cases of contract of sale of personal property for future delivery, and failure to receive and pay for it at the stipulated time, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market or current value of the property at the time and place of delivery, has been settled by previous decisions of this court (see McNaught v. Dodson, 49 Ill. 446, Larrabee v. Badger, 45 id. 440, and Saladin v. Mitchell, id. 79), and is not contested by appellants' counsel. But their contention is, that in case of such contract of sale for future delivery, where, before the time of delivery, the buyer gives the seller notice that he will not receive the property and comply with the terms of the contract, this, whether the seller assents thereto or not, creates a breach of the contract, or, at all events, imposes the legal duty on the seller to thereafter take such steps with reference to the subject of the contract, as, by at once reselling the property on the market on account of the buyer, or making a forward contract for the purchase of other property of like amount and time of delivery, shall most effectually mitigate the damages to be paid by the buyer in consequence of the breach, without imposing loss upon the seller. If the buyer may thus create a breach of the contract without the consent of the seller, we doubt not the duty to sell (where the property is in the possession of the seller at the time), at least within a reasonable time after such breach, will result as a necessary consequence of the breach. When the breach occurs by a failure to accept and pay for property tendered pursuant to the terms of a contract at the day specified for its delivery, this is doubtless the duty of the seller, and no reason is now perceived why it should not equally result from any breach of the contract upon which the seller is legally bound to act.

But the well settled doctrine of the English courts is, that a buyer cannot thus create a breach of contract upon which the seller is bound to act. In Leigh v. Patterson, 8 Taunt. 540 (4 Eng. C. L. 267), Phillpotts et al. v. Evans, 5 M. & W. 475; Ripley v. McClure, 4 Exch. 359, and, it may be, also in other early cases, it was held a party to a contract to be performed in the future cannot, by merely giving notice to the opposite party that he will not perform his part of the contract, create a breach of the contract. Subsequently, however, in Cort v. Ambergate, Nottingham, &c. Ry. Co., 17 Q. B. 127, and more explicitly in Hochster v. De la Tour, 2 E. & B. 678, the doctrine was announced as not in conflict with previous decisions, that the party to whom notice is given in such cases will be justified in acting upon the notice, provided it is not withdrawn before he acts. Lord Campbell, C. J., in delivering his opinion in the latter case, and speaking for the court, used this language: "The man who wrongfully renounces a contract into which he has deliberately entered, cannot justly complain if he is immediately sued for a compensation in damages by the man whom he had injured, and it seems reasonable to allow an option to the injured party either to sue immediately or to wait till the time when the act was to be done, still holding it as prospectively binding for the exercise of this option, which may be advantageous to the innocent party, and cannot be prejudicial to the wrong-doer."

The leading text-writers who treat of this question follow the authority of these cases, and the rule they announce is thus expressed in Sedgwick on Damages, (6th ed.) 340, * 284: "An effort has been made in many cases by the purchaser to relieve himself from the contract of sale before the time fixed for performance by giving notice that he would not be ready to complete the agreement, and in these cases it has been insisted that the damages should be estimated as at the time of giving notice; but the English courts have justly denied the right of either party to rescind the agreement, and have adhered to the day of the breach as the period for estimating damages." To like effect see Chitty on Contracts, (11th Am. ed.) 1079; 2 Parsons on Contracts, (6th ed.) 67; Benjamin on Sales, (1st ed.) 559, (4th Am. ed.) 973; Addison on Contracts, * 952; Wood's Mayne on Damages, 250, * 150.

After breach of a contract, as before herein intimated, we do not, at present question that it is the duty of the party entitled to damages to do what he reasonably may, without prejudice to his rights, to lighten the burden falling on his adversary.

There is nothing in the more recent English cases, as we understand them, repugnant to those to which we have referred upon this question.

In Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111 (1 Moak, 218), decided in the Exchequer Chamber in February, 1872, the suit was for breach of a marriage contract, whereby the defendant had promised to marry the plaintiff upon the death of his father, but the father still living, the defendant had announced his intention of not fulfilling his promise on his father's death, and broke off the engagement. Cockburn, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, thus states the law, after referring to the previous decisions: "The promisee, if he pleases, may treat the notice of intention" (i. e. not to perform the contract) "as inoperative, and await the time when the contract is to be executed, and then hold the other party responsible for all the consequences of nonperformance; but in that case he keeps the contract alive for the benefit of the other party as well as his own. He remains subject to all his own obligations and liabilities under it, and enables the other party not only to complete the contract, if so advised, notwithstanding his previous repudiation of it, but also to take advantage of any supervening circumstances which would justify him in declining to complete it. On the other hand, the promisee may, if he thinks proper, treat the repudiation of the other party as a wrongful putting an end to the contract, and may at once bring his action as on a breach of it, and in such action he will be entitled to such damages as would have risen from the nonperformance of the contract at the proper time, subject, however, to abatement in respect of any circumstance which may have afforded him the means of mitigating his loss." This was followed, and its doctrine reiterated, in Brown v. Miller, L. R. 7 Exch. 319 (3 Moak, 429), decided in the Court of Exchequer in June, 1872, and Roper v. Johnson, L. R. 8 C. P. 167 (4 Moak, 397), decided in the Common Pleas in February, 1873.

Counsel for appellants refer to the fact that Keating, J., in Roper v. Johnson, says: "If there had been any fall in the market, or any other circumstances calculated to diminish the loss, it would be for defendant to show it,"—and then cites with approval from the opinion of Cockburn, C. J., in Frost v. Knight, supra, to the effect that "the damages are subject to abatement in respect of any circumstances which would entitle him to a mitigation," etc., and insist they recognize the duty, here, of appellees, upon receiving notice, etc., to have sold upon the market or have entered into another contract for January delivery, etc. It is enough to observe, in answer to this, that in both Frost v.

Knight and Roper v. Johnson, supra, the notice that defendant would not comply with the contract was accepted and acted upon by the plaintiff as a breach of the contract; and so what was said in respect of the duty of the plaintiff to mitigate damages was said with reference to a case wherein he recognized the contract as having been broken by the notice of the adverse party, and with reference to what was to be done by him upon and after the recognition of that breach, and hence can have no application here. If a party is not compelled to accept the declarations of the other party to a contract that he will not perform it, as a breach, it must logically follow that he is under no obligation to regard that declaration for any purpose; for, as we have seen, the theory in such case, as laid down by Cockburn, C. J., in Frost v. Knight, supra, is: "He keeps the contract alive for the benefit of the other party as well as his own. He remains subject to all his own obligations and liabilities under it, and enables the other party not only to complete the contract, if so advised, notwithstanding his previous repudiation of it, but also to take advantage of any supervening circumstance which would justify him in declining to complete it."

Nothing would seem to be plainer than that while the contract is still subsisting and unbroken, the parties can only be compelled to do that which its terms require. This contract imposed no duty upon appellees to make other contracts for January delivery, or to sell barley in December, to protect appellants from loss. It did not even contemplate that appellees should have the barley ready for delivery until such time in January as they should elect. If appellees had then the barley on hand, and had acted upon appellant's notice, and accepted and treated the contract as then broken, it would, doubtless, then have been their duty to have resold the barley upon the market, precisely as they did in January, and have given appellants credit for the proceeds of the sale; but it is obviously absurd to assume that it would have been appellees' duty to have sold barley in December to other parties which it was their duty to deliver to appellants, and which appellants had a legal right to accept in January.

We have been referred to Dillon v. Anderson, 43 N. Y. 231, Danforth et al. v. Walker, 37 Vt. 240 (and same case again in 40 Vt. 357), and Collins v. Delaporte, 115 Mass. 159, as recognizing the right of either party to a contract to create a breach of it obligatory upon the other party, by giving notice, in advance of the time for the commencement of the performance of the contract, that he will not comply with its terms. An examination of the cases will disclose that they do not go so far, but that they are entirely in harmony with what we have heretofore indicated is our opinion in respect of the law applicable to the present question.

In Dillon v. Anderson, the action was for a breach of contract for the construction of a pair of boilers for a steamboat. After work had been commenced under the contract, and a certain amount of material had been purchased therefor by the plaintiff, notice was given by the defendant to stop work, that the contract was rescinded by the defendant, and that he would make the plaintiff whole for any loss he might suffer. The court held that it was the duty of the plaintiff, as soon as he received the notice, to have so acted as to save the defendant from further damage, so far as it was in his power.

In Danforth et al. v. Walker, 37 and 40 Vt., the defendant made a contract with the plaintiffs to purchase of them five car-loads of potatoes, being fifteen hundred bushels, to be delivered at a designated place as soon as the defendant should call for them, and as soon as he could get them away, some time during the winter. Soon after the first car-load was taken, potatoes fell in the market, and the defendant thereupon wrote the plaintiffs not to purchase any more potatoes until they should hear from him. The court held this created a breach of the contract, and that plaintiffs were not authorized to purchase any more potatoes on account of the defendant after they received the notice. The court, in the case in 37 Vt., on page 244, use this language: "While a contract is executory a party has the power to stop performance on the other side by an explicit direction to that effect, by subjecting himself to such damages as will compensate the other party for being stopped in the performance on his part at that point or stage in the execution of the contract. The party thus forbidden cannot afterwards go on, and thereby increase the damages, and then recover such increased damages of the other party." And this same rule, upon the authority of these cases, is laid down in 2 Sutherland on Damages, 361.

The points in issue in Collins v. Delaporte are not pertinent to the present question, but in the opinion the court quotes the rule as above laid down, upon the authority of Danforth et al v. Walker, and other cases.

It will be observed that in each of these cases the time for the performance of the contract had arrived, and its performance had been entered upon. In neither of them was the defendant at liberty, after notifying the plaintiff not to proceed further in the performance of the contract, to demand that he should proceed to perform it, as it was said in Frost v. Knight, supra, the defendant was, in case of notice, not to perform a contract the time of the performance of which is to commence in the future. In these cases there is no time or opportunity for repentance or change of mind,—in those there was. * * *

There was proof, upon the trial, tending to show that although appellees owned and had in their possession, at the time of the making of the alleged contract, an amount and kind of barley equal to or greater than that professed thereby to be sold, yet that they then only had of the warehouse receipts, which they actually tendered to appellants in January, those for 48,500 bushels, and that they subsequently obtained from Huck & Lefens the warehouse receipts for the remaining 51,500 bushels, upon a contract, whereby appellees agreed to pay Huck & Lefens therefor, at all events, one dollar per bushel, and one dollar and twenty cents per bushel if appellees shall recover from appellants in this suit. The court, in giving and refusing instructions, ruled that this in no wise concerned appellants,—that if the facts were as claimed, it did not make Huck & Lefens necessary parties to the suit, nor entitle appellants to any reduction in the measure of damages. In this there was surely no error. Huck & Lefens have no privity of contract with appellants, and whether appellees pay much or little for the barley with which to comply with their contract, cannot concern appellants. It was sufficient they owned and tendered the barley at the appointed time. If it had been given them, their measure of damages must be precisely the same as it would be had they paid ten-fold more than it was worth. The only effect of the transactions by which they obtained the barley was to vest title in them, and when thus vested it was absolutely theirs to do with as they pleased. No court, so far as our researches have enabled us to know, ever held that the price paid by the seller for an article sold and contracted to be delivered in the future, was a circumstance to be taken into consideration by the jury in determining the amount of damages the seller is entitled to recover upon the buyer's refusing to receive and pay for the property, and the distinguished counsel representing appellants have been unable to refer us to any such decision. * * *

*Judgment affirmed.*¹⁷⁰

ROTH & CO. v. TAYSEN, TOWNSEND & CO. AND OTHERS.

(Court of Appeal, 1896. 1 Commercial Cases 306.)

This was an action for damages for the non-acceptance by the defendants, Grant & Grahame, of a cargo of maize. The alleged contract was contained in telegrams which passed between the parties on May 23, 1895, and the trial judge and the Court of Appeal found it to be a contract to ship the cargo by a named boat, the ship to be ready to load on July 15, and the buyers to have the power of cancelling on August 15 if the ship was not ready to load by that day. May 29 defendants ¹⁷⁰ If the plaintiff makes a new forward contract, he may be held not entitled to damages on the basis of it. See Missouri Furnace Co. v. Cochran, 8 Fed. 463 (1881). It is for the defendant to make contracts to protect himself, if he deems protection needed, for there is no one but himself responsible if he does not. It is not like the case where for plaintiff to go ahead will unnecessarily increase the damages against a defendant, who has done all he could to prevent the increase, for here going ahead may diminish rather than increase the damages and any way, the defendant is in no way kept from making his own protecting contract, which would be as effective as one made by the plaintiff. See also 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1397.

repudiated because an option to cancel if the ship was not loaded by August 15 was not given. Plaintiff did not sue until July 24 and did not resell the cargo until September 5. The resale on September 5 was at a loss of £3807 3s. 8d. The trial court (Mathew, J.) fixed the damages at £1557, which would have been the amount of the loss if the cargo had been sold on July 24, when the plaintiffs issued the writ.

Against this judgment the defendants, Grant & Grahame, appealed, on the ground that there was no binding contract between the parties, and that the damages were excessive. The damages, they contended, if payable, were £688 only, the amount of the loss if the cargo had been sold on May 29, when they repudiated the contract. The plaintiffs entered a cross-appeal, claiming by way of damages £3807 3s. 8d., the amount of the loss sustained by the sale of the cargo on September 5.

LORD ESHER, M. R.† * * * Then comes the question of damages. When there is a repudiation which the other party chooses to treat as a breach, the primary rule is that the damages are the difference between the contract price and the market price of the goods at the date of the breach. If the repudiation takes place before the day of delivery, the other party has the right to bring an action immediately, and it follows that he has the right to have his damages assessed at the time he brings his action. In such a case the damages are not the difference between the contract and market price on the day the action is brought. It is the duty of the jury to assess them, having regard to, and making allowance for, the fact that the party plaintiff is receiving damages before the date of delivery has arrived. There is this further rule. The party who has treated a repudiation as a breach is bound to do what is reasonable to prevent the damages from being inflamed or increased. Now, did the plaintiffs do what was unreasonable in declining to sell till September 5? * * *

The evidence before the judge was that the market was falling steadily from day to day and from week to week, and was still falling when the writ was issued. Any one acquainted with the market must have seen the strong probability that the market would continue to fall. The plaintiffs had no right to suppose that the market would begin to rise, and no ordinary business man who was not a speculator would have thought that it was likely to do so. Buyers were refusing to come forward, being of opinion that they would have to sell at a still lower price. The judge had the right to come to the conclusion, as a jury, that ordinary business men (such as the plaintiffs), who were desirous of diminishing the loss, would have sold the maize at an earlier date, and I cannot undertake to say that his finding was wrong. The appeal and the cross-appeal therefore fail.

† The facts are rewritten so as to present only the damages question, and parts of the opinions are omitted.

LOPEZ, L. J. * * * What are the plaintiffs' rights? Ever since the case of Hochster v. De la Tour, 2 E. & B. 678, it has been the rule that if a payor repudiates a contract and the payee accepts his repudiation, the payee may bring an action. If no time has been fixed for the fulfilment of the contract, the plaintiff is entitled to such damage as he has sustained calculated at the date of the breach; if a time has been fixed for fulfilment, the damages are the loss of the plaintiff calculated as at the date of fulfilment. Here the breach was on July 24. The plaintiffs were bound to take reasonable steps to mitigate the damages; and, if they could have sold the cargo at any time previous to the date of fulfilment of the contract, or about the time of the breach, they ought to have done so. The learned judge held that they might have sold, and that they ought to have done so, about July 24. It is said for the plaintiffs that, though there is that rule of law, there was no evidence upon which a judge or jury could hold that it would have been prudent for the plaintiffs to sell. Of course, it is true that if the plaintiffs had sold and the market had then risen, they might have been told that they were wrong to sell; but I think that they were indiscreet in holding on when the market was falling, and that they would have been well advised if they had sold at an earlier date. The learned judge has held that they did not act reasonably, and I am not prepared to say that he was wrong. I think the amount of damages which he awarded was right.

RIGBY, L. J. * * * The only question, then, is as to the measure of damages. Now, taking in its full effect in favor of the plaintiffs the rule laid down in Roper v. Johnson, L. R. 8 C. P. 167, it may be that, prima facie, this being the breach of a contract to deliver goods, the damages are to be assessed as at the agreed date of delivery. But here the plaintiffs put an end to the contract at an earlier date. Judges have always held that a person availing himself of his right to accept repudiation of a contract must take measures to mitigate the damages which he has sustained by the breach. It is true that by so doing he may take some risk upon himself, but the tribunal will take that fact into consideration. In the present case there seems to be sufficient evidence, though it is not conclusive, to justify the learned judge in holding that the plaintiffs ought to have sold the cargo when they put an end to the contract by accepting the defendants' repudiation. I gather that there was evidence that the market was falling, and that the state of things did not render a recovery of prices probable within a reasonable time. I cannot accept the argument of Mr. Bigham [of counsel for the plaintiffs] that it is sufficient to show that the plaintiffs acted to the best of their judgment. The standard which one must use in these cases is the conduct of an ordinary prudent man under similar circumstances. The result is that both appeals must be dismissed.

*Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed.*¹⁷⁸

Section 3. Impossibility of Performance.

THORNBOROW v. WHITACRE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1706. 2 Ld. Raym. 1164.)

Action upon the case, in which the plaintiff declares upon an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant that the defendant in consideration of 2s. 6d. in hand paid, and of 4l. 17s. 6d. to be paid upon the defendant's performing the agreement of his part, deliberaret to the plaintiff two grains of rye corn on Monday the 29th of March, and four grains of rye corn on Monday then next following, and eight grains of rye corn on Monday next after the Monday last mentioned, and sixteen grains of rye corn on Monday next after the said third Monday, and double the number of grains of rye corn, viz. thirty-two grains of rye corn on Monday next after, being the fifth Monday, et progressu sic deliberaret quolibet alio die Lunae successive infra unum annum ab eodem 29 Martii bis tot grana secalis quot die Lunae proximo precedente respective deliberanda forent, etc., the defendant demurs to the declaration.

Mr. Salkeld¹⁷³ to maintain the demurrer said, that the agreement appeared upon the face of it to be impossible, the rye to be delivered amounting to such a quantity, as all the rye in the world was not so much, and being impossible was void, and the defendant not bound by a seller to deliver goods for which there is a market at a fixed date, the buyer without buying against the seller may bring his action at once, but that if he does so his damages must be assessed with reference to the market price of the goods at the time when they ought to have been delivered under the contract. If the action comes to trial before the contractual date for delivery has arrived, the court must arrive at the price as best it can.

"To this rule there is one exception for the benefit of the defaulting seller—namely, that if he can show that the buyer acted unreasonably in not buying against him the date to be taken is the date at which the buyer ought to have gone into the market to mitigate damages." Ballhache, J., in Melachrino v. Nickoll, [1920] 1 K. B. 693, 699. See also, Millett v. Van Heek & Co., [1920] 3 K. B. 535, 543, where Bray, J., says that in the case of an anticipatory breach of a contract for the sale of goods "prima facie the damages should be the difference between the contract price and the price at which the goods should have been delivered," but that "If it can be shown by either party that the reasonable course for minimizing the damages would be otherwise this prima facie rule should not be applied. For instance, if it could be shown that the reasonable course to be pursued would be for the buyer to enter into a forward contract on the date when the [seller's] repudiation was accepted, the damages should be assessed according to the difference between that price in that forward delivery and the contract price, and so, also, if it could be shown that the reasonable course to be pursued would have been to enter into a forward contract at some later date."

to perform it. He said, that there were three sorts of impossibilities: [First,] impossibilitas legis, such are all immoral actions, as to murder J. S. etc.; secondly, impossibilitas rei, such as are all natural impossibilities, which cannot be done from the nature of the thing; thirdly, impossibilitas facti, viz., such an impossibility as though there is nothing in the nature of it impossible to be done, yet it is impossible for a man to do, as to touch the heavens, or go to Rome in a day. And a covenant or condition to do any of these impossibilities is void. * * *

HOLT, Chief Justice. Suppose A, for money paid him by B, will undertake to do an impossible thing, shall not an action lie against him for not performing it; as in case of a bond with such an impossible condition, the bond is single. So where a man will for a valuable consideration undertake to do an impossible thing, though it cannot be performed, yet he shall answer damages.

And as to the impossibility the court said it was only impossible with respect to the defendant's ability, which was not such an impossibility as would make the contract void. And the chief justice said the words, quolibet alio die Lunae, must be construed what we say in English, every other Monday, that is, every next Monday but one, and that would bring the contract nearer to the defendant's ability of performance. And he said, that impossibilitas rei et facti were all one.

POWELL said, that though the contract was a foolish one, yet it would hold in law, and that the defendant ought to pay something for his folly.

Upon this occasion the case in 1 Lev. 111, 1 Keb. 569, James v. Morgan, was remembered, which was an agreement to pay for a horse, a barley corn a nail, for every nail in the horse's shoes, and double every nail, which came to 500 quarters of barley; and at a trial before Hide, Chief Justice, the jury gave the plaintiff the value of the horse in damages, and he had his judgment; which case was admitted of all hands to be good law, and did, as the counsel for the plaintiff urged, rule this. But Mr. Salkeld said, that differed from this, because that was possible to be performed, though it was an ill bargain, but this impossible.

The counsel for the defendant perceiving the opinion of the court to be against his client, offered the plaintiff his half crown and his cost, which was accepted of, and so no judgment was given in the case.¹⁷⁴

For a case of apparent mutual mistake where the court refused to enforce the impossible contract, see Bennett v. Morse, 6 Colo. App. 122 (1894), where Thompson, J., said:

"If a joint agreement is invalid or incapable of enforcement against all of

JOHN A. STEES, ET AL. v. CHARLES LEONARD, ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1874. 20 Minn. 494.)

The defendants, who are architects and builders, having at plaintiffs' request, furnished them with plans and specifications for a building pro-

its makers, it is invalid and incapable of enforcement against any one or more of them. In this case sixteen men agreed to purchase 400 shares each, making a total of 6,400 shares, to come out of one certificate—No. 44—for 5,000 shares. As shown by the complaint, this is the exact contract which the parties made, and it is not in our power to vary it. If they had been jointly sued, the plaintiffs must have been ready to deliver to them 6,400 shares; but there were only 5,000 shares from which they could be taken. Such a contract is inherently absurd. The parties could not purchase and the plaintiffs could not deliver 6,400 shares from 5,000 shares. Mr. Bishop says: 'A mutual undertaking between parties to do what both know to be impossible is vain and idle, lacking the elements of a contract, and no suit can be maintained upon it.' Bish. Cont., § 579. See also, Chit. Cont. (11th Am. Ed.) 64, note; Faulkner v. Lowe, 2 Exch. 595; Gilmer v. Gilmer, 42 Ala. 23. If the agreement had by its terms been several, a recovery could have been had against each of the parties as long as the stock remained unexhausted, because his agreement was complete in itself, and independent of that of the others; but, the contract being joint, and, as a joint contract, being upon its face impossible of performance, it is void, and no action is maintainable upon it against all or any of the parties to it."

In the topic of impossibility the difficulty is to draw the line in the proper place. Freedom of contract calls for permission to a sane person to contract to do the impossible or pay damages. On the other hand mutual mistakes of sufficient seriousness call for judicial rectification. While the common law started with the general proposition that impossibility is no defense to an action on a contract obligation, because the party had his chance to protect himself by proper stipulations in his contract, but did not do it, a number of exceptions have moderated the severity of that rule and even today "the law upon the matter is undoubtedly in process of evolution." McCardie, J., in Blackburn Ribbon Co., Ltd. v. T. W. Allen & Sons, Ltd., reported post. See also William H. Page, The Development of the Doctrine of Impossibility of Performance, 18 Mich. L. Rev. 589. The difficulty of finding a satisfactory stopping point is greater in the case of impossibility, so called, than in the case of conditions implied by law, because normally in the case of impossibility the plaintiff is free from blame whereas in the case of conditions implied by law normally he is reprehensible. In the case of a condition implied by law the defendant's defense is that he has not had or is not going to receive the performance which the plaintiff was to give the defendant in exchange for the latter's performance. Where impossibility is recognized as a defense, the plaintiff's performance in exchange for the defendant's usually has been given or is assured, and the defendant's defense is simply that because of the extraordinary circumstances which the courts consider to constitute impossibility, it is not fair to require the defendant to perform as nearly as is possible (on as nearly as possible, see Board of Education v. Townsend, 63 Oh. St. 514 (1900)) or else to pay damages, unless by his contract he assumed the risk of the happening of those extraordinary circumstances.

In an article on Impossibility of Performance as an Excuse for Breach of Contract in 1 Col. L. Rev. 529 at 533, Professor F. C. Woodward suggests that in the impossibility cases, not within the exceptions about local law, destrucposed to be erected by them on their own land, afterwards, and on the 18th August, 1868, the plaintiffs and defendants made and executed a contract under seal, in which they are all described as "of the city of St. Paul," etc. By the terms of the contract, the defendants "agree to and with the said John A. and Washington M. Stees, to well and truly build, erect, and complete the three-story business house proposed to be erected by the said J. A. & W. M. Stees, on Minnesota Street, between Third and Fourth Streets; all in accordance with the plans and specifications of the same, with such alterations as are mentioned in said specifications, prepared by M. Sheire & Bro., architects, and signed by both parties; the building, with the exception of painting, to be completed on or before the first day of January, 1869. In consideration whereof the said John A. & W. M. Stees * * * agree to pay, or cause to be paid, unto the said Charles Leonard, Monroe and Romaine Sheire, * * * the sum of $6,735 in payments as follows: $500 when the excavation is completed; $800 when the basement walls are up; $800 when the first-story walls are up; $1,000 when the second-story walls are up; $1,200 when the third-story walls are up and the roof on; $1,200 when the plastering is done; and the balance when the building is completed." The specifications annexed to the contract are very full, and provide (among other things) that "All the walls shall be of the following thickness: foundation walls, two feet thick, and shall have footings six inches thick, which shall run clear across walls and project six inches on each side of wall above it." The specifications contain no other provisions relating to the character of the foundation for the building.

The defendants entered upon the performance of the contract and erected the proposed building to a height of three stories, when it fell to the ground, on the 1st November, 1868. In the following year the defendants again attempted to perform the contract, and again erected the building to the same height as before, when it again fell, on the 1st August, 1869, whereupon the defendants abandoned the work, and tion of specific property and death or illness of parties bound to render personal services, the rule should be: "If the contingency which makes the contract impossible of performance is such that the parties to the contract, had they actually contemplated it, would probably have regarded it as so obviously terminating the obligation as not to require expression, failure of performance should be excused." He explains that "In other words, the proper inquiry is not: Would the parties as reasonable men, if their attention had been called to the contingency, have provided for it, in their contract? That, as has been said, would be making a contract for them different from that which they had actually made for themselves. But: Would the parties, had their attention been called to the contingency, have thought it unnecessary to provide for it in the contract? That is not altering or adding to the contract, but merely construing it, as already made by the parties." But see note in 15 Harv. L. Rev. 418, and see, also, William C. Conlen, Intervening Impossibility of Performance as Affecting the Obligations of Contracts, 66 U. of Pa. L. Rev. 28, 31.

refused to perform the contract. [The plaintiffs then brought this action and demanded judgment] * * * for the sum of $5,214.80, with interest, as the damages sustained by the plaintiffs; being $3,745.80 paid, pursuant to the contract, during the progress of the work, $1,000 as damages for loss of the use of the lot on which the building was to be erected; and $469, as damages occasioned by the fall of the building, to an adjacent house of the plaintiffs and property stored therein. * * *

At the trial in the district court for Ramsey County, the defendants made the following offers of proof: * * *

That in architecture and building, "footings," when used in a building, are the lowest portion of the structure, and the only artificial foundation employed for the building, when footings are employed.

That they constructed each of these buildings that fell, in all respects as required by the contract and specifications.

The evidence thus offered * * * was objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and in each case the objections were sustained, and the defendants excepted.

The jury found for the plaintiffs. The defendants moved, upon a bill of exceptions, for a new trial, and appeal from the order denying their motion.

YOUNG, J.¹⁷⁵ The general principle of law which underlies this case is well established. If a man bind himself, by a positive, express contract, to do an act in itself possible, he must perform his engagement, unless prevented by the act of God,¹⁷⁶ the law, or the other party to the contract. No hardship, no unforeseen hindrance, no difficulty short of absolute impossibility, will excuse him from doing what he has expressly agreed to do. This doctrine may sometimes seem to bear heavily upon contractors; but, in such cases, the hardship is attributable, not to the law, but to the contractor himself, who has improvidently assumed an absolute, when he might have undertaken only a qualified liability. The law does no more than enforce the contract as the parties themselves have made it. Many cases illustrating the application of the doctrine to every variety of contract, are collected in the note to Cutter v. Powell, 2 Smith Lead. Cas. 1.

The rule has been applied in several recent cases, closely analogous to the present in their leading facts. In Adams v. Nichols, 19

¹⁷⁵ The statement of facts is abbreviated and parts of the opinion are omitted.

Pick. 275, the defendant Nichols contracted to erect a dwelling-house for plaintiff on plaintiff's land. The house was nearly completed when it was destroyed by accidental fire. It was held that the casualty did not relieve the contractor from his obligation to perform the contract he had deliberately entered into. The court clearly state and illustrate the rule, as laid down in the note to Walton v. Waterhouse, 2 Wms. Saunders, 422, and add: "In these and similar cases, which seem hard and oppressive, the law does no more than enforce the exact contract entered into. If there be any hardship, it arises from the indiscretion or want of foresight of the suffering party. It is not the province of the law to relieve persons from the impropriety of their own acts."

In School Dist. v. Dauchy, 25 Conn. 530, the defendant contracted to build and complete a schoolhouse. When nearly finished, the building was struck by lightning, and consumed by the consequent fire; and the defendant refused to rebuild, although plaintiffs offered to allow him such further time as should be necessary. It was held that this nonperformance was not excused by the destruction of the building. The court thus state the rule: "If a person promise absolutely, without exception or qualification, that a certain thing shall be done by a given time, or that a certain event shall take place, and the thing to be done, or the event, is neither impossible nor unlawful at the time of the promise, he is bound by his promise, unless the performance, before that time, becomes unlawful."

School Trustees v. Bennett, 3 Dutcher, 513, is almost identical in its material facts with the present case. The contractors agreed to build and complete a schoolhouse, and find all materials therefor, according to specifications annexed to the contract; the building to be located on a lot owned by plaintiff, and designated in the contract. When the building was nearly completed it was blown down by a sudden and violent gale of wind. The contractors again began to erect the building, when it fell, solely on account of the soil on which it stood having become soft and miry, and unable to sustain the weight of the building; although, when the foundations were laid, the soil was so hard as to be penetrated with difficulty by a pickaxe, and its defects were latent. The plaintiff had a verdict for the amount of the instalments paid under the contract as the work progressed. The verdict was sustained by the Supreme Court, which held that the loss, although arising solely from a latent defect in the soil, and not from a faulty construction of the building, must fall on the contractor.

In the opinion of the court, the question is fully examined, many cases are cited, and the rule is stated, "that where a party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract.

• • • If before the building is completed or accepted, it is destroyed by fire or other casualty, the loss falls upon the builder; he must rebuild. The thing may be done, and he has contracted to do it. • • • No matter how harsh and apparently unjust in its operation the rule may occasionally be, it cannot be denied that it has its foundations in good sense and inflexible honesty. He that agrees to do an act should do it, unless absolutely impossible. He should provide against contingencies in his contract. Where one of two innocent persons must sustain a loss, the law casts it upon him who has agreed to sustain it, or rather, the law leaves it where the agreement of the parties has put it. • • • Neither the destruction of the incomplete building by a tornado, nor its falling by a latent softness of the soil, which rendered the foundation insecure, necessarily prevented the performance of the contract to build, erect, and complete this building for the specified price. It can still be done, for aught that was opened to the jury as a defence, and overruled by the court."

In Dermott v. Jones, 2 Wall. 1, the foundation of the building sank, owing to a latent defect in the soil, and the owner was compelled to take down and rebuild a portion of the work. The contractor having sued for his pay, it was held that the owner might recoup the damages sustained by his deviation from the contract. The court refer with approval to the cases cited, and say: "The principle which controlled them rests upon a solid foundation of reason and justice. It regards the sanctity of contracts. It requires a party to do what he has agreed to do. If unexpected impediments lie in the way, and a loss ensue, it leaves the loss where the contract places it. If the parties have made no provision for a dispensation, the rule of law gives none. It does not allow a contract fairly made to be annulled, and it does not permit to be interpolated what the parties themselves have not stipulated."

Nothing can be added to the clear and cogent arguments we have quoted, in vindication of the wisdom and justice of the rule, which must govern this case unless it is in some way distinguishable from the cases cited.

It is argued that the spot on which the building is to be erected is not designated with precision in the contract, but is left to be selected by the owner; that, under the contract, the right to designate the particular spot being reserved to plaintiffs, they must select one that will sustain the building described in the specifications, and if the spot they select is not, in its natural state, suitable, they must make it so; that in this respect the present case differs from School Trustees v. Bennett.

The contract does not, perhaps, designate the site of the proposed building with absolute certainty; but in this particular it is aided by the pleadings. The complaint states that defendants contracted to erect the proposed building on "a certain piece of land of which the plaintiffs then were and now are the owners in fee, fronting on Minnesota Street, between Third and Fourth Streets, in the city of St. Paul.' The answer expressly admits that the defendants entered into a contract to erect the building, according to the plans, etc., "on that certain piece of land in said complaint described," and that they "entered upon the performance of said contract, and proceeded with the erection of said building," etc. This is an express admission that the contract was made with reference to the identical piece of land on which the defendants afterwards attempted to perform it, and leaves no foundation in fact for the defendants' argument.

It is no defence to the action, that the specifications directed that "footings" should be used as the foundation of the building, and that the defendants, in the construction of these footings, as well as in all other particulars, conformed to the specifications. The defendants contracted to "erect and complete the building." Whatever was necessary to be done in order to complete the building, they were bound by the contract to do. If the building could not be completed without other or stronger foundations than the footings specified, they were bound to furnish such other foundations.¹⁷⁷ If the building could not ¹⁷⁷ "Where one agrees to do, for a fixed sum, a thing possible to be performed, he will not be excused or become entitled to additional compensation, because unforeseen difficulties are encountered. Day v. United States, 245 U. S. 159, 38 Sup. Ct. 57, 62 L. Ed. 219; Phoenix Bridge Co. v. United States, 211 U. S. 138, 29 Sup. Ct. 81, 53 L. Ed. 141. Thus one who undertakes to erect a structure upon a particular site, assumes ordinarily the risk of subsidence of the soil. Simpson v. United States, 172 U. S. 372, 19 Sup. Ct. 222, 43 L. Ed. 482; Dermott v. Jones, 2 Wall. 1, 17 L. Ed. 762. But if the contractor is bound to build according to plans and specifications prepared by the owner, the contractor will not be responsible for the consequences of defects in the plans and specifications. MacKnight Flintie Stone Co. v. The Mayor, 160 N. Y. 72, 54 N. E. 661; Filbert v. Philadelphia, 181 Pa. 530; Bentley v. State, 73 Wis. 416, 41 N. W. 338. See Sundstrom v. State of New York, 213 N. Y. 68, 106 N. E. 924. This responsibility of the owner is not overcome by the usual clauses requiring builders to visit the site, to check the plans, and to inform themselves of the requirements of the work, as is shown by Christie v. United States, 237 U. S. 234, 35 Sup. Ct. 565, 59 L. Ed. 933; Hollerbach v. United States, 233 U. S. 165, 34 Sup. Ct. 553, 58 L. Ed. 898, and United States v. Stage Co., 199 U. S. 414, 424, 26 Sup. Ct. 69, 50 L. Ed. 251, where it was held that the contractor should be relieved, if he was misled by erroneous statements in the specifications." Brandeis, J., for the court, in U. S. v. Spearin, 248 U. S. 132, 39 Sup. Ct. 59, 61 (1918).

While the rule as to responsibility for defective plans so announced by Justice Brandeis is plausible as stated, the real question should be one of fact as to whether the owner personally, or through his architect, or the contractor, was in fact and properly, relied upon to see that the plans were practicable. In any event, there is a conflict in the cases. As in the principal case, the contractor was held responsible in Loneragan v. San Antonio Trust Co., 101 Tex. 63 (1907); Leavitt v. Dover, 67 N. H. 94 (1892).

In Cavanagh v. Tyson, Weare and Marshall Co., 227 Mass. 437 (1917), the be erected without draining the land, then they must drain the land, "because they have agreed to do everything necessary to erect and complete the building." (3 Dutcher, 525; and see Dermott v. Jones, supra, where the same point was made by the contractor, but ruled against him by the court.)

As the draining of the land was, in fact, necessary to the erection and completion of the building, it was a thing to be done, under the contract, by the defendants. * * *

There was, therefore, no error in the exclusion of the evidence offered, and the order appealed from is affirmed.¹⁷⁸ court had to consider whether there was a material enough mistake for rescission of contract where the contract was for driving piles for a pier and where the soil, instead of being soft and easily penetrable, as indicated by the plans, consisted largely of stone rip rap of large size, deposited there when the ground was filled in. On the whole the court decided against rescission, there being no fraud and opportunity to investigate. Pierce, J., said: "In the case at bar the character of the fill through which the piles were to be driven was of importance only in the determination of the price to be demanded and paid for the performance of the work. Had the burden of performance proved less than anticipated it scarcely will be claimed that the defendant could, in an appropriate action have had relief from the contract through rescission or to recover any excess in payment over reasonable compensation. Yet such would be the defendant's right if the contract were void ab initio. Sherwood v. Walker, 66 Mich. 568. In the case at bar the mistake of fact is collateral to the essential thing contracted about and therefore does not invalidate the contract" (p. 444).

But in Faber v. City of New York, 222 N. Y. 255 (1918), where the city had made an investigation as to bed rock and the plans indicated where it was, the contractor having no reasonable opportunity to find out the truth, the city was deemed to have made by its plans such a representation or warranty that the situation of the bed rock was farther from the surface than it was as to render the city liable for the great additional expense of excavation caused by the mistake.

¹⁷⁸ "The general rules governing the rights of the parties to a building contract, where the building to be erected is partially constructed and is destroyed by fire before full completion, in cases where the contract is entire and contains no express provisions regarding their rights in that contingency, are not seriously controverted. If, in such a case, the parties do not rescind or abandon, but stand upon the contract, it controls their rights. The contractor and the owner each must perform his part of the contract. If the whole price is due upon completion, the contractor must complete it before he can lawfully demand payment. If it is payable in installments during the progress of the work, he cannot recover an installment earned but not paid at the time of the fire, until the reconstruction has proceeded to the stage necessary to make it due. He must stand the loss resulting from the fire, and must replace at his own expense the structure that is destroyed. When he has done so, he may recover the full contract price. He is not excused, from completing the performance of the contract by the fact that the fire has destroyed the structure already made. It is nevertheless possible for him to begin again and rebuild the entire building. Such destruction does not prevent performance within the meaning of section 1511 of the Civil code. (Wilmington T. Co. v. O'Neil, 98 Cal. 5 (32 Pac. 705); Barrere v. Soms, 113 Cal. 97, 104 (45 Pac. 177, 572);

ARTHUR v. WYNNE.

Administration action. Claim by trustees of a marriage settlement to be admitted as creditors for the £10,000 for which the deceased had covenanted to insure his life.

Sample v. Fresno Flume, Etc., Co., 129 Cal. 222, 228 (61 Pac. 1085); Wilson v. Alcatraz, Etc., Co., 142 Cal. 182 (75 Pac. 787); Polack v. Ploche, 35 Cal. 416, 422 (95 Am. Dec. 115); 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1249; Civ. Code, sec. 1439.) There are cases which hold that upon such a contract if the contractor neglects to complete the performance after such destruction, the owner may recover from him the installments which had been paid prior to the destruction. (Green v. Wells, 2 Cal. 584; Tompkins v. Dudley, 25 N. Y. 272 (82 Am. Dec. 349).)

"From these principles it logically follows that if there are progress payments on the work which are due, or earned, but unpaid, at the time of the fire, the contractor cannot rightfully demand payment thereof, or recover the same, until he has rebuilt the structure to the point where, by the terms of the contract, the work required to make the particular payment due is again performed. As we have said, these principles apply where the contract contains no provisions declaring the rights of the parties in case of the destruction of the partly completed building. The contract sued on contained a provision on this subject." Shaw, J., in Ahlgren v. Walsh, 173 Cal. 27, 31-32 (1916).

Except where very exceptional facts exist, the builder, as in the principal case of Stees v. Leonard, is not excused. Professor Corbin states the rule as follows: "Increased or unexpected difficulty and expense do not, as a rule, excuse from performance. * * * In building contract cases like School District v. Danchy (1857), 25 Conn. 530, and Trustees v. Bennett (1859), 27 N. J. L. 513, performance at the time agreed may have become practically impossible; but time might not be of the essence; and, if so, substantial performance is still possible. Even if time is of the essence this may be waived by the party whose duty was conditional on performance on time." Corbin's Anson on Contracts, pp. 430-431, note 4.

In Board of Education v. Townsend, 63 Oh. St. 514 (1900), and Sickinger v. Board of Directors of Public Schools for Parish of Orleans, 147 La. 479, 85 So. 212 (1920), school boards under a contract for the exchange of property to move a house of the other party to the lot he was to receive were compelled to reconstruct the house, though it was wrecked by storms. In both cases the contract failed to provide that the method of removal should be without dismantling the building, and in the Louisiana case the court said that "Our opinion is that it was the duty of the school board to reconstruct the building after the storm, using what material was yet suitable and substituting like material for that which was destroyed" (85 So. at p. 215).

That problem is somewhat like that in Drake v. White, 117 Mass. 10 (1875), where a debtor deposited collateral with his creditors as security for the debt and they promised to return it or pay for it in money. The collateral being destroyed by fire, the creditors were made to pay for it, the court saying: "The fact that one part of this alternative promise has become impossible of fulfillment does not relieve them from the other" (p. 13).

If the defendant contracts to repair an existing house or chattel of the plaintiff or to furnish part of the labor and materials for a house for plaintiff,

JESSEL, M. R.¹⁷⁹ • • • There is here a covenant to effect an insurance on or before a given day. The covenantor had nearly two years in which to do it, but he put off doing anything till a day or two before the last day; however, just previously he became so ill, and he thenceforward continued so ill, that no policy could be effected on his life. Now, it does appear to me to be clear that he cannot avail himself of that negligence or omission on his part to take any steps towards the performance of his covenant till a day or two before the expiration of the two years, to say that there had been no breach of the covenant. There was a time, nearly two years, during which he might have performed it, and he did not perform it during the time when he could have per-towards the erection of which house the plaintiff is to furnish other labor and materials under an arrangement in substance like a contract by defendant to repair, and the house is destroyed without the defendant's fault, the defendant is excused from further performance. Butterfield v. Byron, 153 Mass. 517 (1891); Cook v. McCabe, 53 Wis. 250 (1881); Krause v. Board, 162 Ind. 278 (1903). But in Vogt v. Hecker, 118 Wis. 306 (1903), a contract to build a barn upon a foundation and with materials furnished by the property owner was held to be one for the construction of a complete building, or, at least, governed by the rule applicable to such a contract, and in Chapman v. Beltz & Sons Co., 48 W. Va. 1 (1900), where under a contract to remodel and rebuild a house, using some of the old walls, the building without the builder's fault collapsed, the builder was held liable in damages for breach of contract, because the owner notified the builder that he expected to restore the building to the condition it was in when the builder began the improvements and thereby required the builder to finish it in accordance with the contract, and where the builder on receiving the notice wrote the owner it would insist that there was no obligation on it to restore or complete the improvements on said building, it was held that the owner was entitled to restore the substructure and to require the builder to complete performance of its contract. But that such offer of the owner will not make the builder liable, see Krause v. Board, 162 Ind. 278, 291-293 (1903).

The question whether there may be a quasi-contractual recovery for repairs prior to the destruction of the house or chattel will be answered variously in different jurisdictions. By the general American rule recovery for the work done prior to the destruction, after deducting payments made, is allowed. Woodward on Quasi Contracts, §§ 116, 117, 119. But in England and in some American jurisdictions both parties are discharged and neither may recover against the other, unless the contract is severable in the sense that instalment payments to be made as the work progresses are, in the language of Denman, J., in Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Co. v. Rennie, L. R. 10 C. P. 271, 283 (1875), "to be in payment of the work certified to be done, neither more nor less," in which latter event recovery may be had for the amount already earned at the time of the destruction of the building. Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Co. v. Rennie, supra; Siegel Cooper & Co. v. Eaton & Prince Co., 165 Ill. 550 (1897). See The Madras, [1898] P. 90. Compare, Chandler v. Webster, reported post p. 1038. Of Siegel Cooper & Co. v. Eaton & Prince Co., supra, it has been said: "The court held the contract in that case severable, but without apparent reason." Harriman on Contracts, 2 ed., sec. 274, note 5.

formed it. Why is he not to be answerable in damages? It seems to me that he has committed a breach of the covenant, and not the less so because misfortune subsequently overtook him, for he might have performed it up to a short period before the expiration of the time. It is no answer to say that there would have been no breach if he had done it on the last day, because he has not done it on the last day; and, whether or not he would be excused from performance if it had been a covenant to do it on that day, it appears to me that is not an excuse when he has not done it. On that ground I should be in favour of the applicants.

[The learned Master of the Rolls then discussed the question whether there was an implied condition in the covenant to insure only if his life remained insurable, and held "that there is no implied exception of the kind suggested" and that "on that point I think the applicants are also entitled to succeed."] * * *

The amount of damages payable to the trustees of the settlement was fixed by arrangement between the parties.

MERIWETHER v. LOWNDES COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Alabama, 1890. 89 Ala. 362, 7 So. 198.)

SOMERVILLE, J.¹⁰⁰ The bond of the defendant's intestate, which is here sued on, for the consideration specified, bound him, by covenant, not only to build the bridge contracted for by the county of Lowndes, but also for five years to keep the structure in repair. The express condition of the undertaking is that said bridge shall be "kept in good repair" by the obligor, and shall "remain safe continuously from the time of its acceptance [by the county,] for the period of five years, for the passage of travelers and other persons, as well as for all purposes for which said bridge may be properly and lawfully used."

It is not denied, on the one hand, that the bridge in question was constructed in a skillful and workmanlike manner, nor, on the other, that the county had the authority to contract generally for the construction of bridges, free or toll, and to take a bond to keep them in good repair for a stipulated period. Code 1886 §§ 1442, 1456, 1457. The breach of the bond assigned is that the bridge was washed away by a flood, within the period it was stipulated to stand, and thereby became impassable to the public, and that the defendant's intestate refused to rebuild and repair the bridge, although notified to do so by the board of revenue of the county, which was invested with the jurisdiction and powers conferred by the statute on courts of county commissioners in reference to the subject of bridges.

The main defense urged to the suit is that the bond imposed no duty on the obligor to rebuild the bridge, but only to keep it in repair so long as it stood; and that the structure was destroyed from no defect in the work, but by an extraordinary and unprecedented flood, which was an act of God, not covered by the covenants of the bond. This defense was clearly not good. There is a long line of cases, both in England and this country, which settle the proposition that an unconditional express covenant to repair or keep in repair is equivalent to a covenant to rebuild, "and binds the covenantor to make good any injury which human power can remedy, even if caused by storm, flood, fire, inevitable accident, or the act of a stranger;" and that, while an act of God will excuse the nonperformance of a duty created by law, it will not excuse a duty created by contract. Abby v. Billups, 35 Miss. 618, 72 Amer. Dec. 143, and note, p. 148; Ross v. Overton, 3 Call, 309; Polack v. Pioche, 95 Amer. Dec. 115, note, 121, 122; Hoy v. Holt, 91 Pa. St. 88; Miller v. Morris, 40 Amer. Rep. 814; School-Dist. v. Dauchy, 68 Amer. Dec. 371; Beach v. Crain, 49 Amer. Dec. 369, note, 374; Van Wormer v. Crane, 16 N. W. Rep. 686; Warren v. Wagner, 75 Ala. 188; Nave v. Berry, 22 Ala. 382. The courts have no authority to relieve contracting parties from the hardships often occasioned by such contracts, as it is within the power of obligors to provide in advance by excepting liability for casualties of this nature from the terms of their contracts, if they so elect. The contract, moreover, shows that the duty of keeping "in good repair" is coupled with the covenant that the bridge shall "remain safe" for the period stipulated. And the statute clearly contemplates that when a bridge, constructed under such a contract, is "washed away, or so damaged [in any manner] as to become unsafe to the public," within the period covered by the bond, such accident shall be such a breach of the bond as to constitute a ground of action. Code 1886, § 1457. The second plea interposing this defense was bad, and the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to it. * * *

[Judgment for plaintiff] affirmed.

JOHN D. CLANCY v. BENJAMIN OVERMAN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1835. 18 N. Car. 402.)

Action of covenant brought upon an indenture, made the 22d day of January, A. D., 1827, between John D. Clancy, of, etc., of the one part, and Benjamin Overman, of, etc., of the other part, whereby the said John D. Clancy bound unto the said Benjamin Overman a negro boy, named Essex, to serve him faithfully for the term of three years from date, and the said Benjamin Overman covenanted that he would teach and instruct, or cause to be taught and instructed, the said negro boy, in the art and mystery of the coach-making business. The breach assigned in the plaintiff's declaration was, that the defendant had not taught and instructed, nor caused to be taught and instructed, the slave Essex, mentioned in the covenant, the art and mystery of the coach-making business.

Pleas. Covenants performed and not broken; previous covenants not performed.

Upon the trial at Guilford, on the last Circuit, before his Honor, Judge Norwood, the plaintiff offered evidence to show that the slave Essex did not understand the coach-making business at the expiration of his term of service with the defendant. The defendant, on his part, offered evidence to show that he made all proper exertions to teach the slave Essex, but that said slave had not capacity enough to learn the coach-making business. His Honor charged the jury that the covenant of the defendant was absolute, and that he could not be excused from its performance, for want of capacity in the boy Essex to learn the coach-making business; but that the jury might take that into consideration in estimating the damages, if they should find for the plaintiff. Under this charge, a verdict was returned for the plaintiff; and the defendant appealed.

GASTON, J.¹⁸¹ There is a well known distinction between obligations imposed by law, and those created by express contract. When the law imposes a duty, and the party charged is disabled to perform it without any default in him, and he has no remedy over, the law will excuse him; but when the party, by his own contract, imposes unconditionally a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to perform it, or answer in damages for its nonperformance, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity. In the latter case, the contract constitutes the law between the parties, and if it contain no exception, none will be presumed. This court agrees, therefore, with the judge below, in holding that the engagement of the defendant was absolutely binding to the extent of that engagement; and it is also of opinion with him that the covenants of the respective parties to this indenture were mutual and independent. But we do not concur in the construction which was given below to the covenant of the defendant. It seems to us that an engagement to teach the apprentice, or to cause the apprentice to be taught, a trade, is not an engagement that the apprentice will learn that trade. If it were so, then had the apprentice died on the day succeeding the execution of the indenture, or had been visited by an infirmity which utterly disabled him to learn, or had obstinately resisted every proper effort to make him learn, the covenant would have been broken, and the defendant responsible in damages for the breach. Nor do we think that, in such a case, these circumstances should avail to lessen the damages; for if an individual deliberately bind himself to insure a certain result, and the obligation is broken, the extent of the injury forms the measure of damages, however the performance may have been defeated. It would be doing violence, we think, to the words found in this covenant, to regard them as stipulating for more than faithful, diligent and skillful instruction. The case of Winston v. Linn, 4 Eng. C. L. Rep. 131, which has been cited for the plaintiff, does not conflict with this opinion. It was there held that the covenants were mutual and independent, and that disobedience on the part of the apprentice, and his temporary withdrawal from the service of the master, did not warrant the latter in insisting that the indenture was dissolved. It decides no more. * * *

THE MARQUIS OF BUTE v. THOMPSON.

(Court of Exchequer, 1844. 13 Meeson & Welsby, 487.)

Action of covenant for £216, 13s. 4d., being half a year's fixed rent under a lease.

POLLOCK, C. B.¹⁸² * * * This is an action of covenant: the defendants have expressly covenanted that they, their executors, adminis-

But in general a defendant is not excused from performance because the necessary cooperation of a third person cannot be obtained. That is because the parties must be deemed to have contemplated that the third person might not cooperate and the promisor must be deemed to have assumed the burden of getting that cooperation since he has not conditioned his promise upon it.

"There can be no question that a party may by an absolute contract, bind himself to perform things which subsequently become impossible, or pay damages for the non-performance, and such construction is to be put upon an unqualified undertaking where the event which causes the impossibility might have been anticipated and guarded against in the contract, or where the impossibility arises from the act or default of the promisor. But where the event is of such a character that it cannot be reasonably supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made, they will not be held bound by general words, which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards happens." Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Hoyt, 149 U. S. 1, 14, 15 (1893).

trators, and assigns, or some or one of them, should and would raise and work 13,000 tons of coal in each and every year during the term, and pay at the rate of 8*d.* per ton royalty for the same, or pay in money annually, £433, 6*s.* 8*d.* each year, as fixed rent, whether coals should be wrought or not, and also 9*d.* upon each ton over and above that quantity, to whatever extent the same might be wrought. We are of opinion that this stipulation for a fixed rent, coupled with a covenant that coal should be wrought to that extent, and if above it, that there should be a payment of 9*d.* for each ton over and above, does not carry with it, by any implication, a condition that there shall be coals to that amount capable of being wrought.¹⁰⁴ It appears to us to be a stipulation on the part of the defendants that they would work and get that quantity, and that if they did not get it, they would pay a fixed rent to the landlord; and we cannot import into that covenant a condition that there should be coals to that extent. If that was the intention of the parties, they should so have expressed it. This is the short ground on which we are of opinion that plaintiff, the Marquis of Bute, is entitled to the judgment of the court.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

LORD CLIFFORD v. WATTS.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1870. L. R., 5 Common Pleas, 577.)

WILLES, J.¹⁰⁵ This is an action upon a demise or grant by Lord Clifford to Watts of certain mines, pits, etc., of clay, by which demise the rent was made payable at a certain rate per ton upon the clay raised; and the indenture contained, amongst others, a covenant that Watts shall work and make trials for clay under the lands in question. The first breach is founded upon that covenant, and in respect of that the defendant has paid 40*s.* into court. The indenture also contains a covenant that Watts shall dig and raise from the land an aggregate amount of not less than 1,000 tons, or more than 2,000 tons, of pipe or potter's clay in each year of the term. The term granted was twelve years; and for the pipe or potter's clay the defendant was to pay a royalty of 2*s.* 6*d.* per ton. The breach assigned on that covenant is that with which we have to deal on this occasion; it is, that the defendant has not dug an aggregate amount of not less than 1,000 tons of pipe and potter's clay in each year of the demise. The plea, the validity of which is now in question, is, that the defendant could not dig 1,000 tons of clay each year according to his covenant, because there was not at the time of the demise, nor since existing under the lands, 1,000 tons of such clay; that the performance of the covenant had always been impossible, and that such impossibility was unknown to the defendant at the time, and he had no reasonable means of knowing or ascertaining the same. To that plea there is a demurrer. It is obvious that this plea may be considered from two points of view: First, with reference to the abstract question whether a covenant to perform an impossibility is or is not valid in point of law; whether the covenantor can set up such impossibility from the beginning as an answer to a breach, or must pay damages, which, according to Mr. Preston (Shep. Touch. 7th Ed. 164), may only be nominal. The second, and with reference to this case the most important, consideration appears to me to arise from the question whether the defendant has by this covenant contracted to perform an impossibility, or whether the true meaning of the covenant, construing it by the rest of the deed, is, not that the defendant undertakes to get the stipulated quantity of clay whether it be there or not, or to pay the stipulated tonnage as if the clay had been raised, but rather, dealing with it as subsidiary to the main object of the demise, that he will raise such pipe or potter's clay as may be found under the land, at the rate and price specified. If the latter be the true construction of the covenant, it is not an independent covenant to do the thing contracted for, whether possible or not, but only a stipulation as to the rate at which that is to be done which both parties at the time contemplated. According to that construction of the covenant, the plea is a good defence to the second breach. And this is the view to which, after the best consideration I am able to bring to the case, and after having heard the very learned arguments on both sides, my opinion inclines.

¹⁰⁴ The defendants contended, to quote Erle, the plaintiff's counsel, "that if the colliery be exhausted, so that coals sufficient to make up that amount [of 13,000 tons] cannot be raised, they are discharged from the payment of the fixed rent."

The deed, without any recital, witnesses that Lord Clifford, in consideration of the rent, payments, covenants, etc., demised to Watts the mines, pits etc., of clay under certain lands particularly described. It then proceeds to grant Watts a license to enter upon the land to dig and search for clay and to make pits, etc., with rights of way for carrying it away, etc., subject to compensation for damage. Then comes the habendum,—to have, hold, etc., the said mines, etc., of pipe and potter's or other clay, with the powers thereby granted, for twelve years; and to have and to hold all and every the said beds or veins of clay that shall be found and raised within the term out of any part of the land so authorized to be worked, unto Watts, his executors, etc., unto his and their own use. So far we are dealing with the demising part of the instrument, which refers to specific lands and to specific clay which is believed by both parties to be under the lands described at the time. The whole scope of the contract is that the defendant shall take that clay. Whether the speculation would turn out to be a profitable one to the tenant or not was uncertain. So far it was natural that he should take the risk. But the question is whether we are justified in importing another element into a bargain like this, namely, a warranty by the tenant that clay shall be found, or an undertaking to pay for the quantity stipulated for, whether found or not. * * * The bare statement of the provisions of the deed leads me to the conclusion that the tenant never intended to warrant that there was clay upon the land, and that neither party contemplated that he should, in the event of no clay being found there, at all events pay a minimum fixed rent during the term. It is a bare stipulation as to the rate of payment for the clay which should be raised. That appears to me to be the natural and ordinary construction of the covenant when read by the light of the context. It turned out that there was no clay of the descriptions mentioned on the land. The covenant therefore became inapplicable, and has not been broken. * * *

Cases may be conceived in which a man may undertake to do that which turns out to be impossible, and yet he may still be bound by his agreement. I am not prepared to say that there may not be cases in which a man may have contracted to do something which in the present state of scientific knowledge may be utterly impossible, and yet he may have so contracted as to warrant the possibility of its performance by means of some new discovery, or be liable in damages for the nonperformance, and cannot set up by way of defence that the thing was impossible. But before we arrive at such a conclusion we must be satisfied, if no other reasonable construction suggests itself, that the party really did intend to warrant that to be possible which was impossible. The authorities relied on for the plaintiff appear to me to be cases where a man either undertook to do a thing which was possible at the time, but which, without any fault of his adversary, became afterwards impossible, or where he, notwithstanding the thing was impossible of performance, took upon himself to warrant that it should be possible. Barker v. Hodgson, 3 M. & S. 267, was a case where the charterer of a ship had covenanted to send a cargo alongside at a foreign port, but in consequence of the prevalence of an infectious disorder at the port, all public intercourse was prohibited by the authorities of the place, and yet he was held to be responsible in damages for the nonperformance of his covenant. If the intercourse with the foreign port had been prohibited by the law of this country, the act would have been illegal, and the defendant would have been excused, not because he could not, but, because he ought not to do it. But where the performance of the thing covenanted to be done is not made impossible by the law of this country, the case falls within the principle laid down in the leading case of Paradine v. Jane, Aleyn, 26, where the defendant, in an action for rent, sought to excuse himself by reason of his having been expelled from the premises by alien enemies, and his plea was held insufficient. The material resolution of the court was, that "where the law creates a duty or charge, and the party is disabled to perform it, without any default in him, and hath no remedy over, there the law will excuse him;" but "when the party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract; and therefore if the lessee covenant to repair a house, though it be burnt by lightning, or thrown down by enemies, yet he ought to repair it." Where a thing becomes impossible of performance by the act of a third person, or even by the act of God, its impossibility affords no excuse for its nonperformance; it is the defendant's own folly that has led him to make such a bargain without providing against the possible contingency. In the present case, if the allegations in the plea be true, there was nothing upon which the covenant could attach at the time it was entered into. Hills v. Sughrue, 15 M. & W. 253, has no application, for another reason. There the charterer by his contract warranted that, the ship being ready to take a cargo of guano at Ichaboe, he would there provide her with a full cargo. The impossibility of obtaining a cargo there was no excuse for the nonperformance of his contract. That case therefore falls within the second category of cases, where the defendant had warranted the possibility of doing the thing contracted for.

It remains only to deal with Marquis of Bute v. Thompson, 13 M. & W. 487. There, by the express terms of the contract, the lessee covenanted absolutely to raise a given quantity of coal in each year, or to pay a minimum rent which should represent the minimum amount of coal agreed to be worked; and the lessee failing to raise the stipulated quantity of coal, he was held bound at all events to pay the minimum rent. The judgment of the court is very short, and but for the facts might possibly be taken to bear the construction put upon it by Mr. Kingdon, namely, that the lessee was bound to perform his covenant whether there was coal to be found or not. The judgment, however, must be read with reference to the subject-matter with which the court was dealing; and so reading it, it is plain that the court construed the covenant, not as a stipulation exhausting itself upon the first branch as to the raising of the coal, but as an alternative covenant to secure the lessor at all events a minimum rent during the term, whether or not coal was worked or was there to be worked. There is, however, no such covenant here; there is only a covenant to work out all the clay under the land, and this covenant was not broken by the defendant's failure to work clay if none was to be found there. I therefore think the defendant is entitled to judgment.

¹⁸⁶ "If [the impossibility is] unknown to both parties there is little occasion

TAYLOR v. CALDWELL.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1863. 3 Best & Smith, 826.)

BLACKBURN, J.¹⁸⁷ In this case the plaintiffs and defendants had, on May 27th, 1861, entered into a contract by which the defendants agreed to let the plaintiffs have the use of the Surrey Gardens and Music Hall on four days, then to come—viz., June 17th, July 15th, August 5th, and August 19th, for the purpose of giving a series of four grand concerts, and day and night fêtes, at the Gardens and Hall, on those days respectively; and the plaintiffs agreed to take the Gardens and Hall on those days, and pay £100 for each day.

The parties inaccurately call this a "letting," and the money to be paid, a "rent;" but the whole agreement is such as to show that the defendants were to retain the possession of the Hall and Gardens, so that there was to be no demise of them, and that the contract was merely to give the plaintiffs the use of them on those days. Nothing, however, in our opinion, depends on this. The agreement then proceeds to set out various stipulations between the parties as to what each was to supply for these concerts and entertainments, and as to the manner in which they should be carried on. The effect of the whole is to show that the existence of the Music Hall in the Surrey Gardens, in a state fit for a concert, was essential for the fulfilment of the contract—such entertainments as the parties contemplated in their agreement could not be given without it.

After the making of the agreement, and before the first day on which a concert was to be given, the Hall was destroyed by fire. This destruction, we must take it on the evidence, was without the fault of either party, and was so complete, that in consequence the concerts could not be given as intended. And the question we have to decide is whether, under these circumstances, the loss which the plaintiffs have sustained is to fall upon the defendants. The parties, when framing their agreement, evidently had not present to their minds the possibility of such a disaster, and have made no express stipulation with reference to it, so that the answer to the question must depend upon the general rules of law applicable to such a contract.

to distinguish existing impossibility from supervening impossibility. Parties deal with unknown present situations on the same basis as future contingent occurrences, and the law of contracts should adopt this method of dealing with them. There is, therefore, no more difficulty in finding a binding contract to perform something in fact impossible from the outset, if the facts or their import are unknown to the parties than there is in making a contract in which a promisor takes the risk of supervening impossibility." 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1933, p. 3285.

In Mineral Park Land Co. v. Howard, 172 Cal. 289 (1916), where gravel and earth was to be taken and existed, but where it turned out to be possible of removal only at ten to twelve times the usual cost, performance was excused.

¹⁸⁷ The statement of facts and parts of the opinion are omitted.

There seems no doubt that where there is a positive contract to do a thing, not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of unforeseen accidents the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burdensome or even impossible. The law is so laid down in 1 Roll. Abr. 450, Condition (G), and in the note 2 to Walton v. Waterhouse, 2 Wms. Saund. 421a, 6th ed., and is recognized as the general rule by all the judges in the much discussed case of Hall v. Wright, E. B. & E. 746. But this rule is only applicable when the contract is positive and absolute, and not subject to any condition either express or implied; and there are authorities which, as we think, establish the principle that where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor.

There seems little doubt that this implication tends to further the great object of making the legal construction such as to fulfil the intention of those who entered into the contract. For in the course of affairs men in making such contracts in general would, if it were brought to their minds, say that there should be such a condition. * * *

There is a class of contracts in which a person binds himself to do something which requires to be performed by him in person; and such promises—for example, promises to marry, or promises to serve for a certain time, are never in practice qualified by an express exception of the death of the party; and therefore in such cases the contract is in terms broken if the promisor dies before fulfilment. Yet it was very early determined that, if the performance is personal, the executors are not liable. Hyde v. The Dean of Windsor, Cro. Eliz. 552, 553. See 2 Wms. Exors. 1560, 5th ed., where a very apt illustration is given. "Thus," says the learned author, "if an author undertakes to compose a work, and dies before completing it, his executors are discharged from this contract, for the undertaking is merely personal in its nature, and, by the intervention of the contractor's death, has become impossible to be performed." For this he cites a dictum of Lord Lyndhurst in Marshall v. Broadhurst, 1 Tyr. 348, 349, and a case mentioned by Patteson, J., in Wentworth v. Cock, 10 A. & E. 42, 45-46. In Hall v. Wright, E. B. & E. 746, 749, Crompton, J., in his judgment, puts another case. "Where a contract depends upon personal skill, and the act of God renders it impossible, as, for instance, in the case of a painter employed to paint a picture who is struck blind, it may be that the performance might be excused."

It seems that in those cases the only ground on which the parties or their executors can be excused from the consequences of the breach of the contract, is, that from the nature of the contract there is an implied condition of the continued existence of the life of the contractor, and perhaps in the case of the painter, of his eyesight. In the instances just given, the person, the continued existence of whose life is necessary to the fulfilment of the contract, is himself the contractor, but that does not seem in itself to be necessary to the application of the principle, as is illustrated by the following example. In the ordinary form of an apprentice deed, the apprentice binds himself in unqualified terms to "serve until the full end and term of seven years to be fully complete and ended," during which term it is covenanted that the apprentice his master "faithfully shall serve," and the father of the apprentice in equally unqualified terms binds himself for the performance by the apprentice of all and every covenant on his part. See the form, 2 Chitty on Pleading, 370, 7th ed., by Greening. It is undeniable that if the apprentice dies within the seven years, the covenant of the father that he shall perform his covenant to serve for seven years is not fulfilled, yet surely it cannot be that an action would lie against the father. Yet the only reason why it would not is that he is excused because of the apprentice's death.

These are instances where the implied condition is of the life of a human being, but there are others in which the same implication is made as to the continued existence of a thing. For example, where a contract of sale is made amounting to a bargain and sale, transferring presently the property in specific chattels, which are to be delivered by the vendor at a future day; there, if the chattels, without the fault of the vendor, perish in the interval, the purchaser must pay the price, and the vendor is excused from performing his contract to deliver, which has thus become impossible.

That this is the rule of the English law is established by the case of Rugg v. Minett, 11 East, 210, where the article that perished before delivery was turpentine, and it was decided that the vendor was bound to refund the price of all those lots in which the property had not passed; but was entitled to retain without deduction the price of those lots in which the property had passed, though they were not delivered, and though in the conditions of sale, which are set out in the report, there was no express qualification of the promise to deliver on payment. It seems in that case rather to have been taken for granted than decided that the destruction of the thing sold before delivery excused the vendor from fulfilling his contract to deliver on payment.

The same principle seems to be involved in the decision of Sparrow v. Sowgate, W. Jones, 29, where, to an action of debt on an obligation by bail, conditioned for the payment of the debt or the render of the debtor, it was held a good plea that before any default in rendering him the principal debtor died. It is true that was the case of a bond with a condition, and a distinction is sometimes made in this respect between a condition and a contract. But this observation does not apply to Williams v. Lloyd, W. Jones, 179. In that case the count, which was in assumpsit, alleged that the plaintiff had delivered a horse to the defendant, who promised to redeliver it on request. Breach, that though requested to redeliver the horse he refused. Plea, that the horse was sick and died, and the plaintiff made the request after its death; and on demurrer it was held a good plea, as the bailee was discharged from his promise by the death of the horse without default or negligence on the part of the defendant. "Let it be admitted," say the court, "that he promised to deliver it on request, if the horse die before, that is become impossible by the act of God, so the party shall be discharged, as much as if an obligation were made conditioned to deliver the horse on request, and he died before it." And Jones, adds the report, cited 22 Ass. 41, in which it was held that a ferryman who had promised to carry a horse safe across the ferry was held chargeable for the drowning of the animal only because he had overloaded the boat, and it was agreed that notwithstanding the promise no action would have laid had there been no neglect or default on his part.

It may, we think, be safely asserted to be now English law, that in all contracts of loan of chattels or bailments if the performance of the promise of the borrower or bailee to return the things lent or bailed, becomes impossible because it has perished, this impossibility (if not arising from the fault of the borrower or bailee from some risk which he has taken upon himself) excuses the borrower or bailee from the performance of his promise to redeliver the chattel. * * * The principle seems to us to be that, in contracts in which the performance depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing, a condition is implied that the impossibility of performance arising from the perishing of the person or thing shall excuse the performance.

In none of these cases is the promise in words other than positive, nor is there any express stipulation that the destruction of the person or thing shall excuse the performance; but that excuse is by law implied, because from the nature of the contract it is apparent that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the particular person or chattel. In the present case, looking at the whole contract, we find that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the Music Hall at the time when the concerts were to be given, that being essential to their performance.

We think, therefore, that the Music Hall having ceased to exist, without fault of either party, both parties are excused, the plaintiffs from taking the gardens and paying the money, the defendants from performing their promise to give the use of the Hall and Gardens and other things. Consequently the rule must be absolute to enter the verdict for the defendants.

*Rule absolute.*¹⁰⁸

HOWELL v. COUPLAND.

(Court of Appeal, 1876. 1 Q. B. D., 258.)

The plaintiff is a potato merchant at Holbeach, Lincolnshire, and the defendant a farmer at Whaplode, in the same county.

In 1872 the defendant, at the proper season, and in the due course

¹⁰⁸ In Shawmut National Bank v. Boston, 118 Mass. 125 (1875), Morton, J., said: "The case presents, therefore, the question as to the rights of the lessees where different rooms in the same building are leased to different tenants, and the whole building is destroyed by fire. In Stockwell v. Hunter, 11 Met. (Mass.) 448, this question was carefully considered. In that case the tenant had a lease of the cellar and basement story of a building three stories high, each story being occupied by separate tenants, his lease containing no stipulations as to rebuilding in case of fire, and it was held that the destruction of the building terminated the interest of the lessee in the premises. This was upon the ground that such leases of distinct rooms do not carry any interest in the land beyond that connected with the enjoyment of the particular room; that the room was the thing leased, and that the destruction of the principal thing leased necessarily terminated the lessee's interest therein. This decision has been followed in Graves v. Berdan, 26 N. Y. 498; Alnsworth v. Ritt, 38 Cal. 89, and McMillan v. Solomon, 42 Ala. 356."

See Martin, etc., Co. v. Siegel, etc., Co., 237 Ill. 610 (1909), where a contract for the third floor in a department store was held discharged by the total destruction of the building, and where Dunn, J., at p. 616, said: "And in case a new building is erected having a similar space in the same location as in the old building, the tenant is not entitled to occupy it. Stockwell v. Hunter, 11 Metc. 456."

If a leasehold building is accidentally destroyed, the common law doctrine was that the lessee is nevertheless bound to perform his covenant to pay rent. Fowler v. Bott, 6 Mass. 63 (1809). See Stubbings v. Evanston, 136 Ill. 37 (1891). This was so even though the destruction was total. Izon v. Gorton, 5 Bing. N. C. 501 (1839). But in general in the United States, total destruction of the building is a defense. Humiston, Keeling & Co. v. Wheeler, 175 Ill. 514 (1898); Hahn v. Baker Lodge, 21 Ore. 30 (1891). See local statutes. If a lease contains an express covenant by the lessee to make repairs or a covenant to surrender the premises at the expiration of the term in as good condition as at the beginning of the tenancy, the common law doctrine was that if the premises are injured by third persons (Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416 (1868); see Beach v. Crain, 2 N. Y. 86 (1848)), or the building thereon is destroyed by accidental fire (Phillips v. Stevens, 16 Mass. 238 (1819); Hoy v. Holt, 91 Pa. St. 88 (1879); Armstrong v. Maybee, 17 Wash. 24 (1897)), the performance of the covenant was not excused, but the premises must be restored. But this common law doctrine has been changed in some states. Wattles v. South Omaha Ice & Coal Co., 50 Neb. 251 (1897). See local statutes.

of husbandry, appropriated between 80 and 90 acres of land for the growth of potatoes: 68 acres at Whaplode, and about 20 in Holbeach.

In March of the same year the plaintiff and the defendant entered into the following contract: "A memorandum of agreement, made this day of , 1872, between Robert Coupland, of Whaplode, and John Howell, of Holbeach, whereby Robert Coupland agrees to sell, and the said John Howell agrees to purchase, 200 tons of regent potatoes grown on land belonging to the said Robert Coupland in Whaplode, at and after the rate of £3 10s. 6d. per ton, to be riddled on 1½-inch riddle, and delivered at Holbeach railway station, good and marketable ware, during the months of September or October, as the said John Howell, may direct, and under his direction, the purchaser to find riddles. It is further agreed between the said Robert Coupland and the said John Howell, that the said potatoes shall be paid for when and as they are taken away."

At the time of making the contract, out of the 68 acres in Whaplode 25 were actually sown with potatoes, and the remaining 43 acres were ready for sowing. The 43 acres were afterward sown in due course, and the whole 68 acres together were amply sufficient, in an ordinary season and in the ordinary course of cultivation, to produce a much larger quantity than 200 tons, the land producing, on an average, 7 tons to the acre.

In July and August, without any default on the part of defendant, a disease which no skill or care on the part of the defendant could have prevented attacked the crop and caused it to fail; and when the time for taking it up arrived, the whole marketable produce of the crop of the lands of the defendant, both in Whaplode and Holbeach together, amounted to no more than 79 tons 8 cwt., and this quantity the defendant delivered to the plaintiff. The rest of the crop had perished from the disease.

If the defendant had had other land to plant with potatoes at the time when the disease was discovered, which in fact he had not, it would have been too late to sow it.

The present action was brought to recover damages for the non-delivery of the residue of the 200 tons, and the verdict at the trial was entered for £432 5s., leave being reserved to move to enter the verdict for the defendant, on the ground that he was not liable to deliver the ungrown potatoes.

A rule having been obtained accordingly, it was made absolute by the Court of Queen's Bench on May 22d, 1874. Plaintiff appealed.

JAMES, L. J. I think the case was rightly considered in the court below to turn upon the construction of the contract. Is it a contract for a certain quantity of potatoes of a particular sort, with a warranty that they shall be supplied, or is it a contract to deliver 200 tons of potatoes out of a specific crop? I am of opinion it is the latter; and if so, the principle of the cases relied on applies, and the defendant is excused by reason of his being prevented by causes for which he is not answerable.

BAGGALLAY, J. A. ¹⁸⁹ I at first doubted whether the contract excluded the possibility of the defendant being able to perform his contract by delivering potatoes grown on other land; but on consideration it is clear the contract is confined to particular land; and the statement in the case is that 68 acres, the amount actually sown with potatoes, was a due proportion to enable the defendant to perform his contract in an ordinary season.

CLEASBY, B. I am of the same opinion. I put my decision, not so much on the ground that the defendant was excused by the act of God rendering the performance impossible, as upon the terms of the contract itself. This is not like a contract where the parties have agreed to deliver a cargo of grain at Odessa or any other port by a given time, in which case the parties are bound by the contract, although its performance has become impossible by vis major. Here there was not an absolute contract to deliver 200 tons of potatoes in September and October, but 200 tons of potatoes grown on particular land. Not 200 tons of potatoes simply, but 200 tons off particular land. The crop on this particular land has failed, and there is nothing to which the promise can apply. If the crop had existed at the time of the contract, and had afterward failed, there can be no doubt that the principle of the decided cases would apply and the defendant would be excused; and I cannot see any difference in principle from the fact that the crop had not been sown at the date of the contract.

*Appeal dismissed.*¹⁹⁰

¹⁹⁰ "The court did not err in directing a verdict for the defendant. It is true, as contended by counsel for the plaintiffs, that the general rule is that, when the contract is to do a thing which in itself is possible, the promisor will be liable for a breach thereof, notwithstanding it was beyond his power to perform it. The reason is that it was his own fault to run the risk of undertaking to perform an impossibility, when he might have provided against it by his contract. There are, however, well-known exceptions to this general rule, and one of them is that, where from the contract it is apparent that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of a given thing, a condition is implied that, if the performance became impossible from the perishing of the thing, that shall excuse the performance.

"In the instant case, according to the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs, the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiffs 300 bales of cotton which were growing on his farm in Miller county, Ark. The contract was executed on the 1st day of August. The defendant had planted 1,000 acres in cotton, and that number of acres usually made 500 or 600 bales of cotton. The contract related to the crop to be grown by the defendant on the latter's farm in Miller county. Under these circumstances the performance of it, in the contemplating of both parties, depended upon the future growth and continued existence of the cotton.

"The defendant delivered to the plaintiffs all the cotton that grew on the ANDERSON v. MAY.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1892. 50 Minn. 280, 52 N. W. 530, 17 L. R. A. 555, 36 Am. St. Rep. 642.)

GILFILLAN, C. J. The defendant having alleged as a counterclaim a contract in June, 1890, between him and plaintiff, whereby the latter agreed to sell and deliver to the former, on or before November 15th, certain quantities of specified kinds of beans, and that he failed so to do except as to a part thereof, the plaintiff, in his reply, alleged in substance that the contract was to deliver the beans from the crop that he should raise that year from his market gardening farm near farm, and he was therefore excused from a further performance of the contract. * * *

"Of course, if the defendant by the terms of the contract had warranted that he would raise 300 bales of cotton, he would be bound by the terms of his warranty, notwithstanding on account of weather conditions or other matters over which he had no control he failed to raise the designated number of bales." Hart, J., in C. G. Davis & Co. v. Bishop, 139 Ark. 273, 276-276, (1919).

"It is true that where an absolute executory contract is made, the contractor is not excused by inability to execute it caused by unforeseen accident or misfortune, but must perform or pay damages unless he has protected himself against such contingency by stipulation in the contract. Harmony v. Bingham, 12 N. Y. 99; Tompkins v. Dudley, 25 N. Y. 272; Wheeler v. Conn. Mut. L. Ins. Co., 82 N. Y. 543. But there may be in the nature of a contract an implied condition by which he will be relieved from such unqualified obligation, and when, in such case, without his fault, performance is rendered impossible, it may be excused. That is so when it inherently appears by it to have been known to the parties to the contract, and contemplated by them when it was made, that its fulfillment would be dependent upon the continuance or existence at the time for performance, of certain things or conditions essential to its execution. Then in the event they cease, before default, to exist or continue, and thereby performance becomes impossible without his fault, the contractor is, by force of the implied condition to which his contract is subject, relieved from liability for the consequences of his failure to perform. People v. Bartlett, 3 Hill 570; Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 62; Booth v. S. D. R. Mill Co., 60 N. Y. 491; Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826.

"By the contract now under consideration, the cheese and butter were to be manufactured at this factory, and to be made from the milk furnished by the patrons, of whom the plaintiff and his assignors were members. The existence of that particular factory was terminated by its destruction, and the loss with it of the manufactured product and of the milk then remaining there unconverted into cheese and butter rendered it impossible for the defendant to further proceed with the performance of his contract in respect to those articles of material and product. And as the nature of the agreement was such that it must be deemed to have been contemplated by the parties to it, that the articles to be manufactured should be made only from the materials furnished by the patrons and at the factory referred to, there was necessarily an implied condition so qualifying the defendant's undertaking, as to relieve him from performance rendered impossible without his fault, and from the consequences of his inability thus occasioned to fulfil his contract in respect to the subject of the bailment which was destroyed by the fire." Bradley, J., in Stewart v. Stone, 127 N. Y. 500, 507-508 (1891).

Red Wing. Upon the trial the contract was proved by letters passing between the parties. From these it fairly appears that the beans to be delivered were to be grown by plaintiff, though it cannot be gathered from them that he was to grow the beans on any particular land. They contain no restriction in that respect. There can be no question that, if grown by him, and of the kinds and quality specified, defendant would have been obliged to accept the beans, though not grown on any land previously cultivated by plaintiff. The contract, therefore, was, in effect, to raise and sell and deliver the quantities, kinds, and quality of beans specified—a contract in its nature possible of performance.

As an excuse for not delivering the entire quantity contracted for, the plaintiff relies on proof of the fact that an early unexpected frost destroyed or injured his crop to such extent that he was unable to deliver the entire quantity.

What, in the way of subsequently arising impossibility for the party to perform, will suffice as excuse for nonperformance of a contract, is well settled in the decisions; the only apparent difference in them arising from the application of the rules to particular circumstances. The general rule is as well stated as anywhere in 2 Chit. Cont. 1074, thus: "Where the contract is to do a thing which is possible in itself, or where it is conditioned on any event which happens, the promisor will be liable for a breach thereof, notwithstanding it was beyond his power to perform it; for it was his own fault to run the risk of undertaking to perform an impossibility, when he might have provided against it by his contract. And therefore, in such cases, the performance is not excused by the occurrence of an inevitable accident, or other contingency, although it was not foreseen by, or within the control of the party." An application of this rule is furnished by Cowley v. Davidson, 13 Minn. 92 (Gil. 86). What is sometimes called an "exception to the rule" is where the contract is implied to be made on the assumed continued existence of a particular person or thing, and the person or thing ceases to exist, as, where it is for personal service, and the person dies, or it is for repairs upon a particular ship or building, and the ship or building is destroyed. An agreement to sell and deliver at a future time a specific chattel existing when the agreement is made would come under this exception. The exception was extended further than in any other case we have found in Howell v. Coupland, L. R. 9 Q. B. 462. That was a contract to sell and deliver a certain quantity from a crop to be raised on a particular piece of land, and the entire crop was destroyed by blight. The court held the contract to be to deliver part of a specific thing, to wit, of the crop to be grown on a given piece of land, and held it to come within the rule that, where the obligation depends on the assumed existence of a specific thing, performance is excused by the destruction of the thing without the parties' fault. Without intimating whether we would follow that decision in a similar case, we will say that the case is unlike this, in that in this case the plaintiff was not limited or restricted to any particular land. It was not an undertaking to sell and deliver part of a specific crop, but a general undertaking to raise, sell, and deliver the specified quantity of beans. We have been cited to and found no case holding that, where one agrees generally to produce, or manufacture or otherwise, a particular thing, performance being possible in the nature of things, he may be excused from performance by the destruction, before completion or delivery, of the thing, from whatever cause, except the act of the other party. Applications of the general rule, where the thing agreed to be produced was, before completion, destroyed without the party's fault, are furnished in Adams v. Nichols, 19 Pick. 275, 279; School Dist. v. Dauchy, 25 Conn. 530; and Trustees v. Bennett, 27 N. J. Law 513, approved and followed in Stees v. Leonard, 20 Minn. 494 (Gil. 448). Where such causes may intervene to prevent a party performing, he should guard against them in his contract.

In Whipple v. Lyons Beet Sugar Refining Co., 118 N. Y. Supp. 338 (1909), the contract was to seed and grow eight acres of sugar beets in the town of Ridgeway, N. Y., following printed directions on the back of the contract. Plaintiff sowed eight acres according to contract, but there was a total failure of crop on four acres due to no fault on the part of the plaintiff, but attributed to drought. Plaintiff sued for the price of beets grown and delivered and the defendant counterclaimed for liquidated damages of $25 per acre for failure to live up to the contract as to four acres. Plaintiff could have taken any eight acres, but since plaintiff was to follow and did follow the instructions absolutely, it was held that the contract was one for a crop to be raised according to the defendant's specific instructions, and was subject to the implied condition that, if the seeds planted failed to grow on a portion of the land selected in accordance with such instructions by reason of drought or other climatic conditions over which the plaintiff had no control, performance would be excused. The court said: "The contract in suit is not a contract to deliver a certain quantity of beets absolutely, nor, on the other hand, is it, in terms, a contract to deliver a specific crop merely." But the court treated it as if it were the latter.

With the principal case compare Whitman v. Anglum, 92 Conn. 392 (1918), where defendant contracted to sell plaintiff so much milk a day for a year, the plaintiff to come for it, and where, though the defendant and all his cattle and all the products of his farm were quarantined and though, shortly after, the cows were killed by the proper public authorities to prevent the spreading of the hoof and mouth disease, the defendant was held liable for failure to deliver milk under the contract. That was because the contract did not require the milk to be produced on the premises and it was not illegal for the defendant to deliver milk or procure its delivery.

CHANDLER v. WEBSTER.

(High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division. [1904] 1 K. B. 493.)

COLLINS, M. R.¹⁹² In this case the plaintiff agreed with the defendant for the hire of a room for the purpose of viewing the coronation procession [of King Edward VII]. The price of the room was to be £141 15s. The plaintiff paid £100 before the date fixed for the procession, leaving a balance of £41 15s. unpaid. The procession did not take place [because of the illness of King Edward]. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action to recover the £100 which he had paid, and in that action the defendant counterclaimed for the unpaid balance of £41 15s. The learned [trial] judge [Wright, J.], decided that both the claim and the counterclaim failed; that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover back the £100 paid by him and the defendant was not entitled to be paid the balance of £41 15s. Against this decision both the parties appealed, the defendant's appeal being the first in date. He contends that in the event which happened, having regard to the terms of the contract, he is entitled to the balance of £41 15s. which the plaintiff has refused to pay him. I will deal with that appeal first. The question appears really to depend upon the terms of the contract made by the parties. Contracts in these cases arising out of the postponement of the coronation have formed the subject of several decisions; and it has been held that, in cases where the doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826, applies, that is to say, where the parties have made no express stipulation that money paid for viewing the procession shall be returned in the event of no procession taking place, and where, under the circumstances of the contract, no condition to that effect can be implied, the result of the procession being prevented from taking place is, that the further performance of the contract having become impossible, the person who has paid his money in pursuance of it, on the footing of the contract being subsequently performed in full, must nevertheless, abide the loss of what he has paid; and the person to whom a sum would have become payable on performance of the contract must also abide the loss, and cannot impose on the other party the obligation of paying that sum; in the event which has happened the fulfilment of the contract having become impossible, both parties are relieved from further performance of it. The question is how the law so laid down is to be applied in the present case.

Dealing first with the defendant's counterclaim for the balance of £41 15s., I think that, upon the authorities, it is clear that the defendant has a right to recover that balance, if the contract was that the price of the room should be paid before the time at which the procession became impossible. A person who has agreed to pay a sum of money cannot be in a better position by reason of his having failed to perform his obligation to pay it at the time when he ought to have done so, than that which he would have occupied if he had paid the money in accordance with the contract. If that be so, the question which we have to consider is whether the contract entered into bound the plaintiff to pay the price of the room before the date at which the procession became impossible. In my opinion it did so bind him, and it was not a condition precedent to his obligation to pay the money that the procession should take place. The terms of the contract are to be gathered from the correspondence between the parties. I need not refer to it in detail. It appears to me to be clear upon the correspondence that the understanding was that the £141 15s. for the use of the room was to be paid, either immediately or, at any rate, as soon as possible after the making of the contract, and certainly before the date when the procession became impossible. * * * That being so, in my opinion the application of the law, as established by the authorities which have been cited, to this case, is clear. The fulfilment of the contract having become impossible through no fault of either party, the law leaves the parties where they were and relieves them both from further performance of the contract. Therefore, if by the contract the obligation to pay for the room did not arise until after the procession had taken place, then, the obligation being based on the happening of the procession which has become impossible, the hirer is relieved from that obligation; but if by the contract the obligation to pay for the room had accrued before the procession became impossible, the hirer, if he has paid, cannot get his money back, and, if he has not paid, is still liable to pay. That being so, it appears to me that the defendant is entitled to succeed on the counterclaim.

Then, with regard to the plaintiff's claim for a return of the £100, to a very considerable extent I have already dealt incidentally with the considerations which apply to that claim. The plaintiff contends that he is entitled to recover the money which he has paid on the ground that there has been a total failure of consideration. He says that the condition on which he paid the money was that the procession should take place, and that, as it did not take place, there has been a total failure of consideration. That contention does no doubt raise a question of some difficulty, and one which has perplexed the courts to a considerable extent in several cases. The principle on which it has been dealt with is that which was applied in Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826,—namely, that, where, from causes outside the volition of the parties, something which was the basis of, or essential to the fulfilment of the contract, has become impossible, so that, from the time when the fact of that impossibility has been ascertained, the contract can no further be performed by either party, it remains a perfectly good contract up to that point, and everything previously done in pursuance of it must be treated as rightly done, but the parties are both discharged from further performance of it. If the effect were that the contract were wiped out altogether no doubt the result would be that money paid under it would have to be repaid as on a failure of consideration. But that is not the effect of the doctrine; it only releases the parties from further performance of the contract. Therefore the doctrine of failure of consideration does not apply.

The rule adopted by the courts in such cases is, I think, to some extent, an arbitrary one, the reason for its adoption being that it is really impossible in such cases to work out with any certainty what the rights of the parties in the event which has happened should be. Time has elapsed, and the position of both parties may have been more or less altered, and it is impossible to adjust or ascertain the rights of the parties with exactitude. That being so, the law treats everything that has already been done in pursuance of the contract as validly done, but relieves the parties of further responsibility under it. In the case of Blakeley v. Muller & Co., [1903] 2 K. B. 760, Wills, J., in giving judgment made some valuable observations on this point. He said, with regard to the decision in Appleby v. Myers, L. R. 2 C. P. 651, "That decision is, in my opinion, distinctly in point. The argument for the plaintiffs must be that the contract was rescinded ab initio. There is no authority to warrant that contention, and I cannot think it is well founded. The process of constructing a hypothetical contract by supposing what terms the parties would have arrived at if they had contemplated the possibility of what was going to happen is, to my mind, very unsatisfactory. It is very difficult to construct such a contract for them. Probably, in the present case, the defendants would have stipulated for compensation for their outlay, and the plaintiffs for a return of their money; but it is impossible to say with any certainty what the result of their bargaining would have been." It seems to me that he there points out the reason why the courts have been obliged to stop short where they have, namely, at the position of the parties when the further performance of the contract was excused for both, and why they have felt themselves constrained to adopt what appears to be a more or less arbitrary rule on the subject. * * *

For these reasons I think the judgment was right as to the claim, but wrong as to the counterclaim. The appeal must therefore be allowed and the cross-appeal disallowed.

*Appeal allowed and cross-appeal dismissed.*¹⁹³

Webster*, Professor Corbin has said: "It is to be observed in the first place that these coronation cases do not belong under the head of impossibility of performance. In all three of the cases mentioned in the text the performance of every act agreed upon by plaintiff and defendant remained as easy to perform after the king's illness as before. These acts consisted of delivery of posses-

PERLEE v. JEFFCOTT.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1916. 89 N. J. L. 34, 97 Atl. 789.)

Action by John H. Perlee against Robert C. Jeffcott.

From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

On August 30, 1913, Perlee, by writing under his hand and seal, in consideration of $500 cash and a promissory note for $500 payable September 1, 1914, gave and granted to Jeffcott an option to purchase a farm.

In case the option was not exercised by Jeffcott and all its terms complied with, the note was to be paid at maturity. If Jeffcott purchased the premises, the $1,000 paid, represented by the cash and the note, was to be credited on the purchase price. On August 20, 1914, the barn, which added substantially to the value of the premises, was struck by lightning, and, with other outbuildings, was totally destroyed. There is a suggestion in the case that the option was extended for two days from September 1, 1914, but no proof that this extension was by mutual agreement, or that it was anything more than the voluntary act of Perlee. On September 2d Jeffcott demanded the return of the cash and the note. On September 3d Perlee by written notice offered to extend the option to September 10th and to reduce the purchase price by $2,000 on account of the loss by fire. The defendant had insured the house and premises for $5,000 about two months after the date of the option. This suit was brought on the note in January, 1915, and Jeffcott counterclaimed the cash he had paid. The trial judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the note, and also on the counterclaim.

SWAYZE, J. The only ground upon which the cash paid by Jeffcott may be reclaimed is that there was a total failure of consideration. The consideration in a legal sense was Perlee's promise to keep the offer to sell open for a year. It was the promise, not the performance. The offer itself was a continuing offer, open to Jeffcott's acceptance at any time, and Perlee's promise was partially performed. Jeffcott has had the benefit of the option, and Perlee has suffered the detriment of being unable to sell or mortgage or lease his property for nearly the whole year. What has happened has been, not a total failure of consideration, but an inability to perform, due, not to any fault of either ston by the owner on the one hand and the payment of the agreed sum by the hirer on the other hand." Corbin's Anson on Contracts, 430, n. Accordingly, Professor Corbin regards the real question as one of whether the law shall construct conditions precedent or subsequent, as the case may require. He points out that in Chandler v. Webster, "the active duty of the defendant to pay actually arose," and asks: "Should it be discharged by the occurrence of some constructive condition subsequent?"

party, but to an act of God. The contract was for the conveyance of a specific thing—the farm and premises upon which Jeffcott resided. Both parties undoubtedly contemplated the conveyance of the buildings as an essential part of the premises. The destruction of the barn made this impossible. Such a contract is to be construed as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor. Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826, 834. In that case Blackburn, J., said:

“The principle seems to us to be that in contracts in which the performance depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing a condition is implied that the impossibility of performance arising from the perishing of the person or thing shall excuse the performance.”

Taylor v. Caldwell is the leading case. It has been approved by our Court of Errors and Appeals in Middlesex Water Co. v. Knappmann Whiting Co., 64 N. J. Law, 240, at 252, 45 Atl. 692, 49 L. R. A. 572, 81 Am. St. Rep. 467, and was there recognized as an exception to the rule. It has been followed and applied under varying states of fact in several cases growing out of contracts made in view of the proposed coronation of Edward VII, which was postponed on account of his illness. Elliott v. Crutchley, [1903] 2 K. B. 476, affirmed [1906] 1 K. B. 565; Herne Bay Steamboat Co. v. Hutton, [1903] 2 K. B. 683; Krell v. Henry, [1903] 2 K. B. 740; Civil Service Co-operative Society v. General Steam Navigation Co., [1903] 2 K. B. 756.

We think therefore that the trial judge was right in giving judgment for the plaintiff on Jeffcott's counterclaim to recover the cash paid.

The same reasoning leads us to think he was wrong in giving judgment against the defendant for the amount of the note. This note was not due when the performance of the contract became impossible by reason of the fire. Both parties were excused from further performance. Jeffcott was excused from payment of the note as Perlee was excused from his promise to keep the option open for the whole year. The option provided that the note when paid should be credited on account of the purchase price of the farm. Since the farm could no longer be conveyed in the condition contemplated by the parties, the contract in this respect could not be carried out. There should have been judgment for the defendant in the claim on the note.

The judgment must be reversed, but without costs, and the record remitted for a new trial.¹⁹⁴

PETER GOULED v. MICHAEL L. HOLWITZ.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1921. 113 Atl. 323.)

On defendant's rule to show cause after verdict for plaintiff.

GUMMERE, C. J. The plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement in writing, under date of December 13, 1918, by the terms of which the former rented to the latter a team of horses, a farm wagon, and a set of double harness. They were delivered to the defendant upon the following expressed understanding:

"To give board to said horses, free of charge for their care, and for reasonable work, for a period of twelve weeks from above date, and to return said horses and other property upon demand in as good condition as they are at present."

During the period covered by the bailment one of the horses was taken sick. A veterinarian was thereupon sent for by the defendant, who diagnosed the horse's disease as spinal meningitis, and left instructions as to what should be done. These instructions were carried out. A day or two afterwards an agent from the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals visited the defendant's premises, and, going to a shed where the horse was stabled, shot and killed him over the protest of the defendant. It is submitted that proper care had been taken of the animal by the defendant up to the time he became ill. The plaintiff conceiving that, under the terms of the contract of bailment, the defendant was not excused from the performance of his agreement to return the horse in good condition, notwithstanding the above-recited facts, instituted the present action to recover its value. The trial judge, concurring in the plaintiff's view of the law, charged the jury that the defendant's agreement to return the horse in good condition was an absolute one, and that consequently he was liable for the value of the horse. The jury thereupon found for the plaintiff and assessed his damages at $350. The determination of this rule depends upon the soundness of the instruction to the jury.

As a general rule, where a party contracts expressly to do a thing not unlawful, the contractor must perform his agreement, and if, by some unforeseen accident, the performance is prevented, he must pay damages for not doing it. And there is no distinction between accidents that could be foreseen when the contract was entered into and those that could not have been foreseen. Where from the result of such an accident one of two innocent persons must sustain a loss, the law casts it upon him who has agreed to sustain it, or, rather, leaves it where the agreement of the parties has put it, and will not insert for the benefit of one of the parties by construction an exception which the parties have, either by design or neglect, omitted to insert in their agreement. School Trustees v. Bennett, 27 N. J. Law, 513, 72 Am. Dec. 373; Middlesex Water Co. v. Knappmann Whiting Co., 64 N. J. Law, 240, 45 Atl. 692, 49 L. R. A. 572, 81 Am. St. Rep. 467. But, as was stated in the case last cited, this general rule is not universally applicable, and one of the exceptions to it is where the continued existence of something essential to the performance is an implied condition of the contract; and the question, therefore, before us is whether the agreement to return the horse at the end of the term of bailment in as good condition as it was when the plaintiff received it was absolute, and so within the general rule, or whether its destruction, without the fault of the defendant, before the time of its return to the plaintiff had arrived, brought the case within the exception to the rule, and absolved the former from performance. Speaking of a similar contract, Peckman, J., in the case of Young v. Leary, 135 N. Y. 569, 576, 32 N. E. 607, 609, declared that where the contract relates to the hiring for use of the thing hired, and the bailee expressly agrees to redeliver the article hired upon the determination of the term of hiring, there is implied a condition of the continued existence of the thing which is the subject of the contract, and if it perish without any fault of the hirer, so that redelivery becomes impossible, the hirer is excused. That, for instance, if a horse be delivered to one under an express promise to redeliver when demanded, and the horse die before the demand, and without fault on the part of the bailee, he is excused. And he concludes with the following statement of the legal rule:

“The authorities establish the principle that where from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for the fulfillment of the contract arrived, some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that when entering into the contract they must have contemplated such continued existence as the foundation of what was to be done, then in the absence of any express or implied warranty that a thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but is subject to an implied condition that the party shall be excused in case before breach the contract becomes impossible [of performance] from the perishing of the thing without the default of the contractor.”

And Swayze, J., in the case of Perlee v. Jeffcott, 89 N. J. Law, 34, 97 Atl. 789, says that the true rule in cases of this kind is laid down by Mr. Justice Blackburn in Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826, namely, that:

“In contracts in which the performance depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing, a condition is implied that the impossibility of performance arising from the perishing of the person or thing [without the fault of the person against whom the contract is sought to be enforced] shall excuse the performance.”

In our opinion, the present case comes within exception to the general rule stated in the Middlesex Water Co. Case, and is controlled by the decision in Perlee v. Jeffcott, supra.

The rule to show cause will be made absolute.

ROWE ET AL. v. TOWN OF PEABODY.

TOWN OF PEABODY v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY &
GUARANTY CO.

Actions by Ransome Rowe and another against the Town of Peabody, and by the Town of Peabody against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, tried together. The first was contract on an account annexed for work, labor, and materials and machinery furnished the town of Peabody in the construction of a tunnel for its waterworks. The second action was on a bond given by the Guaranty Company to secure the performance by Rowe & Perini (the plaintiffs in the first action) of a contract to construct the tunnel. The court directed a verdict for the defendant in the first case, and Rowe & Jerini excepted. In the second case a verdict was returned for the plaintiff for the face of the bond and interest, and the Guaranty Company excepted. Exceptions overruled.

SHELDON, J.¹⁹⁵ The plaintiffs in the first suit, hereinafter called the contractors, made in July, 1905, an agreement with the town of Peabody for the building of a tunnel from Suntaug Lake for a distance of 1,550 feet, and for the laying of certain pipe and the performance of other specified work. The contractors were to do all the work and supply the materials, so as to furnish to the town a completed tunnel with all its equipment, and were to be paid fixed prices for the different parts of what they were to do. They gave to the town a bond with the defendant in the second suit as surety, conditioned for their faithful performance of the contract. The work was to be a timber-supported tunnel, in which was to be constructed a masonry conduit 30 inches in diameter. The judge instructed the jury that the contract required as essential conditions "the construction of a tunnel 30 inches in diameter by the use of timber props, roof supports and lagging. It was not a contract for constructing a suitable tunnel by whatever method should become available." He further ruled that under the contract the officers acting for the town had no power "to require the contractors without their consent to construct a tunnel by pneumatic process 48 inches in diameter. Such requirement would not be a mere variation in form and dimensions which the contractors must adopt, * * * but would be the substitution of a different contract." Both of these rulings were made at the request of the contractors and apparently without objection by any party. They must now be taken as correct. MacKnight Flintic Stone Co. v. New York, 160 N. Y. 72, 54 N. E. 661.

The contractors began to construct the tunnel as required by the contract, but presently found that owing to the nature of the soil there were serious difficulties, so great, they contended, as to make the construction in that way practically impossible, and certainly so great as to make it impracticable without a very large and disproportionate expense, such as they were not able to incur. Finally, on October 27th, after some negotiations with the engineer and with the committee of the town, which so far as necessary will be referred to hereafter, the contractors sent to the committee a letter formally abandoning the contract. The town then completed the tunnel by what is called the pneumatic construction, which necessarily involved a cost of $47,805.12 in excess of the contract price. It was also necessary under this mode of construction to make the diameter of the tunnel 48 inches instead of 30 inches. This mode of construction, as already pointed out, was essentially different from that originally contracted for; but it does not seem to have been disputed that if not the only practicable method, it was at least the cheapest, most expeditious and most economical method by which the tunnel could be constructed.

The first contention made in behalf of the contractors is that the performance of their contract was impossible, or at least that it might have been found by the jury to be impossible, and that for this reason the contract was no longer binding upon the parties. They argue that a contract to build a particular tunnel of specified dimensions by a described method of construction is like a contract to ship goods by a certain steamer, or to sell potatoes to be raised upon certain specified land, or to account for the proceeds of butter to be made in a certain factory, or to build a bridge by the caisson method—in each of which cases it has been held that the continued existence of the subject-matter of the contract or the continued practicability of the essential details that are stipulated for is an implied condition of the continued validity of the agreement. Krell v. Henry, [1903] 2 K. B. 740; Chandler v. Webster, [1904] 1 K. B. 473; Howell v. Coupland, 1 Q. B. D. 258; Stewart v. Stone, 127 N. Y. 500, 28 N. E. 595, 14 L. R. A. 215; Buffalo & Lancaster Land Co. v. Bellevue Improvement & Land Co., 165 N. Y. 247, 59 N. E. 5, 51 L. R. A. 951; Lovering v. Buck Mountain Coal Co., 54 Pa. 291. This is the same principle which we recently considered in Hawkes v. Kehoe, 193 Mass. 419, 79 N. E. 766, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 125. It has frequently been applied in the courts. See, besides the cases already cited, Agnus v. Scully, 176 Mass. 357, 57 N. E. 674, 49 L. R. A. 562, 79 Am. St. Rep. 318; Butterfield v. Byron, 153 Mass. 517, 27 N. E. 667, 12 L. R. A. 571, 25 Am. St. Rep. 654; Elliott v. Crutchley, [1903] 2 K. B. 476; McKenna v. McNamee, 15 Canada S. C. 311. But the question is as to the construction of the contract which the parties have made. This was recognized in most of the cases above cited. One who chooses to contract absolutely for the performance of a certain thing is not to be excused from such performance, in the absence of any other ground, merely because it either was originally or has since become impossible of execution. As was said by Blackburn, J., in the leading case of Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 Best & S. 826, 833, "Where there is a positive contract to do a thing not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of unforeseen accidents the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burdensome or even impossible. This also has been frequently declared by the courts. Jones v. St. John's College, L. R. 6 Q. B. 115, 127; Paradise v. Jane, Aleyn, 26; Atkinson v. Ritchie, 10 East 530; Hill v. Sughrue, 15 M. & W. 253; Harvey v. Murray, 136 Mass. 377; Drake v. White, 117 Mass. 10; Stees v. Leonard, 20 Minn. 494 (Gil. 448). As was said by the present Chief Justice in Butterfield v. Byron, 153 Mass. 517, 520, 27 N. E. 667, 668, 12 L. R. A. 571, 25 Am. St. Rep. 654, "the fundamental question is, What is the true construction of the contract?"

In the case at bar the contract expressly stated that the nature of the underground plot had not been investigated, and that the committee of the town denied any responsibility for its character. The contractors also agreed by the twenty-third article of the contract to take all responsibility for the work and to bear all losses resulting on account of its nature or character or because of the nature of the ground being different from what was estimated or expected. The difficulties which it was claimed made the prescribed mode of construction impossible arose wholly from the character of the soil beneath the surface. They were warned that there might be such difficulties, and no one could say in advance, that these might not be very great, or even insuperable. But they chose to make their agreement an absolute one, and the court cannot relieve them from the bargain which they saw fit to make. The case is well within the decisions. Boyle v. Agawam Canal Co., 22 Pick. 381, 33 Am. Dec. 749; Dermott v. Jones, 2 Wall. 1, 17 L. Ed. 762; Eastman v. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co., 24 Minn. 437; Thorn v. Mayor of London, L. R. 9 Exch. 163; L. R. 10 Exch. 112, 1 App. Cas. 120. There are three English cases, decided respectively in the House of Lords or in the Court of Appeals, which resemble closely the case at bar. Jackson v. Eastbourne Local Board, 2 Hudson, Building Contracts (3d Ed.) 67; Bottoms v. Lord Mayor of York, Id. 220; and McDonald v. Mayor of Workington, Id. 240. In the first of these cases, Lord Esher said in the Court of Appeal: "When a man is asked to tender upon specifications, he must inquire whether it is possible for him to do the work which he engages to do, and if he does not then find out that it is impossible, he is not excused by reason that, from the difficulties of the work it is afterwards found impossible. He has contracted to do it, and must fulfil his contract."

We are clearly of opinion that these contractors were not excused from the performance of their agreement by reason of its alleged impossibility, but that they were bound either to accomplish what they had promised to do or to respond in damages for their failure. * * *

The exceptions in each case must be overruled.

PHILLIPS v. ALHAMBRA PALACE COMPANY.

(High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division. [1901] 1 Q. B. 59.)

The plaintiffs were a troupe of four music-hall performers, and in October, 1897, they entered into a contract with certain music hall proprietors calling themselves the Alhambra Palace Company to appear and perform at the Alhambra Palace Hall, for a period of twelve nights commencing August 8, 1898, at a weekly salary of 28*l.*, and also for a further period of twelve nights commencing October 23d, 1899, at a similar salary. It was provided by the contract that "in the event of any unforeseen calamity by which the business may be suspended or stopped, all engagements will terminate immediately." In the contract the proprietors of the music hall were described simply as the Alhambra Palace Company, and it was signed on their behalf by T. H. Greasley, who was described as the managing director. The Alhambra Palace Company was in fact a partnership, which at the time of the making of the said contract consisted of three partners, T. H. Greasley, H. Willford, and P. Robson, but it was admitted that the plaintiffs had at that time no knowledge of the composition or nature of the company with which they were contracting. The property of the company was at that time heavily mortgaged. On December 16, 1897, Willford died, and the business was carried on by the surviving partners, but no notice was given to the plaintiffs of the death. In August, 1898, the plaintiffs carried out the first part of their engagement, and were paid for their services. On July 4, 1899, the mortgagees sold the music hall under their power of sale. The plaintiffs had meanwhile been on tour fulfilling engagements abroad, and returned to this country in September, 1899, in readiness to perform the second part of their engagement in October. On arriving at Plymouth they received a notice to the effect that in consequence of the death of one of the proprietors and consequent dissolution of partnership, the Alhambra Palace had been sold and closed, and all contracts were void. The plaintiffs declined to accept the notice cancelling their engagement, and claimed their right to carry it out. They presented themselves at the music hall at the time fixed by the contract, but were not allowed to perform. They then commenced this action in the High Court against the surviving partners, and the executor of Willford to recover the sum of 56*l.*, being the amount of salary which they would have been entitled to if the contract had been carried out. The action was remitted for trial to the county court. The defendants resisted the claim on the grounds—(1) that, the contract being one for personal service, was cancelled by the death of one partner, and (2) that the sale by the mortgagees was an “unforeseen calamity.” The county court judge overruled both objections and gave judgment for the plaintiffs as against the surviving partners Greasley and Robson, but dismissed the executors of Willford from the action. The defendants appealed.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C. J.¹⁹⁷ * * * With regard to the second point, I do not think that interference by the mortgagees in the exercises of their power of sale can be regarded as an unforeseen calamity of the kind contemplated by the provision of the contract. As to the other point, whether the death of one partner puts an end to the contract, there is more difficulty. The principle of law, however, seems to be that it must be determined in each case whether the obligation which it is sought to enforce depended upon the personal conduct of the deceased party.

* * * If in any particular case the contract is one which has relation to the personal conduct of the contracting party, then the death of that party puts an end to the contract; if, on the other hand, it has no such relation, the death of the contracting party has not that effect. In the present case I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs did not rely on the personnel of the partners, who were unknown to them. And under those circumstances I am of opinion that the liability contracted by the three partners can after the death of one of them be enforced against the two survivors.

The appeal must be dismissed.

KENNEDY, J. I agree that the case is one of some difficulty. I think on the authority of the decisions and also of the text books, the true question in each case must be, What did the contracting parties intend to do by their contract? Each contract must be considered with reference to its terms, to the relation between the parties, and the nature of the engagement. It may be that the contract is so dependent on the continued existence of the partnership business, as in Tasker v. Shepherd, 6 H. & N. 575, or on the personal honesty or capacity of the particular partner, as in Robson v. Drummond, 2 B & Ad. 303, that the death of one partner will put an end to the contract altogether.

* * * It is clear that no absolute rule can be laid down which shall be applicable to all cases. The case of Tasker v. Shepherd, supra, has certainly gone as far as any case. But even there the judges did not go upon the ground that the case fell within the principle of those cases in which the contract has been held to be put an end to by reason of the personal skill of the parties being involved. They only said that it might be so. They expressed no opinion upon it. The real ground of the decision was that the contract had reference to the existing partnership business only. So I can conceive that a contract such as we have to deal with in the present case might be made under circumstances under which it would be unjust to compel the plaintiffs to perform for the surviving partners, and under which it would be equally unjust to compel the surviving partners to employ them. But here, if the plaintiffs are provided with the agreed stage on which to perform, and are only required to perform at the agreed time and under the agreed conditions, it surely cannot matter to them who the particular persons are by whom they are to be paid. The case does not fall within the decision of Tasker v. Shepherd, supra.

*Appeal dismissed.*¹⁹⁰

¹⁹⁰ Compare Brace v. Calder, [1895] 2 Q. B. 253.

While the principal case is to be supported, it displays more liberality than is customary, whether the employer who dies is the only employer or is one of several partners. In Yerrington v. Greene, 7 R. I. 589 (1863), for example, the plaintiff was employed by a manufacturing jeweler named Keach as the latter's clerk and salesman under a three years' contract. After about a year of the service Keach died and the administrators, after continuing to employ the plaintiff for two months, declined longer to employ him. When he sued for breach of his three years' contract, it was held, that he could not recover. Ames, C. J., said:

"It is, in general, true, that death does not absolve a man from his contracts; but that they must be performed by his personal representatives, or their nonperformance compensated, out of his estate. An exception to this rule, equally well established, at both the civil and common law, is, that in contracts in which performance depends upon the continued existence of a certain person or thing, a condition is implied, that the impossibility of performance arising from the perishing of the person or thing shall excuse the performance. The implication arises in spite of the unqualified character of the promissory words, because, from the nature of the contract, it is apparent that the parties contracted upon the basis of the continued existence of the particular person or chattel. * * *

"Does the case at bar fall within the general rule, or within the exception we have been considering? This must depend upon the nature of the contract, whether one, requiring the continuing existence of the employer, Keach, for performance on his part, or one which could, according to its spirit and meaning, be performed by the defendants, his administrators. The contract was, to employ the plaintiff as clerk and agent of the intestate, in his business, in New York and Philadelphia; and it seems to us undoubted, that the continued existence of both parties to the contract for the whole stipulated term, was the basis upon which the contract proceeded, and if called to their attention at the time of the contract, must have been contemplated as such by them. The death of the plaintiff within the three years would certainly have been a legal excuse from the further performance of his contract; since it was an employment of confidence and skill, the duties of which, in the spirit of the contract, could be fulfilled by him alone. If this be the law in application to a covenant for ordinary service (Shep. Touch. 180), how much more in application to a contract for service of such confidence and skill as that of a clerk and agent for sale. On the other hand, this employment could continue no longer than the business in which the employer was engaged, and the plaintiff retained. The intestate, when living, could, by the contract, have required the services of the plaintiff in no other business than that in which he had engaged him, and with no other person than himself. It would seem, then, necessarily to follow, that when the death of the employer put a stop to this business, and left no legal right over it in the administrators, except to close it up with the least loss to the estate of their decedent, they were, by the contract, bound no longer to employ the plaintiff, any more than he to serve them. The act of God had taken away the master and principal,—the law had revoked his agency, and stopped the business to which alone his contract bound him,—and if he would serve the administrators in winding up the estate, it must be under a new contract with them, and under renewed powers granted by them. Any other result than that this contract of service was upon the implied condition that the employer, as well as the employed, was to continue to live during the stipulated term of employment, would involve us in the strange conclusion, that the administrators might go on with the business of their intestate, in which the plaintiff must continue with powers unrevoked by the death of his principal, or, that he, with new powers from them, was bound by the contract to serve them as new masters, and in a different service, and that they were bound to grant him such powers, and employ him for the stipulated time in such service. The novelty of such a claim, and the contradiction of well-settled principles necessary to maintain it, justify the ruling of the judge who tried the cause; and this motion [for a new trial] must be dismissed with costs, and judgment entered [for defendants] upon the verdict."

In Lacy v. Getman, 119 N. Y. 109 (1890), the plaintiff contracted to work for one McMahan upon his farm for a year for $200. In July, after about three months of the service, McMahan died, leaving the farm to his widow for life and making the defendant his executrix. The defendant did not employ plaintiff, but he continued to work on the farm under the direction of the widow until the end of the year contracted for with McMahan and then sued the defendant as executrix for the full year's wages. It was held that he could recover only for services rendered up to the death of McMahan. Finch, J., based the decision on the personal relation, saying, that "it must be conceded that the death of the servant, employed to render personal services under the master's daily direction, dissolves the contract. Babcock v. Goodrich, 3 How. Pr. (N. S.) 53. But if that be so, on what principle shall the master be differently and more closely bound? And why shall not his death also dissolve the contract? There is no logic and no justice in a contrary rule. The same reasoning which relieves the servant's estate relieves also the master's, for the relation constituted is personal on both sides and contemplates no substitution. If the master selects the servant, the servant chooses the master. It is not every one to whom he will bind himself for a year, knowing that he must be obedient and render the services required. Submission to the master's will is the law of the contract which he meditates making. He knows that a promise by the servant to obey the lawful and reasonable orders of his master within the scope of his contract is implied by law, and a breach of this promise in SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Jan. 26, 1875.

"Received of Thomas Moore one thousand dollars, in consideration of my agreeing hereby to defend his brother, James Moore, who is indicted for having in possession and passing counterfeit money, and secure his acquittal and release from said charge in full, and forever keep him harmless from the same. And I specially agree that he shall be set at full liberty at the June term of the U. S. District Court, A. D. 1875. Six hundred dollars of said amount is paid to me in cash, and the other four hundred paid in a note of the said Thomas Moore, due first day of July, A. D., 1875. I further and specially a material matter justifies the master in discharging him. King v. St. John, Devizes, 9 B. & C. 896. One does not put himself in such relation for a fixed period without some choice as to whom he will serve. The master's habits, character, and temper enter into the consideration of the servant before he binds himself to the service, just as his own personal characteristics materially affect the choice of the master. The service, the choice, the contract are personal upon both sides, and more or less dependent upon the individuality of the contracting parties, and the rule applicable to one should be the rule which governs the other.

"If now to such a case—that is, to the simple and normal relation of master and servant, involving daily obedience on one side and constant direction on the other—we apply the suggested test of possibility of performance in substantial accord with the contract, the result is not different. It is said that if the master dies his representatives have only to pay, and any one may do that. But under the contract that is by no means all that remains to be done. They must take the place of the master in ordering and directing the work of the farm, and requiring the stipulated obedience. That may prove to effect a radical change in the situation of the servant, as it seems to have done in the present case, leading the plaintiff to the verge of refusing to work further for either widow or executrix, whose views apparently jangled. The new master cannot perform the employer's side of the contract as the deceased would have performed it, and may vary so far from incapacity or fitful temper or selfish greed, as to make the situation of the servant materially and seriously different from that which he contemplated and for which he contracted.

"We are, therefore, of opinion that in the case at bar the contract of service was dissolved by the death of McMahan, and his estate was only liable for the services rendered to the date of his death."

It appears, however, that what was really and properly worrying the court was that the plaintiff performed on the farm for the widow yet was asking the executrix to pay. There being no work to do for the executrix, the plaintiff, to mitigate damages, should have sought other work of the same kind, even if the contract survived and the executrix refused performance, and as he did not do so, and made no showing of inability to get other work at as good wages, as to which, contrary to the usual rule (3 Williston on Contracts, § 1360) the unusual circumstances should be deemed to place the burden of proof on him, he failed to make out a case even on his theory that the contract survived. The actual decision may be supported without adopting the reasoning of the court.

Professor Williston has well said, that "Undoubtedly in many contracts of employment the undertaking of the employer is personal in character. But the assumption frequently made in the cases that because the contract of the

James Moore did not appear at the June term, 1875, or at any subsequent term of the United States District Court, to answer to the indictment pending against him, and has not been tried upon or released from the said charge. Neither appellant nor appellee is shown to be in any wise in fault for the nonappearance of James Moore to answer to the indictment. It is very clear that the only contingency upon which appellee was entitled to retain the $600 paid him, and to collect the $400 note, was the legal acquittal of James Moore upon a trial in the United States District Court. Appellee, by his contract, stipulated that he should retain the money and the note only upon the happening of that contingency. Both parties manifestly contemplated that James Moore should appear and answer to the charge, and his failure to do so is equally a surprise to both, and there is neither reason nor justice in holding that this shall operate to the prejudice of the appellant. He has not received what he agreed to pay for, and appellee has that which he agreed to refund if applicant did not receive the stipulated consideration. What appellee in good faith did, pursuant to the terms of the agreement, before ascertaining that its performance had become impossible, he is entitled to be compensated for, and this should be deducted from the $600. The balance appellant is entitled to have judgment for.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

employee is personal that of the employer necessary must be, seems wholly unfounded. There is no necessity logical or legal for both the promises in a bilateral contract to be personal in character because one is. The promise of a painter to paint a landscape is discharged by his physical inability to paint, but the death or illness of one who has contracted to buy the painting will not free his estate from liability. Similarly in contracts of employment the nature of the employer's undertaking should be considered in each case. If the character of the employment was such that the employer had free power to delegate the oversight of the work to another and no personal cooperation on his part was needed for the proper fulfilment of the contract, there seems no reason why his death should affect the continued obligation of the contract."

ALBERT HERTER, RESPONDENT, v. JEREMIAH J. MULLEN AND THOMAS MULLEN, APPELLANTS.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1899. 159 N. Y. 28, 53 N. E. 700, 44 L. R. A. 703, 70 Am. St. Rep. 517.)

MARTIN, J.²⁰⁰ This action was to recover seven months' rent of a dwelling house situated upon Madison Avenue, in the city of New York. There was a lease between the parties by which the defendants rented the premises from May 1, 1894, for the period of one year, the rent payable in monthly instalments in advance. The rent for that term has been paid. By this action the plaintiff seeks to recover rent for a portion of the succeeding year, on the ground that the defendants held over after the expiration of their term, and thus became liable for the rent of the premises for that time.

The facts are undisputed. The defendants alleged as a defence to the action the making of the contract or lease with the plaintiff; that in the month of February, 1895, before the expiration of their term, they notified the plaintiff that they would not retain the premises for another year, and that after such notice the plaintiff and his agents were permitted to show the premises and to place the usual notice "To Let" upon them, which remained during the balance of the term. The defendants then specially alleged that on May 1, 1895, the defendants were prevented from yielding up the possession of the premises by the act of God in afflicting their mother, who was a member of their family, with a disease which, at that time, previously, and subsequently including May fifteenth, confined her to her bed so that it would have endangered her life to take her from the house; that for that reason and no other, of which the plaintiff had full knowledge and notice, the defendants were obliged to and did occupy a small portion of the premises until May fifteenth; that all their property, furniture, and belongings and their family were removed from the premises and every part thereof on May 1, 1895, except from the sick-room in which their mother was confined, and that they were forbidden by the physician in charge to remove her until May fifteenth, when she was at once removed.

Upon the trial it was admitted that upon the first of February, 1895, the defendant notified the plaintiff that on the first of May they would give up and surrender the possession of the premises. That they were occupied under the lease was admitted, also the rate of rent, and the fact that the defendants from necessity held over after the expiration of the lease some fifteen days. The plaintiff then admitted the facts set up in the answer as to the impossibility of the defendants' surrendering possession at the expiration of the year, so that the question presented is whether, notwithstanding the facts alleged in the answer, the plaintiff was entitled as a matter of law to recover rent for the succeeding year, upon the ground that the defendants held over after the expiration of their term.

The admission of the plaintiff amounts to a concession that by reason of the sickness of the defendants' mother it was impossible for them to surrender up the possession of the premises to the plaintiff; that so far as it was possible they did so; and, hence, that their retention was wholly involuntary. If there was any doubt as to the question of impossibility, it should have been submitted to the jury, and the defendants' exception to the direction of a verdict was well taken. Thus, in a word, the question is whether that impossibility justified the defendants' action, or whether, although it was impossible to surrender the entire premises, the holding of a small part for a few days imposed upon them a liability for rent for the succeeding year.

It is well settled that where a tenant voluntarily holds over after the expiration of his term, he may be held as upon an agreement to hold for a year upon the terms of the prior lease. Conway v. Starkweather, 1 Denio, 114; Commissioners of Pilots v. Clark, 33 N. Y. 251; Haynes v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 287, 289.

The basis of this liability is often said to be an implied agreement upon the part of the tenant to hold for another year. While I doubt, as I always have, the propriety of calling this class of obligations implied contracts, but think they are to be regarded as duties which the law imposes, yet, whether they be denominated implied contracts or duties created by law, in either case the right arises upon an implication of law and in no sense upon an express or absolute contract.

It is also well settled that where a duty or charge is created by law, and the performance is prevented by inevitable accident or the act of God, without fault of the party sought to be charged, he will be excused, but where a person absolutely and by express contract binds himself to do a particular thing which is not at the time impossible or unlawful, he will not be excused, unless through the fault of the other party. The reason given for the latter portion of this rule is that he might have provided by his contract against inevitable accident or the act of God. Harmony v. Bingham, 12 N. Y. 99; Tompkins v. Dudley, 25 N. Y. 272; Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 62.

Thus the most that can be said of the obligation that arises from the relation of landlord and tenant and follows by a general lease, is that the tenant is charged with the duty of vacating the premises at the end of his term. If he fails, it is a breach of duty and ordinarily the law implies or creates a liability on his part for another year's rent. This being a duty implied or created by law and not by an express or absolute agreement, it falls within the first part of the foregoing rule, and, hence, it is obvious that if the tenant's removal was rendered impossible by inevitable accident or the act of God, he is excused for his omission to surrender the premises, at least so far as it creates a liability for a year's rent which is implied by law.

The reason for the distinction between the effect of impossibility of performance, occasioned by inevitable accident or the act of God, upon an obligation created by express contract, and upon an obligation which the law implies, has been held to rest "upon the unwillingness of the law to at once create, impose, and exact the performance of an obligation forbidden or rendered impracticable by the interposition of Providence." School District v. Dauchy, 25 Conn. 530. Under the principle of the authorities relating to this subject, I think it is clear that, as the obligation sought to be enforced was one created by law and not by the agreement of the parties, impossibility of performance was a valid excuse, and the defendants cannot be held for the rent for the subsequent year.

Moreover, the same result may be reached upon another ground. There are many cases where the courts have implied a condition in a contract to the effect that a party is relieved from its terms where its performance has, without his fault, become impossible. The principle upon which those cases are based is that, when the contract was made, the parties contemplated that the condition which subsequently existed might arise and render performance impossible, and that the implied condition is to be construed as a part of the existing contract, and thus relieves the party from liability in case that condition arises. Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 62; Lorillard v. Clyde, 142 N. Y. 456, 462; Stewart v. Stone, 127 N. Y. 507; Spalding v. Rosa, 71 N. Y. 40, 44; Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 Best & S. 826; Robinson v. Davison, L. R. [6 Ex.] 269; Kein v. Tupper, 52 N. Y. 550, 555; Dolan v. Rodgers, 149 N. Y. 489, 492.

To hold in this case that this agreement was made upon an implied condition that the defendants should not be required to vacate the premises at the expiration of their term in the event that it was rendered impossible by inevitable accident or the act of God is quite within the principle of the authorities cited. But, be this as it may, it is manifest that the charge or liability which the plaintiff seeks to enforce was created by law and not by agreement, and that as its performance was prevented without the defendants' fault, they were excused from the onerous liability which the plaintiff now seeks to enforce.

It may well be, and doubtless is, true that the plaintiff may recover for the time the premises were occupied by the defendants, or if by reason of their failure to surrender up the premises additional damages follow, that they may be recovered in a proper action so that all damages caused by the defendants' misfortune would be borne by them, but that he cannot recover the rent for the subsequent year upon the implied contract or duty imposed by law, seems to me clear.

These considerations lead me to the conclusion that the judgment in this action should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

HALL v. CROOK.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1919. 144 Minn. 82, 174 N. W. 519.)

Action by Whitford M. Hall against Ida M. Crook. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

DIBELL, J.²⁰² This is an action to cancel a deed made by the plaintiff to the defendant. There was judgment for the defendant adjudging that the defendant was the owner of the premises described in the deed "released and free from any claim, lien, title or interest of the plaintiff." The plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff is a widower and an uncle of the defendant. On March 26, 1910, he conveyed to her certain premises in Blue Earth county in consideration of his support during life and his burial at a designated place upon his death. The portion of the deed giving the understanding of the parties is as follows:

"It is hereby understood and agreed between the parties to this conveyance that as part of the consideration above mentioned the grantee herein named shall provide at her own cost and expense a home for the said grantor, Whitford M. Hall, upon the premises herein described and conveyed, for and during the term of his natural life, and that during said time she shall provide him with all the necessities of life, including medical care and treatment in time of sickness or accident, and at his death shall give him a decent burial in the Elm Township Reserve Church burial ground near Diller, Nebraska, and it is further specifically agreed between the parties hereto that the rights of the said grantor, Whitford M. Hall, to a home upon such premises, and to such support, shall be and is hereby constituted a specific lien upon the lands and premises herein described and conveyed, and it is further understood and agreed that if at any time said Whitford M. Hall desires to absent himself from said premises for the purpose of visiting friends living elsewhere or for any other purpose, such absence shall not be deemed an abandonment of any of his rights hereunder, provided, that during the time or times that said Whitford M. Hall may be so absent from the home of said second party, she shall be relieved from furnishing him his living and support until he returns."

Upon the execution of the deed the plaintiff made his home with the defendant until October 1, 1910, when he shot and killed her husband.

²⁰¹ But see Mason v. Wierengo's Estate, 113 Mich. 151 (1897).

²⁰² Parts of the opinion are omitted.

On December 10, 1910, he was convicted therefor of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to imprisonment for life. On July 11, 1916, he was pardoned. * * *

The deed contemplated that the plaintiff should have care and support at the home of the defendant upon the premises conveyed. Fairly construed, it intended something in the way of personal care and attention on her part. When he killed her husband he made impossible the further performance of the contract by her in the spirit in which it was intended. He cannot take advantage of the impossibility of performance which he has created and his right to care and support are gone and with them the lien given therefor by the deed.

The plaintiff desired that his burial be at a church burial ground of his choice in Nebraska. The defendant's agreement to give such burial was a part of the consideration of the deed, and a substantial part. The reasons that forfeit his claim to care and support do not affect her contract obligation to give him burial. * * * [But] it does not affect the land. If ever broken the remedy will be by a personal action. The judgment barring the plaintiff from all claim to the land is therefore right. The obligation to give care and support and a home is gone and the obligation to give burial does not affect the land. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

ATCHINSON v. BAKER.

(Nisi Prius, 1796. Peake Add. Cas. 103.)

In this case (which was an action for a breach of promise of marriage) the declaration stated in general terms that in consideration that the plaintiff (being sole and unmarried) had promised to marry the defendant, the defendant (being, etc.) promised to marry the plaintiff.

All the witnesses on the part of the plaintiff proved the promise to be to marry the plaintiff in due time after the death of the defendant's father.

In this case the plaintiff was a widower upwards of forty years of age, and the defendant a widow about the same age; when the promise was made, the plaintiff was apparently in good health but the defendant afterwards discovered that he had an abscess in his breast, and for that reason refused to marry him after her father's death.

Gibbs, for the defendant, objected that this evidence was a fatal variance from the declaration. A promise to marry generally is a promise to marry immediately, but this promise was not to operate until a subsequent event had taken place.

Lord Kenyon (after directing a nonsuit on the objection to the declaration²⁰⁰) said, that if the condition of the parties was changed after the time of making the contract, it was a good cause for either party to break off the connection. Lord Mansfield had held that if, after a man had made a contract of marriage, the woman's character turned out to be different from what he had reason to think it was, he might refuse to marry her without being liable to an action, and whether infirmity was bodily or mental, the reason was the same; it would be most mischievous to compel parties to marry who could never live happily together.²⁰⁴

²⁰⁴ In Edmonds v. Hughes, 115 Ky. 561 (1903), in a breach of promise of marriage action defendant set up three defenses, one being that at the time he promised to marry plaintiff "she was a woman in full possession of the power of procreation and was able to bear children; that after the promise was made she voluntarily submitted to and permitted an unnecessary surgical operation to be performed upon her body, by which she was rendered unable to procreate or bear children, and will forever remain so." The court held that each of the three defenses was a valid bar to the cause of action, though it did not discuss this defense.

In Jefferson v. Paskell, [1916] 1 K. B. 57, the defendant set up that plaintiff had contracted tuberculosis, as he discovered before the date fixed for the marriage, and asked leave to raise by way of amendment a further defense that he honestly and on reasonable grounds believed the plaintiff to be in such a condition as to be unfit for marriage. The plaintiff, on special findings by the jury, had a judgment and the Court of Appeal dismissed the defendant's appeal. All the judges read judgments for dismissal. As to the amendment and the general right of recovery, Phillimore, L. J., said:

"I will deal first with the questions 3 and 4, which were put in consequence of an amended defense which the man was allowed to raise at the trial to the effect that he honestly believed her to be unfit for marriage within a reasonable time; and it is best in the first instance to determine upon its validity. I am of opinion that it is not a valid defense. A contract of marriage is in this respect like any other contract. The justification for the refusal to carry it out must be found in the actual facts, and not on belief or opinion, however reasonable or honest, as to what the facts are. If instead of want of health the question had been one of want of chastity, it will be very apparent that the objective truth, and not the subjective belief, would have to be looked for. This being so, it is unnecessary to inquire whether the answers of the jury to the two questions 3 and 4 were or were not justified by the evidence.

"Another point lies in limine. It was contended by counsel for the woman that ill-health is not a justification for refusal to perform the promise to marry, and for this the case of Hall v. Wright, E. B. & E. 746, 765, was cited. This case has been much observed upon; but it is unnecessary to consider its weight, because it has no bearing upon the one before us. In Hall v. Wright (supra), the man pleaded his supervening ill-health as his justification for refusal. The woman was willing to marry him notwithstanding. Whether the decision was that in no case could a party rely on his or her own ill-health as a justification, or whether, as some have thought, the case turned upon a point of pleading or upon the insufficiency of the degree of ill-health pleaded, it has no bearing upon a case where the ill-health is that of the insisting party. On principle it would seem that there must be some cases of mental or physical infirmity (as it has been decided that there are cases of moral infirmity) which supervening after the promise, or, I would add, first coming to the knowledge of the party after the promise, will justify him or her in refusing to marry. * * *

"Upon the other question the learned judge directed the jury that the burden

TRAMMELL v. VAUGHAN.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, 1900. 158 Mo. 214, 59 S. W. 79, 51 L. R. A. 354, 81 Am. St. Rep. 302.)

Actions for breach of promise of marriage. After the contract and before the date for the marriage the defendant without his fault became afflicted with a loathsome venereal and contagious disease, but despite that fact communicated to her the plaintiff insisted upon the marriage taking place, saying that she would marry him as he was and he could then go to St. Louis or some springs for treatment for three weeks or a month and she could stay with her sister, and adding that she did not believe he was sick at all. The defendant, however, refused to go on with the marriage, and this action was brought eight days after the day fixed for the marriage and before the time plaintiff was cured or could reasonably have been cured. Plaintiff recovered a verdict and defendant appealed.

MARSHALL, J.³⁰⁵ 1. The principal question in this case is whether the defendant had a right to postpone the marriage upon the appearance of the disease between the date of the contract and the date appointed for its performance; in other words, stated broadly, whether the defendant would have been justified in marrying the plaintiff, even with her consent, while he had the disease. The proposition is stated thus broadly because it is incredible that the plaintiff would have been willing to marry him if she knew the nature and character of the disease. This, too, even if the consummation of the marriage was to be postponed until he could be cured. We prefer to believe she either did not know the nature and character of the disease, or else she did not believe he was so afflicted, and thought it was simply an excuse to keep from performing his contract. But there is no room for doubt upon this record that he had the disease, and there is no countervailing evidence that it made its appearance between the date of the contract to marry and the time appointed for the marriage, and without any intervening fault on his of proof that the woman was unfit for marriage on September 12th, which is the date he takes, was on the man. In this he is in my view wrong. In every contract the party who seeks to recover damages for the breach must prove that he or she was ready and willing to perform it. Now admittedly on the date fixed for the marriage, that was April 9, the woman was not ready; she was not fit. The burden of proof was upon her to show that she would be fit within a reasonable time or that she actually became fit before breach. There was no burden upon the man to show that she was unfit. But when the woman admitted that she was not fit on April 9 she admitted no more. She did not admit that she had a permanent or even a prolonged illness. The man, if he relied on her having tuberculosis or any other permanent or prolonged illness, had to prove it, and the learned judge rightly laid the onus on him so far, and the question was rightly put as to tuberculosis, Are you satisfied that she had it?"

part. Fortunately there are few reported precedents for the conditions present in this case. It has been held that if a party to a marriage contract develops a disease which renders it unsafe or improper for him to marry, without intervening fault on his part, between the date of the contract and the date appointed for the marriage, he is entitled to have the ceremony postponed until the result of the disease is known or he is cured. Allen v. Baker, 86 N. C. 91; Sanders v. Coleman, 97 Va. 690, 34 S. E. 621; Shackleford v. Hamilton, 93 Ky. 80, 19 S. W. 5, 15 L. R. A. 531; Mabin v. Webster, 129 Ind. 430, 28 N. E. 863. Of course, if the defendant entered into the contract knowing of such an impediment to its consummation, it would be an aggravation of the plaintiff's damages, and she would be entitled to refuse to marry him, and to treat his condition as a breach of the contract,—a fraud perpetrated upon her. Marriage is a contract, but it is not merely a civil contract, for it can only be entered into in a manner recognized by law, and can only be dissolved in a like manner. The state is the third party to every such contract, and has a direct interest therein. Blank v. Nohl, 112 Mo., loc. cit. 167, 20 S. W. 477, 18 L. R. A. 350; State v. Bittick, 103 Mo. 183, 15 S. W. 325, 11 L. R. A. 587. Certain marriages are prohibited by law because of their detrimental effects upon society and the human species. Every contract of marriage implies that the contracting parties know of no legal or physical impediment to the contractual relation and its consequences. "Wilfully to communicate a venereal disease is clearly cruelty, for it is misconduct tending to impair the health, and tends to render cohabitation unsafe;" and it is, therefore, a ground for divorce, whether specifically enumerated in the statutory causes for divorce or not. 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.), p. 792, and cases cited; and, as specially bearing on this case, Venzke v. Venzke, 94 Cal. 225, 29 Pac. 499, and Boughner v. Boughner (Ky.), 41 S. W. 26. In State v. Marcks, 140 Mo., loc. cit. 677, 43 S. W. 1097, it was said by Sherwood, J., that intercourse with a woman, though she was willing thereto, by a man who was infected with a venereal disease, would constitute the act a common assault, for the fraud vitiated the consent; and in support of the statement he cited the cases of Reg. v. Bennett, 4 Fost. & F. 1105; Reg. v. Sinclair, 13 Cox, C. C. 28; Com. v. Stratton, 114 Mass. 303. If the principles announced in the cases hereinbefore cited be correct, it is also true that it is legally as well as morally wrong for a man, while infected with such a disease, to marry; and a man, for such cause, is entitled to demand a postponement of the marriage until he is cured. If the thing to be performed becomes unlawful, without his intervening fault, after the contract is entered into, the performance is excused by force of law. Sauner v. Insurance Co., 41 Mo. App. 480. The idea that the ceremony should be performed, and the consummation of the marriage postponed until he is cured, is not only intolerable, but obnoxious to a proper subservience of the public interests and morals. This, too, whether the woman knows his condition, and consents to such an arrangement, or not; for, though she may be willing to waive the defect, or be indifferent to the condition or its consequences to her and her children, the third party to the contract, the state, has a right to and does object. If the disease is of a temporary character,—such as was the case here,—and could be easily cured, the defendant is entitled to postpone the marriage until he is cured; ³⁰⁶ and, if the disease is of a permanent character,—such as was the fact in the North Carolina, Kentucky, and Virginia cases cited,—the defendant is not only entitled to refuse to carry out the contract, but it is his duty to do so.

2. The instruction given by the court of its own motion was to the effect that, if the disease was of a temporary character, and could ordinarily be cured in a reasonable time, and if the plaintiff knew its character, and consented to marry him, and that he should afterwards subject himself to proper treatment, then the disease constituted no defense in this case; otherwise if the disease was permanent, or rendered the defendant unfit for the discharge of marital duties. For the reasons given, this instruction is erroneous. The fifth and eighth instructions asked by the defendant and refused by the court, to the effect that under the circumstances of this case the defendant had a right to postpone the marriage temporarily,—that is, until he was cured,—whether the plaintiff consented to it or not, correctly state the law, and should have been given. * * *

4. This action was begun eight days after the day fixed for the marriage, and before the time plaintiff was cured, or could reasonably have been cured. The evidence is conflicting as to whether the plaintiff consented to the postponement, but the defendant was entitled to postpone it until he was cured, whether she consented or not. Ordinarily, this would lead to the conclusion that the action was prematurely brought. But in this case the defendant's acts and declarations after the date set for the marriage afford sufficient basis for the charge that he did not intend to fulfil his contract, even after he was cured. The plaintiff was, therefore, excused from going through the formality of waiting until he was well, and then demanding a performance of the contract, before instituting her suit; for his conduct subsequent to the postponement was a renunciation of the contract, and constituted a present and immediate breach of his contract, and her cause of action accrued then. Gabriel v. Brick Co., 57 Mo. App. 520; Manufacturing Co. v. McCord, 65 Mo. App. 507; Lawson, Cont. § 442. For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for trial anew upon the principles herein announced.³⁰⁷

³⁰⁷ The general rule is that if defendant's ill-health, occurring subsequent to the engagement without his fault, would be aggravated by the marriage and his death hastened, he has the defense of impossibility. In re Estate of Oldfield, 175 Ia. 118 (1916). Indeed the Iowa court seems to regard the certainty of approaching death, because of an incurable disease as an excuse for refusal

THE RICHLAND QUEEN.

RICHLAND S. S. CO. v. BUFFALO DRY DOCK CO.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1918. 254 Fed. 662, 166 C. C. A. 166.)

to marry. Id. A federal Circuit Court of Appeals, however, in the latter kind of a case has held that the disease only affects the quantum of damages. Parsons v. Trowbridge, 226 Fed. 15 (1915).

In Smith v. Compton, 67 N. J. L. 548 (1902), the trial court refused the defendant's request to charge the jury that if after the making of the promise to marry the plaintiff, but before the day named for the consummation of the marriage, the defendant, without his fault, contracted or developed a urinary or other disease, which kept him under the treatment of a physician, and which would be aggravated by sexual intercourse and hazardous to his health, such malady was a complete defense to the plaintiff's cause of action, and yet a judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed. Van Syckel, J., said (pp. 553-554): "The contract is an unconditional one, into which the defendant cannot read a condition which will defeat it. I agree with the declaration of the majority of the judges in Hall v. Wright [E. B. & E., 746], that it is not enough to show, in answer to an action upon the contract after breach, that its performance is inconvenient or may be dangerous; impossibility to perform will alone constitute an absolute bar. Ill-health is the defendant's misfortune, not to be visited, beyond what is inevitable, upon the plaintiff. If the plaintiff was willing, in view of his social position, or that which she might acquire by reason of his wealth, to marry him, and await his restoration to health, she had the right to insist upon the benefit of the unconditional contract. If he was apprehensive of danger to his health or life, he could break the engagement, but was subject to such damages as a jury would award against him for the breach. That would, in effect, be a substituted performance in discharge of the obligation incurred. This is in accordance with the well-established rule which governs contracts, and, unless it is adhered to, the loss falls upon the party to whom no fault can be imputed." Smith v. Compton seems to be the only case agreeing with the majority judges in Hall v. Wright, E. B. & E., 746, and on that case, see Phillemore, L. J., as quoted in note 204, ante.

In Smith v. Compton, supra, is to be found, however, a satisfactory dictum to the effect that if after the engagement one of the parties acquires a loathsome disease by an immoral act his condition is not a defense to an action for breach of promise of marriage. But see Sanders v. Coleman, 97 Va. 690 (1899); Allen v. Baker, 86 No. Car. 91 (1882).

In Grover v. Zook, 44 Wash. 489 (1906), where one party was seriously affected with pulmonary tuberculosis and the other had an hereditary taint of the same disease, their contract to marry was held void as against public policy, though the parties were aware of these facts prior to the engagement.

WARD, J. This is an appeal from a decree of Judge Hazel in favor of the Buffalo Dry Dock Company for the reasonable cost of repairs to the steamer Richland Queen, and dismissing the cross-libel of the Richland Steamship Company for damages for loss of the use of the vessel due to unreasonable delay in making the repairs.

September 5, 1916, the steamer was sent to the Dry Dock Company's yard, and remained there until December 5th. No express contract for the repairs was made, but the reasonable value of the use of the dry dock and of the repairs is admitted to have been $39,984.08. The Steamship Company, in order to get possession of its vessel, paid $30,000 to the Dry Dock Company without prejudice, and gave a stipulation for the balance, and in its cross-libel alleged that the repairs should have been completed by October 9, 1916, and that it was deprived of the use of its steamer during the remainder of the season to November 13th, or 37 days, at the reasonable rate of $500 a day, aggregating $18,500.

The Dry Dock Company kept an open shop, and justified the delay by the fact that a strike of its workmen began October 14, 1916, without grievance or warning, which prevented by intimidation and violence old hands and new hands from working.

At the trial the only contention was as to the damages for delay, viz., whether the steamship company was entitled to a decree for $18,500, less the unpaid balance of the Dry Dock Company's bill of $9,984.08.

The working day in the Buffalo shipyards at the time in question was nine hours, with a half holiday on Saturday during the summer months, while some competing yards on the Lakes required a nine-hour, and some a ten-hour day.

October 14, 1916, a committee of workmen demanded of the Dry Dock Company an eight-hour day without reduction of pay, which the company refused, and notified the men that thereafter they must work straight nine-hour day for six days in the week. As a consequence 80 to 90 per cent. of the men left the yard, and although the company did its best to secure an adequate force of workmen, it was not able to do so. The strike involved no violence, although picketing was kept up in the neighborhood of the yard, and there was much persuasion of both old and new hands. The men gradually came back between November 15th and December 2d, without any change in the hours of labor, and there has been no labor trouble since that time.

Judge Hazel was of opinion that the Dry Dock Company, in view of all the circumstances, made the repairs to the steamer in a reasonable time, and was not liable under the decision of the Court of Appeals of the state of New York in D., L. & W. R. R. Co. v. Bowna, 58 N. Y. 573. In that case, however, there was an agreement to deliver coal within a fixed time, with an express exception of interference by strikes. No time was fixed in the case under consideration for making the repairs, so that the obligation of the Dry Dock Company was to make them within a reasonable time, and there was no exception of strikes. The question, therefore, is simply whether the delay complained of was reasonable or unreasonable, not in view of the circumstances existing at the time the contract was made, but in view of the circumstances existing when the contract was being performed. Empire Transportation Co. v. P. & R. R. Co., 77 Fed. 919, 23 C. C. A. 564, 35 L. R. A. 623; Hick v. Rodoconachi, 2 Q. B. D. 626.

The Court of Appeals of the state of New York, has held that a peaceable strike of the employer's servants is no defense to a claim for delay (Blackstock v. New York & Erie R. R. Co., 20 N. Y. 48, 75 Am. Dec. 372), while a strike with violence is a defense (Geisner v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 102 N. Y. 563, 7 N. E. 828, 55 Am. Rep. 837). The employer in each of these cases was a common carrier, but, as the recovery sought was for damages caused by delay in delivery, the decisions are applicable to the situation under consideration, because common carriers are not insurers of prompt delivery, but only liable for ordinary care and diligence. The duty is the same as in the present case, viz., the performance in a reasonable time in view of all the circumstances.

We do not appreciate the distinction made in these cases, thinking that the difference between a peaceable and a violent strike as a defense is one of degree only, a strike with violence being more likely to be a good defense than a peaceable strike. The question, however, in each case is the same, whether the conduct of the employer was reasonable. A peaceable strike upon frivolous grounds, which the employer did all he could to prevent, should be a defense against a claim for delay. On the other hand, a violent strike on justifiable grounds, which the employer either fomented or unreasonably resisted, ought to be no defense. Of course, the employer in either case could end the strike by surrendering. We are not disposed to differ with Judge Hazel's finding that the Dry Dock Company's performance was reasonable in view of the strike.

Decree affirmed.

MANTON, J.† I dissent. * * * The testimony indicates plainly that, prior to the time of the acceptance of the Richland Queen for repairs, labor troubles were brewing in the Dry Dock Company's yard, which were unknown to the owners of the Richland Queen, but which were known to the officers of the appellee. No mention of this fact, however, was made to the vessel's owners.

During the time of this cessation of work, there was no violence of any character. The month's delay in making the repairs caused a loss of about $500 a day to the owners of the vessel. Judge Rogers, in Frankfurt-Barnett Co. v. Prym Co., Ltd., 237 Fed. 21, 150 C. C. A.

† Parts of the dissenting opinion are omitted.

223, L. R. A. 1918A, 602, quoting and accepting the language of the New York Court of Appeals in Eppens, Smith & Wiemann Co. v. Littlejohn, used this language:

"If a contract fails to fix the exact time for delivery, the law fixes it for the parties, by presuming that a reasonable time was intended. The law was so declared in the Court of Appeals of New York in Eppens, Smith & Wiemann Co. v. Littlejohn, 164 N. Y. 187 [58 N. E. 19, 52 L. R. A. 811]."

And what is a reasonable time must be determined by what the parties had in mind when the contract was made, and this must be judged by the circumstances which surrounded the parties at the time the contract was made, rather than by the circumstances and conditions which subsequently arose, and in this connection knowledge which the appellee had as to its unsettled condition of labor, or the prospect of a strike, could not be locked up in the mind of the appellee, and should have been disclosed to the owners of the vessel; for it is true that the owner of the vessel, without knowledge, could reasonably have in mind that the work would be done within a reasonable time, such as normal conditions in the yard would permit. It was within the power of the appellee to disclose such information, and, indeed, to make it one of the conditions of accepting the work. Even where labor trouble is not anticipated, such provisions are frequently put in contracts. D. L. & W. v. Bowns, 58 N. Y. 573. * * *

I concede that there is no legal obligation for an employer to yield to the strikers on a matter of rate of wages and hours of labor, but here the contract was undertaken to be performed within a reasonable time, and the strike cannot be taken into consideration in determining what was a reasonable time. * * *

The case of D., L. & W. v. Bowns, 58 N. Y. 573, cited by the district judge, does not help the appellee. It contained a provision which relieved the company from responsibility in the event of strike or lock-out, and is not a useful authority here.

In Smith, etc., v. Littlejohn, supra, the contract for the sale of goods to be shipped from a foreign port fixed no time for the shipment. It was held that it must be made within a reasonable time, and what that is depends upon the circumstances of the particular case, such as the parties may be supposed to have contemplated in a general way in making the contract, and the burden was fixed upon the seller to show compliance, where an action was instituted to recover damages for the buyer's refusal to accept and pay for the goods. There the court said:

"Thus the jury could find that although the plaintiff made every reasonable effort to ship the coffee promptly, and did ship it at the first opportunity it could command, nevertheless the delay in the shipment was prolonged, not because of the conditions and circumstances of the shipping facilities themselves, but because of the plaintiff's personal inability to avail itself of them. The delay was therefore unreasonable as to the defendant, because uncommonly long, and made so by the conditions peculiar to the plaintiff, and not to the transportation facilities. This personal disadvantage was not within the contemplation of the contract, and is not available to the plaintiff either to disprove unreasonable delay or to excuse it."

In Blackstone v. N. Y. & Erie R. R. Co., 20 N. Y. 46, 75 Am. Dec. 372, in a suit for damages on account of nonfulfillment of a contract of transportation by a common carrier, it was held that a railroad corporation was responsible for damages resulting from a delay to transport freight in the usual way, which was caused by a great number of its servants suddenly and wrongfully refusing to work.

Nor do I consider the rule of the state courts different from that of the federal court. This subject was treated in an able opinion by Judge Sanborn in Empire Transportation Co. v. Phila. & R. Coal & Iron Co., 77 Fed. 919, 23 C. C. A. 564, 35 L. R. A. 623, but there the defendant was excused because there was violence and interference by illegal methods. Here such was not the case.

In Brown v. Certain Tons of Coal, 34 Fed. 914, Judge Severens, speaking for the Circuit Court of Appeals, said:

"It was therefore a part of this contract that this unloading should be done within a reasonable time. It being the duty of the consignee to unload this freight, it was his duty to provide the facilities for doing so. He was bound to promptitude and diligence. The measure of that diligence is to be estimated by the urgency of the case, by the circumstances surrounding the parties, by the loss and damage which would accrue to the owner of valuable vessels by detention during the earning season of the year; and the circumstances in this case required that the consignee should exercise promptitude and a high degree of diligence in unloading these vessels."

Hardship, expense, or loss to the party performing his contract, or anything short of impossibility of performance, will not excuse a breach of the contract. In my opinion there has been a breach here to the damage of the libellant, and it should have a decree on the cross-libel.

Decree affirmed.^{}

BAILY v. DE CRESPIGNY.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1869. L. R., 4 Q. B., 180.)

HANNEN, J.† This was an action on a covenant contained in a lease

^{} On strikes as an excuse for nonperformance of contract in the absence of a special stipulation relating thereto, see 12 Ann. Cas. 313, note. See also 17 Ann. Cas. 240, note.

† The statement of the pleadings, which preceded the opinion in the report, and parts of the opinion are omitted.

of certain premises granted by the defendant to the plaintiff in 1840, for a term of eighty-nine years, whereby the defendant covenanted that "neither he nor his assigns should or would, during the term, permit to be built any messuage, etc., on a paddock fronting the demised premises." The breaches alleged are: 1. That the defendant during the term permitted a railway station to be built on the paddock. 2. That the defendant assigned the paddock to the London and Brighton Railway Company, who erected the railway station on the paddock.

To this declaration the defendant pleaded that, after the making of the deed, the railway company required to take the paddock under powers given them by act of Parliament, 1862, for purposes for which they were by the act empowered to take the same; that the paddock was land which the company were empowered to take compulsorily for the purpose of the undertaking authorized by the act; and that the company under the powers so conferred, did compulsorily purchase and take the paddock; and that the assignment by defendant to the company was the assignment in completion of such compulsory purchase; that the company afterwards built on the paddock the erections complained of, which were erections reasonably required for the purposes of the undertaking authorized by the act, and that, except as aforesaid, the defendant did not permit the said erections to be built. The plaintiff demurred to this plea; and also replied that the erections, though reasonable, were not necessary or compulsory for the company to build. To this replication there was a demurrer.

It must be taken on these pleadings that the assignment by the defendant to the railway company was altogether made under the requirements of the act of Parliament, and without any stipulation introduced into the conveyance of the vendor or the purchaser, which would alter its character as an act done by the defendant in obedience to the command of the legislature. The 75th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is imperative that the owner of lands shall, on the performance of the conditions imposed on the company, when required so to do, duly convey the lands to the promoters, or as they shall direct, and in default thereof it shall be lawful for the promoters to execute a deed poll, declaring the fact of such default having been made, and thereupon all the estate and interest in such lands, capable of being sold and conveyed by such owner, shall vest absolutely in the promoters of the undertaking.

We think that no distinction can be drawn between the case of an owner of lands who does that which it is his duty to do—namely, conveys to the company—and one who, by refusing to convey, obliges the company to obtain a title to the lands by the execution of a deed poll. In the one case, as in the other, the transfer of the title is compelled by the legislature, and it cannot be supposed that it was intended that the landowner who acts solely in obedience to the law should be in a worse position than one who refuses compliance. In either case the railway company must be regarded as the assignee of the land, not by the voluntary act of the former owner, but by compulsion of law.

The substantial question, therefore, raised on this record is whether the defendant is discharged from his covenant by the subsequent act of Parliament, which put it out of his power to perform it.

We are of opinion that he is so discharged on the principle expressed in the maxim, "Lex non cogit ad impossibilia."

We have first to consider what is the meaning of the covenant which the parties have entered into. There can be no doubt that a man may by an absolute contract bind himself to perform things which subsequently become impossible, or to pay damages for the non-performance, and this construction is to be put upon an unqualified undertaking, where the event which causes the impossibility was or might have been anticipated and guarded against in the contract, or where the impossibility arises from the act or default of the promisor.

But where the event is of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made, they will not be held bound by general words which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterward happens. It is on this principle that the act of God is in some cases said to excuse the breach of a contract. This is in fact an inaccurate expression, because, where it is an answer to a complaint of an alleged breach of contract that the thing done or left undone was so by the act of God, what is meant is that it was not within the contract; for, as is observed by Maule, J., in Canham v. Barry, 15 C. B. at p. 169, a man might by apt words bind himself that it shall rain tomorrow or that he will pay damages. * * * This is the principle of that which was laid down in Brewster v. Kitchell, 1 Salk. 198, that "where H. covenants not to do an act or thing which was lawful to do, and an act of Parliament comes after and compels him to do it, the statute repeals the covenant. So if H. covenants to do a thing which is lawful, and an act of Parliament comes in and hinders him from doing it, the covenant is repealed." 300

To apply the foregoing observations to the present case: The defendant has covenanted that his "assigns" shall not build. The word "assigns" is a term of well-known signification, comprehending all those who take either immediately or remotely from or under the assignor, whether by conveyance, devise, descent, or act of law. Spencer's Case, 5 Rep. 16. The defendant when he contracted used the general word "assigns," knowing that it had a definite meaning, and he was able to foresee and guard against the liabilities which might arise from his contract so interpreted. The legislature by compelling him to part with his land to a railway company, whom he could not bind by any stipulation, as he could an assignee chosen by himself, has created a new kind of assign, such as was not in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was entered into. To hold the defendant responsible for the acts of such an assignee is to make an entirely new contract for the parties. On the other hand, to confine the word "assigns" to those who take by the voluntary act of the assignor would not, as was suggested in argument, limit the operation of the covenant to his immediate grantee, because all those who take from the first assignee do so in consequence of the original voluntary act of the assignor, and it was his own fault that he assigned at all, or that he did not in the original conveyance guard against the acts of subsequent assignees. To exempt him from liability for such acts would be contrary to the intention of the parties, to be collected from their words, interpreted according to their known ordinary signification.

It was, indeed, conceded on the argument by the plaintiff's counsel, that the defendant would not be liable for all acts of the railway company, as he would have been for the acts of any other assignee; but it was contended that the defendant was relieved from liability on his covenant as to those acts only which the company was required by the act of Parliament to do, and not as to those which the company was merely empowered to do.

We do not think that this distinction is well founded. The rule laid down in Brewster v. Kitchell, 1 Salk. 198, rests upon this ground, that it is not reasonable to suppose that the legislature, while altering the condition of things with reference to which the covenantor contracted, intended that he should remain liable on a covenant which the legislature itself prevented his fulfilling; but the covenantor in this case is equally disabled from preventing the railway company from doing those things which it is empowered to do, as those which it is required to do; why then should there be a difference in the liability of the covenantor with respect to the one and the other? * * *

*Judgment for the defendant.*²¹⁰

²¹⁰ In Tweedie Trading Co. v. James P. McDonald Co., 114 Fed. 985 (1902), a contract to transport laborers from Barbadoes to Colon for so much per trip, which contract was made at New York City and was valid by the law of New York and also by the law of Barbadoes at the time the contract was entered into, was made impossible of performance by a regulation of the colonial government of Barbadoes, made after part performance, forbidding the future embarkation of laborers. The Tweedie Trading Company was a New Jersey corporation with an office in New York City, and the James P. McDonald Company was a West Virginia corporation with an office in New York City. While admitting that the law of the place of performance "ordinarily governs the incidents of a performance," Adams, J., treated it as foreign law, so far as impossibility was concerned, saying (p. 988): "The question really is, do the legal acts of the agent of a foreign government, which prevent the full performance of a contract of this character, control the rights of the parties?"

HEART v. EAST TENNESSEE BREWING CO.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee, 1908. 121 Tenn. 69, 113 S. W. 364, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 964, 130 Am. St. Rep. 753.)

SHIELDS, J.²¹¹ Complainant, on August 31, 1902, leased a certain house and lot situated in Knoxville, Tenn., and owned by him, to the Contracting parties are subject to the contingencies of changes in their own law, and liable to have the execution of their contracts prevented thereby; but it is on the ground of illegality, not of impossibility. Prevention by the law of a foreign county is not usually deemed an excuse, when the act which was contemplated by the contract was valid in view of the law of the place where it was made [citations], and a fortiori when it was also then valid at the place of performance."

But on the court's assumption as to the law ordinarily governing performance, is its conclusion sound? Impossibility by local law does not rest wholly on illegality, as Baily v. De Crespigny, supra, shows, but, any way, did not impossibility in the case before the court arise because of illegality under that local law which was recognized by the court as the local law to govern performance?

A reasonably frequent situation where the courts distinguish between local law and "foreign" law is that of bail bonds. If the person bailed fails to appear when he is to be produced and that failure is due to his arrest and confinement in the state, the sureties have a good defense. State v. Funk, 20 N. Dak. 145 (1910); State v. Heber (Okla.), 178 Pac. 651 (1918). So where the United States Court sitting in the state has the principal arrested and confined. Com. v. Overby, 80 Ky. 208 (1882). But they have no defense where arrest and confinement in another state is the cause of the failure to appear. Yarbrough v. Com., 89 Ky. 151 (1889); Taylor v. Taintor, 16 Wall. (U. S.) 366 (1872). So where the principal is confined in an insane asylum in another state. Adler v. State, 35 Ark. 517 (1880). But there the bail sent him out of the state for treatment, though, also, in the other cases, they are deemed to blame for letting him go out of the state. That the blameworthiness of the person bailed may play its part is shown in Hargis v. Begley, 129 Ky. 477 (1908), where the court protected sureties because the bailed person's failure to appear was due to his being accidentally shot while out of the state on a visit. In referring to previous cases where the sureties were held for the default of a principal, who went out of the state, the court said: "If it had been made to appear in those cases that the defendants had been prevented from appearing in answer to their recognizance, not on account of any wrongful act or dereliction on their part, but on account of unavoidable accident or sickness, over which they had no control, the results would have been different" (p. 480).

On liability of bail where principal fails to appear for no fault of his own, see 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 136, note; 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211, note; 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 262, note.

"It is altogether probable that a contract the performance of which would require a breach of the law of some friendly nation would now be held to be illegal and void. If this is true, and possibly even if it is not, a change in some foreign law making the performance of a previously made contract illegal (or impossible) ought to be given the same effect as would a like change in the domestic law. See Ford v. Cotesworth (1870), L. R., 5 Q. B. 544; Cunningham v. Dunn (1878), 3 C. P. D. 443." A. L. C. [Arthur L. Corbin] in 23 Yale, L. J., at p. 402.

defendant for a term of eight years, to be used as a saloon or place for the sale of intoxicating liquors, as expressed in the written lease that day made and executed by both parties. The defendant entered into possession of the property, and paid the rent contracted for to November, 1907, but after that declined to further use it, or to pay any rent. Complainant sues to collect rent accruing since November 1, 1907. The contract of lease was exhibited with and made a part of the bill, and therein the terms of the contract and the purposes for which the property was to be used are fully set forth.

The chancellor sustained a demurrer to the bill upon the ground that by chapters 17, 206, 207, pp. 81, 752, 755, Acts Gen. Assem. 1907, the sale of intoxicating liquors was made unlawful and prohibited in the city of Knoxville from and after November 1, 1907, and therefore the purpose for which the lease was made was from that time illegal, and the contract void and unenforceable, and the complainant has brought the case to this court for review.

There is no error in the action of the chancellor. When the contract was made, the purpose for which the property was leased—the sale of intoxicating liquors in Knoxville—was lawful, and the lease valid and enforceable. Afterwards, November 1, 1907, that purpose was made unlawful by the acts of the General Assembly above referred to, and thus by operation of law the lease became and is void and unenforceable at the instance of either party.

It is a principle of general application that all contracts are void which provide for doing a thing which is contrary to law, morality and public policy. * * *

The rule is the same when the purpose of the contract, although lawful when made, becomes unlawful by statute enacted before the full performance of its terms. * * *

The case of Gray v. Sims, Fed. Cas. No. 5729, is directly in point. This was a suit upon a policy of marine insurance. The vessel insured was to be employed in importing goods from Calcutta or Madras into the United States, and the contract of insurance specified this as one of the purposes of the voyage. After the policy was written, and before the return of the vessel, it became by act of Congress illegal to import goods into the United States from those points. The master undertook to do so, and the ship was seized and confiscated. The loss was within the terms of the policy. A recovery was denied. The court said:

“But if the contract be legal when it is made, and the performance of it rendered illegal by a subsequent law, the parties are both of them discharged from its obligation. The insured loses his indemnity and the insurer his premium.”

Other cases in accord are: Sauner v. Phoenix Insurance Co., 41 Mo. App. 480; Corrigan v. Chicago, 144 Ill. 537, 33 N. E. 746, 21

L. R. A. 212; Jamieson v. Gas & Oil Co., 128 Ind. 555, 28 N. E. 76, 12 L. R. A. 652; Presb. Church v. New York, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 538.

It is not necessary in this case to determine whether or not the contract contained in the lease restricts the use of the property for the sale of intoxicating liquors.²¹² It was the purpose of both lessor and lessee, as clearly expressed in the instrument, that it should be used as a saloon, and, this being made unlawful by law, the contract is no longer enforceable.

The decree of the chancellor is affirmed, with costs.

CLARKSVILLE LAND CO. v. HARRIMAN.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1895. 68 N. H. 374, 44 Atl. 527.)

Assumpsit to recover price of driving logs. The defendant claims to recoup damages arising from the nonperformance of the contract. Facts found by a referee. Judgment for plaintiff.

²¹² But the great majority of the cases are contra on this point. If the premises may be used for other purposes, as, for instance, the sale of nonintoxicating drinks, the contract is enforceable even though the rent is higher than it would have been if saloon purposes had not been contemplated. Hyatt v. Grand Rapids Brewing Co., 168 Mich. 360 (1912); Hayton v. Seattle Brewing & Malting Co., 66 Wash. 248 (1911); Hecht v. Acme Coal Co., 19 Wyo. 18 (1910). If, however, the premises may be used for saloon purposes only, meaning thereby the sale of intoxicating liquors, a law prohibiting the sale of such liquors is a defense to the lessee on his covenant to pay rent. Grell Bros. Co. v. Mabson, 179 Ala. 444 (1912); Stratford, Inc. v. Seattle Brewing, Etc., Co., 94 Wash. 125 (1916). But see Houston Ice & Brewing Co. v. Keenan, 99 Tex. 79 (1905), where the lessee claimed that the stipulation in the lease that the demised premises should be used for the saloon business constituted an express covenant that said premises should be used for no other purpose, and where the court, by Brown, J., said: "Assuming that the stipulation * * * 'constitutes a covenant' nevertheless, the contract of lease was not 'rendered illegal' nor was appellant [the lessee] absolved from liability for rents 'by the adoption of local option in Ellis County.'"

On impossibility by law in these saloon cases, see 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 964, note; 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 497, note; 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 773; L. R. A. 1917 C, 935, note.

In McCullough Realty Co. v. Laemmle Film Service, 181 Ia. 594 (1917), the obligation to pay rent under a lease of premises, the building on which was not fire-proof, "for Film Exchange and film and theater supplies purposes only," the handling of films being 99 per cent of the business of a film exchange and the sale of supplies being not a source of direct profit, was held terminated by the passage of a city ordinance which forbade the handling of inflammable films in buildings not fire-proof and thereby forbade the further conduct of the lessee's film exchange business on the premises leased.

A case of the discharge of a contract obligation to give passes over the railroad because of a statute rendering performance impossible is Cowley v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 68 Wash. 558 (1911). See note on the point in 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 848.

WALLACE, J. In the spring of 1881 the defendant had a large quantity of logs on the branches of Hall stream, a tributary of the Connecticut river, ready to be driven down the stream. At this time the plaintiffs entered into an agreement with him to drive the logs down the stream to the Connecticut river. Although it is not found in express terms that the contract was to be performed that spring, yet such appears to have been the understanding of the parties. Shortly afterwards, and before the plaintiffs had a reasonable time in which to complete their contract, notwithstanding the fact that they used due diligence, the water in the stream suddenly fell, and remained so low that the further performance of the contract that spring was rendered impossible. The question is whether this is an excuse for the non-performance of the contract on the part of the plaintiff. The plaintiffs did not undertake to transport the logs in any event, regardless of the way in which they should move them, whether by the stream or in some other way. They only undertook to transport them by driving them down the stream. If the parties contemplated the failure of the water in the stream, and contracted with reference to it, and it was agreed that the plaintiffs were to guaranty its sufficiency for driving the logs, then they were not excused from the performance of the contract by the failure of the water, and are answerable in damages. But if they contracted on the basis of the continued existence of sufficient water to transport the logs, and it was the understanding that the plaintiffs were only bound to drive them in case the water was adequate for that purpose, they were excused from the further performance of the contract. Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 Best & S. 826; The Tornado, 108 U. S. 342, 2 Sup. Ct. 746; Railway Co. v. Hoyt, 149 U. S. 1, 14, 13 Sup. Ct. 779; Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 62; Lord v. Wheeler, 1 Gray, 282; Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514. It is a question of fact what the terms of the contract were. The referee does not find that the plaintiffs agreed to warrant the sufficiency of the water in the stream. It is so unreasonable and improbable to suppose that they would so contract that it will not be inferred from a mere finding that the plaintiffs agreed to drive the logs for the defendant that spring. The referee finds that emergencies arose to prevent the performance of the contract that cannot reasonably be supposed to have been contemplated by the plaintiffs, and which would not have been anticipated by a man of experience, and a practical river driver, when the contract was made. This shows that the parties did not contemplate the failure of the water in the stream, nor undertake to contract that the logs were to be driven in any event, or that the plaintiffs should warrant the sufficiency of the stream for that purpose, and be answerable in damages for its failure. The contract was made on the basis of the continued existence of sufficient water to render its performance possible. The plaintiffs, being without fault, and having exercised due diligence in the performance of their contract, were excused from its further performance by the failure of the water.

Judgment on the report for plaintiffs.

KINZER CONSTRUCTION CO. v. STATE.

(Court of Claims of New York, 1910. 125 N. Y. Supp. 46.)

Action by the Kinzer Construction Company against the State of New York. Judgment for plaintiff.

RODENBECK, J.^{§13} The claimant made a contract with the state of New York to construct 3.76 miles of the improved Champlain Canal which is a part of the so-called Barge Canal system of the state now in progress of construction; and while the work was in progress, and claimant was excavating for one of the locks, an extensive cave-in occurred, which revealed the fact that for the balance of the contract the earth was of a "slippery, greasy clay," with not sufficient resistency to permit of the construction according to the contract, plans, and specifications of the lock and substantially the remainder of the work. The state issued a stop order while it was investigating and determining what to do under these unexpected conditions, and this order remained in force for six months, when an alteration order which involved extensive changes in the construction of the remainder of the work was submitted by the state to the claimant for the completion of the contract. The claimant refused to accept these alterations, insisting that they constituted a fundamental change in the contract and amounted to a breach of the contract by the state, and thereupon the state proceeded to advertise for bids for the completion of the work, and let it to other contractors, and the claimant filed this claim for the work done and not paid for, and for damages including loss of profits on the portion of the work uncompleted, amounting, in all, to $370,525.41. The total amount of the contract, including previous alteration orders, was $968,296.11, and there was uncompleted at the time that the stop order was issued $521,954.42, and of this amount $398,612 was eliminated and new work was added, aggregating $153,584.50, so that the work to be done there was a reduction of $245,027.50 or a decrease of about 25 per cent. of the contract price, and upon these facts, and upon the terms of its contract, the claimant insists that the state violated its contract and justified its course in refusing to complete the contract; while the state claims that the construction of the work when the cave-in occurred revealed the fact that the subsoil was so treacherous that the lock could not be constructed in that section of claimant's contract at all, and made necessary the other changes in the plans and specifications, and also that the alterations were authorized by the contract, and that claimant was guilty of a breach of its contract in refusing to complete it as directed by the alteration order. The claimant had agreed in its contract that it had satisfied itself by its own investigation and research regarding "all the conditions affecting the work," and that its conclusion to execute the contract was based upon such investigation and research, and not upon any information prepared by the state engineer.

If the contention of the claimant is sustained, the state will be obliged, not only to pay to the claimant the amount of work done and not paid for under the contract and profits which claimant estimates at $210,490.84 besides other damages, but to other contractors the profits, if any, which they will make upon the completion of the work under the reletting; while, if the position of the state is upheld that under the clause in the contract reserving to it the right to make necessary alterations in the plans it was authorized to make the changes which it did, the claimant not only loses the profits which it claims, but it must pay the state any damages caused by its failure to perform the contract including the increased cost, if any, of completing the work. The contention of the claimant is based upon the interpretation that it places upon the clause in the contract relating to alterations in the plans and specifications, and it insists that the changes proposed by the state were fundamental alterations of the contract, and were not contemplated when the contract was made, and constituted a breach thereof. This claim [clause?] provides that the state may make such alterations in the plans and specifications as may be "necessary."

The case, however, does not turn upon the construction of this clause in the contract, but rests upon another proposition growing out of the conditions that were found when the attempt was made to construct lock No. 7. When this part of the work was reached, a condition of the soil was found which made it impossible to construct the lock as planned, and made it impracticable to build it within the limits of the remainder of the contract. When the excavation for the foundation of the lock had been carried to a depth of 10 or 12 feet, it was found that the underlying stratum was a greasy slippery clay with no grit in it—"just like axle grease," as one witness put it. Claimant's expert said that he had never seen any soil like it, and that it would not be good engineering to build a lock in such material at all. Under this condition of things, the case falls within that line of decisions where the contract is regarded as at an end and performance is excused because of the failure of conditions the existence of which are necessary to the performance of the contract. The early rule upon impossibility as an excuse for the performance of a contract was that inability to execute an absolute executory contract due to subsequent unforeseen accident or misfortune without the fault of either party will not excuse performance. Paradine v. Jane, Aleyn, 26. This rule which was promulgated in English Jurisprudence as early as the year 1178 was based upon the ground as stated in this case that:

"Where the party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract."

By the language of the Constitution of the state of New York, this rule with the remainder of the common law of England and Great Britain became operative in this state subject to such alterations as might be made from time to time. State Const. 1777, art. 35. There are many illustrations of the adoption and application of the rule in this state (Harmony v. Bingham, 12 N. Y. 99, 62 Am. Dec. 142; Tompkins v. Dudley, 25 N. Y. 272, 82 Am. Dec. 349; Wheeler v. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 82 N. Y. 543, 37 Am. Rep. 594; Booth v. Spuyten Duyvil Rolling Mill Co., 60 N. Y. 487), but exceptions began to creep in as a strict enforcement of the rule seemed to work out an inequitable result.

In England the rule prevailed in all its severity down to the middle of the last century (Hall v. Wright, E. B. & E. [1857]), but since then the courts both here and in England have modified it to a large extent upon the theory that the event which rendered the performance impossible should be implied as a matter of law as one of the conditions of the contract (Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 8249 [1863]; Bailey v. De Crespigny, L. R. 4 Q. B. 185), thus carrying out the supposed intention of the parties, and placing such contingencies as excuse performance upon the same basis as an act of God which Pollock defines as:

"An event which as between the parties and for the purposes of the matter in hand cannot be definitely foreseen or controlled." Pollock on Contracts (3d Ed.) p. 535.

These exceptions have been growing so that now there are at least four well-recognized modifications of the early rule, while the courts seem to be groping for a rule broad enough to include all of the exceptions. Three of these exceptions have long since been firmly established in the jurisprudence, not only of this country, but of England, and the fourth has been adopted in many cases of recent date in this state where the existing rules did not equitably meet the peculiar facts. The rule that performance is excused where legal impossibility arises from a change in the law or where the specific thing which is essential to performance is destroyed, or where there is an incapacity by sickness or death in the case of a contract for personal services, are of long standing, but quite recently a fourth and broader rule has grown up which is applicable to the case at bar.

One writer in the Columbia Law Review, in discussing the tendency toward a broader rule to meet cases of impossibility in the performance of contracts, says:

"If the contingency which makes the contract impossible of performance is such that the parties to the contract, had they actually contemplated it, would probably have regarded it as so obviously terminating the obligation as not to require expression, failure of performance should be excused." Volume 1, p. 533.

Another writer in the Harvard Law Review, criticising the proposed rule, suggests another:

"A proper rule, it is suggested, is that impossibility should be recognized as a defence wherever it seems reasonable that, had the contingency which renders performance impossible been contemplated by the parties, they would have both agreed that its introduction into the contract as a condition terminating the obligation would be just." Volume 15, p. 419.

A third writer in the same Review, after referring to the general rule and its exceptions, says:

"The New York court, however, has of late been more liberal and in a somewhat indefinite way has laid down the doctrine that impossibility is an excuse when caused by the noncontinuance either of the subject-matter of the contract or of the conditions essential to its performance." Volume 15, p. 63.

There is abundant warrant in the decided cases in this state for these attempts to state the broad rule that the courts are now following in relation to this subject and to justify the statement that the "modern tendency seems to be toward a more lenient construction. More regard is paid to what must have been the intention of the parties." American Law Register 1909, p. 570. * * *

From these cases, it will be seen that a fourth exception must be made to the general rule that accident or an unforeseen contingency arising without the fault of their party will not excuse performance of an absolute executory contract, and the four exceptions may now be stated broadly as follows: First, where the legal impossibility arises from a change in the law (Jones v. Judd, 4 N. Y. 411; Heine v. Meyer, 61 N. Y. 171; Larabee Co. v. Crossman, 100 App. Div. 499, 92 N. Y. Supp. 565; People v. Bartlett, 3 Hill, 570; Hildreth v. Buell, 18 Barb. 107); second, where the specific thing which is essential to the performance of the contract is destroyed (Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 62, 7 Am. Rep. 415; People v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co., 91 N. Y. 174; Lorillard v. Clyde, 142 N. Y. 456, 37 N. E. 489, 24 L. R. A. 113; Hayes v. Gross, 9 App. Div. 12, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1098); third, where by sickness or death personal services become impossible (Wolfe v. Howes, 20 N. Y. 197, 75 Am. Dec. 388; Clark v. Gilbert, 26 N. Y. 279, 84 Am. Dec. 189; Spalding v. Rosa, 71 N. Y. 40, 27 Am. Rep. 7; Gaynor v. Jonas, 104 App. Div. 35, 93 N. Y. Supp. 287; Matter of Daly, 58 App. Div. 49, 68 N. Y. Supp. 596); and fourth, where conditions essential to performance do not exist (Stewart v. Stone, 127 N. Y. 500, 28 N. E. 595, 14 L. R. A. 215; Dolan v. Rodgers, 149

N. Y. 489, 44 N. E. 167; Buffalo & Lancaster Land Co. v. Bellevue L. & I. Co., 165 N. Y. 247, 59 N. E. 5, 51 L. R. A. 951; Whipple v. Lyons Beet Sugar Refining Co., 64 Misc. Rep. 363, 118 N. Y. Supp. 338). From these considerations the rule may be deduced fairly in the present case that where in the course of the construction of a canal natural conditions of soil unexpectedly appear which contingency the contract does not in express terms cover, and which render the performance of the contract as planned impossible, and make necessary substantial changes in the nature and cost of the contract and substantially affect the work remaining under the contract, the law will read into the contract an implied condition when it was made that such a contingency will terminate the entire contract.

These terms are implied in the contract by force of the law itself, and not because the parties had them in mind. Whether we approve of their insertion upon the theory that had the attention of the parties been called to the conditions giving rise to the application of the rule, they would have omitted any reference to them because obviously covered by the law (1 Columbia Law Review, p. 533), or upon the theory that they would have regarded them as just provisions to have inserted (15 Harvard Law Review, p. 419).

In the eyes of the law being a part of the terms of the contract, the conditions that rendered performance impossible do not terminate the contract ab initio, and vitiate what has been done and what remains to be done that is capable of execution. The conditions may be of such an extent as to amount to a substantial abrogation of the entire contract, or they may relate to an insignificant part of the contract, but they excuse performance only to the extent to which performance is impossible, and leave what has been done valid permitting a recovery therefor, and may not excuse performance of the remaining work. No general rule can be laid down which will apply to all cases, but each case must be decided upon its own facts, and that this course can be taken and justice done according to the facts in each case unhampered by written rules is due to the great flexibility of the common law which is its chief merit. Applying this rule to the case at bar, it will be seen to work out an equitable result. The state was not in a position to compel performance of an impossibility, and likewise the claimant could not ask the state to proceed with the contract. It would not have been fair of the state to insist upon the literal performance of its contract, and place the loss upon the claimant for the failure to perform, nor would it have been just for the claimant to insist that the state must carry out its contract as planned or suffer the penalty of paying damages, including prospective profits for the breach of the contract. It is better to regard the contract as at an end, and treat both parties as having been excused from further performance, allowing the claimant to recover for work done and for benefits received by the state under the contract down to the time of the discovery of the conditions which rendered performance impossible, and for such damages as may have resulted to it from the stop order issued by the state. Both of the parties were in the same situation at the time that the conditions were discovered, and the rule applied leaves both of them to share the responsibilities for these conditions which were not anticipated when the contract was made thus carrying out the spirit of the state Constitution, which provides that, if for any unforeseen cause the terms of any contract prove to be unjust and oppressive, the canal board may, upon the application of the contractor, cancel the contract. State Const. art. 7, § 9. The state, therefore, had the right to relet the completion of the work, but must bear the increased expense resulting therefrom, while the claimant is not entitled to recover for any prospective profits on the work remaining to be done. Rhodes v. Hinds, 79 App. Div. 379, 79 N. Y. Supp. 437; Snyder v. City of New York, 74 App. Div. 421, 77 N. Y. Supp. 637; Sickels v. United States, 1 Ct. Cl. 214. * * *

The claimant should have judgment for $70,679.25, with interest on $61,144.16 from December 15, 1908.

PIERSON & CO. v. MITSUI & CO., LIMITED.

(Supreme Court, Trial Term, New York County, 1920. 111 Misc. 388, 181 N. Y. Supp. 273.)

Action by Pierson & Co. against Mitsui & Co., Limited. On motion by defendant to set aside verdict, directed by the court in favor of plaintiff, and for a new trial. Motion denied.

SEARS, J.²¹⁴ The contracts upon which this action is based were for the sale by the plaintiff to the defendant, f. o. b. Pittsburgh, of steel plates thereafter to be rolled. The defendant intended to export the plates to Japan, and this intention was known to the plaintiff. After the first contract was entered into, and before the second contract was agreed upon, a statute of the United States was enacted, under the provisions of which an executive order was issued, after the date of both contracts, making the export of such articles to Japan invalid, except under license from the Export and Administrative Board established by the executive order. The defendant endeavored to obtain such a license, but was unable to secure one, except a license which was entirely ineffective because of the dates of performance specified in the contract. The statute and the embargo declared thereunder did not prevent the plaintiff from delivering, or the defendant from receiving, the plates at Pittsburgh. It was the export of the plates which was prevented, unless a license could be obtained. In other words, the defendant was prevented from devoting the goods to the purpose for which they were intended; but this is far from rendering the contract incapable of performance within the rule laid down in the authorities:

"It is a well settled rule of law that a party must fulfill his contractual obligations. Fraud or mutual mistake, or the fraud of one party and the mistake of the other, or an inadvertence induced by the one party and not negligence on the part of the other, may relieve from an expressed agreement, and an act of God or the law, or the interfering or preventive act of the other party, may free one from the performance of it; but, if what is agreed to be done is possible and lawful, the obligation of performance must be met. Difficulty or improbability of accomplishing the stipulated undertaking will not avail the obligor. It must be shown that the thing cannot by any means be effected. Nothing short of this will excuse nonperformance. The courts will not consider the hardship or the expense or the loss to the one party, or the meagerness or the uselessness of the result to the other. They will neither make nor modify contracts, nor dispense with their performance. When a party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to a possible performance of it, because he promised it, and did not shield himself by proper conditions or qualifications." Cameron-Hawn Realty Co. v. City of Albany, 207 N. Y. 377, 101 N. E. 162, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 922.

The statements of the defendant in the long correspondence between the parties justified the plaintiff in not having the plates rolled. The defendant, having expressed an intention not to take the goods, cannot complain of plaintiff's failure to tender the goods. At all times plaintiff expressed its readiness and willingness to proceed with the rolling of the plates, if the defendant would change its position that it would receive and accept the same only on condition that it obtained a license. There was no breach of the contract on plaintiff's part. The clause in relation to tests was clearly waived. * * *

The defendant's motion is therefore denied.

BIGGS ET AL. v. STEINWAY & SONS.

ANDREWS, J. This action is brought by the vendors to compel the specific performance of a contract made on June 29, 1916, for the purchase of Nos. 109, 111, and 113 West Fifty-seventh Street, New York. The price fixed was $280,000, of which $28,000 was paid down. The premises were to be conveyed in fee, free of all incumbrances except certain covenants against nuisances. On August 1st the plaintiffs tendered such a deed as the contract required. It was refused.

The parties understood that the land described in the contract was but a part of a larger purchase and that upon the whole of it the defendant desired to erect a business building. The remainder of the plot, 114 West Fifty-eighth Street, belonged to a Mrs. Flagg. The contract recited a simultaneous contract with her, and stated that the covenants contained in it were dependent upon the simultaneous delivery of the two deeds. If upon examination the title to the Flagg premises was found unmarketable then the purchaser was not obliged to complete its contract with the plaintiffs and was entitled to be repaid its $28,000.

After the execution of this contract and on July 25th a so-called "zoning ordinance" was adopted by the city of New York under statutes then in force which prohibited the erection of a business building on the Flagg property. As to it, the ordinance was repealed on July 12, 1918, and before the trial. It was because of this fact that the defendant refused to complete its bargain with the plaintiffs.

We have held that the zoning ordinance is a valid exercise of the police power, and that it did not constitute an incumbrance upon the Flagg property or render it unmarketable. Lincoln Trust Co. v. Williams Building Corporation, 128 N. E. 209, handed down herewith. Yet it is possible that had this action been brought by Mrs. Flagg upon her contract, a refusal to decree specific performance might be upheld. Anderson v. Steinway, 178 App. Div. 507, 165 N. Y. 608, affirmed 221 N. Y. 639, 117 N. E. 575. But the question here is somewhat different. The plaintiffs offered a perfect title. The circumstance mentioned in the contract, that the title to 114 West Fifty-eighth Street should be found unmarketable, under which the defendant might refuse to complete its bargain, had not arisen. Does then the fact that two separate parcels are brought from separate owners for a common purpose and that because that purpose may so fail as to one that a court of equity may refuse to enforce specific performance as to it and remit the parties to their legal rights, justify a refusal of specific performance as to the other?

As we have said, we assume that the purpose of the defendant, known to all the parties, was to erect a building covering both the Biggs and the Flagg lots. We assume that purpose has failed because of the zoning ordinance which affects only the latter. We assume that Mrs. Flagg offered a marketable title. Yet we cannot hold that as between these plaintiffs and this defendant circumstances have so changed as to make the enforcement of the contract unfair. These circumstances affect other land with which the plaintiffs have no connection. Upon it the defendant might not build as it had planned. Its purpose in making the entire purchase, therefore, failed. But in balancing the equities between the parties, the expense of this failure should not be charged to the plaintiffs who have entered in good faith into a contract of sale, absolute except in one contingency which has not occurred.

It may be said that the plaintiff in the Anderson Case was as innocent as are the plaintiffs here. Yet, there, the failure was caused by a regulation which affected her own land. It was not because of some collateral matter. Neither party being at fault, the change of circumstances which justified the refusal of specific performance directly affected the subject of the contract itself. We have found no well-considered case where specific performance has been refused except under such circumstances. The discretion to be exercised by courts of equity is a judicial discretion within defined limits.

The judgments appealed from must be reversed, and judgment directed for the plaintiffs for the relief demanded in the complaint, with costs in all courts.

WESTERN DRUG SUPPLY & SPECIALTY CO. OF KANSAS CITY, MO., FOR USE OF LOWENSTEIN v. BOARD OF ADMINISTRATION OF KANSAS ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Kansas, 1920. 106 Kans. 256, 187 Pac. 701.)

Mandamus by the Western Drug Supply & Specialty Company of Kansas City, Mo., for the use of Lewis Lowenstein, against the Board of Administration of the State of Kansas, composed of E. W. Hoch and others, and J. H. Pritchett and others, seureties on the bonds of plaintiff. Writ denied.

WEST, J.²¹⁶ This action involves the one question, the right of the plaintiff to compel the defendant to issue a voucher for the amount claimed to be due. By the agreed statement of facts it appears that in the fall of 1917 the board contracted in writing with the plaintiff for certain supplies for the state institutions, and the plaintiff made a bond to faithfully perform its obligations. The supplies were furnished until January 24, 1918, since which time no more have been furnished, for the sole reason that an action was filed against the plaintiff in Jackson county, Mo., and a receiver appointed for all its effects, who also took charge of all its assets and sold them in bulk to Lewis Lowenstein, ²¹⁵ "In any event, however, it seems clear that a promise would not be discharged because the performance promised in return had lost value because of supervening fortuitous circumstances, unless these circumstances nearly or quite completely destroyed the purpose of the bargain." 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1955, p. 2322, with the following footnote: "In Abbaye v. United States Motor Cab Co., 71 N. Y. Misc. 454, 128 N. Y. for whose benefit this action is brought. The damages suffered by the defendant on account of the failure to supply the goods amount to the precise sum claimed to be due by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff invokes the doctrine of vis major, and contends that, as its failure was no fault of its own, but was caused by the receivership, it should be unburdened with any liability thereof. The cases of Kansas Union Life Ins. Co. v. Burman, 141 Fed. 835, 73 C. C. A. 69, Malcomson v. Wappoo (C. C.) 88 Fed. 680, In re Inman & Co. (D. C.) 175 Fed. 312, In re Inman & Co. (D. C.) 171 Fed. 185, and South Memphis Land Co. v. McLean Hardwood L. Co., 179 Fed. 417, 421, 102 C. C. A. 563, are cited.

The defendant asserts that, having contracted to furnish the goods, the plaintiff is not absolved from liability for failure on account of the receivership, and cites as authorities Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 19, 20 Sup. Ct. 780, 44 L. Ed. 953, and Central Trust Co. v. Chicago Auditorium, 240 U. S. 581, 36 Sup. Ct. 412, 60 L. Ed. 811, L. R. A. 1917 B 580. * * *

One would suppose that, if he enters into a contract to do a thing which he knows may become impossible, he should be bound thereby; for otherwise to sign such a contract would be an idle thing, and any probable or foreseen contingency could be guarded against "while yet it is day." And the law, which is said to be common sense, also reasons on this wise. Chitty on Contracts (15th Ed.) uses these words:

"As a general proposition of law, if a man contract to do a thing which is absolutely impossible, such contract will not bind him, because no man can be obliged to perform an impossibility. * * * But where the contract is to do a thing which is possible in itself, or where it is conditioned on an event which happens, the promisor, will be liable for a breach thereof, notwithstanding that the occurrence of an accident or other contingency which, although it was not foreseen by or within the control of the party, might have been provided against by his contract, has put it beyond his power to perform it." Pages 707, 708.

The authority regarded by many as almost the father of law of contracts—Parsons—says:

"It has been somewhat questioned how far the impossibility of doing what a contract requires is a good defense against an action for the breach of it. If the performance of a contract could not possibly be attributed to the promisor, and this impossibility was not among the probable contingencies which a prudent man should have foreseen and provided for, it should seem that this would be a sufficient defense. But to make the act of God a defense it must amount to an impossibility of performance by the promisor; mere hardship or difficulty will not suffice. * * * So if it becomes impossible by contingencies which should have been foreseen and provided against in the contract, and still more if they might have been prevented, the promisor should be held answerable." 2 Parsons on Contracts (9th Ed.) 673. * * *

It appears, therefore, both by reason and by authority, that the party contracting to furnish goods for a certain length of time, and making such contract doubly sure by giving bond for its performance, could not be relieved because some one brought a lawsuit and by a receivership impounded and sold its assets. This might have reasonably been foreseen and guarded against, and, having taken its chances, the drug company and the purchaser at the bankrupt sale must abide by the consequences.

FRANKLIN S. DEWEY v. THE UNION SCHOOL DISTRICT OF THE CITY OF ALPENA.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1880. 43 Mich. 480, 5 N. W. 646, 38 Am. Rep. 206.)

Assumpsit. Plaintiff brings error.

GRAVES, J. The plaintiff was regularly hired by the district to serve as teacher in its public schools for ten months for $130 per month. He entered on his duties on the 2d of September, and continued up to the 10th of December, at which time the district officers closed the schools on account of the prevalence of small-pox in the city, and kept them closed thereafter for the same reason until the 17th of March. They were then reopened and the plaintiff resumed his duties. He was subsequently hired for the next school year, and his compensation was increased $100. The district refused to pay him for the period of suspension, and he brought this action to recover it.

The claim was resisted on two grounds: first, that on the second hiring it was mutually agreed that the addition of $100 to his compensation for incoming service should stand and be allowed and accepted in full satisfaction of all claim for pay during the time in question; and, second, that the suspension was the effect of an overruling necessity, or, in other §17 The failure to perform, which the plaintiff in the principal case said was no fault of the plaintiff, but was caused by the receivership, was really the plaintiff's fault because in legal theory financial incapacity, the cause of the receivership, does not constitute impossibility and was, therefore, the legal fault of the plaintiff.

Where the corporation undergoes involuntary dissolution, it is normally legally at fault and should not have the defense of impossibility. Spader v. Mural Decoration Co., 47 N. J. Eq. 18 (1890). But it was given that defense in People v. Globe Mut. Life Ins. Co., 91 N. Y. 174 (1883).

On bankruptcy, see Central Trust Co. v. Chicago Auditorium Association, reported ante, p. 991. But see Lenoir v. Linville Improvement Co., 126 No. Car. 322 (1900).

On appointment of a receiver as excuse for nonperformance of contract, see 3 A. L. R. 627, note.

words, the act of God, and that all parts of the contract were suspended for the time being.

The circuit judge submitted to the jury both questions in a very clear manner, and instructed them to find against the plaintiff in case they were satisfied the alleged compromise was in fact entered into; or in case they should find that the small-pox was so prevalent that it became obligatory on the board to close the schools as a necessary step to prevent the spread of the disease and save human life.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the district. But we cannot know with legal certainty whether they determined only one of these questions in favor of the district, or whether they so determined both; and of course if one only was so decided, it is impossible to say which one. The evidence on the compromise was conflicting, and as it appears in the record the advantage was with the plaintiff. Still, if no other ground of defence had been laid, the verdict must have been conclusive; as just explained, it is not so now.

The second objection must be briefly considered. Beyond controversy the closing of the schools was a wise and timely expedient, but the defence interposed cannot rest on that. It must appear that observance of the contract by the district was caused to be impossible by act of God. It is not enough that great difficulties were encountered, or that there existed urgent and satisfactory reasons for stopping the schools. But this is all the evidence tended to show. The contract between the parties was positive and for lawful objects. On one side school buildings and pupils were to be provided, and on the other personal service as teacher. The plaintiff continued ready to perform, but the district refused to open its houses and allow the attendance of pupils, and it thereby prevented performance by the plaintiff. Admitting that the circumstances justified the officers, and yet there is no rule of justice which will entitle the district to visit its own misfortune upon the plaintiff. He was not at fault. He had no agency in bringing about the state of things which rendered it eminently prudent to dismiss the schools. It was the misfortune of the district, and the district and not the plaintiff ought to bear it.

The occasion which was presented to the district was not within the principle contended for. It was not one of absolute necessity, but of strong expediency. To let in the defence that the suspension precluded recovery, the agreement must have provided for it. But the district did not stipulate for the right to discontinue the plaintiff's pay on the judgment of its officers, however discreet and fair, that a stoppage of the schools is found a needful measure to prevent their invasion by disease, or to stay or oppose its spread or progress in the community; and the contract cannot be regarded as tacitly subject to such a condition.

The judgment must be reversed, with costs, and a new trial granted.²¹⁸

²¹⁸ It would seem to be wrong on principle to distinguish between the case where the Board of Health closes the school and that where the school board,

On demurrer to defendants' fifth, sixth and seventh pleas.

COCKBURN, C. J.²¹⁹ I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the defendants. I will not say that all and each of the pleas are good, but on the admitted facts sufficient is shown to constitute a defence to acting reasonably in the emergency closes the school, though some cases do so distinguish. School District v. Howard, 5 Neb. (Unoff.) 340, 38 N. W. 666 (1904); McKay v. Barnett, 21 Utah 239 (1900). Professor Williston's suggestion that the true distinction is between the case where the teacher must remain in readiness to resume teaching, in which event he should be paid during the waiting period, and the case where the probable duration of the closing is so great that it is not proper to require the teacher to remain in readiness to resume work or to ignore the defense of impossibility, in which event the teacher should not be paid, seems sound. See 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1958.

In Crane v. School Dist. No. 14 (Ore.) 188 Pac. 712 (1920), a contract with plaintiff to transport the pupils of the defendant school district for nine months was enforced for the period from Oct. 1, 1918, to Feb. 10, 1919, during which the school was closed because of a dangerous epidemic of influenza, and there were no pupils to transport. The state board of health had issued orders for the closing, but the court found that it was without authority to act, and while the school district had power to act it did act only in obedience to the order of the health officer. Accordingly the court held the closing no defense to the contract and said that even if the school board on exercising its own authorized discretion, had closed the school that might not have suspended the contract.

Bearing on this question are certain related cases. See Hanford v. Conn. Fair Assoc., Inc., 92 Conn. 621 (1918), where performance of a contract to hold a baby show was held excused because of an epidemic of infantile paralysis which rendered the show highly dangerous to public health. The decision was based on public policy.

The impossibility by illness does not have to be absolute, but may be only practical impossibility. If a singer is so sick that it is unreasonable to ask him to sing, he is excused. Even the apprehended illness of one party has been held to excuse the other party from the performance of a contract to buy an interest as partner in the business of the one whose illness was apprehended. Powel v. Cash, 54 N. J. Eq. 218 (1896). And it has been held that an employee is excused from performing his contract of service if a cholera epidemic breaks out "so dangerous in its character that a man of ordinary care and prudence, in the exercise of those qualities" is justified in leaving, and the employee, in fear of the epidemic, actually does leave. Lakeman v. Pollard, 43 Me. 463 (1857). Compare the case of an employee compelled by strikers to quit work. Walsh v. Fisher, 102 Wis. 172 (1899). But an employer who had contracted to run his mill "steadily save when prevented from doing so by unavoidable accident" was held to have no defense when his employees, because of the prevalence of smallpox, quit his employment in such numbers as greatly to diminish the output of his mill, in Vale v. Suiter, 58 W. Va. 353 (1905). See also, Standard Ice Co. v. Lynchburg Diamond Ice Factory (Va.), 106 S. E. 390 (1921).

the action. The declaration is upon a charter party, whereby the defendants, the shipowners, engage to load a cargo of coals at a spout, as directed by the plaintiffs, and having loaded to proceed, as soon as wind and weather would permit, to Hamburg, and there deliver the coals. To that contract, however, there are qualifications, and on one of these the defendants rely—"the restraints of princes and rulers excepted." The pleas show that, after the making of the charter party, and before anything had been done by either party in furtherance of the contract, war broke out between France and Germany, and the French Government proceeded to declare, among other ports, that of Hamburg to be blockaded, and it must be taken that an effective blockade was established and maintained. The question is, whether this was such a state of things as justified the defendants in throwing up the charter party, and refusing to perform either part of it, first in going to a spout to load, and then in taking the cargo to Hamburg. It is perfectly true, that they might have gone to the spout and loaded the cargo; there was no obstacle to their doing that; but they say there was an obstacle to their carrying the cargo to Hamburg, viz., the effective blockade of that port; and that as, in consequence of it, they could not carry out their contract, they were excused from taking the initial step; and I think that the terms of the contract justified this course. I do not think it necessary to consider the larger proposition put forward by Mr. Williams based on Continental Codes—that in the absence of a stipulation as to unforeseen circumstances, we should imply such a term—because I base my judgment on an exception which is contained in the terms of the charter party, viz., of restraints of princes, etc. Does that afford the defendants a justification? I think it does. First, is a blockade a restraint of princes? I think it is. It is an act of a sovereign state or prince; and it is a restraint, provided the blockade is effective: and in the eye of the law a blockade is effective if the enemies' ships are in such numbers and position as to render the running of the blockade a matter of danger, although some vessels may succeed in getting through. In such a case, the obstacle arises from an act of state of one of the belligerent sovereigns, and consequently constitutes a restraint of princes. The case, therefore, is brought within the exception of the charter party. But then it is said that the exception must be taken to apply to the whole contract, and that, inasmuch as the defendants were bound to sail as soon as wind and weather would permit, that must mean, if there be no such restraint; and if there be, then as soon as wind and weather permit after the restraint is removed. But it would be monstrous to say that in such a case the parties must wait—for the obligation must be mutual—till the restraint be taken off—the shipper with cargo, which might be perishable, or its market value destroyed—the shipowner with his ship lying idle, possibly rotting—the result of which might be to make the contract ruinous. At all events it must be taken that the restraint must cease within a reasonable time, and that the duty of the defendants was to wait only a reasonable time prepared to carry out their contract should the restraint be removed; but the defendants rest their defence on the ground that it was here impossible to expect, from the nature of the circumstances, that the obstacle of the blockade would be removed within a reasonable time. It is a sufficient answer on the defendants' part that it was not likely to be removed within a reasonable time; and assuming that either party was bound to wait a reasonable time to ascertain whether the obstacle would be removed, in point of fact it was not so removed, and the defendants were then justified in not attempting to perform their contract. But then it is contended by the plaintiffs that the contract is divisible into two parts, and that the defendants ought to have performed the first part, which was practicable, in order to be in a position to perform the second, which was not. But the answer of the defendants is that the contract is one entire contract, and that the impossibility of performing the whole within a reasonable time dispensed with the necessity of taking any steps towards its performance. And it is perfectly obvious that it is so; for what good would it have been to the shipper that the shipowner should go to the spout and take in the coals, if he could not proceed with the cargo to Hamburg? None whatever. It is an entire contract, and anything that applies to make the performance of one part impossible must be taken to apply to the whole; and it is admitted that the defendants could not have got to their port of destination. The true way of looking at this case, as it appears to me, is this: it was an entire contract, and there was an insuperable obstacle to the performance of it in toto; and the defendants were, therefore, justified in not performing that part of it which was possible, but which, without the possibility of performing the other part of it, was useless.

PER CURIAM.

Judgment for the defendants on all the pleas.

WATTS, WATTS & COMPANY, LTD., APPELLANTS, v. MITSUI & COMPANY, LTD., RESPONDENTS.

(House of Lords. [1917] A. C. 227.)

LORD DUNEDIN.²²⁰ * * * The first question that arises is whether there was a breach of contract. The non-fulfillment is admitted, but the appellants say that under the circumstances that is excused under one of the exceptions in the charterparty, namely, restraint of princes. On August 1st, 1914, Germany had declared war against Russia and had begun hostile action against France, and on the night of the 4th Great Britain declared war against Germany. There was, however, at this time no activity on Germany's part in the Black Sea, or the passage from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean or in the Levant. Turkey was a neutral. Restraint of princes, to fall within the words of the exception, must be an existing fact, and not a mere apprehension. This was held long ago by Lord Ellenborough in Atkinson, 10 East. 530. The more recent cases cited by the appellants, such as Geipel, L. R. 7 Q. B. 404 and Nobel's Explosives, [1896] 2 Q. B. 326, do not in any way touch that proposition. They only show that it may be possible to invoke the exception when a reasonable man in face of an existing restraint may consider that the restraint, though it does not affect him at the moment, will do so if he continue the adventure. It would be useless to try to fix by definition the precise imminence of peril which would make the restraint a present fact as contrasted with a future fear. The circumstances in each particular case must be considered. In the present case, while there was natural and great apprehension on September 1st, and while the decision of the British Government immediately after to exclude Black Sea voyages from the benefits of the government insurance scheme might well deter British subjects from sending their ships to the Black Sea, yet it is clearly proved by the production of lists of ships which after that date and up to September 26th passed inwards and outwards through the Dardanelles that there was no such restraint as would have actually prevented the appellants presenting a ship at Marioupol before or by the appointed date of September 20. I agree on this matter with the conclusion arrived at by the court below.

Breach of contract being ascertained, damages are due. * * * I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and that the respondent should be found entitled to the sum of £800, being the sum allowed by Bailhache, J., minus the premium calculated at 6 per cent. * * *

Order of the Court of Appeal set aside, and judgment of Bailhache, J., varied by reducing the amount of damages awarded thereunder to £800²²¹ and, subject to such variation, restored.

²²¹ At p. 237, Earl Loreburn stated the damages found as follows: "In short I think the plaintiffs are entitled to say to the defendants 'You broke your contract in not sending your ship to the point of loading. If you had sent her we could have loaded her with a cargo which we had ready. True, it would never have reached its destination by reason of the war, but we should have insured against war risks, as any practical man would do, and we could have done so at 6 per cent premium. Pay us what we have lost by your default. It is the avowed value at port of destination less the actual price we paid at port of loading and the expenses, and less also the premium we had to pay for insuring against war risks.' That sum leaves £300 as the damages."

But in the Kronprinzessin Cecilie (North German Lloyd v. Guaranty Trust Co.), 244 U. S. 12 (1917), though the exception in the bills of lading of gold shipped from New York to Europe by the vessel, of "arrest and restraint of princes, rulers or people" was not held to include in its "literal intent" the reasonable and justifiable precaution of the master of the vessel in turning back to the United States on learning of the outbreak of war, it was held that "other exceptions are necessarily to be implied" (p. 22) and that in the words

NAYLOR, BENZON & CO., LTD., v. KRAINISCHE INDUSTRIE GESELLSCHAFT.

(High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division. [1918] 1 K. B. 331.)

MCCARDIE, J.²²⁸ The plaintiffs seek a declaration that a written contract made between the defendants and themselves was dissolved by the outbreak of the war with Austria on August 12, 1914.

The plaintiffs are an English company registered under the Companies Act; their office is in London. The defendants are an Austrian corporation; their office is in Austria. The contract, dated February 20, 1912, was a sale by the plaintiffs to the defendants of 40,000 tons of iron ore. The price was 16s. per ton c. i. f. Servola. Servola is a port adjacent to Trieste. The bargain provided that about 20,000 tons should be delivered during 1914 and about 20,000 tons during 1915. Shipments were to be made at regular intervals as should be arranged. Up to August 12, 1914, the plaintiffs had duly delivered about 10,000 tons to the defendants. Upon the outbreak of war a balance of about 30,000 tons was therefore outstanding.

Several points of general importance were argued before me by Mr. Bevan for the plaintiffs and by Mr. La.Quesne for the defendants. Their arguments were full and able.

The contract was made in London. It is in English form, and it must, therefore, be construed according to English law: see Jacobs, Marcus & Co. v. Credit Lyonnais, (1884) 12 Q. B. D. 589, 600, per Bowen, L. J. But for the fact that the agreement contained a suspension clause the case would present no difficulty, for, apart from such a clause, the contract, if carried out, would clearly have involved a trading with the enemy, and would therefore have been avoided by the war. Esposito v. Bowden, 7 E. & B. 763. It matters not whether the contract be beneficial or not to the English subject. Dissolution takes place irrespective of business loss or gain. The question to be asked in such cases is this: What dealings or communications would or might in the ordinary course of contractual performance have taken place between the parties but for the intervention of war and a consequent prohibition of intercourse. That, as far as I can see, was the test applied in Esposito v. Bowden, supra, and is perhaps the only test applicable to the matter. It has been assumed in many decisions. It has been most recently stated by Pickford, L. J., in Rio Tinto Co. v. Ertel Beiber & Co. (1917), 16 L. T. 810, 814.

It therefore becomes necessary to consider the suspension clause before me and to ascertain its true scope, intent and effect. It is as follows:

of the syllabus, paragraph 2: "In an ordinary contract of carriage, not made in the expectation that war may intervene before delivery, peril of belligerent capture affords an implied exception to the carrier's undertaking, the contract being silent on the subject."

²²⁸ The statement of facts and parts of the opinion are omitted.

"In cases of stoppage of mines or works, or of loss or delay during transit, owing to accidents, strikes, lockouts, wars, civil commotions, epidemics, quarantine, dangers of the sea, or of any other cause beyond the control of sellers or buyers, the deliveries now contracted for may be wholly or partially suspended by sellers or buyers during the continuance of same without liability, buyers, however, undertake to receive any quantities for which sellers may have engaged freight before receiving advice of such stoppage." But the contract also contained an arbitration clause, as follows: "Any dispute arising out of this contract shall be referred to two arbitrators in London in the usual manner." The suspension clause cannot, I think, be considered apart from the provision as to arbitration. The consideration of this suspension clause involves several points. The relevant authorities are numerous. The majority have sprung into existence since the occurrence of the present war. The older decisions have been much considered and frequently restated within the last two years. Some of the principles at issue are now, in my opinion, settled with reasonable clearness; but they are not yet finally developed. Their application is oftentimes difficult. In the course of this judgment, I shall formulate rather than fully examine the relevant authorities. In view of the weight of opinion and the divergence of dicta this task is one of delicacy and difficulty to a judge of first instance. But diffidence must not prevent the performance of duty. I will deal with the points involved under separate heads.

First, what is the true effect of the suspension clause in the present contract? * * * I am satisfied that it does not extend to a direct war between Austria and the United Kingdom. * * *

The above observations suffice to dispose of the present case, but as further points were discussed before me it is better that I should briefly deal with them. I will therefore assume that the suspension clause contemplated an outbreak of war between the United Kingdom and Austria, and that it operated also to suspend not deliveries only but all intercourse between the parties. The question, I think, still arises, even on that assumption, as to whether the contract has been dissolved or not. For the events which have taken place may be such as to be outside of the clause, even though construed in the manner most favorable to the defendants. The principle applicable, is, I think, clearly stated in the judgment of Lord Haldane in Tamplin Steamship Co. v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Co., [1916] 2 A. C. 397, 406, as follows: "Although the words of the stipulation may be such that the mere letter would describe what has occurred, the occurrence itself may yet be of a character and extent so sweeping that the foundation of what the parties are deemed to have had in contemplation has disappeared, and the contract itself has vanished with that foundation." The opinions of the members of the House of Lords in Tamplin's Case, [1916] 2 A. C. 397 show an agreement in the principle, but a difference as to its application to the facts of that case: see per Lord Cozens-Hardy, M. R., in Metro- politan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co., [1917] 2 K. B. 1, 20. The principle is one of great value. If applied, it may solve many cases. It was, I think, the principle on which the Court of Appeal decided the case of Scottish Navigation Co. v. Souther & Co., [1917] 1 K. B. 222. It was also the principle which governed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co., [1917] 2 K. B. 1, and the affirmation of that decision by the House of Lords, [1918] A. C. 119. A clause, though broad in its meaning, may not cover a set of facts so fundamental and far-reaching in extent and operation and so prolonged in duration as to change the whole circumstances of the contract and the character of its performance. The war has involved vast change. It has now lasted several years. The end is not in sight. During the whole period of the war, as I have already pointed out, supreme administrative intervention has prevented any communication between the parties. The position of shipping has wholly changed. Trade rests on a different basis. Prices and freights are already uniquely high. At the conclusion of the war new conditions of trade and transport will spring into being. The day of peace will not restore old conditions. Imperial policy may operate in unexpected ways. Can such a set of circumstances have been in the minds of the parties when they made the bargain of February 20, 1912? In my opinion the answer is No. My view in the present case is strengthened by the fact that here the period of normal performance of the contract ended in December, 1915. Two years have elapsed since then. The contract contemplated a temporary suspension only and not the prolonged intermission and changes which have actually taken place. If the circumstances are wholly outside the contemplation of the parties, then a term should be implied that in such a case the contract should cease: Tamplin's Case, supra, per Lord Loreburn. It was upon this principle, I feel, that the case of Horelock v. Beal, [1916] A. C. 486 was decided: Tamplin's Case, [1916] 2 A. C. 397, 403, per Lord Loreburn. I have considered the decision of Rowlatt, J., in Distington Hematite Iron Co. v. Passehl & Co., [1916] 1 K. B. 811. In spite of the suspension clause there existing he held that the war had dissolved the contract. His decision has been approved by Lord Finlay in Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co., [1918] A. C. 119. In my opinion, the decision of Rowlatt, J., substantially rests on the principle I have stated, namely, that a revolution of circumstances may effect a dissolution of contract. As Rowlatt, J., said ([1916] 1 K. B. 814): "To affirm such a contract as standing generally, although at the present time and for an indefinite period it cannot be acted upon, is not to maintain the original contract, but to substitute a different contract for it." I have also considered the decision of Rowlatt, J., in Clapham Steamship Co. v. Handels-en Transport-Maatschappij Vulcan of Rotterdam, [1917] 2 K. B. 639. A suspension clause existed in that case also. The learned judge there held the view that the contract was dissolved upon the ground of public policy. I venture to think, however, that his decision may also be supported on the principle I have stated. I will hereafter say a few words on the question of public policy.

In the course of the arguments before me the decision of Bray, J., in the case of Naylor, Benzon & Co. v. Hirsch (1917), 33 T. L. R. 432 was cited. In that case there was also a suspension clause. But the learned judge held that it did not cover the circumstances which had arisen, and that the contract had become "commercially impracticable," and was therefore dissolved. In my view he merely applied the principle I have already stated. The juristic meaning of the phrase "commercially impracticable" can only be this, I think, that the contract cannot be applied to circumstances which could not have been within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (1873), L. R. 8 C. P. 572, 581, per Brett, J., and Bush v. Whitehaven Trustees (1888), 52 J. P. 392, 393, per Lord Coleridge, C. J.

A final point was argued before me, namely, that a suspension clause operating in such a contract as the present to postpone deliveries until after the conclusion of war was against public policy and therefore void. The question is a grave one. It involves considerations which are not confined to the present contract or the present war. I ought perhaps to state that by s.2 of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916 (5 & 6 Geo. 5 c. 105), the Board of Trade may cancel any contract with an enemy if it appears to the Board that such contract is injurious to the public interest. In my view this provision is of vital importance. The time has perhaps come when the Board of Trade should review the range of existing contracts with enemies and should decide the questions of great economic urgency which obviously arise upon the section. But the existence of the Act of Parliament does not absolve the court from deciding the questions which arise in pending actions.

In the present case, I point out that there is no express restriction of sales by the plaintiffs during the period of suspension. In Zinc Corporation v. Hirsch, [1916] 1 K. B. 541, such an express restriction existed. But upon the question of public policy, I see no distinction between an express restriction and the business restriction which necessarily results where a vendor is embarrassed and fettered by forward contracts. In the case before me the plaintiff's managing director, Mr. Hay, pointed out the effect upon the plaintiffs' business if this contract remains operative at the close of the war. The plaintiffs must, if the bargain be binding, provide for the fulfillment of the contract. Freight rates are already vastly higher than before the war. Tonnage is ever more difficult to get. The price of ore is already 50 per cent higher f. o. b. than before the war. The plaintiffs' ore is largely used for steel wherewith to make munitions of war for the British Government. In the view of Mr. Hay, the value of the ore and the cost of tonnage will be equally as high at the conclusion of the war. The result is that the plaintiffs are and will be hampered if the contract holds, whilst the enemy defendants will possess an asset of great value in their rights against the plaintiffs. In these circumstances, I am asked by the plaintiffs to say that public policy would invalidate the clause, assuming that it applied to the present war and operated in entire suspension of the whole of the respective rights and obligations of the parties.

The question of public policy may well give rise to a difference of judicial opinion. Public policy, it was said by Burroughs, J., in Richardson v. Mellish (1824), 2 Bing. 229, 252, "is a very unruly horse, and when once you get astride it you never know where it will carry you." But the courts have not hesitated in the past to apply the doctrine whenever the facts demanded its application. In Janson v. Dreifontein Consolidated Mines, [1902] A. C. 484, 491 Lord Halsbury, L. C., said: "I deny that any court can invent a new head of public policy." I very respectfully doubt if this dictum be consistent with the history of our law or with many modern decisions. In Wilson v. Carnley, [1908] 1 K. B. 729, the Court of Appeal held that a promise of marriage made by a man who, to the knowledge of the promisee, was at the time of making the promise married, is void as being against public policy. This decision marked a new application or head of public policy. In Neville v. Dominion of Canada News Co., [1915] 3 K. B. 556, the Court of Appeal held, affirming Atkin, J., that an agreement by a journalist not to comment upon the plaintiff's company or its directors or business was void as against public policy. This decision created, I think, a wholly new head of public policy. In Horwood v. Millar's Timber Trading Co., [1917] 1 K. B. 305, the Court of Appeal held that an agreement which unduly fettered a man's liberty of action and the free disposal of his property was void as against public policy. This decision also, I think, created in substance, a new head of public policy. The truth of the matter seems to be that public policy is a variable thing. It must fluctuate with the circumstance of the time. This view is exemplified by the decisions which were discussed in the House of Lords in Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co., [1894] A. C. 535. The general economic considerations to which the courts will have regard were indicated by Lord Parker in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in Attorney-General of the Commonwealth of Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Co., [1913] A. C. 781, 809, 810; see also the judgment of Lord Haldane in North-western Salt Co. v. Electrolytic Alkali Co., [1914] A. C. 461, 469, 471. The principles of public policy remain the same, though the application of them may be applied in novel ways. The ground does not vary. As it was put by Tindal, C. J., in Horner v. Graves, (1831) 7 Bing. 735, 743, "Whatever is injurious to the interests of the public is void, on the grounds of public policy." Now on looking at the famous judgment of Lord Stowell in The Hoop (1799), 1 C. Rob. 196, it will be seen that the prohibition of intercourse with enemies is based in his view on public policy. I think, too, that the decision in Esposito v. Bowden (8 E. & B. 763), substantially rests on the same basis. Upon turning to the judgment of Lord Davey in Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines [1902] A. C. 484, 499, it will be seen that he states expressly that the rule first established in The Hoop (supra), rests "on distinct grounds of public policy." Hence I see no ground for omitting to consider the question of public policy in respect of a suspension clause contained in an ante-war contract with one who is now an enemy, even though public policy sometimes be an unsafe ground for decisions: see per Lord Davey in Janson's Case [1902], A. C. 500. Indeed in the passage from Lord Halsbury's opinion in Janson's case (ibid. 491), already referred to, that great lawyer expressly refers to the rule against "assisting the King's enemies," as a recognized head of public policy. How, then, do the most recent authorities stand with respect to the validity of a suspension clause in such a contract as the present? They may be briefly mentioned. In Zinc Corporation v. Hirsch [1916], 1 K. B. 541 Swinfen Eady and Pickford, L. JJ., both expressed their view that the suspension clause in the contract there in question was, when taken in conjunction with the restriction clause, against public policy. As I have already said, I feel that it is not material whether there be an express restriction clause if there be the implied but necessary restriction of business arrangements resulting from a binding forward contract. In Rio Tinto Co. v. Ertel Bieber & Co. (116 L. T. 810), Pickford, L. J., apparently, and Scrutton, L. J., certainly, approved the view of Swinfen Eady, L. J., in Zinc Corporation v. Hirsch, supra. The judgment of Scrutton, L. J., is emphatic. In the Clapham Steamship Case, [1917] 2 K. B. 639, Rowlatt, J., clearly followed the view of Swinfen Eady, L. J., although no restriction clause existed in that case. The learned judge pointed out that the effect of the suspension clause would be to fortify the present commercial position of the enemy apart from the question of his strengthened position at the conclusion of the war. * * *

I have considered the circumstances of this case with care, and I have also considered the general questions and considerations which arise in connection with it. As a result I have come to the conclusion, though not without doubt, that a suspension clause in such a contract as the present is, having regard to all the relevant circumstances, void as against public policy. I thus follow the view expressed by Rowlatt, J., in the Clapham Steamship Company Case, supra. To maintain the contract during the war will support the enemy during the war. I venture to add the further reason that it will strengthen the enemy greatly after the war. Upon the circumstances before me in this case I feel that the words of Lord Parker in Daimler Co. v. Continental Tyre & Rubber Co. [1916], 2 A. C. 307 do not impugn the views that I have expressed. Nothing that I have said weakens the rule that any debt or cause of action which accrued to the enemy before the war will remain to him, subject to the effect of the Trading with the Enemy Acts, and the vesting of such a chose of action in the Public Trustee. The dissolution of the contract leaves such debts and causes of action as they existed at the outbreak of the war. Ex parte Boussmaker (1806), 13 Ves. 71; Civil Service Co-operative Society v. General Steam Navigation Co., [1903] 2 K. B. 756, 764, per Lord Halsbury, L. C.; Chandler v. Webster, [1904] 1 K. B. 493, 501, per Romer, L. J.

For the reasons given I therefore declare that the contract between the parties was dissolved by the outbreak of the war with Austria on August 12, 1914. The defendants must pay the costs of this action.

²²² See Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co., [1918] A. C. 260.

In The Claveresk (Earn Line S. S. Co., Limited, v. Sutherland S. S. Co., Ltd.), 264 Fed. 276 (1920), the action was for breach of a charter-party of the steamship Claveresk entered into in 1913, to expire in April, 1918. While the Claveresk was on a voyage under the charter, and on January 25, 1917, the British Government notified its owner that the boat was required for government service and the owner honored that notice and the formal requisitioning letter which followed it. On Feb. 10, 1917, the Claveresk passed under control of the British Admiralty and the court expressly found that "in January-February, 1917, having regard to the then violence of German submarine warfare on merchant vessels, and the success thereof, no reasonable man would have expected or even dared hope that the Claveresk, once taken into government service, would be released for any use contemplated by the charter of 1913, before the expiring of the term of that charter" (p. 279). In affirming a decree dismissing the libel because the requisition by the government was within the "restraint of princes" clause and because of the impossibility of performance created by the requisition, Hough, J., said in reference to the second reason:

"How does the contract stand eo instanti the ship is taken away? Is the private contract living or dead, and, if dead, what killed it? This question cannot be answered by reference to the restraint clause, or any other expressed term of the written contract; therefore another legal creation, and one underlying the words chosen by the parties, is appealed to, and we find that this charter party ended or died, and its obligations were forever dissolved, on February 10, 1917, because the commercial adventure was then frustrated.

"This phrase is said to have been born in the judgment in Jackson v. Union Marine Ins. Co., L. R. 10 C. P. 125 (Bank Line v. Capel [1919] 1 A. C. 457); it has been the subject of recent exhaustive discussion in the House of Lords (Horlock v. Beal [1916] 1 A. C. 486, and the Tamplin & Bank Line Cases, supra), and the doctrine was recently applied in The Allanwilde, 248 U. S. 377, 39 Sup. Ct. 147, 63 L. Ed. 312, 3 A. L. R. 15, and Lewis v. Mowinkel, 215 Fed. 710, 132 C. C. A. 88. It is so authoritatively held in the cases cited, and those on which they rely, that the doctrine of frustration applies to a variety of maritime contracts including time charters, that more than mention of the fact scarcely seems necessary. In our judgment the justification for the holdings is best expressed by Lord Sumner (Bank Line Case, at page 454), in saying:

"Rights ought not to be left in suspense or to hang on the chances of subsequent events. The contract binds or it does not bind, and the law ought to be that the parties can gather their fate then and there."

"But since parties almost never agree about it, courts must ascertain fate for them, by (says Lord Loreburn, in Tamplin Case at page 404) inferring, BLACKBURN BOBBIN CO., LTD., v. T. W. ALLEN & SONS, LTD.

(High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division. [1918] 1 K. B. 540.)

Action in the commercial list tried by McCardie, J., without a jury.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the written judgment:—

“The claim is for damages for breach of contract. The plaintiffs are manufacturers of bobbins for spinning. Their office is at Blackburn. The defendants are timber merchants at Hull. In the early part of 1914 the defendants sold to the plaintiffs seventy standards of Finland birch timber at the price of 10*l*, 15*s*. per standard free on rail at Hull. Deliveries were to commence about June or July, 1914,

‘from the nature of the contract and the surrounding circumstances, that a condition not expressed was a foundation on which the parties contracted.’ It follows naturally that, when the foundation is removed the superincumbent contract falls and dies; it is killed by that malignant disease—a change of circumstances. It may also be accepted on authority that frustration of adventure and termination of contract may be the instant result of an act which may be properly described as ‘restraint of princes,’ etc. Bank Line Case, at page 442.

“Applying these rules to the facts before us, it being true that government on February 10, 1917, made it impossible for either Sutherland, Earn Line, or any other private individual to use the Claveresk, and did this under circumstances clearly showing to any sensible man that such indefinite taking would almost certainly outlast the life of the charter, it further appearing that the boat was so retained far beyond the charter period, and indeed (by admission at bar) still is kept by government (cf. Bank Line Case, at page 454), it follows as a conclusion of law that the charter party was terminated by frustration on February 10, 1917.

“Although this result has been worked out in the highest British court with an enormous expenditure of writing, an examination of the case law relied on shows that the doctrine of frustration as applied to time charters is regarded as a logical outcome of the Union Marine Insurance Case, supra, and Gelpel v. Smith, L. R. 7 Q. B. 404, which are likewise the precedents forming the foundations of The Styria, [186 U. S. 1] supra, and kindred decisions.

“Indeed, we cannot think the doctrine new except in phraseology and application; for it is elementary that among the ways in which any contract ends and is dissolved is the cessation of existence of some thing, condition, or state of things, upon the continued existence of which the contract was known to depend, provided such cessation of existence arises without fault in either contracting party. Jenks, Dig. English Civil Law, bk. 2, part 1, § 297, citing CANON.

“In the present instance, what ceased to exist was Sutherland’s control of the Claveresk; that swept away the foundation of contract, as thoroughly as might a fire or shipwreck. All arguments leading to an opposite result, all suggestions that such charter as this survived February 10, 1917, make of the superior force that removed every reasonable chance of doing what both parties expected to do when they agreed together, no more than an option to cancel, to be exercised after a nice calculation of possible loss or gain, by owner or charterer as the case may be. Indeed, there seems nothing left to cancel but a chance of loss; for never is it admitted that any portion of the charter and to continue during the season which would expire about November in that year. The contracts were not formal; they were created by correspondence. They contained no war or force majeure or suspension provisions. They were simple bargains of sale and purchase. Finland produces birch timber of a clean and pliable character. It is particularly useful for the purpose (inter alia) of manufacturing bobbins. The contract required that the timber to be supplied to the plaintiffs should come from Finland. Prior to the war the unvarying practice was to load the timber into vessels at ports in Finland for direct sea carriage to English ports. No timber was railed across Scandinavia for shipment from a Scandinavian port to England.

"Up to August, 1914, the defendants had made no deliveries to the plaintiffs. Then war broke out. Imports of timber from Finland stopped at once. German war vessels traversed the Baltic. Transport was paralyzed. No vessels left Finland for Sweden. Swedish vessels ceased to sail for Finland. The vast disorganizing effect of the war on trade and transport need not be further indicated. It undoubtedly effected a revolution of circumstances, and rendered it impossible for the defendants to deliver the timber in accordance with their bargain. The English timber merchants who deal in Finish timber do not survive seizure except the chance of gain. No suggestion of sharing loss is admitted.

"But a charter party is not a partnership agreement, nor is it primarily an agreement for money payments; it is a promise to serve with and by a named ship, and when the ship is gone the charter is ended; and all the law can do is to apportion blame for the loss, guiding inquiry, first, by the words of the agreement; and, second, by the implications of underlying inherent conditions presumed to be common to sensible and honest men. It is impossible to imagine such men even wishing to agree that if government pays a high price, the advance goes all to one, while if a low price is paid, the burden falls only on the other. 'Heads I win, tails you lose,' as a bargain, is beyond the pale of implication.

"For these reasons, libelant can take nothing by this libel. That pleading rests solely on a breach, called a 'repudiation' by the pleader; this is another of the ways in which a contract ends or dies, in which case the breach gives rise to damages. A breach is a wrong, but there was no breach, therefore there can be no damages."

Where because of impossibility a contractor cannot perform all of his contracts affected by the impossibility in full, but can in part, he may prorate his performances and escape liability by performing to that extent. Herrmann v. Bowen Chemical Mfg. Co., 242 Fed. 59 (1917). That is, of course, providing he has acted reasonably and has not recklessly made new contracts. As was said by Morton, J., in Metropolitan Coal Co. v. Billings, 202 Mass. 457, 460-461 (1909):

"The judge also instructed the jury that as against the defendant the plaintiff would have no right to sell to new customers, and that any inability to fulfill its contract resulting from a desire to sell to others at higher prices or to relieve the necessities of others would not excuse the plaintiff from the obligation imposed on it by the contract. These instructions * * * were well warranted by the decision in Oakman v. Boyce, 100 Mass. 477 * * * We see no reason to doubt the correction of the rules there laid down."

hold stocks. Their timber as it arrived before the outbreak of the war had gone to the customers to whom it had been already sold.

"Following upon the outbreak of the war the defendants did not supply the plaintiffs with any portion of the timber to which the plaintiffs were entitled during the season of 1914. Correspondence took place between the parties up to November, 1914. Thenceforward no letter or communication passed between them until July, 1916. In that month the plaintiffs asked for delivery. The defendants then asserted for the first time that the contract had been dissolved by the outbreak of the war in 1914. The plaintiffs disputed this assertion; hence their claim to damages. The defence contains no plea that the contract was mutually abandoned, nor was any such point raised in argument."

MCCARDIE, J.²²⁴ * * * The above brief statement of facts suffices for the purpose of considering the main point raised by the defendants, namely, that the contract between the parties was dissolved by the outbreak of the war. * * * It is obvious that the principle raised by the case is one of vital and general importance.

The question at issue is this: When will a change of circumstances (not due to the default of either party) cause a dissolution of contract? The law upon the matter is undoubtedly in process of evolution; see per Atkin, J., in Lloyd Royal Belge Societe Anonyme v. Stathatos (1917) 33 Times L. R. 390 and per Pickford, L. J., in Hulton & Co. v. Chadwick & Taylor, (1918) 34 Times L. R. 230. The point must presumably be solved upon broad existing principles of contract law. Those principles, I conceive, should be the same whether the case be one of charterparty, building contract, or sale of goods; see per Lord Loreburn in the Tamplin case, [1916] 2 A. C. 397, 404. But the application of the principles may vary with the terms and subject matter of the contract. Is there a conflict at the present time between the rules which are relevant to the present case? The original rule of English law was clear in its insistence that where a party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself he is bound to make it good notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract; see per curiam, Paradine v. Jane, (1647) Aleyn, 26. That principle was applied with full severity during the eighteenth century. I need not discuss the decisions in detail; many are referred to in Leake on Contracts, 6th ed., pp. 494-498. In some of those cases there was clearly a grave change of circumstance not within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract, yet it was held that no dissolution of contractual obligation took place. I mention the decisions referred to in Leake because it is, I think, essential to remember them if the pending evolution of principle proceeds. The original rule has again and again been restated. I only refer to Spence v. Chodwick, (1847) 10 Q. B. 517, 530, per Wightman, J., and to Ford v. Cotesworth, (1868) L. R. 4 Q. B. 127, per Blackburn, J. To what extent has the original rule been modified by later decision? I do not think that the decision in Exposito v. Bowden, (1857) 7 E. & B. 763, is relevant to the question for the contract was there dissolved by reason of the absolute prohibition of commercial intercourse with an enemy. I doubt, moreover, if Baily v. De Crespigny, (1869) L. R. 4 Q. B. 180, is a true modification of the doctrine. For there an Act of Parliament took away from both parties the subject matter of the contract. The rights of each were destroyed and nothing was left upon which the contract could operate. There was more than a change of circumstance; there was a statutory seizure of the contract property. But the judgment of the court undoubtedly rested to some extent on the principle of dissolution by a complete change of circumstance, and this view has apparently been approved by Lord Parmoor in Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co. [1918] A. C. 119, 140.

The first true modification of the original rule was created, I think, by the doctrine of commercial frustration. I need not review the decisions on this doctrine; they are fully and historically considered in the judgments, both in the Common Pleas and the Exchequer Chamber, in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (1873) L. R. 8 C. P. 572, (1874) L. R. 10 C. P. 125. The effect of that decision is best stated by Brett, J. (L. R. 8 C. P. 581) as follows: "Where a contract is made with reference to certain anticipated circumstances, and where, without any default of either party, it becomes wholly inapplicable to or impossible of application to any such circumstances, it ceases to have any application; it cannot be applied to other circumstances which could not have been in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made." If these words of Brett, J., are to be applied to their widest extent they may well effect a revolution of contract law. It has been pointed out by Lord Loreburn that the rule stated in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (L. R. 10 C. P. 125), is a mere application to commercial adventures of a broad contractual principle; see the Tamplin Case, [1914] 2 A. C. 404.

The next true modification of the original rule was finally affected by the decision in Taylor v. Caldwell, (1863) 3 B. & S. 826. There the contract was held dissolved by the destruction of its subject-matter. The doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell, (supra) was extended by Nicholl & Knight v. Ashton, Eldridge & Co., [1901] 2 K. B. 126, and still more strikingly enlarged by the Coronation cases, of which Krell v. Henry, [1903] 2 K. B. 740 is the most vivid example, for in Krell v. Henry, (supra) the court held that a collateral, though important, circumstance was the basis of the contract between the parties, and that when the basis ceased it followed that the contract was dissolved. Krell v.

Henry, (supra) has been frequently cited and adopted in the highest tribunal.

So stood the decisions at the outbreak of the present war. Since that event judgments have been delivered as to the true effect of the decisions I have stated. On the one hand the original rule has been stated to exist in its integrity, whilst on the other hand the modification of the rule is deemed to be clearly settled: see per Lord Wrenbury in Horlock v. Beal, [1916] 1 A. C. 486, 525. The explanation of the lines of cases represented (a) by Jackson v. Marine Union Insurance Co., L. R. 10 C. P. 125, and (b) by Krell v. Henry, [1903] 2 K. B. 740, has been finally and authoritatively stated. It was put with clearness by Lord Shaw in Horlock v. Beal, [1916] 1 A. C. 512, where he said: "The underlying ratio is the failure of something which was at the basis of the contract in the mind and intention of the contracting parties." It was stated with equal clearness by Lord Haldane in the Tamplin Case, [1916] 2 A. C. 406, 407, where he said: "The occurrence itself may * * * be of a character and extent so sweeping that the foundation of what the parties are deemed to have had in contemplation has disappeared, and the contract itself has vanished with that foundation." In every case it is now necessary "to examine the contract and the circumstances in which it was made not of course to vary, but only to explain it, in order to see whether or not from the nature of it the parties must have made their bargain on the footing that a particular thing or state of things would continue to exist and if they must have done so, then a term to that effect will be implied, though it be not expressed in the contract:" per Lord Loreburn in the Tamplin case (supra). It is obvious that what I will call the Krell v. Henry rule as now formulated is theoretically capable of application to all contracts, whether as between shipowner and seamen, as in Horlock v. Beal, [1916] 1 A. C. 486, or to building contracts, as in Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co., [1918] A. C. 119.

But by what tests and subject to what limitation is the Krell v. Henry rule to be applied? No indication has yet been given as to the extent of its operation. At the outbreak of war a vast body of commercial contracts existed which contained no clauses whatever providing for that event. No one can doubt that such contracts had been made upon the assumption that peace would continue. Neither side contemplated the occurrence of war. But it cannot be that all such contracts were dissolved by the events of August, 1914. The mere continuance of peace was not a condition of the contract: see per Lord Loreburn in the Tamplin case, supra. The destruction of a state of peace is not of itself a destruction of any specific set of facts within the Krell v. Henry rule. Nor can it be that grave difficulty on the part of a vendor in procuring the contract articles will excuse him from the performance of his bargain. If such were the case, then the decision of the House of Lords in Tennants (Lancashire) v. Wilson & Co., [1917] A. C. 495 with respect to the force majeure clause there in question would have been unnecessary for the contract would have been dissolved by a basic change of circumstances and the principle of Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co. supra would have applied.

What, then, are the limits of the Krell v. Henry rule, as most recently exemplified by the last-named case, Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co., supra? At the same time I deem it well to ask this further question: Have the recent decisions in the House of Lords impliedly overruled the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Jacobs, Marcus & Co. v. Crédit Lyonnais, 12 Q. B. D. 589? There the defendants, a London firm, sold to the plaintiffs, London merchants, 20,000 tons of Algerian esparto to be shipped by a French company at an Algerian port on vessels to be provided by the plaintiffs. The defendants pleaded that performance of their contract had become impossible by reason of an insurrection in Algeria, and a consequent prohibition by the territorial government of the collection and transport of esparto. It was held by the Court of Appeal (Brett, M. R. and Bowen, L. J.,) affirming Manisty and Denman, JJ., that such plea afforded no answer to the plaintiff's claim for damages. The pith of the case was put by Bowen, L. J. (at p. 603): "Now, one of the incidents which the English law attaches to a contract is that (except in certain excepted cases, as that of common carriers and bailees, of which this is not one,) a person who expressly contracts absolutely to do a thing not naturally impossible, is not excused for nonperformance because of being prevented by vis major. 'The rule laid down in the case of Paradine v. Jane, (Ayleyn, 26, 27) has,' says Lord Ellenborough, 'been often recognized in courts of law as a sound one; i. e., that 'when the party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract.' (Atkinson v. Ritchie (1809), 10 East, 530, 533.) See also Spence v. Chodwick, 10 Q. B. 517, 530; Loyd v. Guilbert (1865), L. R. 1 Q. B. 115, 121. If inevitable necessity occurring in this country would not excuse nonperformance, why should nonperformance be excused on account of the inevitable necessity arising abroad? So to hold would be to alter the liability which English law attaches to contracts, and would, in the absence of an express or implied intention to that effect, be contrary to authority as well as principle, see Barker v. Hodgson (1814), 3 M. & S. 267; Sjoerds v. Luscombe (1812), 16 East, 201." The change of circumstances in Jacobs Case (12 Q. B. D. 589), was serious and clearly was not foreseen by the parties. See also Ashmore v. Cox, per Lord Russell of Killowen, C. J., [1899] 1 Q. B. 436.

To supply an answer to the above questions is a task of great difficulty in the absence of any authoritative guidance, for it calls not only for a reconciliation of apparently conflicting lines of cases, but it calls also for the ever-embarrassing duty of deciding whether an implied term shall be read into a given contract to the effect that dissolution shall take place if an un contemplated and serious change of circumstances occurs. The decisions with respect to personal services throw, I feel, but little light on the matter, for it seems just and reasonable to imply a condition in such agreements that the contracts shall be dissolved upon the death or physical incapacity of the person who has agreed to give his personal services: see Robinson v. Davison (1871), L. R. 6 Ex. 269. Death and illness are unceasing features of human society. I think, however, that assistance is derived from considering broadly the nature of the cases in which the Krell v. Henry rule has been applied, whether before or after that decision in 1903. It will be observed that they apparently fall into several classes: First, where British legislation or government intervention has removed the specific subject-matter of the construction from the scope of private obligation (Baily v. De Crespigny, L. R. 4 Q. B. 180, is a good example of this class: see also In re Shipton, Anderson & Co., and Harrison Brothers & Co., [1915] 3 K. B. 676, the case of specific goods. I myself, venture to think that this is an independent class of case, though, for the purpose of clearness, I classify it as falling within Krell v. Henry); secondly, where the actual and specific subject-matter of the contract has ceased to exist, apart from British legislation or administrative intervention (Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826 is the best example of this class); thirdly, where a specific set of facts directly affecting a specific subject-matter has ceased to exist, (see Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (L. R. 10 C. P. 125), the case of a ship, and Scottish Navigation Co. v. Souter & Co., [1917] 1 K. B. 222, also the case of a ship); fourthly, where a specific set of facts collaterally only affecting a specific subject-matter, but yet constituting the basis of contract, has ceased to exist (see Nicholl & Knight v. Ashton, Eldridge & Co., [1901] 2 K. B. 126, the case of a ship and Krell v. Henry, [1903] 2 K. B. 740, the letting of specific premises); and, fifthly, where British administrative intervention has so directly operated upon the fulfilment of a contract for a specific work as to transform the contemplated conditions of performance (Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co., [1918] A. G. 119). I need not, of course, classify or illustrate the cases in which British legislation has directly prohibited the performance of a contract. In such cases the doctrine of illegality dissolves the bargains: see Brewster v. Kitchell (1697), 1 Salk. 198. In none of the cases in the above classes has it been stated or substantially suggested that the principle of Krell v. Henry applies to the case of a bare sale of unascertained goods. The illuminating judgment of Scrutton, L. J., in Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co., supra, seems throughout to be dealing with specific subject-matters.

But the above classification, imperfect as I fear it is, does not exhaust the decisions which call for consideration and here I must point out that in not a few of the decisions since the outbreak of the war the question of trading with the enemy has crept directly or indirectly into the determination of the matters in dispute. The doctrine of prohibition against any intercourse whether commercial or otherwise, with an enemy subject, is severe and far-reaching. I need only refer to Esposito v. Bowden, 7 E. & B. 763; Zine Corporation v. Hirsch, [1916] 1 K. B. 541; Robson v. Premier Oil & Pipe Line Co., [1915] 2 Ch. 124; and Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co., [1918] A. C. 260 in the House of Lords. It is important to remember this point in approaching the cases which I next mention. Such cases apparently deal with a sale of unascertained goods. They are as follows: (a) Jager v. Tolme & Runge, [1916] 1 K. B. 930 (Court of Appeal). The facts of this case were complicated, but the substance of the matter was that the vendors had agreed to deliver sugar f. o. b. Hamburg in August, 1914. The parties were British. The courts held that the contract was dissolved by the outbreak of the war. In my opinion, however, it is clear that the ratio of the decision was that performance of the contract would be illegal inasmuch as it would involve commercial intercourse with the enemy. The Court of Appeal ignore the expressly-raised contention that the contracts had been dissolved on the principle of Krell v. Henry. The case of Grey & Co. v. Tolme (1915), 31 Times L. R. 551 was decided by Bailhache, J., on the same ratio. (b) Smith, Coney & Barrett v. Becker, Gray & Co., [1916] 2 Ch. 86. Here again the facts were complicated. The parties were British firms. The vendors had agreed on August 1st, 1914, to sell sugar f. o. b. or into warehouse Hamburg. In view of the special provision in the contract the court held that the contract was not dissolved. Had it held otherwise, I venture to think that the true ratio would again have been that performance would have involved trading with the enemy. But it is right to say that although the majority of the court (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M. R. and Swinfen Eady, L. J.) did not apparently favour the application of the Krell v. Henry rule, yet Phillimore, L. J., seems to have thought that it might apply under certain circumstances—for instance, if the sugar had been wholly destroyed by fire. The point does not seem to have been fully argued, and such cases as Jacobs, Marcus & Co. v. Credit Lyonnais 12 Q. B. D. 589 were not brought to the attention of the court. (c) Hulton & Co. v. Chadwick & Taylor, 34 Times L. R. 230. The facts in this decision more closely approach the facts of the present case. It was recognized by Pickford, L. J., that the principle of dissolution of contract by change of circumstances had been largely extended in operation. But I respectfully suggest that the true ratio of the decision of the Court of Appeal is to be found not so much in the change of circumstance, though serious in extent, as in the fact that administrative intervention of the British Government had in substance prevented the fulfilment of the contract by the vendor in accordance with his obligations. Hulton & Co. v. Chadwick & Taylor represents, in my view, an extension of the principle of Brewster v. Kitchell, 1 Salk. 198, or Baily v. De Crespigny, L. R. 4 Q. B. 180, rather than a true extension of the broader principle of Krell v. Henry. The former principle is one which admits of many applications in these days of administrative intervention, and in some cases the facts may be covered as much by Krell v. Henry as by Baily v. De Crespigny, supra. The principles may overlap. The rule contended for by Mr. MacKinnon [of counsel for the defendants] must have applied, if at all, as much to that case as to the present, for there had been in Hulton's case (34 Times L. R. 230) a revolution of circumstance, yet it is clear that Pickford, L. J., rested his judgment on administrative intervention, that is to say, on Baily v. De Crespigny, supra, rather than on the application of the Krell v. Henry rule.

My conclusion upon the matter is that in the absence of any question as to trading with the enemy, and in the absence also of any administrative intervention by the British Government authorities, a bare and unqualified contract for the sale of unascertained goods will not (unless most special facts compel an opposite implication) be dissolved by the operation of the principle of Krell v. Henry even though there has been so grave and unforeseen a change of circumstance as to render it impossible for the vendor to fulfill his bargain. If I were to hold otherwise, I should create a rule the results of which no man can foresee, and to the operation of which no judge can satisfactorily fix the limits.

By stating the above conclusion I maintain the original rule of English law whereby a man is bound by his contract whilst I leave a field as yet undefined for the operation and extension of the Krell v. Henry principle. I am fortified in the view I express by the fact that Jacobs, Marcus & Co. v. Crédit Lyonnais, supra, has remained unchallenged amidst the testing breadth of recent decisions. I can see no sound distinction between impossibility of foreign law and impossibility created by an outbreak of war involving a complete cessation of transport facilities. Just as it seems clear that a vendor is not absolved from the duty to deliver unascertained goods by reason of the destruction of his factory or warehouse, so a vendor is not relieved from his obligation in such a case as the present. An ordinary and bare contract for the sale of unascertained goods gives no scope for the operation of the Krell v. Henry rule, unless the special facts show that the parties have clearly (though impliedly) agreed upon a set of circumstances as constituting the contractual basis. Here no such agreement exists. In the present case I ask the question put by Denman, J., in Jacobs, Marcus & Co. v. Credit Lyonnais, 12 Q. B. D. 597: "Looking at the nature of this contract, what is there to show that the intention of the parties was that the defendants should be relieved from the performance of their contract by reason of difficulties arising out of circumstances which were unforeseen?" My answer in the present case is that there is nothing to show such an intention. There is here no question of illegality or public policy, of actual prohibition or of intervention by the government. There is merely an unforeseen event which has rendered it practically impossible for the vendor to deliver. That event the defendants could easily have provided for in their contracts. If I approve the defendants' contention, I should be holding in substance that a contract which did not contain a war clause was as beneficial to the vendor as a contract which contained such a provision.

In my view the rule in Jacobs, Marcus & Co. v. Credit Lyonnais, 12 Q. B. D. 589, holds good today, and I think that it covers the present case. I desire respectfully to add that in my opinion the Krell v. Henry rule should not be unduly extended. It is only in exceptional cases that it can be safely applied. The difficulties of its application are amply indicated by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Herne Bay Steam Boat Co. v. Hutton, [1903] 2 K. B. 683 and by the actual decision of the majority of the Law Lords in the Tamplin case [1916], a A. C. 397. The perils of the rule may appear in later years. If it be extended too far, it may tend to sap the foundations of contract law as they now exist. It is, I venture to say, of the utmost importance to a commercial nation that vendors should be held to their business contracts. When a change of circumstances is to absolve from liability, provision to that effect should be inserted in the bargain. If I pronounced in favor of the defendants I should be giving a decision of a legislative rather than judicial character, and I might well be rendering superfluous in many cases the provisions contained in the courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1917 (7 & 8 Geo. 5 c. 25).

I may mention that in the present case I am satisfied that the plaintiffs were unaware at the time of the contract of the circumstance that the timber from Finland was shipped direct from a Finnish Port to Hull. They did not know whether the transport was or was not partly by rail across Scandinavia, nor did they know that the timber merchants in this country did not hold stocks of Finnish larch.

I decide against the first contention of the defendants. * * *

CHAPTER VIII.

ILLEGAL CONTRACTS.¹

THORSTEN NORDENFELT, APPELLANT, v. THE MAXIM-NORDENFELT GUNS AND AMMUNITION COMPANY, LIMITED, RESPONDENTS.

(House of Lords. [1894.] A. C. 535.)

LORD HERSCHELL, L. C.² My Lords, the question raised by this appeal is, whether a covenant entered into between the parties can be

¹ "It is not every contract, which may be remotely connected with some illegal transaction, which can be said to be against public policy. While public policy forbids the enforcement of an illegal or immoral contract, it is as equally insistent that those which are lawful and contravene none of its rules shall be enforced, and not held invalid on a bare suspicion of illegality. Those contracts alone are against public policy which tend clearly to injure public health, public morals, or public confidence in the purity of the administration of the law, or to undermine that sense of security for individual rights, whether of personal liability or of private property, which any citizen ought to feel." Sampson, J., in Owens v. Henderson Brewing Co., 185 Ky. 477, 480 (1919).

"There is no precise definition of public policy and consequently no absolute rule by which a contract can be measured or tested to determine whether or not it is contrary to public policy. Each case, as it arises, must be judged and determined according to its own peculiar circumstances. The public policy of the state or of the nation is to be found in its constitution and its statutes, and when cases arise concerning matters upon which they are silent, then in its judicial decisions and the constant practice of the government officials * * * As was said in Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R. Co., supra [70 Fed. 20]: 'The public policy of a state or nation must be determined by its constitution, laws and judicial decisions—not by the varying opinions of laymen, lawyers or judges as to the demands of the interests of the public.'" Cooke, J., in Zeigler v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, 245 Ill. 180, 193 (1910).

"A correct definition, at once concise and comprehensive, of the words 'public policy' has not yet been formulated by our courts. Indeed, the term is as difficult to define with accuracy as the words 'fraud,' 'equity,' 'welfare.' In substance, it may be generally said to be the community common sense and common conscience extended and applied throughout the state to matters of public morals, public health, public safety, public welfare, and the like. It is that general and well-settled public opinion relating to man's plain, palpable duty to his fellow man, that has due regard to all circumstances of each particular situation.

"Our written public policies are put into our Constitutions, our statutes, enforced against the appellant, or whether it is void as being in restraint of trade.

The covenant in question was contained in an agreement of the 12th of September, 1888, and was in these terms "(2) The said Thorsten Nordenfelt shall not, during the term of 25 years from the date of the incorporation of the company, if the company shall so long continue to carry on business, engage except on behalf of the company either directly or indirectly in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns, gun-mountings, or carriages, gunpowder explosives, or ammunition or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that for the time being carried on by the company: provided that such restriction shall not apply to explosives other than gunpowder or to subaqueous or submarine boats or torpedoes or castings or forgings of steel or iron or alloys of iron or of copper. Provided also that the said Thorsten Nordenfelt shall not be released from this restriction by the company ceasing to carry on business merely for the purpose of reconstitution or with a view to the transfer of the business thereof to another company so long as such other company taking a transfer thereof shall continue to carry on the same." The agreement also provided that the appellant should, for seven years from the incorporation of the respondent company, retain the share qualification of a director, and should act as managing director of the company, at a remuneration of £2000 a year, together with a commission upon the net profit of the company.

Before directing attention to the particular terms of the covenant, and to the considerations to which it gives rise, it is necessary to advert to the position of the parties at the time the agreement was entered into.

The appellant had, prior to March, 1886, obtained patents for improvements in quick-firing guns, and carried on, amongst other things, the business of the manufacture of such guns and of ammunition. In that month he procured the registration of a limited liability company, which was to take over his business, with the business assets and liabilities. On the 5th of March, 1886, an agreement was made between the appellant and the Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Company by and ordinances, but our unwritten public policies rest largely in judicial judgment and public opinion. Manifestly, when the Constitution of the state declares and defines certain public policies, such public policies must be paramount, though a score of statutes conflict and a multitude of judicial decisions be to the contrary. No General Assembly is above the plain potential provisions of the Constitution, and no court, however sacred or powerful, has the right to declare any public policy that clearly contravenes or nullifies the rights declared in the Constitution." Wanamaker, J., in Kintz v. Harriger, 99 Oh. St. 240, 246-247 (1919).

"What the law recognizes as contrary to public policy turns out to vary greatly from time to time." Viscount Haldane in Rodrigues v. Speyer Bros., [1919] 1 A. C. 59, 79.

On public policy, see Naylor, Benson & Co., Ltd., v. Krainische Industrie Gesellschaft, reported ante, p. 1091.

which the company was to purchase the good-will of the appellant's business, and all the stock, plant, and patents connected therewith, he covenanting to act as managing director for a period of five years, and so long as the Nordenfelt Company should continue to carry on business "not to engage, except on behalf of such company, either directly or indirectly in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns or ammunition, or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that carried on by such company."

The agreement for purchase was duly carried into effect, and the price paid to the appellant, namely, £237,000 in cash, and £50,000 in paid-up shares of the company. In July, 1888, negotiations were entered into for the amalgamation of the Nordenfelt Company and the Maxim Gun Company, and for the transfer of their business and assets to a new company, to be called the Maxim-Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Company.

By an agreement for the amalgamation of the two companies, dated the 3d of July, 1888, and made between the Maxim Company, the Nordenfelt Company, and P. Thaine, on behalf of the new company, the Nordenfelt Company agreed that they would procure the appellant to enter into the agreement which was afterwards embodied in the instrument of the 12th of September, 1888.

The respondents were incorporated on the 17th of July, 1888, and on the 8th of August the agreement of the 3d of July was adopted by the company. It is to be noted that at the time when this agreement was entered into, to which the Nordenfelt Company was a party, the appellant was managing director of that company, and that, in the memorandum of association of the amalgamated company which was signed by the appellant, the objects of the company were stated to be, inter alia, not only the adoption of the agreement of the 3d of July, but also "to acquire, undertake, and carry on as successors to the Maxim Gun Company and the Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Company, the good-will of the trade and businesses heretofore carried on by such companies and each of them, and the property and rights belonging to or held in connection therewith respectively."

This is of importance, because the appellant in a forcible argument pointed out that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was largely founded on the fact that the covenant in question was entered into in connection with the sale of the good-will of the appellant's business, and was designed for the protection of the good-will so sold, and he contended that this was an error, inasmuch as there was no sale by him of the good-will on that occasion, he having already parted with it to the Nordenfelt Company, the later sale being by that company and not by him.

I think it is impossible to accede to this contention. Upon the sale by the appellant to the Nordenfelt Company, the good-will was conveyed to them, and was protected by a covenant in some respects larger than the one he entered into in September, 1888, but it was limited to the time during which that company should carry on business; it therefore necessarily ceased when the Nordenfelt Company and the Maxim Company were absorbed by the new company. But in the agreement for the amalgamation (to the making of which, as I said, the appellant was a party) the covenant which the Nordenfelt Company undertook to obtain from the appellant was to be in addition to the transfer by the Nordenfelt Company of the full benefit of any obligations which Mr. Nordenfelt was then under to that company, and by the terms of the memorandum of association of the new company the object was, as I have shown, stated to the world to be the acquisition of the good-will of the Nordenfelt Company.

My Lords, in view of these facts, I think the case must be treated on precisely the same footing as if the obligations of the covenant under consideration had been undertaken in connection with the direct transfer to the respondents of the good-will of the appellant's business and with the object of protecting it.

The appellant mainly relied upon the fact that the covenant was general, that is to say, unlimited in respect of area, and argued that it was therefore void. I think it was long regarded as established, as part of the common law of England, that such a general covenant could not be supported.

In early times all agreements in restraint of trade, whether general or restricted to a particular area, would probably have been held bad; but a distinction came to be taken between covenants in general restraint of trade and those where the restraint was only partial. The distinction was recognized and given effect to by Lord Macclesfield in his celebrated judgment in Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181. That was a case of particular restraint [not to exercise the trade of a baker in a particular parish during the five year term of the lease of a bake-house assigned by defendant to plaintiff] and the covenant was held good * * *

But I respectfully differ from the view which appears to be indicated [in cases cited] that there was not at any time a rule of the common law distinguishing particular from general restraints, and treating the former only as exceptions from the general principle that contracts in restraint of trade are invalid.

The discussion on which I have been engaged is, it must be admitted, somewhat academic. For, in considering the application of the rule, and the limitations, if any, to be placed on it, I think that regard must be had to the changed conditions of commerce and of the means of communication which have been developed in recent years. To disregard these would be to miss the substance of the rule in a blind adherence to its letter. Newcastle-upon-Tyne is for all practical purposes as near to London to-day as towns which are now regarded as suburbs of the metropolis were a century ago. An order can be sent to Newcastle more quickly than it could then have been transmitted from one end of London to the other, and goods can be conveyed between the two cities in a few hours and at comparatively small cost. Competition has assumed altogether different proportions in these altered circumstances, and that which would have been once merely a burden on the covenantor may now be essential if there is to be reasonable protection to the covenantee.

When Lord Macclesfield emphasized the distinction between a general restraint not to exercise a trade throughout the kingdom and one which was limited to a particular place, the reason which he gave for the distinction was that "the former of these must be void, being of no benefit to either party, and only oppressive, as shall be shown by-and-by." He returns to the subject later on, when giving the reasons why all voluntary restraints are regarded with disfavor by the law, in these terms: "Thirdly, because in a great many instances they can be of no use to the obligee; which holds in all cases of general restraint throughout England; for what does it signify to a tradesman in London what another does at Newcastle? And surely it would be unreasonable to fix a certain loss on one side, without any benefit to the other. The Roman Law would not enforce such contracts by an action (see Puffendorff, lib. 5, c. 2, s. 3, 21 H. 7, 20)" There are other passages in the judgment where this view is enforced.

There is no doubt that, with regard to some professions and commercial occupations, it is as true to-day as it was formerly, that it is hardly conceivable that it should be necessary, in order to secure reasonable protection to a covenantee, that the covenantor should preclude himself from carrying on such profession or occupation anywhere in England. But it cannot be doubted that in other cases the altered circumstances to which I have alluded have rendered it essential, if the requisite protection is to be obtained, that the same territorial limitations should not be insisted upon which would in former days have been only reasonable. I think, then, that the same reasons which led to the adoption of the rule require that it should be frankly recognized that it cannot be rigidly adhered to in all cases.

My Lords, it appears to me that a study of Lord Macclesfield's judgment will show that if the conditions which prevail at the present day had existed in his time he would not have laid down a hard-and-fast distinction between general and particular restraints, for the reasons by which he justified that distinction would have been unfounded in point of fact.

Whether the cases in which a general covenant can not be supported are to be regarded as exceptions from the rule which I think was long recognized as established, or whether the rule is itself to be treated as inapplicable to the altered conditions which now prevail, is probably a matter of words rather than of substance. The latter is perhaps the sounder view. When once it is admitted that whether the covenant be general or particular the question of its validity is alike determined by the consideration whether it exceeds what is necessary for the protection of the covenantee, the distinction between general and particular restraints ceases to be a distinction in point of law.

I think that a covenant entered into in connection with the sale of the good-will of a business must be valid where the full benefit of the purchase cannot be otherwise secured to the purchaser. It has been recognized in more than one case that it is to the advantage of the public that there should be free scope for the sale of the good-will of a business or calling. These were cases of partial restraint. But it seems to me that if there be occupations where a sale of the good-will would be greatly impeded, if not prevented, unless a general covenant could be obtained by the purchaser, there are no grounds of public policy which countervail the disadvantage which would arise if the good-will were in such cases rendered unsaleable.

I would adopt in these cases the test which in a case of partial restraint was applied by the Court of Common Pleas in Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 735, 743, in considering whether the agreement was reasonable. Tindal, C. J., said: "We do not see how a better test can be applied to the question, whether reasonable or not, than by considering whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in favor of whom it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public. Whatever restraint is larger than the necessary protection of the party can be of no benefit to either; it can only be oppressive, and, if oppressive, it is, in the eye of the law, unreasonable." The tendency in later cases has certainly been to allow a restriction in point of space which formerly would have been thought unreasonable, manifestly because of the improved means of communication. A radius of 150 or even 200 miles has not been held too much in some cases. For the same reason I think a restriction applying to the entire kingdom may in other cases be requisite and justifiable.

I must, however, guard myself against being supposed to lay down that if this can be shown the covenant will in all cases be held to be valid. It may be, as pointed out by Lord Bowen, that in particular circumstances the covenant might nevertheless be held void on the ground that it was injurious to the public interest.

My Lords, I turn now to the application of the law to the facts of the present case. It seems to be impossible to doubt that it is shown that the covenant is not wider than is necessary for the protection of the respondents. The facts speak for themselves. If the covenant embraced anything less than the whole of the United Kingdom it is obvious that it would be nugatory. The only customers of the respondents must be found amongst the governments of this and other countries, and it would not practically be material to them whether the business were carried on in one part of the United Kingdom or another.

So far I have dealt only with the covenant in relation to the United Kingdom. The appellant appeared willing to concede that it might be good if limited to the United Kingdom; but he contended that it ought not to be world-wide in its operation. I think that in laying down the rule that a covenant in restraint of trade unlimited in regard to space was bad, the courts had reference only to this country. They would, in my opinion, in the days when the rule was adopted, have scouted the notion that if for the protection of the vendees of a business in this country it were necessary to obtain a restrictive covenant embracing foreign countries, that covenant would be bad. They certainly would not have regarded it as against public policy to prevent the person whose business had been purchased and was being carried on here from setting up or assisting rival businesses in other countries; and for my own part I see nothing injurious to the public interests of this country in upholding such a covenant.

When the nature of the business and the limited number of customers is considered, I do not think the covenant can be held to exceed what is necessary for the protection of the covenantees.

I move your Lordships, therefore, that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

*Order appealed from affirmed and appeal dismissed.

* Local statutes should be consulted. In the absence of statutes, most American courts follow the principal case. See Anchor Electric Co. v. Hawkes, 171 Mass. 101 (1898), reversing earlier Massachusetts cases; Hall Mfg. Co. v. Western Steel & Iron Works, 227 Fed. 588 (1915). But in some states, as, for instance, Illinois, public policy is held, in any contract restraining the carrying on of a business by a seller, to call for the reservation of the privilege of carrying it on somewhere in Illinois. In Union Strawboard Co. v. Bonfield, 193 Ill. 420, 427 (1901), Cartwright, J., said: "It is against the policy of the state that its citizens should not have the privilege of pursuing their lawful occupations at some place within its borders and that a citizen should be compelled to leave the state to engage in his business and to support himself and family. It is true that a contract may be valid which embraces portions of more than one state. Trade and business are not affected by state lines, and a contract might be good in restraint of trade which embraced, within reasonable limits, parts of different states, but an agreement which applies to the whole state is void and cannot be enforced." See also Andrews v. Kingsbury, 212 Ill. 97 (1904). On validity of contract in restraint of trade covering whole state or country, see 20 Ann. Cas. 661, note.

9 A. L. R. 1450.)

Action by the Samuel Stores, Incorporated, against Aaron H. Abrams. Demurrer to complaint sustained, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

Action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from conducting a clothing business in Bridgeport and from soliciting former and present customers of the plaintiff to trade with him, in alleged violation of a contract.

The defendant filed a demurrer, pleading, among other grounds of demurrer, the following:

to leave his parish under pain of pillory or prison, when if he could not stand where he was rooted he would become a public charge, it may have been right enough for the king's courts to see no public interest but the artisan's ability to pay taxes and serve the king. * * * It took the courts a long time to get beyond testing the validity of a restrictive covenant purely by the presence or absence of limitations. * * * But beginning about 1830, the advent of the factory system, multifold new machines, railroads, steamships, fast mail and express service, telegraphs, telephones, wireless, trolleys, automobiles, aeroplanes, lessening space, shortening time, offering continually new and widening avenues for both labor and capital, emphasized a point of view that had been suggested in somewhat earlier times; and that is that the validity of a restrictive covenant should be tested by determining whether in the facts of the particular case the restraint is greater than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the purchaser of the business and good will. * * *

"Tested by the rule of reason, a restrictive covenant is not necessarily valid because it is limited in time and place. Logically the corollary follows that by the same rule of reason a restrictive covenant is not necessarily invalid because it is unlimited in time and place. A restraint of 500 miles and 50 years on a village doctor, who had only a local practice, would be unreasonable, because not reasonably necessary to the protection of his successor, while a general covenant by the Pears' Soap Company should be enforced (at least to the extent of the decreeing court's reach) because the good will of the business is world-wide and of expected indefinite continuance. * * *

"In this case, and in all of the kind, two public interests are to be balanced against the one that is opposed to restrictive covenants: honesty and fidelity among our business men; and the interest of everyone, and so of all, in being able to sell on the most advantageous terms whatever property he owns or has produced, whether tangible or intangible. Unless injury to the public manifestly outweighs the public policies of honesty and of freedom of alienation, restrictive covenants should be enforced."

But even in England an occasional protest is heard against the rule in the Nordenfellt case. See Goldsohl v. Goldman, [1914] 2 Ch. 603. And in S. V. Nevanas & Co. v. Walker, [1914] 1 Ch. 413, 425, Sargant, J., said: "To preclude a former servant from carrying on his natural business in any part whatever of the United Kingdom is a very strong step and requires exceptional justification."

On contract to keep out of a particular business as an unlawful restraint of trade when independent of any other contract, see 3 A. L. R. 250, note.

On the severability of the illegal provisions in a contract in restraint of trade, see Attwood v. Lamont, [1920] 3 K. B. 571. See also 117 Am. St. Rep. 499, note.

"An injunction against the defendant as prayed for would be mischievous and against public policy."

This demurrer the court of common pleas sustained; the plaintiff appealed.

CURTIS, J.⁴ By the complaint and the contract, Exhibit A, attached thereto, the following facts are disclosed:

The plaintiff is a corporation of the state of New York engaged in conducting branch clothing stores in various cities.

It employed the defendant as manager of one of its branch stores for the period of one year from September 5, 1918, under the written contract attached to the complaint.

The contract contains the following stipulation on the part of the defendant:

"And, whereas, in the course of such employment, Aaron H. Abrams may be assigned to duties that may give him knowledge and information of confidential matters relating to the conduct and details of the business of the Samuel Stores, Incorporated, as to result in the opinion of the Samuel Stores, Incorporated, irreparable injury to it, for which no money damages could adequately compensate, if the said party of the second part should enter the employment of rival concern while this contract was still in effect, the said Aaron H. Abrams agrees not to engage in any other occupation during the life of this contract, and further agrees not to either directly or indirectly connect himself with any firm engaged in business similar to that of the party of the first part, which would compete with the business of the party of the first part, nor will he himself engage in any business that will compete with the business of the party of the first part, for five years after the date of his connection with the party of the first part being severed. The said Aaron H. Abrams agrees to use his best endeavors and his entire time to promote the business and business interests of the Samuel Stores, Incorporated."

The defendant in November, 1918, left the employ of the plaintiff, and on December 9, 1918, opened a store in Bridgeport, and engaged in the business of selling clothing for men, women, and children, and engaged in the same line of business conducted by the plaintiff in Bridgeport, and has advertised himself as formerly with the People's Store, the same being the trade-name under which the plaintiff has been conducting business in Bridgeport and the defendant has been and is soliciting the customers of the plaintiff to trade with him.

This case presents the question whether or not the restrictive stipulation in the contract between the parties is void as against public policy.

The public policy to be applied is the public policy of the present time. The changing conditions of life modify from time to time the reasons for determining whether the public interest requires that a restrictive stipulation shall be deemed void as against public policy. The following statement of the law found in the leading case of Nordenfelt v. Maxim-Nordenfelt Gun & Ammunition Co., (1895) 11 The Reports, 1, 27, is generally recognized as fundamental:

"The true view at the present time, I think, is this: The public have an interest in every person's carrying on his trade freely; so has the individual. All interference with individual liberty of action in trading and all restraints of trade of themselves, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and therefore void. But there are exceptions; restraints of trade and interference with individual liberty of action may be justified by the special circumstances of a particular case. It is a sufficient justification, and, indeed, it is the only justification if the restriction is reasonable,—reasonable, that is, in reference to the interests of the parties concerned, and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public,—so framed and so guarded as to afford adequate protection to the party in whose favor it is imposed, while at the same time it is in no way injurious to the public."

Under this principle, that the reasonableness of a restriction in view of all the circumstances and the interests of the public and the parties is the test of its validity, certain basic considerations have developed as guides to covenants and the courts. Some of these we will now consider.

The cases in relation to restraints of trade soon disclosed two leading classes of contracts, contracts between the vendor and vendee of a business and its good will, and, on the other hand, contracts between an employer and an employé.

Under the law, restrictive stipulations in agreements between employer and employé are not viewed with the same indulgence as such stipulations between a vendor and vendee of a business and its good will.

In the latter case, the restrictions add to the value of what the vendor wishes to sell, and also add to the value of what the vendee purchases. In such cases also the parties are presumably more nearly on a parity in ability to negotiate than is the case in the negotiation of agreements between employer and employé.

In a restrictive covenant between a vendor of a business and the vendee, "a large scope for freedom of contract and a correspondingly large restraint of trade" is allowable. In a restrictive covenant between employer and employé on the other hand, there is "small scope for the restraint of the right to labor and trade and a correspondingly small freedom of contract."

In dealing with a restrictive stipulation between an employer and an employé, as in this case, in order that the court may uphold and enforce the restriction, if it is not otherwise contrary to public policy, the court must find that the facts alleged disclose a restriction on the employé "reasonably necessary for the fair protection of the employer's business or rights, and not unreasonably restricting the rights of the employé, due regard being had to the interests of the public and the circumstances and conditions under which the contract is to be performed." Wm. Rogers Mfg. Co. v. Rogers, 58 Conn. 356, 20 Atl. 467, 7 L. R. A. 779, 18 Am. St. Rep. 278; Eureka Laundry Co. v. Long, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 119, note; Simms v. Burnette, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 389, note; Herbert Morris, Limited v. Saxelby, [1916] 1 A. C. 688; Mason v. Provident C. & S. Co., [1913] A. C. 724; Nordenfeldt v. Maxim H. G. & A. Co., [1894] A. C. 565; Id., 11 Reports, 27; Konski v. Peet, [1915] 1 Ch. 530; Herreshoff v. Boutineau, 17 R. I. 3, 19 Atl. 712, 8 L. R. A. 469, 33 Am. St. Rep. 850.

We are then to determine whether the facts set up in this complaint make it reasonably necessary for the fair protection of the plaintiff's business to hold that the restrictive stipulation in the contract should be enforced.

This stipulation provides, in effect, that the defendant, for five years after he leaves the employ of the plaintiff, shall not either directly or indirectly connect himself with any firm engaged in business similar to that of the plaintiff, which would compete with the business of the plaintiff in any city where the plaintiff conducts one of its branch stores.

It appears from the complaint that the services of the defendant contracted for by the plaintiff are not peculiar or individual in their character, nor purely intellectual, nor are they special or extraordinary services or acts.

The defendant's services and the plaintiff's business are not of a character to involve the acquisition of special business secrets of the plaintiff by the defendant. The agreement relates merely to services in a local retail business, and primarily aims to restrict competition.

The plaintiff conducts a local retail clothing business in which the defendant was employed as manager. The situation of manager could have been filled by any person of sufficient business capacity.

The clothing business may be entered upon by any one who desires to enter it, and whether the defendant opened a competitive store or another did so was immaterial to the plaintiff, except that the defendant having acquaintance and knowledge of the plaintiff's customers might solicit their trade.

The restriction in question provides, in substance, that in any city where the plaintiff carries on its business the defendant shall not directly or indirectly connect himself with any firm engaged in business similar to that of the plaintiff, which would compete with the business of the plaintiff, for five years after his employment with the plaintiff ceases.

This restriction, binding for that period and relating to every city in which the plaintiff has established a branch store, is not reasonably necessary for the fair protection of the plaintiff's business. It covers a number of cities in which the defendant, from his employment in one city, could have had no acquaintance with the local customers.

A restrictive agreement, providing that the defendant, while connected with a competing business, should not solicit trade from persons who were customers of the plaintiff at the branch store where the defendant was employed during his employment, might reasonably be claimed to be such a restriction as is reasonably necessary for the fair protection of the plaintiff's business. Konski v. Peet, [1915] 1 Ch. 530.

Such a restriction obviously would not unduly restrict the rights of the defendant, since it would not otherwise restrict the field of his employment than by prohibiting the solicitation of the clothing trade of a limited number of people in one city.

By the sweeping terms of the restrictive stipulation in question, it is true that the solicitation of such customers of the plaintiff is indirectly prevented. But at what cost to the defendant? He is prohibited from entering or being employed in the clothing business in various cities, the number of which may be large, and the area in which he may exercise such experience in and aptitude for that business as he may possess is greatly limited.

The reasonable and fair protection of the plaintiff's business does not require such an extended restriction of the defendant's field of employment. Public policy requires that the defendant's liberty of action in trading or employment shall not be unduly restricted. To enforce the sweeping terms of this restriction would be a useless, unnecessary, and undue curtailment of the defendant's liberty of trading and employment, and an unjustified restraint on competition.

The case at bar illustrates the following comment found in Herreshoff v. Boutineau, 17 R. I. 7, 19 Atl. 713, 8 L. R. A. 469, 33 Am. St. Rep. 850:

"Covenantees [in contracts in restraint of trade between employer and employé] desiring the maximum protection have, no doubt, a difficult task. When they fail, it is commonly because, like the dog in the fable, they grasp too much, and so lose all."

There is no error.⁵

"Covenants in partial restraint of trade are generally upheld as valid when they are agreements (1) by the seller of property or business not to compete with the buyer in such a way as to derogate from the value of the property or business sold; (2) by a retiring partner not to compete with the firm; (3) by a partner pending the partnership not to do anything to interfere, by competition or otherwise, with the business of the firm; (4) by the buyer of property not to use the same in competition with the business retained by the seller; and (5) by an assistant, servant or agent, not to compete with his

GEORGE W. COLLAMER v. IRA DAY.

This was an action of trover, brought up from the county court for the revision of their decision presented in the following case, agreed to by the parties, to wit:

"In this action, plaintiff offered to prove, at the trial, that, on the day mentioned in the declaration, the plaintiff and defendant were together in the office of Jacob Collamer, at Royalton—that while there, a gentleman passed in a chaise: when defendant asked, whose chaise is that? Plaintiff answered, Dr. Denison's. Defendant said no, it is not Denison's chaise: I will bet my watch against yours that it is not Denison's chaise—That to this proposal plaintiff agreed—That each of the parties then took out his watch, and laid it upon the table: and it was then mutually agreed by the parties, that they would go together, and ascertain whether the said chaise was the said Denison's chaise; and that, if it was, plaintiff should take both watches; and, if not, defendant should take both, as and for his own—That they did proceed and examine, and found it to be said Denison's chaise—That the parties then returned to the said office, and the defendant immediately took up his watch, and carried it away—That, on the same day, plaintiff demanded said watch of defendant, who refused to deliver it, but converted it to his own use. This evidence was objected to by the defendant's counsel, and excluded master or employer after the expiration of his time of service. Before such agreements are upheld, however, the court must find that the restraints attempted thereby are reasonably necessary (1, 2 and 3) to the enjoyment by the buyer of the property, good will or interest in the partnership bought; or (4) to the legitimate ends of the existing partnership; or (5) to the prevention of possible injury to the business of the seller from use by the buyer of the thing sold; or (6) to protection from the danger of loss to the employer's business caused by the unjust use on the part of the employee of the confidential knowledge acquired in such business. * * * It would be stating it too strongly to say that these five classes of covenants in restraint of trade include all those upheld as valid at the common law." In Hepworth Mfg. Co., Ltd. v. Ryott, [1920] 1 Ch. 1, it was held to be an unreasonable restraint to require a "movie" actor who became known by his stage name while working for the producing company to refrain from using that stage name after the employment ceased.

In Thorn v. Dinamoore, 104 Kan. 275 (1919), it was held that a law student not yet admitted to practice might lawfully buy the library and business of a practicing lawyer under a contract whereby the latter agreed to refrain from practicing in the town, and further, that the student's failure to be admitted upon his first examination did not impair his rights, since he succeeded in being admitted on a later examination.

by the court. To which decision the plaintiff excepted, and the exception was allowed, and the cause ordered to pass to the Supreme Court."

HUTCHINSON, J. Nothing appears in this case, but that the action would be maintainable by the common law of England. The common law is adopted by our statute, so far, and so far only, as the same is applicable to our local situation and circumstances, and is not repugnant to the constitution, or to any act of the legislature, of this state. Whether applicable, or not, must necessarily be a question of judicial decision: and this is, probably, the first action, that has ever called upon a court in this state to sanction such a contract of betting. The judges of the courts in England have expressed their regret, of late years, that such transactions ever received the sanction of a court of justice: but, they yield to the force of the law, which they consider settled by a train of decisions, extending down from remote antiquity. We feel no such embarrassment, nor are we willing to transmit any such embarrassment to our successors; nor diffuse into society the influence of a rule so demoralizing, as would be the sanction of such a contract. It is honorable to this state, that the industrious and moral habits of our citizens have furnished no occasion to litigate questions of this nature. It is honorable to the legislature, that they have interposed checks to such games and sports as they supposed were creeping into use. By the Statute of 1821, page 268, penalties are affixed to the winning or losing, or betting, in money, goods or chattels, on any game, or on any horse-race, or other sport, within this state. And said statute makes void any contracts and securities made and given for money won on such games. The species of betting now in question may not come within that statute, giving it the strict construction of a penal statute: yet the good morals of society require, that no encouragement should be afforded to the acquisition of property, otherwise than by honest industry. Time might be occupied in seeking occasions to take advantage of the unwary, and acquiring a skill to take such advantage, which ought to be devoted to better purposes.

In this case, according to the terms of the bet, the plaintiff had acquired a right to the possession of the watch, which the defendant had laid down in the bet, but the plaintiff had not acquired the actual possession, when the defendant resumed his possession. The plaintiff, therefore, had no complete right to the watch, without the sanction of such a contract of betting. That sanction is now withheld.

The judgment of the County Court is affirmed.⁶

(High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, 1878. 4 Q. B. D. 685.)

LINDLEY, J.⁷ This action is brought by a broker [who had become defaulter upon the Stock Exchange] against his principal for indemnity against liabilities incurred by the broker, in buying and selling shares upon the Stock Exchange for the defendant by his authority. The main defence is that the claim is founded upon gaming and wagering transactions, in respect of which no action can be brought. In order to decide the point thus raised, it is necessary to consider, first, the real nature of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, and, secondly, how the law stands with respect to gaming and wagering transactions in stocks and shares. As regards the true nature of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, the conclusions at which I have arrived are as follows: first, that the defendant was a speculator, and the plaintiff knew him to be so; secondly, that the defendant employed the plaintiff to speculate for him on the Stock Exchange; thirdly, that the defendant knew, or must be taken to have known, that, in order to carry out the transactions, the plaintiff would have to enter into contracts to buy or sell, as the case might be, and in order to protect himself and the defendant, to enter into other contracts to sell or buy respectively; fourthly, that there was, in fact, no other way in which the plaintiff could speculate for the defendant as he desired; fifthly, that the plaintiff did buy and sell United States, wagers are at least unenforceable and in general are illegal. On wagers and their validity, see 37 Am. St. Rep. 697, note.

As a stakeholder of money put up on a bet has only an agency to pay over not coupled with an interest, his authority to pay can be revoked at any time before it is exercised, though in a few early cases (see Yates v. Foot, 12 Johns 1 (1814)), it was held that revocation comes too late if it comes after the event bet about has been decided against the one seeking to revoke, even if it does come before the stakeholder has paid over the money. The matter is often regulated by statute. There are statutes in Illinois and other states allowing the loser of a specified amount at betting, gambling, etc., to recover back his money, even though it has been paid over by himself and, therefore, presumably if paid over by the stakeholder. Local statutes should be consulted.

On the liability of a stakeholder in an illegal transaction, see L. R. A. 1918 F, 972, note.

"A friendly reviewer of the second volume of the Digest [of English Civil Law] expended a certain amount of genial 'chaff' upon a sentence in the preface of that volume, which spoke of Gaming Contracts as 'social relationships regulated by law'; but the writer of the preface is wholly unrepentant, for he believes that the primitive and deep-seated gambling instinct of the English race has played no small part in the evolution of the peculiarly English institution of the simple contract, and that the hundreds of lost and forgotten dice recovered from the ancient floor of the Middle Temple Hall may have had a closer connection with the theory of contract than has hitherto been guessed." Edward Jenks, English Civil Law, 30 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 3.

⁷ The statement of facts is omitted as are also the opinions of the Justices in the Court of Appeal, who affirmed the judgment for plaintiff.

accordingly; sixthly, that the defendant never expected, nor intended, to accept actual delivery of what the plaintiff might buy for him, nor actually deliver what he might sell for him, and that the plaintiff knew that the defendant never expected or intended so to do; seventhly, that the defendant, nevertheless, knew that he incurred the risk of having to accept or deliver, as the case might be but was content to run that risk, in the expectation and hope that the plaintiff would be able so to arrange matters as to render nothing but differences actually payable to or by him, as the case might be; eighthly, that unless the plaintiff could arrange matters as expected, the defendant would be unable to pay for what was bought from him or deliver what was sold for him, and that the plaintiff knew perfectly well that the defendant would be unable so to do.

I proceed next to examine the law applicable to transactions of this kind. The only statute in force and material to be noticed is 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18, which, in effect, declares all contracts by way of gaming and wagering null and void, and renders actions for the recovery of money won on any wager unsustainable. This act does not expressly mention or allude to Stock Exchange transactions; but it has been decided that agreements between buyers and sellers of shares and stocks, to pay or receive the differences between their prices on one day and their prices on another day, are gaming and wagering transactions within the meaning of the statute. Grizewood v. Blane, 11 C. B. 526; Barry v. Croskey, 2 J. & H. 1; and Cooper v. Neil, W. N. 1 June, 1878, all decide that. But the plaintiff did not agree to buy or sell from or to the defendant; and I have the authority of Brett, L. J., for saying that the statute only affects the contract which makes the bet or wager. The agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant rendered it necessary that the plaintiff should himself, as principal, enter into real contracts of purchase and sale with jobbers, and the plaintiff accordingly did so, and in respect of these contracts he incurred obligations, for the nonperformance of which actions could and can now be brought against him. It is against the liability so incurred that he seeks to be indemnified.

Upon general principles an agent is entitled to indemnity from his principal against liabilities incurred by the agent in executing the orders of his principal, unless those orders are illegal, or unless the liabilities are incurred in respect of some illegal conduct of the agent himself, or by reason of his default. What the plaintiff was employed to do was to buy and sell on the Stock Exchange, and this he did; and everything he did was perfectly legal, unless it was rendered illegal as between the defendant and himself by reason of the illegality of the object they had in view, or of the transactions in which they were engaged. Now, if gaming and wagering were illegal, I should be of opinion that the illegality of the transactions in which the plaintiff and the defendant were engaged would have tainted, as between themselves, whatever the plaintiff had done in furtherance of their illegal designs, and would have precluded him from claiming, in a court of law, any indemnity from the defendant in respect of the liabilities he had incurred. Canan v. Bryce, 3 B. & Ald. 179; McKinnell v. Robinson, 3 M. & W. 434; Lyne v. Siesfeld, 1 H. & N. 278. But it has been held that although gaming and wagering contracts cannot be enforced, they are not illegal. Fitch v. Jones, 5 E. & B. 238, is plain to that effect. Money paid in discharge of a bet is a good consideration for a bill of exchange; Oulds v. Harrison, 10 Ex. 572; and if money be so paid by plaintiff at the request of a defendant, it can be recovered by action against him. Knight v. Camber, 15 C. B. 562; Jessopp v. Lutwyche, 10 Ex. 614; Rosewarne v. Billing, 15 C. B. (N. S.) 316; and it has been held that a request to pay may be inferred from an authority to bet. Oldham v. Ramsden, 44 L. J. (C. P.) 309. Having regard to these decisions, I cannot hold that the statute above referred to precludes the plaintiff from maintaining this action.

It was, however, suggested that, independently of that statute, the gambling here was of so pernicious a nature as to be illegal on grounds of public policy. That the defendant was a reckless speculator, and that the plaintiff knew it, I consider to be beyond all doubt; but it does not follow that what they did or aimed at was illegal. In one sense they were both gamblers; but care must be taken not to be misled by an epithet, and, in order to avoid ambiguity, I have already pointed out exactly what the real nature of their transactions was. Such gambling as this, however demoralizing and reprehensible, does not appear to me to be illegal, and my reasons for this opinion are as follows:

It required a statute (7 Geo. 2, c. 8), to prevent gambling in the public funds; and notwithstanding the strong condemnation in the preamble of such gambling, the act itself was repealed in 1860 by 23 and 24 Vict. c. 28. Moreover, even when the act was in force, gambling in shares and foreign stocks was held not to be illegal, either under the act or at common law. Lord Tenterden, indeed, was of opinion that such gambling was illegal at common law. He said so in Bryan v. Lewis, R. & M. 386; but this opinion was declared erroneous in Hibblewhite v. M'Morine, 5 M. & W. 462. Under these circumstances I am unable to hold that the transactions engaged in by these parties were illegal, or that the purchases and sales made by the plaintiff were made in pursuance of or to attain an illegal object. This view is supported by the judgment of Brett, L. J., in Cooper v. Neil, W. N. 1 June, 1878; and by the case of Ashton v. Dakin, 7 W. R. 384.

In answer to the argument that a contract which is void and unenforceable cannot be made the foundation of an implied promise to indemnify, it appears to me sufficient to say that an obligation to indemnify is created whenever one person employs another to do a lawful act which exposes him to liability, and that, in my view of the evidence, the defendant did authorize the plaintiff to incur liability by buying and selling as above described. I am unable to draw the inference which the jury drew in Cooper v. Neil, W. N. 1 June, 1878, namely, that the plaintiff was instructed to make time bargains, and that he did in fact make such bargains. A real time bargain is, I suspect, a very rare occurrence. Grizewood v. Blane, 11 C. B. 526, affords an instance of one, and Cooper v. Neil, W. N. 1 June, 1878, as understood by the jury, afforded another. But what are called time bargains are, in fact, the result of two distinct and perfectly legal bargains, namely, first, a bargain to buy or sell; and secondly, a subsequent bargain that the first shall not be carried out; and it is only when the first bargain is entered into upon the understanding that it is not to be carried out, that a time bargain, in the sense of an unenforceable bargain, is entered into. Such bargains are very rare, and this is what I understand the witnesses to mean when they say that there are no such things as time bargains on the Stock Exchange. For the above reasons I hold that the plaintiff is entitled to indemnity, notwithstanding the gambling nature of the transactions between himself and the defendant.

The defendant was himself unable to meet his engagements, and was the principal cause of the plaintiff's becoming a defaulter. The inability of the defendant to continue his speculations gave the plaintiff the right to close all the defendant's accounts; that appears from a celebrated case in Chancery, Lacey v. Hill, Law Rep. 8 Ch. 441 and 18 Eq. 182. Whether they were closed by the plaintiff or by the Stock Exchange committee, is, I think, immaterial, it not being proved that the defendant was in any way prejudiced by what was done. Consequently I give judgment for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed with costs.*

In considering how far brokers would be affected by the illegality of contracts made by them, that court says: 'It is certainly true that a broker might negotiate such a contract without being privy to the illegal intent of the principal parties to it which renders it void, and in such a case, being innocent of any violation of law, and not suing to enforce an unlawful contract, has a meritorious ground for the recovery of compensation for services and advances. But we are also of the opinion that when the broker is privy to the unlawful design of the parties, and brings them together for the very purpose of entering into an illegal agreement, he is particeps criminis, and cannot recover for services rendered or losses incurred by himself on behalf of either in forwarding the transaction.' "It is not denied that wagering contracts are void by the common law of Massachusetts; but it is argued that they are not illegal, and that, if one pays money in settlement of them at the request of another, he can recover it of the person at whose request he pays it. It is now settled here that contracts which are void at common law, because they are against public policy, like contracts which are prohibited by statute, are illegal as well as void. They are prohibited by law because they are considered vicious, and it is not necessary to impose a penalty in order to render them illegal. Bishop v. Palmer, 146 Mass. 469; Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co., 130 U. S. 396. The weight of authority in this country is, we think, that brokers who knowingly make contracts that are void and illegal as against public policy, and advance money on account of them at the request of their principals, cannot recover either the money advanced or their commissions, and we are inclined to adopt this view of the law. Embrey v. Jemison, 131 U. S. 336, ubi supra, and the other cases there cited." Field, J., in Harvey v. Merrill, 150 Mass. 1, 10-11 (1889). See Jamieson v. Wallace, 167 Ill. 388 (1897); Waite v. Frank, 14 So. Dak. 626 (1901).

The question is whether the contract between the broker and the customer is illegal where the broker must make legal contracts on the stock exchange but agrees that the customer can settle with the broker by the payment of differences or knows that he can settle only in that way. The argument in part for the English view is thus stated by Professor Williston:

"The broker in no event can make or lose anything except the amount of his commissions, and interest, unless his customer becomes insolvent with insufficient margin, and these opportunities of gain or loss are the same whether or not he makes the agreement suggested with his customer. Likewise the speculative risks of the customer are in no way affected by such an agreement with his broker, for even though no such agreement is made it is always possible by entering into new transactions on the exchange to close his account by paying differences, and in any event he must get the gain or suffer the loss which advance or depreciation of what has been bought or sold for his account involves." 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1672.

In Samuels v. Oliver, 130 Ill. 73 (1889), brokers employed, as they knew, to aid in cornering the market in grain were denied a recovery of money advanced by them. It is stated, Per Curiam, that:

"The enhancement of the price of an article of prime necessity, such as wheat or other articles necessary for food, for purposes of extortion, is against public policy. (Fuller v. Dane, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 472; DeWitt v. Brisbane, 16 N. Y. 508.) 'Combinations whose object is to create what are known as "corners" in the market, or to control the traffic in any staple which is a popular necessity, or to enhance the price thereof, or to withhold the same from the market, are illegal.' (Greenhood on Public Policy 642; Wright v. Crabb, 78 Ind. 487; Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 346.) Such a transaction, if had in cover the sum of 30*l.* 10*s.* alleged to be due in respect of various commissions executed by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant. The defendant pleaded the Gaming Act, and the plaintiff thereupon obtained leave to amend his particulars of claim by alleging that on the day the commissions came due the plaintiff and the defendant made a new agreement as found by the county judge. The learned county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that there was a new contract by which the defendant agreed that if the plaintiff would give him time to pay and would refrain from announcing that he had failed to pay on the proper day, which the plaintiff would have the right to do, and which would ruin the defendant as a bookmaker, the defendant would pay at some future day, and that the plaintiff thereupon agreed not to proclaim the defendant a defaulter. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed.

The Divisional Court held that there was evidence on which the county court judge could arrive at the conclusion at which he had arrived. The defendant appealed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS⁹ said that in his opinion it was impossible to say that there was no evidence on which the county court judge might arrive at the conclusion that there had been a new contract on which the plaintiff might maintain an action. The Divisional Court had reluctantly taken that view, and he could not differ from it.

this state, would be void, as being in contravention of the criminal code, § 130, chap. 38; Schneider et al. v. Turner, 130 Ill. 28.

"An agreement to make a corner in stock, by buying it up so as to control the market, and then purchasing for future delivery, is illegal, and a party thereto whose funds have been used, by his consent, in carrying out the agreement, cannot recover the same back. (Sampson v. Shaw, 101 Mass. 145.) So it has been held that one who loans or advances money to be used for the purpose of making a corner in wheat, cannot recover. (Lehman v. Leavitt, 46 Mich. 447.) So, also, money paid in furtherance of an illegal transaction or purpose cannot be recovered by the party advancing the same. Ball v. Gilbert, 12 Met. (Mass.) 397; Dixon v. Olmstead, 9 Vt. 310; Wheeler v. Russell, 17 Mass. 258; The People v. Fish, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 9.

"When the employment of an agent relates to the performance of an immoral or illegal act,—it is said by Wharton in his work on Agency (sec. 25),—neither party can make the contract the basis of a suit against the other. Advances for illegal purposes fall within the same rule, and cannot be recovered by the principal of the agent, or the agent of the principal. (Id. sec. 319)." See Raymond v. Leavitt, 46 Mich. 447 (1881).

IN RE TAYLOR & CO.'S ESTATE.

APPEAL OF HOWARD.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1899. 192 Pa. St. 304, 43 Atl. 973, 73 Am. St. Rep. 812.)

Claim of William H. Howard against the assigned estate of L. H. Taylor & Co. The auditor disallowed the claim, and exceptions thereto were dismissed by the court, and claimant appeals. Reversed.

MITCHELL, J. It has been settled by this court, so often that it ought not to require reiteration, that dealing in stocks, even on margins, is not gambling. Stocks are as legitimate subjects of speculative buying and selling as flour or dry goods or pig iron. A man may buy any commodity, stock included, to sell on an expected rise, or sell "short," to acquire and deliver on an expected fall, and it will not be gambling. Margin is nothing but security, and a man may buy on credit, with security or without, or on borrowed money, and the money may be borrowed from his broker as well as from a third person. The test is, did he intend to buy, or only to settle on differences? If he had bought and paid for his stock, held it for a year, and then sold, no one would call it gambling; and yet it is just as little so, if he had it but an hour, and sold before he had in fact paid for it. And so with selling. Every merchant who sells you something not yet in his stock, but which he undertakes to get for you, is selling "short"; but he is not gambling, because, though delivery is to be in the future, the sale is present and actual. The true line of distinction was laid down in Peters v. Grim, 149 Pa. St. 163, 24 Atl. 192, and has not been departed from or varied: "A purchase of stock for speculation, even when done merely on margin, is not necessarily a gambling transaction. If one buys stock from A, and borrows the money from B to pay for it, there is no element of gambling in the operation, though he pledges the stock with B, as security for the money. So, if instead of borrowing the money from B, a third person, he borrows it from A, or, in the language of brokers, procures A to 'carry' the stock for him, with or without margin, the transaction is not necessarily different in character. But in this latter case, there being no transfer or delivery of the stock, the doubt arises whether the parties intended there should ever be a purchase or delivery at all. Here is the dividing line. If there was not under any circumstances to be a delivery, as part of and completing a purchase, then the transaction was a mere wager on the rise and fall of prices; but if there was, in good faith, a purchase, then the delivery might be postponed, or made to depend on a future condition, and the stock carried on margin, or otherwise, in the meanwhile, without affecting the legality of the operation." This has been uniformly followed. Hopkins v. O'Kane, 169 Pa. St. 478, 32 Atl. 421; Wagner v. Hildebrand, 187 Pa. St. 136, 41 Atl. 34. And the rule goes so far that an agreement for an actual sale and purchase will make the transaction valid, though it originated in an intention merely to wager. Anthony v. Unangst, 174 Pa. St. 10, 34 Atl. 284.

Turning now to the facts of the present case, it is clear that the law was not correctly applied by the auditor and the court below. The brokers made an assignment on December 21, 1895, on which day they held certain stock for appellant, which they had bought on his order; and he had certain other stock, which they had sold on his order, but which he had not yet delivered to them. He desired to close the account, complete the mutual deliveries, and receive the balance which the transactions left in his favor. He was entitled to do so. Even if the transactions were wagering, the agreement of the parties to make the sales actual would, under Anthony v. Unangst, 174 Pa. St. 10, 34 Atl. 284, have made them valid. It is true, the settlement was not actually made until January 10th; but it was made as of December 20th, the day before the assignment, and the auditor reports that there had been no change of values meanwhile. The time of striking a balance on the books and delivering the stock was not important. Delivery is not in itself a material fact. Its only value is as evidence of the intent to make a bona fide sale. If such is the intent, the delivery may be present or future without affecting validity. But there was no sufficient evidence that the transactions were illegal at any time. The auditor reports that "the stocks ordered to be bought or sold by the customers of L. H. Taylor & Co. were, as shown by their books, actually bought and sold; and, as this evidence is uncontradicted, I must and do so find * * * Thus, so far as L. H. Taylor & Co. were concerned, the transactions were not fictitious, but were actual purchases and sales of stock." This finding should have been a warning to caution in taking a different view of the appellant's position in the transactions. It is true, the purchase or sale may be actual on part of the broker, and merely a wager on part of the customer (see Champlin v. Smith, 164 Pa. St. 481, 487, 30 Atl. 447); but there should be at least fairly persuasive evidence of the difference. There is none here. The transactions covered by the account began with a small cash balance to appellant's credit, followed by an order to buy 200 shares of Wabash common, which were bought by the brokers, paid for by appellant, and delivered to him. The close, two years and a half later, showed, as already said, a large number of shares in the hands of the brokers bought for appellant, and of which he demanded delivery, and other shares sold for him, and which he had in his possession ready to deliver. As to the intermediate transactions, appellant testified, "It was always the intention to buy the stocks out and out, and pay for them, and I had money to do it with." In the face of these facts and this uncontradicted testimony, the auditor found that "the account, including his enormous short sales, has all the earmarks of a gaming transaction, and I so find it." This was a mere inference, unwarranted by the account itself, and wholly opposed to all the evidence in the case. Judgment, so far as it relates to appellant's claim, reversed, and claim directed to be allowed.¹¹

"The main defense is this: It is said that the plaintiff itself keeps the greatest of bucket shops, in the sense of an Illinois statute of June 6, 1887, that is, places wherein is permitted the pretended buying and selling of grain, etc., without any intention of receiving and paying for the property so bought, or of delivering the property so sold. On this ground it is contended that if, under other circumstances, there could be property in the quotations, which hardly is admitted, the subject-matter is so infected with the plaintiff's own illegal conduct that it is caput lupinum, and may be carried off by any one at will.

"It appears that in not less than three quarters of the transactions in the grain pit there is no physical handing over of any grain, but that there is a settlement, either by the direct method, so called, or by what is known as ringing up. The direct method consists simply in setting off contracts to buy wheat of a certain amount at a certain time, against contracts to sell a like amount at the same time, and paying the difference of price in cash, at the end of the business day. The ring settlement is reached by a comparison of books among the clerks of the members buying and selling in the pit, and picking out a series of transactions which begins and ends with dealings which can be set against each other by eliminating those between—as, if A has sold to B 5,000 bushels of May wheat, and B has sold the same amount to C, and C to D, and D to A. Substituting D for B by novation, A's sale can be set against his purchase, on simply paying the difference in price. * * *

"As has appeared, the plaintiff's chamber of commerce is, in the first place, a great market, where, through its eighteen hundred members, is transacted a large part of the grain and provision business of the world. Of course, in a modern market, contracts are not confined to sales for immediate delivery. People will endeavor to forecast the future, and to make agreements according to their prophecy. Speculation of this kind by competent men is the self-adjustment of society to the probable. Its value is well known as a means of avoiding or mitigating catastrophes, equalizing prices, and providing for periods of want. It is true that the success of the strong induces imitation by the weak, and that incompetent persons bring themselves to ruin by undertaking to speculate in their turn. But legislatures and courts generally have recognized that the natural evolutions of a complex society are to be touched only with a very cautious hand, and that such coarse attempts at a remedy for the waste incident to every social function as a simple prohibition and laws to stop its being are harmful and vain. This court has upheld sales of stock for future delivery and the substitution of parties, provided for by the rules of the Chicago stock exchange. Clews v. Jamieson, 182 U. S. 461, 45 L. Ed. 1183, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 845.

"When the Chicago board of trade was incorporated, we cannot doubt that it was expected to afford a market for future as well as present sales, with the necessary incidents of such a market, and while the state of Illinois allows that charter to stand, we cannot believe that the pits, merely as places where future sales are made, are forbidden by the law. But again, the contracts made in the pits are contracts between the members. We must suppose that from the beginning, as now, if a member had a contract with another member to buy a certain amount of wheat at a certain time, and another to sell the same amount at the same time, it would be deemed unnecessary to exchange warehouse receipts. We must suppose that then as now, a settlement would be made by the payment of differences, after the analogy of a clearing house. This naturally would take place no less that the contracts were made in good faith, for actual delivery, since the result of actual delivery would be to leave the parties just where they were before. Set-off has all the effects of delivery. The ring settlement is simply a more complex case of the same kind. These settlements would be frequent, as the number of persons buying and selling was comparatively small.

WILLIAM S. FERGUSON v. ALLEN COLEMAN.

(Court of Appeals of South Carolina, 1846. 3 Rich. L. 99, 45 Am. Dec. 761.)

This was an action on an instrument, dated 31st January, 1843, whereby the defendant promised "to pay on the first of January, 1844,

"The fact that contracts are satisfied in this way by set-off and the payment of differences detracts in no degree from the good faith of the parties, and if the parties know when they make such contracts that they are very likely to have a chance to satisfy them in that way, and intend to make use of it, that fact is perfectly consistent with a serious business purpose, and an intent that the contract shall mean what it says. There is no doubt, from the rules of the board of trade or the evidence, that the contracts made between the members are intended and supposed to be binding in manner and form as they are made. There is no doubt that a large part of those contracts is made for serious business purposes. Hedging, for instance, as it is called, is a means by which collectors and exporters of grain or other products, and manufacturers who make contracts in advance for the sale of their goods, secure themselves against the fluctuations of the market by counter contracts for the purchase or sale, as the case may be, of an equal quantity of the product, or of the material of manufacture. It is none the less a serious business contract for a legitimate and useful purpose that it may be offset before the time of delivery in case delivery should not be needed or desired.

"Purchases made with the understanding that the contract will be settled by paying the difference between the contract and the market price at a certain time (Embrey v. Jemison, 131 U. S. 336, 33 L. Ed. 172, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 776; Weare Commission Co. v. People, 209 Ill. 528, 70 N. E. 1076), stand on different ground from purchases made merely with the expectation that they will be satisfied by set-off. If the latter might fall within the statute of Illinois, we would not be the first to decide that they did when the object was self-protection in business, and not merely a speculation entered into for its own sake. It seems to us an extraordinary and unlikely proposition that the dealings which give its character to the great market for future sales in this country are to be regarded as mere wagers or as 'pretended' buying or selling, without any intention of receiving and paying for the property bought, or of delivering the property sold, within the meaning of the Illinois act. Such a view seems to us hardly consistent with the admitted fact that the quotations of prices from the market are of the utmost importance to the business world, and not least to the farmers; so important, indeed, that it is argued here and has been held in Illinois that the quotations are clothed with a public use. It seems to us hardly consistent with the obvious purposes of the plaintiff's charter, or indeed with the words of the statute invoked. The sales in the pits are not pretended, but, as we have said, are meant and supposed to be binding. A set-off is, in legal effect, a delivery. We speak only of the contracts made in the pits, because in them the members are principals. The subsidiary rights to W. S. Ferguson or bearer, nine hundred and two dollars, fifty-eight cents, if cotton should rise to eight cents by the first November next, and if not, to pay five hundred dollars, for value received." It was admitted at the trial that this instrument was given in part payment of a tract of land which the defendant had purchased of the plaintiff; and it was proved on the part of the plaintiff, that between the date of the agreement and the first of November, 1843, the highest prices of cotton were, in Columbia, 8 1-2 and 8 3-4 cents, and in Charleston, 9 and 9 1-4 cents.

The defendant contended, 1st, that the agreement was a wager on the price of cotton; 2d, that according to the true construction of the instrument, the defendant was only bound to pay the larger sum, if cotton was selling for eight cents on or near the first of November, and that this had not been shown.

Under the instructions of his Honor the presiding judge, the jury found for the plaintiff the larger sum.

The defendant appealed, and now moved this court for a new trial.

CURIA, per FROST, J. The objection chiefly urged against the instructions of the circuit judge, affects the construction of the agreement to pay the larger sum expressed in the note, "if cotton should rise to eight cents by the first of November next." It appeared by admissions at the trial that the defendant was treating with the plaintiff for the purchase of a tract of land; and declining to give the price which the plaintiff asked, it was agreed that the defendant should pay a certain sum if cotton advanced, or less if it did not. The defendant insists that the import of the agreement is, that cotton should rise to eight cents "at or near" the first of November. The various significations to which the necessities of language have applied this and other propositions, would of their employers where the members buy as brokers we think it unnecessary to discuss.

"In the view which we take, the proportion of the dealings in the pit which are settled in this way throws no light on the question of the proportion of serious dealings for legitimate business purposes to those which fairly can be classed as wagers, or pretended contracts. No more does the fact that the contracts thus disposed of call for many times the total receipts of grain in Chicago. The fact that they can be and are set off sufficiently explains the possibility, which is no more wonderful than the enormous disproportion between the currency of the country and contracts for the payment of money, many of which in like manner are set off in clearing houses without any one dreaming that they are not paid, and for the rest of which the same money suffices in succession, the less being needed the more rapid the circulation is.

"But suppose that the board of trade does keep a place where pretended and unlawful buying and selling are permitted, which, as yet, the Supreme Court of Illinois, we believe, has been careful not to intimate, it does not follow that it should not be protected in this suit."

The statutes should be consulted.

On the legality of contracts for the sale of personal property to be delivered in the future or with options, see 1 Am. St. Rep. 752, note; 11 Ann. Cas. 440, note; 1 A. L. R. 1543, note.

render any construction of the agreement, based on a critical analysis of its meaning, very unsatisfactory. But it may be observed that "by," in its primitive sense, expresses relation to place; though by various remote and obscure analogies and casual associations, that meaning is variously modified. In relation to place, it clearly does signify "at or near," but its import is more indefinite when used to express the relation of time. In this application it signifies "on or before." Many examples of this sense readily occur. If a contract were made for the delivery of an article, or the completion of work, by a particular time, to be paid for on completion, or delivery, a claim for the price would accrue on performance, whenever that might be; for the agreement provides for a performance and payment before the appointed time, but leaves the time of performance wholly indefinite. It would be more difficult to derive an example of the defendant's construction from the transactions of life. The popular signification of words, that which use has made familiar in the affairs of men, must be adopted in giving construction and effect to their contracts.

The objection to the agreement that it is a wager is plainly inapplicable; for the parties had an interest in the contingency. The defendant purchased the land at the lowest price, unconditionally, but contracted to pay a larger sum if the value should be enhanced by the increased value of its product.

The motion is dismissed.¹²

GEER v. FRANK.

Bill in equity praying for the appointment of a receiver and an accounting with a decree for the sum due under a contract between complainant Geer, the defendant Frank, and the defendant Bennett, whereby Frank assigned to each of the others one third of his claim against a certain company and in consideration Geer agreed to give his legal services in conjunction with Bennett in suing on said claim and Bennett agreed "to pay the necessary expenses in the way of cash outlays, for court costs, etc.," and his legal services. Though the opinion does not consider the fact, the contract also provided "that no settlement or compromise of said claim shall be made without the assent of all parties." Complainant prosecuted the claim against the company for defendant Frank and got a judgment and defendant Frank settled with the company, satisfied the judgment and refused to account. Defendant Bennett also asked for a decree for what was due him. The superior court dismissed the bill and defendant Bennett's cross-bill. The Appellate Court affirmed the decree and granted a certificate of importance by virtue of which Geer and Bennett appealed to the Supreme Court.

CARTWRIGHT, J.¹³ * * * Disregarding all other questions argued, we are of the opinion that the agreement is illegal and void. It was said in Newkirk v. Cone, 18 Ill. 449, that the common law of champerty had been abolished in this state, but this statement was corrected in Thompson v. Reynolds, 73 Ill. 11, where it was said the former decision was manifestly a mistake, and that the question was not involved in such former decision, the champertous agreement having been abandoned by the parties by mutual consent. The law of champerty has been somewhat qualified by our decisions, but it is a part of the law of the state. We have held, in consonance with the great weight of modern authority, that an attorney may make an agreement for contingent fees of a legitimate character, by which he is to receive a certain share or part of the money or thing recovered. (West Chicago Park Comrs. v. Coleman, 108 Ill. 591; Phillips v. South Park Comrs., 119 id. 626.) In such a case he has no interest in the litigation except that of an attorney and to the extent of his legal services, and if such a contract is not against conscience and reasonable in its terms, a court of equity would doubtless enforce it. The law, however, does not permit a person having no interest in the subject-matter of a suit to become interested in it and concerned in its prosecution, and an agreement by which such person, although an attorney, agrees to bear expense and costs of litigation falls within the definition of champerty, and will not be enforced, either at law or in equity. (Gilbert v. Holmes, 64 Ill. 548; Thompson v. Reynolds, supra.) Under these rules the agreement between Bennett and Frank was champertous, and the undertakings of Geer and Bennett were so mutually dependent upon each other, as a consideration for the agreement of Frank, that the whole contract was tainted with illegality. The considerations for Frank's promise were the agreement of Geer to render legal services in conjunction with Bennett, Bennett's agreement to render legal services in conjunction with Geer, and Bennett's agreement to pay the costs and expenses. The agreement could not be performed and Geer render the services which he promised except by Bennett carrying out his champertous agreement, and it was so executed. The undertakings cannot be separated, and one of the considerations inducing the promise of Frank being illegal, the entire contract is void and a court of equity will not aid in its enforcement.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

7 Ann. Cas. 377.)

Action by Wilmot L. Morehouse against the Brooklyn Heights Railroad Company and another. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (92 N. Y. and Solicitors' Act, 1870, 1 Ch. D. 573 (1875); In re A Solicitor, [1912] 1 K. B. 302. But even there the solicitor may agree to take the regular fees only if the client recovers and only out of the damages recovered. See Rich v. Cook, 110 Law Times 94 (1900). In Massachusetts and New Hampshire it seems to be champerty for a lawyer to agree to look solely to the fund recovered with no personal claim against the client. Hadlock v. Brooks, 178 Mass. 425 (1901); Butler v. Legro, 62 N. H. 350 (1882). The objection seems to be the fact that the lawyer stands to lose, for in Taylor v. Rosenberg, 219 Mass. 113 (1914), where the lawyer was to receive a percentage of damages recovered in condemnation proceedings, since he was sure to get something the contract was held not to be champertous. But most American courts adopt the view of the principal case, Geer v. Frank, allowing contingent fee contracts unless the lawyer contracts to carry on the litigation at his own expense. (On validity of agreement by attorney to save client harmless from costs and expenses, see 6 A. L. R. 184, note.) Some courts disregard even that test and simply ask whether the contract in fact was or was not oppressive. Taylor v. Bemisa, 110 U. S. 42 (1883), Grievance Committee v. Ennis, 84 Conn. 594 (1911). See Brown v. Bigné, 21 Ore. 260 (1891), where the contingent compensation contract was with a layman who advanced thereunder the funds to carry on the suit.

In some jurisdictions, because of the public policy favoring settlements of law suits, a contract between lawyer and client binding the client not to settle without the lawyer's consent is illegal and void. North Chicago, Etc., R. Co. v. Ackley, 171 Ill. 100 (1898); Davy v. Fidelity & Casualty Ins. Co., 78 Oh. St. 256 (1908). But in other jurisdictions only that particular provision of the contract is invalid. Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. v. Winn (Ark.), 229 S. W. 734 (1921); Newport Rolling Mill Co. v. Hall, 147 Ky. 598 (1912); Greenleaf v. Minneapolis, Etc., R. Co., 30 No. Dak. 112 (1915), (But see Moran v. Simpson (N. Dak.), 173 N. W. 769 (1919). On contingent fee contracts, see 1 Ann. Cas. 299, note; 83 Am. St. Rep. 159, note. On contracts with a provision prohibiting the client from settling without the lawyer's consent, see 13 Ann. Cas. 444, note; Ann. Cas. 1913 D, 306, note; 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1101, note. See also Costigan's Cases on Legal Ethics, pp. 495-512.

Champerty is maintenance, for maintenance is assisting another to carry on his lawsuit without legal excuse for so doing; but it is maintenance with the objectionable features of an agreement to receive a share of the recovery for so doing, to pay the costs, or part of the costs, of suit, etc., deemed in the given jurisdiction to constitute champerty. Maintenance that is not champertous is allowable as between relatives, master and servant and as charity to poor persons. On assisting poor person to prosecute or defend suit as maintenance, see 11 Ann. Cas. 69, note.

HAIGHT, J.¹⁵ This action was brought to recover of the defendant Jonas Nathan for services rendered to him by the plaintiff as an attorney at law in the commencement of an action for Nathan against the Brooklyn Heights Railroad Company, and to enforce plaintiff's lien against the railroad company. On the 19th day of February, 1902, the defendant Nathan received personal injuries on the defendant's railroad while a passenger in one of its cars, and thereupon he entered into a written agreement with the plaintiff to prosecute an action therefor, for which he agreed to pay the plaintiff 50 per cent. of whatever might be recovered in the action, by way of settlement or otherwise, together with the costs, allowances, and disbursements thereon as compensation for his services. Shortly thereafter the plaintiff did bring an action against the railroad company by the service of a summons and complaint, which action was subsequently settled by the defendant Nathan; the railroad company paying to him the sum of $2,000. The trial court has found as a fact that the settlement so made by the railroad company was honest and binding upon the plaintiff, but that the plaintiff at the time of serving the summons and complaint had also served upon the railroad company a notice of his lien for 50 per cent. Judgment was thereupon awarded against the defendant for the sum of $1,000, with the provision that execution first issue against the defendant Nathan, and, if it should be returned unsatisfied, then the plaintiff have execution against the defendant railroad company. The defense interposed by the railroad company was that the contract between Nathan and the plaintiff was unconscionable, and therefore illegal and void. Most of the evidence taken upon the trial bore upon this issue. At the conclusion of the evidence the trial court rendered a decision in writing, containing findings of fact and conclusions of law, to which reference has already been made, but containing no finding either way upon the question as to whether the contract was unconscionable and illegal and void. The defendant had submitted requests to find bearing upon this issue, to the effect that the contract was unconscionable, which requests were marked "Refused." In disposing of the case the trial judge filed his opinion, in which he stated that the claim of the defendant that the contract was unconscionable, and would not, therefore, be enforced by the court, was not available to the defendant railroad company, for the reason that, if the company still had the $2,000 in its possession, it could not raise such a question, as it would be a matter between the attorney and client only, and he did not think the company was in any better position after having paid the money in its own wrong. Exceptions were taken to the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the trial court, and to its refusals to find as requested.

I think the defense interposed by the defendant company was available to it, and that it should have been determined either one way or the other by the trial court. It is true the defendant company paid out its $2,000 in settlement of the action brought against it; but this, as the trial justice has found, was honestly done, and consequently was not for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff out of his compensation. It is true that this payment was made after notice of the lien had been served by the plaintiff upon the company. How the company came to make the payment after such notice is not disclosed by the record. Whether it was overlooked or forgotten, we are not advised. The company, however, has honestly settled the case and paid the money to Nathan, as it had the right to do, upon the understanding that he would settle with his attorney for the services he had received. Fischer-Hansen v. Brooklyn H. R. R. Co., 173 N. Y. 492, 60 N. E. 395. Nathan thereby became primarily liable to pay the plaintiff herein for his services in the litigation, and the defendant company only became liable to pay in case collection through execution against Nathan could not be made. In effect it became his surety. Such is the judgment entered herein. It, therefore, appears to me that the defendant company became subrogated to the rights of the defendant Nathan, and had the right to avail itself of any defense to the action that Nathan had. In the case of Pease v. Egan, 131 N. Y. 262-272, 30 N. E. 102, Peckham, J., in commenting upon the general rule of subrogation, refers to a statement of Chief Justice Marshall to the effect "that equity would clothe the party thus paying with the legal garb with which the contract he has discharged was invested, and it would substitute the party paying to every equitable interest and purpose, in the place of the creditor whose debt he has discharged." And again, later on, after referring to the cases of Gans v. Thieme, 93 N. Y. 225, and Arnold v. Green, 116 N. Y. 566, 23 N. E. 1, says with reference to them that they are "evidences of the rule that no contract need subsist upon which to base the right of subrogation, and that it is a remedy which equity seizes upon in order to accomplish what is just and fair between the parties." In Mathews v. Aikin, 1 N. Y. 595, Johnson, J., says: "It is a general and well-established principle of equity that a surety, or a party who stands in the situation of a surety, is entitled to be subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the creditor whose debt he is compelled to pay." Hinckley v. Kreitz, 58 N. Y. 583; Johnson v. Zink, 51 N. Y. 333; Lord v. Tiffany, 98 N. Y. 412, 50 Am. Rep. 689; Wheeler v. Sweet, 137 N. Y. 435, 33 N. E. 483.

Of late years the subject of attorneys' fees and their manner of procuring contracts of retainer, especially in negligence cases, have attracted the attention of both the public and the courts. The charges made in some cases have been exorbitant, if not scandalous, and have tended in a measure to bring the profession into disrepute. It is contended that a claimant who is poor and unable to pay his attorney in cash ought to be permitted to contract to pay a portion of his claim to his attorney, in order to procure his services. The validity of such contracts is not questioned. It is only where the attorney has taken advantage of the claimant, by reason of his poverty or the surrounding circumstances, to extort an unreasonable and unconscionable proportion of such claim that it is condemned. The federal courts have recently, in two instances, characterized a contract of retainer giving to the attorney 50 per cent. of the recovery as unconscionable. Herman v. Met. St. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 121 Fed. 184; Muller v. Kelly, 125 Fed. 213, 60 C. C. A. 170. The Appellate Division in the First Department has also denounced such contracts. The question, however, as to whether such a contract is unconscionable, is one of fact, depending upon the character of the claim and the amount of services to be rendered in prosecuting it to judgment. An agreement to pay an attorney one-half of the recovery, where the action was to recover a penalty of $50, would not by any person be considered to be improper; but, if it was for $50,000, it might be considered quite improper. So that the mere fact that the attorney under the agreement was to receive one-half does not render it unconscionable, unless it appears from the evidence that it was induced by fraud, or, in view of the nature of the claim, that the compensation provided for was so excessive as to evince a purpose on the part of the attorney to obtain an improper or undue advantage over his client. Matter of Fitzsimons, 174 N. Y. 15, 66 N. E. 554. As we have seen, the defendant in the case under consideration interposed the defense that the contract in this case was unconscionable, and therefore void, and evidence was produced upon the trial bearing upon this defense. The defendant company, therefore, had the right to have that issue determined by the trial court. This, as we have seen, the trial judge refused to do for the reason, as he states in his opinion, that the defense was not available to it. * * *

I am, therefore, of the opinion that the failure of the trial court to find upon the issue so raised by the pleadings and the evidence given upon the trial resulted in a mistrial. Miller v. N. Y. & North Shore Ry. Co., 183 N. Y. 123, 75 N. E. 111; Dougherty v. Lion Fire Ins. Co., 183 N. Y. 302, 76 N. E. 4.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

Judgment reversed, etc.¹⁶

¹⁶ In general the fact that plaintiff has made a champertous contract with his lawyer with respect to the litigation is no defense in the litigation. In exceptional situations, however, as where the defendant has settled with the plaintiff and the lawyer is seeking a judgment under an attorney's lien statute, it may be a defense, as the principal case shows. See also Fall v. Gulf States Steel Co. (Ala.) 87 So. 612 (1920). On champertous agreement to prosecute as a defense, see 19 Ann. Cas. 617, note.

Certain kinds of contingent fee contracts are held bad for special reasons of public policy. JOHNSON v. HIGGINS ET AL.

(Superior Court of Delaware, 1917. 108 Atl. 647.)

Action by Thomas W. Johnson, Jr., executor of George W. Todd, deceased, against James Crane Higgins and Daniel W. Corbit, executors of Anthony Higgins, deceased. Directed verdict for defendants.

CONRAD, J.¹⁷ The plaintiff rests his case upon an alleged contract claimed to have been made by Anthony Higgins, an attorney at law in this county, with one George W. Todd, not an attorney, to pay to the latter a certain percentage of the counsel fees to be received by Higgins, contingent upon the recovery of a verdict in a suit then pending against the firm of E. B. Smith & Co.; the percentage to be paid to Todd being compensation for procuring evidence, examining records and minutes, etc., for use in the above suit.

Defendants' counsel moves for a nonsuit on the ground that the contract, if proved, was null and void, being against public policy.

An old English authority cites the following instances of the application of the doctrine of contracts in contravention of public policy: Marriage brokerage bonds, contracts in restraint of trade, contracts by expectant heirs, or in consideration of illicit cohabitation, or such contracts as may injuriously affect the administration of public justice.

The case at bar is claimed to come under the last-named head.

The Supreme Court of Nebraska, in Langdon v. Conlin, 67 Neb. 243, 93 N. W. 389, 60 L. R. A. 429, 108 Am. St. Rep. 643, 2 Ann. Cas. 834, lays down the law very clearly, as follows:

"A contract between an attorney at law and one who is not such an attorney, by which the latter agrees to procure the employment of the former by third persons for the prosecution of suits in courts of record, and also to assist in looking after and procuring witnesses whose testimony is to be used in the cases, in consideration of a share of the fees which the attorney shall receive for his services, is against public policy, and void."

The Supreme Court of New York, in Lyon v. Hussey, 82 Hun, 15, 31 N. Y. Supp. 281, upholds the same doctrine, as shown by the following extract from the court's opinion:

client and attorney in retaining the latter is, in the absence of legal fraud, valid. Matter of Fitzsimons, 174 N. Y. 15, 66 N. E. 554; Morehouse v. Brooklyn Heights R. R. Co., 123 App. Div. 680, 108 N. Y. Supp. 152, affirmed 195 N. Y. 537, 88 N. E. 1126. When the contract is between the executor or administrator under [Code Civ. Proc.] section 1902 [about allowance of reasonable expenses where action for wrongful death] and an attorney, for the purpose of prosecuting or maintaining an action under the section, the law implies the additional condition that as to the damages recovered, or as to the beneficiaries, the contract is subject to the power of the court to determine the reasonable or suitable compensation or expenditure to the attorney which may be deducted from the recovery." Collin, J., in Matter of Meng, 227 N. Y. 264, 269-270 (1919).

¹⁷ The statement of facts and a ruling on an evidence point are omitted.

"It is clear that such a contract is against public policy. The recognition of contracts of this character would be the introduction of all sorts of fraud and deception in proceedings before courts of justice, in order that parties might receive compensation out of the results of their successful manufacture of proofs to be presented to the court, thus holding out a premium upon subornation. The mere statement of the proposition seems to show that such a contract could never be recognized in any court of justice."

The courts of Kentucky and of Michigan are in accord with the same doctrine, and in fact all the courts where the subject has been discussed agree that a contract between an attorney and one not an attorney, to divide contingent fees to be received by an attorney in a suit, is repugnant to every instinct of propriety and justice, and should be regarded as immoral, illegal and void.

We are clearly of opinion that the contract relied upon in the case at bar is null and void, being against public policy.

The motion for a nonsuit is granted.

[The plaintiff declining to accept a nonsuit, a verdict for defendants was directed.¹⁰]

THE WILLIAMSON, HALSELL, FRAZIER COMPANY v. JOSEPH
H. ACKERMAN ET AL.

JOHNSTON, C. J.¹⁰ This suit was brought by the Williamson, Halsell, Frazier Company to recover on three notes, one for $1,166.66 and each of the other two for $1,166.67, due respectively in one, two and three years after date, signed by Joseph J. Ackerman and his two children, John H. Ackerman and Mary H. Sproat, and to foreclose a mortgage on the home of Joseph J. Ackerman purporting to secure the payment of the notes.

The defense of Joseph J. Ackerman was that the notes and mortgage were signed under duress and therefore was unenforceable, and this defense prevailed. The defendants alleged and offered testimony to show that during the years 1903 and 1904 John H. Ackerman was an employee of the plaintiff corporation, and that Halsell, a representative of the company, came to Joseph J. Ackerman and informed him that John had embezzled about $4,000 of the company's money; that he,

Halsell, had obtained and had in his pocket a warrant for John's arrest for embezzlement, and that there was a deputy sheriff waiting in an adjoining room to serve the warrant, and unless the notes and mortgage were signed the warrant would be served and John would be convicted and sent to the penitentiary; that when the father and sister of John asked that they be permitted to consult with John about signing the papers Halsell objected, saying that he would deliver the warrant which he had in his pocket to the deputy sheriff and that the prosecution would go on, but if the notes and mortgages were signed there would be no prosecution. After negotiations which continued for about two hours, Halsell insisting that in case the notes and mortgages were not executed John would be arrested and locked up but if they were given no arrest would be made, and after Mrs. Sproat, who was frightened and crying, had begged her father to save John, he signed the notes and mortgage in suit. Two days afterward a flaw was found in the mortgage, and a representative of the company came to Wichita and demanded a corrected mortgage; and when Mr. Ackerman held back he was informed that a refusal meant a prosecution and the penitentiary for his son, and under these threats a corrected mortgage was executed. There was abundant testimony to show that the notes and mortgage were secured from Ackerman by threats of the arrest and prosecution of his son, and that they would never have been executed if Ackerman had been left to act of his own free will. * * *

There is no lack of testimony to show threats of the arrest and prosecution of John, and that the notes and mortgage were procured through fear excited by the threats. Joseph J. Ackerman was subject to duress because of the threats against a member of his family as much as if they had been directed against himself. In National Bank v. Croco, 46 Kan. 620, 26 Pac. 939, as well as in Heaton v. Bank, 59 Kan. 281, 52 Pac. 876, it was held that a threatened prosecution of the husband may cause duress of the wife. Many cases may be found in the books where the threatened prosecution of a child amounted to duress of the parent. An illustration may be found in Williams and another v. Bayley, L. R. 1 H. L. 200, 35 L. J. Ch. 717, where bankers had acquired paper forged by a young man, and who had brought pressure upon the father to assume the payment of his obligations. The Lord Chancellor spoke of the pressure brought upon the father as of this nature:

“‘We have the means of prosecuting and so transporting your son. Do you choose to come to his help, and take upon yourself the amount of his debts, the amount of his forgeries? If you do, we will not prosecute. If you do not, we will.’ That is the plain interpretation of what passed. Is that, or is it not, legal? In my opinion I am bound to go the length of saying that I do not think it is legal.” (L. J. Ch. 722.)

Lord Westbury, in concurring in the judgment, said:

“The question, therefore, my lords, is whether a father appealed to under such circumstances to take upon himself an amount of civil liability, with the knowledge that, unless he does so, his son will be exposed to a criminal prosecution, with the certainty of a conviction, can be regarded as a free and voluntary agent? I have no hesitation in saying that no man is safe, or ought to be safe, who takes a security for the debt of a felon, from the father of a felon, under such circumstances.

"A contract to give security for the debt of another, which is a contract without consideration, is, above all things, a contract which should be based upon the free and voluntary agency of the individual who enters into it." (L. J. Ch. 725.)

See, also, The City National Bank of Dayton, Ohio, v. Kusworm, 88 Wis. 188, and note thereto in 26 L. R. A. 48.

Finding no errors in the record, the judgment [for defendants] is affirmed.³⁰

³⁰ "A fair result of the evidence, if it is in fact true, shows that the deed was executed and delivered under the influence felt by the grantor and exercised by the grantee, and that the result of the discovery of the criminal act, for which the wife was not liable, and the fear of the criminal prosecution and imprisonment of her husband were used by the defendant, or his agent, to induce her to execute and deliver the deed. The evidence thus shows an attempt to gain an advantage or benefit from an influence improperly exerted, and indicates the use of the criminal process of a court for private and personal ends.

"The important question of law here involved, therefore, is whether one who has discovered the commission of a crime, and has caused the arrest of the perpetrator, and who, by threats of prosecution and imprisonment, has overcome the will of the wife of the perpetrator, and induced her to execute a deed which she would not have willingly executed and delivered, can hold the property so conveyed, if the wife afterwards attempts to avoid the deed and have it canceled on the ground of duress. It has sometimes been held that threats of unlawful imprisonment only can constitute duress, and some of the definitions of duress per minas are perhaps not broad enough to include threats of lawful imprisonment, but at present the rule has a broader application. 'It is founded on the principal that a contract rests on the free and voluntary action of the minds of the parties meeting in an agreement which is to be binding upon them. If an influence is exerted on one of them of such a kind as to overcome his will and compel a formal assent to an undertaking when he does not really agree to it, and so to make that appear to be his act which is not his, but another's, imposed on him through fear, which deprives him of self-control, there is no contract unless the other deals with him in good faith, in ignorance of the improper influence, and in the belief that he is acting voluntarily.' Morse v. Woodworth, 155 Mass. 233, 27 N. E. 1010, 29 N. E. 525.

"The very existence of a contract requires that the minds of the parties meet, and that it be executed freely and voluntarily by all the contracting parties. If, then, in a case like the one shown by the evidence herein, one of the parties acts under constraint, induced by the other, and signs the instrument without voluntary assent to it, the party who exerted the improper influence can take no advantage of the contract. The real question in such a case is not whether the threats relied upon as constituting duress were of

Action by the James Quirk Milling Company against the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad Company. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

ELLIOTT, J. The appellant under a contract with the railway company erected a grain elevator upon its right of way. The building was lawful or unlawful imprisonment, but whether they were of imprisonment which would be unlawful respecting the conduct of him who threatened and sought to obtain a contract by use of the threats. Such imprisonment, resulting from the execution of threats made for the purpose of securing a contract or a conveyance of property, may be lawful with respect to the public or public authorities, but unlawful with respect to him who thus, for his own private benefit, made use of the criminal process of the court provided for the prosecution of crime and the protection of the public. One who, under circumstances as now disclosed in this case, makes use of the criminal process of the court for the purpose of overcoming the will of another to secure an advantage to himself, is not in a position to obtain and hold the fruits of a contract, whether executed or executory, so obtained, on the ground that both parties were in pari delicto, and that in equity the court will leave them where it finds them. Under the weight of recent authority, at least, such parties, under such circumstances, cannot be looked upon as equally at fault, although they are both guilty of a wrong. The inequality of their situation, the one exacting a deed to property which the other is compelled to execute and deliver against her will in order to save her husband from imprisonment in the penitentiary and herself and children from disgrace and ruin, taints the transaction, and renders voidable the instrument obtained under the influence of her fears. This is so because she was not acting as a free agent. The evidence does not show that the conveyance was the result of her own volition, but of that of another; in reality not her contract, but another's; and in such case there is no reason why she should be held bound by the instrument. If, as indicated by the evidence now before us, her main and inspiring purpose was the release of her husband from the consequences of his crime, and to preserve the standing of herself and family in society; if such was the consideration operating in her mind when she signed the deed, a court will not be justified in upholding the transaction." Bartch, C. J., in Gorringe v. Read, 23 Utah 120, 132-134 (1901).

But, also, "It is well settled law that, though criminal proceedings have been begun and be pending against the wrongdoer for the crime, one whose money or property has been embezzled, or fraudulently procured, may contract with such wrongdoer for repayment or satisfaction of the loss and take security therefor, without invalidating such contract, unless there be included therein and as part consideration therefor some promise or agreement, express or implied, that such prosecution shall be suppressed, stified or stayed." Miller, J., in Board of Education v. Angel, 75 W. Va. 747, 750 (1915). As to compromise of action for criminal conversation, see Ann. Cas., 1913 A, 705, note.

destroyed by fire negligently scattered by the company's locomotives. The action was brought to recover the resulting damages, and the trial court sustained a demurrer to the complaint. The appeal is from this order.

The elevator was constructed under a contract between the parties which contained the following provision: "In consideration of the rights hereby acquired the second party agrees * * * to protect, save harmless, and indemnify the railway company, its successors and assigns, from liability to any person, corporation, or company, for or on account of any loss or damage by fire communicated by or escaping from any locomotive, engine, or car, or resulting in any manner from the construction or operation of said track." The appellant contends that this contract is against public policy and therefore void. This involves the denial of the right of the parties to enter into such agreement.

Public policy requires that the right to contract shall be preserved inviolate in ordinary cases. It is denied only when the particular contract violates some principle which is of even more importance to the general public. As said by Sir George Jessel, M. R., in Printing, etc., Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 462, 465, 44 L. J. Ch. 705: "It must not be forgotten that you are not to extend arbitrarily those rules, which say that a given contract is void as being against the public policy, because, if there is one thing which, more than another, public policy requires, it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into freely and voluntarily, shall be held sacred and shall be enforced by the courts of justice. Therefore you have this paramount public policy to consider, that you are not lightly to interfere with this freedom of contract." In Baltimore, etc., Ry. Co. v. Voigt, 176 U. S. 505, 20 Sup. Ct. 387, 44 L. Ed. 560, the court said: "It must not be forgotten that the right of private contract is no small part of the liberty of the citizen, and that the usual and most important function of courts of justice is rather to maintain and enforce contracts than to enable parties thereto to escape from their obligations on the pretext of public policy, unless it clearly appears that they contravene public right or the public welfare." It follows that the party who asserts that a particular contract is against public policy has the burden of proving the same. Printing, etc., Co. v. Sampson, supra; Rousillon v. Rousillon, 14 Ch. Div. 351; U. S. v. Trans-Missouri, etc., Co., 58 Fed. 58, 7 C. C. A. 15, 24 L. R. A. 73; Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Chicago Railway, etc., Co., 70 Fed. 201, 17 C. C. A. 62, 30 L. R. A. 193; Stewart v. Transportation Co., 17 Minn. 372 (Gil. 348).

The appellant assumes that there is a general rule of law which forbids a party to protect himself by contract against damages resulting from his own negligence. But this is true only when the contract protects him against the consequences of a breach of some duty which is imposed by law. Generally a person may waive the right of action which he has against another for an injury received from the negligence of the latter, provided the contract of waiver is supported by a consideration deemed valuable by law and procured without mistake or fraud, such as would avoid other contracts. Thompson, Negligence, vol. 1, § 182. In Hartford Ins. Co. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 175 U. S. 91, 98, 20 Sup. Ct. 33, 36, 44 L. Ed. 84, Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the rule applicable to public carriers, said: "The plaintiff further insisted that the same rules apply universally and should be held to defeat all contracts by which a party undertakes to put another at the mercy of his own faulty conduct. But the only authority cited which supports this proposition is a general statement in Cooley on Torts, 387, and an obiter dictum in Johnson's Adm'x v. Richmond, etc., Ry. Co., 86 Va. 975-978, 11 S. E. 829, and it is certainly too sweeping. Even a common carrier may obtain insurance against losses occasioned by the negligence of himself or his servants, or may by stipulation with the owner of the goods carried have the benefit of such insurance procured thereon by such owner." Minneapolis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Insurance Co., 64 Minn. 61, 69, 66 N. W. 132; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Erie Transportation Co., 117 U. S. 312, 6 Sup. Ct. 750, 29 L. Ed. 873; California Ins. Co. v. Union Compress Co., 133 U. The right to insure against loss by fire occasioned by the negligence of the insured is no longer questioned. Liverpool & Great Western Steam Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 129 U. S. 438, 9 Sup. Ct. 469, 32 L. Ed. 788; Kerr, Ins. p. 375. A stronger illustration is found in the recognized business of insuring employers of labor against damages resulting from personal injuries occasioned by the negligence of the insured.

Exceptions to the general rule which protects the freedom of contract, are made in some instances, especially such as involve the relation of master and servant and the transactions of railway companies when acting as public carriers of persons and property. Positive and peremptory duties are imposed upon public carriers. Public policy requires that contracts which relieve from these absolute duties shall be held null and void. The law imposes upon a railway company the absolute duty to operate its railways, to employ suitable men to operate them, and to exercise ordinary care to furnish them a reasonably safe place to work and with reasonably safe machinery and appliances with which to perform their work. The obligation is imposed by law, and does not arise out of contract. Any breach of this duty, therefore, is a violation of the law which imposes the duty. It follows that a contract which exempts the carrier from damages resulting from negligence in the discharge of these duties is void, because it relieves it of an absolute duty which the law imposes upon it, and because it unreasonably endangers the lives of employes and passengers. The parties to such contracts do not stand upon an equal footing. The law imposes upon the company the absolute duty to accept passengers and freight when offered, and to carry the former with the utmost and the latter with ordinary care. The traveler is often obliged to travel and the shipper to send his goods by railway. A person cannot stop to settle the terms and to negotiate a contract every time he desires to use a railway. On the other hand, a railroad, with its trained employes and monopoly of transportation facilities, has the power to exact any contract it desires. This inequality in the situation of the parties would, if permitted, enable the company to obtain unfair contracts, and the fact that a contract which exempts the company from liability for negligence relieves it from an absolute duty imposed by law and increases the danger to the lives and property of the people constitutes the reason for the rule that such contracts are against public policy. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 70 Fed. 201, 17 C. C. A. 62, 30 L. R. A. 193.

Entirely different conditions are presented by the case at bar. In making the lease in question the railway company was dealing with individuals in reference to the use of its property only remotely, if at all, connected with its business as a common carrier. No law imposed upon it the duty of leasing a portion of its right of way to the appellants. A railway holds its station grounds and right of way for the public use for which the company was incorporated, "yet it is its private property, and to be occupied by itself and by others in the manner which it may consider best fitted to promote or not to interfere with the public use. It may in its discretion permit them to be occupied by others with structures convenient for the receiving and delivering of its freights upon its railroads, so long as a free and safe passage is left for the carriage of passengers and freight." Hartford Ins. Co. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 175 U. S. 92, 99, 20 Sup. Ct. 36, 44 L. Ed. 84; Grand Trunk Ry. Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454, 23 L. Ed. 356; Osgood v. Central Vermont Ry. Co., 77 Vt. 334, 60 Atl. 137, 70 L. R. A. 930. The laws of this state authorized the condemnation of a part of the right of way of a railway company for the erection of a public warehouse and elevator. Chapter 64, p. 177, Gen. Laws 1893; Gen. St. 1894, §§ 7724-7732; Rev. Laws 1905, §§ 2106-2113. But the appellant did not resort to this procedure, which would have made its elevator a public enterprise and thus subject to public regulation. Stewart v. N. P. Ry. Co., 65 Minn. 515, 68 N. W. 208, 33 L. R. A. 427. It chose rather to enter into a private contract with the railway company and to release it from liability for damages occasioned by fire which might escape from its engines. For this waiver of the right of action it must have received some benefit which it deemed the equivalent of the right of action which it waived. The company was under no legal obligation to make the lease. It might leave the appellant to its right to proceed under the statute and accept the obligations arising out of the relation thus created. The company would not be liable for damages to property placed upon its right of way by strangers without its permission, caused by fires occasioned by its want of ordinary care. Having the right to refuse to make the contract, it might stipulate for exemption from damages caused by its negligence in setting fire to the property which the lessee placed upon the leased premises. Placing the building upon the right of way was an inconvenience to the railway company and increased the danger of fire to its own property. In the absence of the stipulation in question, the risks and liabilities of the company would have been materially increased. As the contract in no way relieves the railway company from the discharge of any absolute duty which it owes to the public or to any citizen, it is not against public policy, and is therefore binding upon the parties. The authorities, without exception, sustain this view. Elliott on Railroads, vol. 3, § 1236; Griswold v. Ill. Cent. Ry. Co., 90 Iowa, 265, 57 N. W. 843, 24 L. R. A. 647; *Stephens v. ROBERTS ET AL. v. CRISS.

Action by Jesse Nevin Roberts and another against Hugh Ferguson Criss. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Pending appeal, defendant below died, and Helen G. Criss, administratrix, appeared on order. Affirmed.

ROGERS, J.²¹ * * * It appears that the cause of action grows out of the failure of defendant to secure to the plaintiffs the benefit of defendant's membership in the [New York Stock] Exchange, when to have done so would have caused him to break his contract with the Exchange. The question comes down to this: Can such a cause of action be sustained? There can be no doubt concerning the answer which must be given to such a question. We are satisfied that the agreement into which these parties entered violated the rules of the Exchange, and that all parties, the plaintiffs as well as the defendant, knew that fact when they entered into it. The court below was clearly right in saying that the plaintiffs with knowledge that "the defendant was a member of the New York Stock Exchange and bound by its rules—in other words, that he had a contractual relation with the Exchange to obey these rules—entered into a contract with the defendant in violation of these rules."

The courts do not aid the parties to illegal agreements. If any principle of law is settled it is that a party to an illegal undertaking cannot come into a court either of law or equity and ask to have his illegal contract carried out. Ex dolo malo non oritur actio, and in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis. It makes no difference whether the contract has been executed, or remains still executory. The defense of illegality may be set up, not as a protection to defendant, but as a disability in the plaintiff. It was said by Lord Mansfield in Holman v. Johnson, 1 Cowper, 341, 343:

"No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action on an immoral or illegal act. If, from the plaintiff's own stating or otherwise, the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa or the transgression of a positive law of this country, there the court says he has no right to be assisted. It is upon that ground the court goes, not for the sake of the defendant, but because they will not lend their aid to such a plaintiff."

In Dent v. Ferguson, 132 U. S. 50, 66, 10 Sup. Ct. 13, 19 (33 L. Ed. 242), the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Lamar, cited with approval Chancellor Walworth's opinion in Bolt v. Rogers, 3 Paige, 154, 157, in which he said:

"Wherever two or more persons are engaged in a fraudulent transaction to injure another, neither law nor equity will interfere to relieve either of those persons, as against the other, from the consequence of their own misconduct."

In Hocking Valley Ry. Co. v. Barbour, 190 App. Div. 341, 179 N. Y. Supp. 810, recently decided, the plaintiff had sold certain gondola cars to the Central Locomotive & Car Works. Prior to that sale the plaintiff had entered into a contract with one Wardwell for the sale of 300 of the said gondola cars. The two sales left about 50 cars belonging to the plaintiff unsold. [The plaintiff and the Central Locomotive & Car Works then arranged another agreement for the purchase by the latter of all the cars of the plaintiff, including the cars theretofore contracted to Wardwell.] The plaintiff, apparently being unwilling to hazard a liability to Wardwell by making the sale to the Central Locomotive & Car Works, insisted that the latter should give a bond, executed by it and signed by defendant's testator, to save the plaintiff harmless from all damages and costs which might result if the plaintiff made the sale. The bond was given, the contract between the plaintiff and Wardwell was broken, and all the cars were delivered to the Central Locomotive & Car Works. An action was then brought by Wardwell against the plaintiff, and judgment was obtained for the breach of contract. Then suit was brought by plaintiff against the executors of the bondsmen upon his contract to save the plaintiff harmless from all damages arising from the failure to deliver the cars to Wardwell. The Supreme Court, Appellate Division, First Department, held the action could not be maintained, as the bond was unenforceable, having been executed as an inducement to the seller to break his contract with a third party. The bond was executed for an illegal purpose. In the course of its opinion the court said:

"Whatever right of action Wardwell may have had against the plaintiff, he had a primary right to have his contract consummated, and as this indemnity bond was given with full knowledge of all the parties of the fact that its purpose was to procure the plaintiff to deliberately violate his contract with Wardwell, the court will not give its aid. The law cares nothing for what a fraudulent party may lose, but will leave the parties where it finds them, and will leave them to disentangle themselves from the meshes in which they have become involved by their fraudulent agreement."²²

In Wald's Pollock on Contracts (3 Am. Ed.) 376, it is said:

"An agreement will generally be illegal, though the matter of it may not be an indictable offense, and though the information of it may not amount to the offense of conspiracy, if it contemplates any civil injury to third persons. Thus an agreement * * * to carry out some object in itself not unlawful * * * by means of * * * breach of contract or breach of trust is unlawful and void."

²² "It is not necessary here to hold that one purchasing goods known to have been contracted to another makes a contract tainted with illegality. Where, however, the contract, as in the case at bar is to give a bond for the very purpose of inducing the vendor to violate his contract known to have been made, a different question is involved, and the contract comes within the condemnation of the law as one made directly for an illegal purpose, and therefore tainted with illegality." Smith, J., in Hocking Valley Ry. Co. v. Barbour, 179 N. Y. Supp. 810, 813 (1920).

In 13 Corpus Juris, § 343, it is said that:

"An agreement is illegal and void where its object is the commission of a civil wrong against a third person, although the wrong may not be an indictable offense or crime, either at common law or under the statutes. This is true, for example, * * * of an agreement to perpetrate a fraud on a third person."

It is clear to us that the plaintiffs' cause of action grows out of an illegal and immoral contract. The immorality of the agreement to allow the plaintiffs the use of defendant's seat on the Stock Exchange contrary to the rules of the Exchange, and known to be so to all the parties, is so apparent that discussion is really unnecessary; and it is a well-established principle of sound public policy that no court will lend its aid to a plaintiff who grounds his action upon an immoral agreement. Therefore the court below was right in his direction to the jury to find a verdict for the defendant.

The fact that the illegality of the agreement was not pleaded is of no moment. In Oscanyan v. Winchester Repeating Arms, etc., Co., 103 U. S. 261, 26 L. Ed. 539, the court held that the illegality of the contract might be considered without being pleaded, saying:

"The position of the plaintiff that the illegality of the contract in suit cannot be noticed, because not affirmatively pleaded, does not strike us as having much weight. We should hardly deem it worthy of serious consideration, had it not been earnestly pressed upon our attention by learned counsel. * * * It [the objection of illegality] was one which the court itself was bound to raise in the interest of the due administration of justice. The court will not listen to claims founded upon services rendered in violation of common decency, public morality, or the law. * * * It would not be restrained by defects of pleading, nor, indeed, could it be by the defendant's waiver, if we may suppose that in such a matter it would be offered."

Inasmuch as the cause of action grows out of an agreement which the court cannot recognize, it is unnecessary to consider any other question. The direction of a verdict, in favor of the defendant, was justified under the circumstances.

C. F. JEWETT PUBLISHING CO. v. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1893. 159 Mass. 517, 34 N. E. 1087, 22 L. R. A. 253.)

Action by C. F. Jewett Publishing Company against Benjamin F. Butler for breach of contract. The court reported the case to the Supreme Judicial Court. Judgment for plaintiff.

²³ On validity of contract which contemplates the violation of a contract with a third person, see 11 A. L. R. 706, note.

The contract between the parties recited that the defendant "is minded and intending to write and have published two volumes in the nature of autobiography or reminiscences of his life, and the acts and doings of other public men, so far as they may seem to him to elucidate the history of the country or public affairs," and it was stipulated that the plaintiff should do the publishing. The declaration alleged that, after defendant had written the work, he permitted it to be published by other parties, and that plaintiff had suffered damages in having prepared for the publication, and in the loss of profits which it would have made from the sale.

MORTON, J.²⁴ The first question is whether the contract is, as the defendant contends, illegal on its face. The words relied on to show that it is are as follows: "The party of the first part agrees to accept full responsibility of all matter contained in said work, and to defend at his own cost any suits which may be brought against the party of the second part for publishing any statements contained in said work, and to pay all costs and damages arising from said suit." The presiding justice found that "the contract was made without illegal intent, unless and except so far as the words used import one as matter of law." Do the words used, as quoted above, import one as matter of law? We think not. The parties were contracting respecting a book which was not in existence, but was to be written. There was nothing in the character of the proposed work which naturally or necessarily involved the publication of scandalous or libelous matter, as was the case, for instance, in Shackell v. Rosier, 2 Bing. N. C. 634, referred to by the defendant. At the same time it was not impossible that, in spite of due care and good faith on the part of the author and publisher, the proposed book might contain matter which others perhaps would deem libelous. In such a case it would be no more unlawful for the parties to provide that the author should save the publisher harmless from all costs and damages to which he might be subjected by reason of the publication of the book than it would be for a patentee to agree with his licensee that he would protect him against all costs and damages to which he might be subjected in consequence of using the patent to which the license applied. The case stands on grounds entirely different from those on which it would stand if it appeared that the parties intended to publish or contemplated the publication of libelous matter. There is nothing in the agreement fairly to show that such was their purpose. The most that can be said is that, though there was no intention to write or publish, nor any contemplation of writing or publishing, libelous matter on the part of the author or publisher, it might turn out, after the book was published, that it did contain libelous matter. But that is very far from saying that the parties had in view an illegal purpose in publishing the book. We see nothing unlawful in a contract which provides, without anything more, that the author shall indemnify the publisher for costs and damages to which he may be subjected by reason of the publication of a book to be written by the author. Moreover, it was possible in this case that the book might not contain libelous matter, although libel suits against the publisher might grow out of it. It would be hard to say, in such event, that the publisher, who might have published the book without any libelous purpose, and in the full belief that it contained nothing libelous, could not recover of the author under this clause in the contract the costs and damages to which he had been put by such suits. In order, we think, to render the contract unlawful, it should appear that there was an intention on the part of the author and publisher to write and publish libelous matter, or that the author proposed, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the publisher, to write libelous matter, or that the contract on its face provided for or promoted an illegal act. We do not think the clause in question is fairly susceptible of either construction. Fletcher v. Harcot, Hut. 55; Battersey's Case, Winch, 49; Betts v. Gibbons, 2 Adol. & E. 57; Adamson v. Jarvis, 4 Bing 66; Waugh v. Morris, L. R. 8 Q. B. 202; Pearce v. Brooks, L. R. 1 Exch. 213; Cannan v. Bryce, 3 Barn. & Ald. 179; Graves v. Johnson, 156 Mass. 211, 30 N. E. Rep. 818. * * * A majority of the court think the entry should be, judgment for plaintiff for $2,500 and interest from June 9, 1890, and it is so ordered.

LATHROP, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the opinion of the majority of the court that the contract sought to be enforced is a valid contract. * * * While it is found that the parties acted without illegal intent, yet if the legal effect of the language used is to make the contract against the policy of the law, this court ought not to enforce it. It seems to me to be impossible to say that the language used applies only to groundless suits, and that it should so be construed. What the parties contemplated, and what they intended to provide for, was that actions might be brought against the publisher for libelous matter contained in the work; that these actions might be successfully maintained against the publisher, who would then be compelled to pay damages and costs. In this event the writer agreed to indemnify the publisher. Could such an agreement have been enforced? In my opinion, it could not, and this view is sustained by the authorities. Shackell v. Rosier, 2 Bing. N. C. 634; Colburn v. Patmore, 1 Crompt. M. & R. 73; Gale v. Leckie, 2 Starkie, 107; Clay v. Yates, 1 Hurl. & N. 73; Arnold v. Clifford, 2 Sum. 238, Fed. Cas. It follows that the whole contract was tainted with illegality, and neither party was bound to go on with it. Robinson v. Green, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 159, 161; Perkins v. Cummings, 2 Gray, 258; Woodruff v. Wentworth, 133 Mass. 309;

BENJAMIN STERLING v. SENECA SINNICKSON.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1820. 5 N. J. L. 756.)

Plaintiff declared against the defendant, in debt, on a sealed bill, in the usual form of declarations. Defendant prayed oyer of the sealed bill; which was given in these words:

"I, Seneca Sinnickson, am hereby bound to Benjamin Sterling, for the sum of one thousand dollars, provided he is not lawfully married, in the course of six months from date hereof. Witness my hand and seal. Burlington, May 16th, 1816.

"Witness Jas. S. Budd. Seneca Sinnickson." (Seal)

Defendant, after oyer, demurred generally, to the plaintiff's declaration; and plaintiff joined in demurrer.

KIRKPATRICK, C. J.²⁵ * * * The contract was not only useless and nugatory, but it was contrary to the public policy.

Marriage lies at the foundation, not only of individual happiness, but also, of the prosperity, if not the very existence of the social state; and the law, therefore, frowns upon, and removes out of the way, every rash and unreasonable restraint upon it, whether by way of penalty or inducement.

If these parties had entered into mutual obligations, the plaintiff not to marry within six months, and the defendant to pay him therefor this sum of $1,000, there can be no doubt, I think, but that both the obligations would have been void. In the case of Key v. Bradshaw (2 Vern. 102), there was a bond in the usual form but proved to be upon an agreement to marry such a man, or to pay the money mentioned in the bond; but the bond was ordered to be cancelled, it being contrary to the nature and design of marriage, which ought to proceed from free choice, and not from any restraint or compulsion. In the case of Baker v. White (2 Vern. 215), A gave her bond to B for 100*l.* if she should marry again, and B gave her his bond for the same sum, to go towards the advancement of her daughter's portion, in case she should not marry; it was, as Lord Mansfield says, in Lowe v. Peters (Bur. 2231), a mere wager, and nothing unfair in it: and yet A was relieved against her bond, because it was in restraint of marriage, which ought to be free. A bond, therefore, to marry, if there be no obligation on the other side, no mutual promise; or a bond not to marry, are equally against law. They are both restraints upon the freedom of choice and of action, in a case where the law wills that all shall be free. If the consideration for which this money was to be paid, then, was the undertaking of the plaintiff not to marry, that consideration was unlawful; he would have been relieved against it, either at law or in equity; and if so, the corresponding obligation to pay, according to the principle before stated, is void.

It has been spoken of, by the plaintiff, as if this were an obligation to pay money upon a future contingency, which any man has a right to make either with, or without consideration; and as if the not marrying of the plaintiff were not the consideration of the obligation, but the contingent event only, upon which it became payable. But I think this is not a correct view of the case. Where the event, upon which the obligation becomes payable, is in the power of the obligee, and is to be brought about by his doing or not doing a certain thing, it cannot be so properly called a contingency; it is rather the condition meritorious, upon which the obligation is entered into, the moving consideration for which the money is to be paid. It is not, therefore, to be considered as a mere contingency, but as a consideration, and it must be such consideration as the law regards.

Nor does it at all vary the case, that the restraint was for six months only. It was still a restraint, and the law has made no limitation as to the time. Neither can the plaintiff's performance, on his part, help him. It imposed no obligation upon the defendant; it was wholly useless to him; the contract itself was void from the beginning. Therefore, in my opinion, let there be judgment for the defendant.

KING v. KING.

(Supreme Court of Ohio, 1900. 63 Ohio St. 363, 59 N. E. 111, 52 L. R. A. 157, 81 Am. St. Rep. 635.)

The plaintiff in error was the plaintiff below. Her action was to recover for personal services rendered in the performance of a contract made with James Howland, in 1881, whereby plaintiff agreed to live with him and take care of him during his life. He was a man of means, well advanced in years, without family, living on Euclid avenue in Cleveland, and much of the time in ill health. The plaintiff was a daughter of his niece. She performed the contract on her part, the service extending from the year 1881 to 1896, when Howland died. The contract, as stated in the petition, was that "this plaintiff agreed with the said James Howland that she would refrain from marriage while he should live, and that she would live with him and take care of him while he lived; and he, in consideration thereof, agreed that he would provide for her amply sufficient to make her comfortable and well off." Howland, in his will, left to plaintiff a legacy of $500, but, save small amounts of money given her from time to time, did not perform the contract. A recovery was had in the common pleas. The judgment was reversed by the circuit court because of error in the charge in instructing the jury that the contract was a legal one, and, if proven to have been made as alleged, and duly performed by plaintiff, there might be a recovery. To reverse this judgment of reversal this proceeding is prosecuted.

SPEAR, J. The sole ground of reversal is that the contract is void, because against public policy, being in restraint of marriage; hence there could be no recovery. That contracts in restraint of marriage are void, as being contrary to the public policy of the law, is conceded. But the question here is whether the contract to render service, fully performed by the one party, so rests upon the promise not to marry, or is so tainted by that part of the agreement as to be incapable of enforcement. The consideration moving to the agreement on the part of Howland to make ample provision for his niece was, on its face, two-fold: One, the promise to perform the service agreed upon; the other, not to marry during the continuance of such service. The first was a valid promise, and of itself sufficient to support the promise of the other party; the second was a void promise, not affording any consideration whatever. As given in text-books and numerous decisions, the general rule is that if one of two considerations for a promise be merely void, the other will support the promise, although, if one of two considerations be unlawful, the promise of the other party is void; and yet this rule has many exceptions, as will be shown later on. That is, if one of two considerations is void merely for insufficiency, and not for illegality, the other will support the contract. Widoe v. Webb, 20 Ohio St. 435; Metc. Cont. 246; Chitty. Cont. 988; 1 Para. Cont. 456; Comst. Cont. 24; Pikard v. Cottels, Yel. 56; Bliss v. Negus, 8 Mass. 51; Carleton v. Woods, 28 N. H. 290; Woodruff v. Hinman, 11 Vt. 592; King v. Sears, 2 Crompt. M. & R. 48; Erie Ry. Co. v. Union Locomotive and Express Co., 35 N. J. Law 240; Bradburne v. Bradburne, Cro. Eliz. 149. This distinction between a contract merely void and an illegal contract would seem to be an important one. Courts, as a general proposition, are open for the enforcement of contracts; not for their destruction. So that where parties have deliberately entered into a contract valuable to them, and one has received the full advantage of it, the general policy of the law is to exact proper performance by him who has thus obtained the advantage; and some substantial defect should be shown before a court will refuse enforcement. A mere technical objection should not prevail. Now, a void contract is one which has no legal force, and which, for that reason, cannot be enforced; an unlawful contract is one to do an act which the law forbids, or to omit an act which the law enjoins and for that reason is not enforceable. There is no provision, either by statute or at common law, which enjoins upon any particular person the duty to marry; nor can any one be punished for not marrying. To marry or not to marry is left to the free choice of all who are eligible to marriage. Hence to omit to marry is not illegal, though the promise to omit is one which the law will not enforce. It would appear naturally to follow that the only result of making such a promise would simply be that no legal right could be founded on the promise, and no remedy afforded for its breach. It is difficult to see any good reason for denouncing such contract as illegal in the sense of violating any law, or of placing parties who may have entered into it outside the pale of the law. But, aside from this, in the present case the promise on the part of the woman, which was of value to the man, was the promise to care for him. The promise not to marry was a mere incident to the main purpose, entered into simply because it was supposed that by remaining single the woman could the better perform her contract. It was immaterial to the man whether she married or not, so long as she fulfilled her promise as to care. In other words, the promise to remain unmarried did not enter into or become part of the substance of the general agreement. That agreement was for the performance of services. If the performance was adequate and the services rendered in a satisfactory manner, their value could neither be enhanced nor diminished by the fact that they had been rendered by a single woman rather than a married one. So that, had the plaintiff married, yet, if she satisfactorily performed her contract, the recipient of the services would lose nothing by the fact of marriage. As matter of fact she did not marry; whether because of the contract or for reasons wholly apart from it is not material, for she was under no obligation to marry nor to refrain from so doing. She did perform the service. That, the verdict and judgment of the common pleas settles to all intents and purposes for the present inquiry. As above stated, the promise not to marry, although void because against public policy, was not illegal as against positive law; and it is not easy to perceive how its presence in the contract, or its observance by her, or both facts, could place the parties in what is termed in pari delicto, i. e., in a position where the law should adjudge them guilty of its violation, and hence refuse relief for that reason in the face of the fact that the claimant had fully performed. In such case the maxim, "In pari delicto melior est conditio possidentis," has, in reason, no application, and, we think, ought not to have application in law.

Courts refuse to enforce or recognize certain classes of acts because against public policy on the ground that they have a mischievous tendency, and are thus injurious to the interests of the state, apart from illegality or immorality. A contract in restraint of marriage is of this nature. But, as before suggested, it does not follow that all contracts which may have an element of insufficiency and may be void as to one feature, are incapable of enforcement, or even that all that are illegal will not be enforced. Decisions are abundant in support of the proposition that even where the acts of the parties have been in violation of positive law the contract may, under some circumstances, be enforced. A case in point is Lester v. The Bank, 33 Md. 558. The bank's charter forbade a director, under penalty of fine and imprisonment, to borrow money from the bank. It was claimed that the act of thus lending by the bank was null and void; that no rights could accrue from it, and hence no action could be had by either party based upon it. The court held, however, that: "Contracts made in violation of statute, are not necessarily incapable of enforcement because of their illegality. Whether the courts will enforce them or not, is a question of public policy, and they will be enforced when it may be adjudged that such policy requires their enforcement." Robinson, J., in the opinion, remarks that: "Public policy, it must be borne in mind, lies at the basis of the law in regard to illegal contracts, and the rule is adopted not for the benefit of parties but of the public. It is evident, therefore, that cases may arise, even under contracts of this character, in which the public interests will be better promoted by granting than by denying relief, and in such the general rule must yield to this policy," and cites 1 Story's Eq. Jur., sec. 298. This policy of the law finds expression in our statutes authorizing the recovery back of money lost at gaming, and the decisions under them. See, also, Burkholder's Appeal, 105 Penn. St. 31. To justify refusal of relief to the plaintiff, on the ground referred to, the court ought to be ready to hold that the public mischiefs would be greater by permitting a party to recover who had made and performed a contract otherwise well founded but embracing an agreement not to marry while in its performance, than by permitting the other party to have the full benefit of meritorious service for nothing, thus repudiating his agreements, all of which were legal and based upon at least one consideration entirely adequate and wholly lawful. We are not prepared to make such a holding, but are clearly of opinion that no mischiefs to the public would result from sustaining a right to recover in a case like the present comparable to those which would follow a contrary holding, one which would encourage the violation of contracts and the repudiation of just obligations after full value had been received.

Other phases of the case are argued by defendants in error. The printed record presented embraces only the question here treated. It is not the duty of the court to hunt through portions of the record not printed in the quest of other reasons why the judgment of the common pleas should have been reversed, and we decline to do so.

IN RE GROBE'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1905. 127 Iowa 121, 102 N. W. 804.)

McCLAIN, J. The finding of facts by the trial court was that there was a contract between Mrs. Aldinger, the claimant, and the deceased, whereby the latter agreed to pay to the former $200, if she would go to Chicago to see a woman whom he was desirous of marrying, and give her information concerning him, and the claimant went to Chicago in pursuance of this contract, and incurred certain expenses, all at the request of deceased. The court allowed a portion of the claim, which was for money advanced, but denied recovery for compensation on account of services rendered, on the ground that the contract was a marriage brokerage contract, and void as against public policy.

²⁶ See, accord, Fletcher v. Osborn, 282 Ill. 143 (1918). But see, contra, Lowe v. Doremus, 84 N. J. L. 658 (1913), citing Sterling v. Sinnickson, reported, ante.

It is well settled that no recovery can be had under a contract for services to be rendered in promoting or bringing about a marriage. Advice and solicitation on the part of a third person with reference to entering into the important relation of marriage are presumed to be given from considerations affecting the interests of the parties themselves, and not for pecuniary reward. It is contrary to public policy to make such advice or solicitation the basis of an agreement to pay money. And the rule is equally applicable to advice or solicitation with reference to carrying out a marriage contract, as it is with reference to the formation of such contract. "The freedom of choice is essential to a happy marriage; and the voluntary selection by each spouse of the person who is to be his companion for life, with all that is implied in the relation of marriage, are as fully prevented by the employment of a person who is governed solely by mercenary motives to induce one of the parties to the agreement of marriage to carry it into effect, if he has once been disposed to abandon it, as to endeavor to bring about such an agreement between parties who do not sustain any relation to each other." Morrison v. Rogers, 115 Cal. 252, 46 Pac. 1072, 56 Am. St. 95.

It does not clearly appear in the present case whether the deceased had already a contract of marriage with the woman in Chicago, which he desired the claimant to assist him in bringing about, or whether he was seeking to induce her to enter into a contract of marriage with him. But it is wholly immaterial what was the prior relation between the parties. It is clearly shown that the services to be rendered by claimant under her agreement with deceased, and for which she desires compensation, were to give the woman whom deceased wished to marry information concerning him which would tend to induce the woman to enter into such marriage relation; and no argument is necessary to demonstrate that this arrangement was a marriage brokerage contract, pure and simple—such as is deemed by the law to be against public policy, and therefore void. Duval v. Wellman, 124 N. Y. 158, 26 N. E. 343; Fuller v. Dame, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 472, 481; Morrison v. Rogers, supra; 2 Pomeroy, Equity, § 932.

*The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

* So a contract to prevent a marriage between a man and a woman of bad character was held illegal in Sheppey v. Stevens, 177 Fed. 484 (1910).

GYLES MERRILL v. BYRON L. PEASLEE ET AL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts 1888. 146 Mass. 460, 16 N. E. 271, 4 Am. St. Rep. 334.)

Contract upon a promissory note for $5,000, payable to the order of the plaintiff on demand and signed by Hiram Peaslee, the defendant's testator. The plaintiff was trustee to pay the proceeds to Abby D. Peaslee, the testator's wife, provided she had lived with the testator as his wife until his death. The evidence tended to show that the wife was entitled to a divorce for extreme cruelty and had left him, and that the note was given by the testator in consideration that his wife would return to him and live with him as his wife, and in consideration that she would not institute proceedings for a divorce and alimony. Also that she did return to and lived with him as his wife until his death. Verdict ordered for defendant. Plaintiff alleged exceptions.

W. ALLEN, J.²⁸ The note was given to carry out a contract between husband and wife, by which, in consideration that she should live with him as his wife during their joint lives, he was to cause to be paid to her five thousand dollars after his decease, if she survived. The consideration of the note was the agreement, or the performance of the agreement, of the wife to live in marital relations with her husband. It was not to perform some service for him which could be hired, as to keep his house, or to nurse him in sickness, but to give him the fellowship and communion of a wife. This is not a service which the wife can sell or the husband buy. Perhaps a husband can hire his wife to do anything for him which a servant can be hired to do, or can buy of her anything that is the subject of barter; but a servant cannot be hired to fulfil the marital relation, and the fellowship of the wife is not an article of trade between husband and wife. Like parental authority and filial obedience, conjugal consortium is without the range of pecuniary considerations. The law fixes and regulates it on public considerations, and will not allow the parties to discard and resume it for money.

It is the same when the misconduct of one party has given to the other the option to withdraw conjugal fellowship. It is not a mere personal right affecting only the parties to the marriage, but a right which is an incident of the status of marriage, and which affects children, the family, and society, and which must be exercised upon considerations arising from the nature of the right. It is given to the injured party to be used in the interests of justice and of society. It is as much against public policy to restore interrupted conjugal relations for money, as it is to continue them without interruption for the same consideration. The right of condonation is not exercised for the sake of justice to the injured party, or with regard to the rights of others or the interests of the public, when it is sold for money, and the law cannot recognize such a consideration for it; it implies forgiveness founded on the supposed penitence of the wrongdoer and the hope that he will not again offend. The resumption of marital intercourse after a justifiable separation without such forgiveness, and only for money, shows connivance rather than condonation. See Copeland v. Boaz, 9 Baxter, 223; Van Order v. Van Order, 8 Hun, 315; Roberts v. Frisby, 38 Tex. 219; Miller v. Miller (Iowa), 35 N. W. Rep. 464; Adams v. Adams, 91 N. Y. 381; Garth v. Earnshaw, 3 Y. & C. 584; Gipps v. Hume, 2 Johns. & Hem. 517; Brown v. Brine, 1 Ex. D. 5.

In the present case the wife had left her husband, and had a good cause of divorce from him on account of extreme cruelty. But the agreement did not look to a provision for the separate support of the wife, nor to a bar against proceedings by her for a divorce, except as that was involved in the resumption by her of marital relations. Had the consideration of the note been an agreement not to prosecute proceedings for a divorce, a different question would have been presented, upon which we express no opinion. See Newsome v. Newsome, L. R. 2 P. & D. 306. When the wife, who was living separate from her husband for justifiable cause, voluntarily returned to him, the law conclusively presumed that she returned because she had condoned the offence, and not because she was paid to live with him; and it will not enforce or recognize as valid a promise of the husband to pay money to the wife to induce her to return to him, or to condone the offence. In the opinion of a majority of the court the entry must be,

HOLMES, J. We must assume, and the majority of the court do assume, that a consideration furnished by a married woman who is a cestui que trust will sustain a promise by her husband to her trustee. Whatever might be thought upon this point as a new question, it has been settled, not without discussion, and we are bound by the decisions. Butler v. Ives, 139 Mass. 202. See Nichols v. Nichols, 136 Mass. 256.

In the case at bar the evidence tended to show that the defendant's testator had been guilty of extreme cruelty to his wife, entitling her to a divorce, and that she had separated from him, and had consulted counsel with a view to obtaining a divorce and alimony. The consideration for the note in suit was, that "she would not proceed against him for a divorce or alimony, and would return to him and live with him as his wife." This consideration, however construed, was fully furnished. She did not proceed against him, and she did return and did live with him as his wife until his death.

I do not understand it to be denied that this conduct on the wife's part was such a change of position, or detriment in the legal sense of that word, as to be a sufficient consideration for a promise, if not an illegal one. We must take it that the wife had a right to refuse to return to cohabitation, and it seems to follow that, apart from illegality, the return itself was sufficient consideration for the note. Burkholder's Appeal, 105 Penn. St. 31, 37. The case is not like those where the wife was only doing what she was legally bound to do. This was the ground of decision in Miller v. Miller (Iowa, Dec. 13, 1887), 35 N. W. Rep. 464, and, so far as appears, was the fact in Copeland v. Boaz, 9 Baxter, 223; Roberts v. Frisby, 38 Tex. 219. The last two cases seem to go in part also upon the ground that a contract by a husband upon a consideration moving from the wife is void, notwithstanding the intervention of a trustee, which cannot be taken here, in view of the cases first cited.

At all events, the giving up or refraining from proceedings for a divorce and alimony, which the wife is entitled to maintain, is both a sufficient and legal consideration. Wilson v. Wilson, 1 H. L. Cas. 538, 574; s. c. 14 Sim. 405, 5 H. L. Cas. 40; Hart v. Hart, 18 Ch. D. 670, 685; Sterling v. Sterling, 12 Ga. 201, 204. So that I understand the precise reason on which the decision of the majority goes to be that coupling the wife's return to cohabitation with the legal consideration of giving up her divorce suit made the contract illegal.

I find no decision or dictum in favor of this proposition. On the other hand, the Court of Errors and Appeals of New York has unanimously sustained the validity of a note given by a husband to a trustee for his wife on substantially the same consideration as in the case at bar, and has declared itself unable to see anything against public policy in the transaction. It seems probable that the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania would decide in the same way, and it is hardly open to doubt that the same view would be taken in England. Adams v. Adams, 91 N. Y. 381; Burkholder's Appeal, 105 Penn. St. 31, 37; Newsome v. Newsome, L. R. 2 P. & D. 306; Jodrell v. Jodrell, 9 Beav. 45, 56, 59, and cases supra; Symons v. Burton, Monro, Acta Cancellarie, 266.

It seems to me that reason as well as authority is opposed to the decision. The actual return to cohabitation was perfectly lawful, whatever the motive which induced it. I cannot think that it is unlawful to make a lawful act, which the wife may do or not do as she chooses, the consideration of a promise, merely because, by reaction, the making of the promise tends to mingle a worldly motive with whatever other motives the wife may have for renewing cohabitation. No one doubts that marriage is a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay money. Pub. Sts. c. 78, § 1, cl. 3. I do not quite understand why it should be more illegal to make such a promise for the resumption than for the assumption of conjugal relations.

I agree too to what is said in Adams v. Adams, ubi supra. The arrangements "tended to restore peace and harmony between husband and wife, and renew their conjugal relations. Agreements to separate have been regarded as against public policy,²⁹ but it would be strangely inconsistent if the same policy should condemn agreements to restore marital relations after a temporary separation had taken place. While the law favors the settlement of controversies between all other persons, it would be a curious policy which should forbid husband and wife to compromise their differences, or preclude either from forgiving a wrong committed by the other."³⁰

²⁹While separation agreements are illegal if they relate to a future separation, agreements when separation has taken or actually is taking place are generally upheld in so far as they provide for the separate maintenance of the wife.

"It is contended that deeds of separation between husband and wife cannot be upheld, because it is against public policy to allow parties sustaining that relation to vary their duties and responsibilities by entering into an agreement which contemplates a partial dissolution of the marriage contract. If the question were before us, unaffected by decision, it would present difficulties, for it cannot be doubted that there are serious objections to voluntary separations between married persons. But contracts of this nature for the separate maintenance of the wife, through the intervention of a trustee, have received the sanction of the courts in England and in this country for so long a period of time that the law on the subject must be considered as settled." Davis, J., in Walker v. Walker, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 743, 750 (1869).

See Terkelsen v. Peterson, 216 Mass. 531 (1914).

³⁰The majority of courts agree with the dissenting opinion of Justice Holmes.

In Barbour v. Barbour, 49 N. J. Eq. 429, 24 Atl. 227 (1892), the bill was for specific performance of an agreement by a husband with his wife, in and by which he promised, that if she would dismiss her suit for divorce and return to him, and live with him as his wife, he would execute and deliver to her a deed for the house in and the lot upon which they had been living. Bird, V. C., said: "It is not contrary to public policy, as understood in this state, notwithstanding it may be so regarded in others, to maintain the integrity of such contracts. In Merrill v. Peaslee, 146 Mass. 460, 16 N. E. 271, it was held by a divided court that such contract ought not to be enforced. To the same effect is the case of Copeland v. Boaz, 9 Baxt. (Tenn.) 223. But I take it for granted from what has been said by the courts of this state respecting agreements between husband and wife, looking to their separation, that agreements providing for the peaceable continuance of their marital relations would be most certainly sustained."

In Moayon v. Moayon, 114 Ky. 855, 863-866 (1903), O'Rear, J., said: "It is conceded by the demurrer that Mrs. Moayon had legal grounds for her separation and divorce; that she and her husband were then living apart because of those grounds; and that she had retained counsel to prepare, and he had prepared, a suit for her seeking a divorce from her husband. She, at her husband's solicitation, forgave his wrong, resumed a relation which he, by his conduct, had forfeited, and had no legal right to longer claim, and saved to him the costs of the threatened litigation. Also, under the facts admitted, she was certainly entitled to recover from him substantial alimony, including maintenance for herself and children pending the action, and including a sum sufficient to enable her to employ counsel and defray the costs of her suit against him. As between other persons, where one has a cause of action against the other, and is about to begin a suit on it, its abandonment and satis-

CLARK, C. J. The complaint alleges that the defendant, who is a married man, seduced the plaintiff when she was 14 years of age and faction will constitute a consideration to support a contract based upon that fact. Clarke v. McFarland's Exrs., 5 Dana, 48; Brown v. Buford, 3 B. Mon. 508, 39 Am. Dec. 477; 6 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law 2d Ed.) 947, and cases. Nor is it even necessary that the party sought to be charged shall have been benefited by the abandonment of the suit. If the other party has thereby been put to an irretrievable disadvantage, that fact will equally constitute what is termed a valuable consideration. Ford v. Crenshaw, 1 Litt. 70; Gaines v. Scott, 3 Ky. Law Rep. 418. Becoming reconciled to the husband, with full knowledge of his actionable offense, will be a bar, as a condonement, to the suit of the wife for divorce, based upon the original facts. Independent of the question whether the fact of the reconciliation was not of as much value to the wife as to the husband, and that a mere claim or right to a divorce is of no legal value, yet her right to a settlement upon herself and children as alimony and maintenance was a right possessing money value. When she abandoned and obliterated her cause for divorce in this case, it likewise nullified her right to sue for and recover alimony.

"It is argued, though, that it is the duty of the wife, no less than of the husband, to maintain in good faith the marital relation; that a promise of one to pay money to the other to continue the married relation is at best but an agreement to pay for the performance of a duty already undertaken for a sufficient consideration (to wit, the mutual undertaking to live together in the married state); and that, therefore, there is nothing upon which to rest the new promise. Were it the fact that there was no cause for the separation, this argument of appellee would be good. The other side of this proposition—that is, an agreement between husband and wife by which the former undertook to pay the latter a stipend in consideration of their living apart—has been before this court frequently. In all those cases it was shown that the marital relations had become unendurable to the parties, whether because of statutory grounds of divorce or not was not always shown. The contract of the husband to pay the wife a stipulated sum, or to convey to her certain property, was upheld on the theory that it was the legal and moral duty of the husband to support the wife, and that these contracts were but another form of, and were in lieu of, the original undertaking, and were consequently valid. Gaines' Adm'x v. Poor, 3 Metc. 303, 79 Am. Dec. 559; Flood v. Flood, 5 Bush, 170; Loud v. Loud, 4 Bush, 455; Evans v. Evans, 93 Ky. 510, 20 S. W. 605. Nor was it held in those cases to be necessary that the suit for divorce should be pending in order to support the agreement. It was sufficient if there was an actual or impending separation and suit for divorce. Gaines' Adm'x v. Poor, supra. It is the policy of the law, because it has been found best for social happiness and progress, that the state of marriage be encouraged. Certainly, if an agreement between husband and wife, settling the obligations of the husband to provide for the wife in contemplation of their living permanently apart, will be specifically enforced, as being based upon a sufficient legal consideration, and as being not contrary to the policy of the law, a fortiori must be a contract between them under like conditions founded on the considhas begotten three children by her; that during such cohabitation, in response to her repeated requests for assistance for herself and children, she then being again with child by him and disclosing her purpose to appeal to the bastardy law if refused, the defendant promised that, if she would not institute such proceeding, he would provide her "with money and necessaries for the support of herself and children, begotten by him, and for the expenses of her sickness and lying in, and for her mainte-eration of the restoration or preservation of the marital relation. See Bishop on Marriage, Divorce & Separation, section 1279. As said in Adams v. Adams, 91 N. Y. 381, 43 Am. Rep. 675; 'While the law favors the settlement of controversies between all other persons, it would be a curious policy which would forbid husband and wife to compromise their differences, or preclude either from foregoing a wrong committed by the other.' To same effect is the case of Phillips v. Meyers, 82 Ill. 70, 25 Am. Rep. 295."

In Rodgers v. Rodgers, 229 N. Y. 255, 258-259 (1920) Pound, J., said:

"We think that the complaint is sufficient. The agreement set forth therein is not on its face against public policy. It is for the resumption of marital relations between husband and wife separated for cause. In the absence of proof, it may not be presumed that the wife's grievance was unsubstantial. It rests on a valuable consideration. The wife condoned the alleged adultery of the husband. That was a detriment to her. She surrendered a right. The husband got rid both of the action and the cause of action for divorce. He might have been successful in his defense, but it was a substantial benefit to him to have the case ended and his wife again under his roof. The performance of marital duty should not be made the subject of bargain and sale, but it does not appear that reconciliation was plaintiff's duty in this case. Rather it was her right to refuse to condone an offense against the marriage relation and to insist on a divorce, with separate support and maintenance. The husband was not hiring a discontented wife, separated from him without good cause, to return to him. She was to be paid to give up her right to live apart from him. She did not return until she was assured of proper treatment as a wife, and the court will not say to her that she sold her forgiveness, and that 'conjugal consortium is without the range of pecuniary consideration.' To apply such a rule to cases like this would be to discourage the reunion which the law should favor, of couples unhappily parted. We are dealing with the contract that was executed by plaintiff, and not with unexecuted possibilities based on subsequent separation of husband and wife. Adams v. Adams, 91 N. Y. 381, 43 Am. Rep. 675. The wife, when she returned to her husband, was entitled by law to her support. It cannot be presumed from the allegations of the complaint that such support was the equivalent of the allowance provided for her by the agreement of the parties."

In Miller v. Miller, 78 Ia. 177 (1889), however, a contract between husband and wife, made after the husband had given the wife cause to leave him and have separate support, whereby it was agreed that they should drop all matters of dispute, refrain from scolding, fault-finding, and anger, and live together as husband and wife; that the wife should keep her home in a comfortable condition; and that the husband should provide all the necessary expenses of the family, and pay the wife in addition a certain sum per month so long as she faithfully should observe the terms and conditions of the agreement, was held to be contrary to public policy, because of the undesirable investigations into family discord which it would necessitate, as well as because of the discord which it would tend to promote.

nance when she was unable to work. These promises he continued to make and renew from time to time to the plaintiff and to her father for her, and by means of his said promises, all of which were based upon their relations and the results thereof, and without stipulation or reference to any future cohabitation, she was induced to refrain from making application to the court under the provisions of the bastardy law or to bring any action against him." The complaint further alleges that the defendant has broken his oft repeated and solemn promises and removed to Virginia, leaving her, and his children by her, destitute and unprovided for, and asks for the recovery of damages sustained from the breach of the defendant's promises.

The defendant demurred on the grounds:

1. "That this is a proceeding in bastardy, and a justice of the peace has exclusive original jurisdiction." This is not a bastardy proceeding, but it is an action for damages from a breach of a promise made upon good and valid consideration. Bastardy proceeding would not be a feasible remedy, for the defendant has removed from the state. Besides, the plaintiff sues for breach of a promise and asks damages beyond the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace.

2. "That the action, being based upon a promise not to institute bastardy proceedings, is illegal and void and against public policy." Bastardy proceedings are civil, not criminal, in their nature (State v. Liles, 134 N. C. 735, 47 S. E. 750), and an agreement not to resort to or to discontinue such proceeding is "a good consideration for a pecuniary settlement or compromise" (9 Cyc. 510).

3. "That the alleged cause of action is based upon an immoral and illegal contract and is therefore void as against public policy." It is true that a contract for future cohabitation is immoral and void, as against public policy. But a contract in consideration of past cohabitation to support the mother and children is in the nature of reparation, as far as it goes, and to be commended. It is neither void nor immoral, even though the illegal cohabitation continues, if there is no stipulation for future cohabitation. Brown v. Kinsey, 81 N. C. 245, and cases there cited. It would be infinitely more to the credit of the defendant that he should provide for the victim of his lust and the innocent children of whom he has become the father, and should keep them from suffering and from becoming a charge upon the taxpayers, than that he should remove to another state, leaving her and his children in destitution and, when sued for breach of his promise, should plead his own immorality and violation of law as a defense. The defendant was under a natural obligation to support his illegitimate offspring (Kimborough v. Davis, 16 N. C. 74), and maintain the plaintiff in her sickness, which he had caused. This obligation the law not only recognizes, but enforces it in bastardy proceedings. It cannot be immoral for the defendant to promise to do his natural and legal duty by the plaintiff and his illegitimate offspring. He presents a very sorry spectacle in pleading to be released from liability on the ground that such promise is immoral and against public policy. He has been immoral, but not in promising to provide for the support of his victim and his children. It is in furtherance of, not against, public policy that provision for them should be made by him and the burden not be cast upon the taxpayers. Brown v. Kinsey, supra, is exactly in point. Corbett v. Clute, 137 N. C. 546, 50 S. E. 216, which holds that a bond given as consideration for the suppression of a criminal prosecution is null and void, has no application. The execution of public justice cannot be stayed by the payment of money or by any private arrangement. But bastardy proceedings are not in the enforcement of punishment. It is a quasi civil remedy for the sole purpose of providing support for the woman and child, and to save the taxpayers from that expense.

The judgment overruling the demurrer is affirmed.^{§1}

UNITED STATES ASPHALT REFINING CO. v. TRINIDAD LAKE
PETROLEUM CO., LIMITED (two cases).

(United States District Court, S. D. New York, 1915. 222 Fed. 1006.)

In Admiralty. Suits by the United States Asphalt Refining Company against the Trinidad Lake Petroleum Company, Limited. On motions by defendant to stay prosecution of the suits until further order of the court. Denied.

HOUGH, J. One of these actions is brought for the alleged breach of the charter party of the steamship Russian Prince, and the other for a similar breach of a like charter party relating to the steamship Roumanian Prince. Libellant is a corporation of South Dakota. Respondent was the chartered owner of the steamships above named. It is a British corporation, and the vessels are of British registry.

The charter parties by which libellant took the steamers from respondent were made in London, and granted libellant the right to use the vessels in any lawful traffic in most parts of the world. As matter of fact the steamers were employed between Trinidad and United States ports until the outbreak of war in August, 1914, when it is alleged that the vessels were wrongfully withdrawn from charterer's service. These actions in personam were begun with clause of foreign attachment, and appearance enforced by seizure of funds within this jurisdiction. Before any steps in the actions other than appearing and giving security for the seized property had been taken, these motions were made.

^{§1} On discontinuance of bastardy proceedings as consideration for contract, see 2 Ann. Cas. 493, note.

On the compromise of an action for criminal conversation, see Ann. Cas. 1913 A, 704.

The charter party of each steamer contained the following very ordinary clause:

"19. Any dispute arising under this charter shall be settled in London by arbitration, the owners and charterers each appointing an arbitrator, and the two so chosen, if they do not agree, shall appoint an umpire, the decision of whom shall be final. Should either party refuse or neglect to appoint an arbitrator within 21 days of being required to do so by the other party, the arbitrator appointed may make a final decision alone, and this decision shall be binding upon both parties. For the purpose of enforcing any award, this agreement shall be made a rule of court."

There can be no doubt that this was a submission to arbitration, and for that reason was a contract between the parties to this action: District of Columbia v. Bailey, 171 U. S. at page 171, 18 Sup. Ct. 868, 43 L. Ed. 118; citing Whitcher v. Whitcher, 49 N. H. 176, 6 Am. Rep. 486. It is equally plain that under the law of the place of the contract—i. e. England—this arbitration agreement was at the time of making the charter parties entirely valid, and any endeavor to do exactly what libelant has done by bringing these suits would have been restrained by the English courts, acting under authority of the English Arbitration Act of 1889 (chapter 49, 52-53 Victoria). See, also, Manchester Ship Canal Co. v. Pierson & Son, [1900] 2 Q. B. 606; Austrian Lloyd Co. v. Gresham, etc., Society, [1903] 1 K. B. 249.

The contentions of the parties litigant may therefore be summed up as follows: Respondent urges that the contract for arbitration contained in the charter parties was valid and enforceable when and where it was made, and must consequently be enforced everywhere, unless some positive rule of the law of the forum prevents such recognition and enforcement. Libelant asserts that, whether the contract was or was not good at the time and place of making, it has always been invalid under the law of the United States and most of the states thereof, with the admitted and asserted result that an American may make a solemn contract of this nature in England and repudiate it at will in America with the approbation of the courts of his own country.

There has long been a great variety of available reasons for refusing to give effect to the agreements of men of mature age, and presumably sound judgment, when the intended effect of the agreement was to prevent proceedings in any and all courts and substitute therefor the decision of arbitrators. The remarkably simple nature of this libelant's contract breaking has led me to consider at some length the nature and history of the reasons adduced to justify the sort of conduct, by no means new, but remarkably well illustrated by these libels.

It has never been denied that the hostility of English-speaking courts to arbitration contracts probably originated (as Lord Campbell said in Scott v. Avery, 4 H. L. Cas. 811)—

"in the contests of the courts of ancient times for extension of jurisdiction—all of them being opposed to anything that would altogether deprive every one of them of jurisdiction."

A more unworthy genesis cannot be imagined. Since (at the latest) the time of Lord Kenyon, it has been customary to stand rather upon the antiquity of the rule than upon its excellence or reason:

"It is not necessary now to say how this point ought to have been determined if it were res integra—it having been decided again and again," etc. Per Kenyon, J., in Thompson v. Charnock, 8 T. R. 139.

There is little difference between Lord Kenyon's remark and the words of Cardozo, J., uttered within a few months in Meacham v. Jamestown, etc., R. R. Co., 211 N. Y. at page 354, 105 N. E. at page 656:

"It is true that some judges have expressed the belief that parties ought to be free to contract about such matters as they please. In this state the law has long been settled to the contrary."

Nevertheless the legal mind must assign some reason in order to decide anything with spiritual quiet, and the causes advanced for refusing to compel men to abide by their arbitration contracts may apparently be subdivided as follows:

- (a) The contract is in its nature revocable.
- (b) Such contracts are against public policy.
- (c) The covenant to refer is but collateral to the main contract, and may be disregarded, leaving the contract keeper to his action for damages for breach of such collateral covenant.
- (d) Any contract tending to wholly oust the courts of jurisdiction violates the spirit of the laws creating the courts, in that it is not competent for private persons either to increase or diminish the statutory juridical power.
- (e) Arbitration may be a condition precedent to suit, and as such valid, if it does not prevent legal action, or seek to determine out of court the general question of liability.

The Doctrine of Revocability.

This seems to rest on Vynior's Case, 8 Coke, 81b, and is now somewhat old-fashioned, although it appears in Oregon, etc., Bank v. American, etc., Co. (C. C.) 35 Fed. 23, with due citations of authority; and in Tobey v. County of Bristol, 3 Story, 800, Fed. Cas. No. 14,065, it is treated at great length.

The Public Policy Doctrine.

No reason for the simple statement that arbitration agreements are against public policy has ever been advanced, except that it must be against such policy to oust the courts of jurisdiction. This is hardly a variant of the reasoning ascribed by Lord Campbell to the "courts of ancient times":

"Such stipulations [for arbitration] are regarded as against the policy of the common law, as having a tendency to exclude the jurisdiction of the courts." Hurst v. Litchfield, 39 N. Y. 377.

"Such agreements have repeatedly been held to be against public policy and void." Prince Co. v. Lehman (D. C.) 39 Fed. 704, 5 L. R. A. 464.

The above are two examples of the cruder forms of statement; but of late years the higher courts have been somewhat chary of the phrase "public policy," and in Insurance Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 457, 22 L. Ed. 365, Hunt, J., quotes approvingly from Story's Commentaries, thus:

"Where the stipulation, though not against the policy of the law, yet is an effort to divest the ordinary jurisdiction of the common tribunals of justice, such as an agreement in case of dispute to refer the same to arbitration, a court of equity will not, any more than a court of law, interfere to enforce the agreement, but will leave the parties to their own good pleasure in regard to such agreements."

But neither the court nor the commentator pointed out any other method by which an arbitration agreement could be against the policy of the law, unless it were by seeking to divest the "ordinary jurisdiction of the common tribunals of justice."

Having built up the doctrine that any contract which involves an "ouster of jurisdiction" is invalid, the Supreme Court of the United States has been able of late years to give decision without ever going behind that statement. Thus in Insurance Co. v. Morse, supra, it is said:

"Agreements in advance to oust the courts of the jurisdiction conferred by law are illegal and void."

In Doyle v. Continental Insurance Co., 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. Ed. 148, the case last cited is distinctly reaffirmed. The lower courts have followed, and in Perkins v. United States, etc., Co. (C. C.) 16 Fed. 513, Wallace, J., said:

"It is familiar doctrine that a simple agreement inserted in a contract, that the parties will refer any dispute arising thereunder to arbitration, will not oust courts of law of their ordinary jurisdiction."

Even a partial ouster was held "evidently invalid" when inserted in a bill of lading, in The Etona (D. C.) 64 Fed. 880, citing Slocum v. Western Assurance Co. (D. C.) 42 Fed. 236, and the Guildhall (D. C.) 58 Fed. 796.

The Doctrine That the Covenant to Refer is Collateral Only.

This idea is set forth with his customary clearness by Jessel, M. R., in Dawson v. Fitzgerald, 1 Ex. D. 257. It was repeated in Perkins v. United States, etc., Co., supra, and accepted in Crossley v. Connecticut, etc., Co. (C. C.) 27 Fed. 30. The worthlessness of the theory was amply demonstrated in Munson v. Straits of Dover (D. C.) 99 Fed. 787, affirmed 102 Fed. 926, 43 C. C. A. 57, where Judge Brown, accepting without query or comment the doctrine that any agreement which completely ousted the courts of jurisdiction was specifically unenforceable, found himself unable to award more than nominal damages for the breach of the collateral agreement. The opinion for affirmance (102 Fed. 926, 43 C. C. A. 57) is written by Wallace, J., who had himself pointed out in Perkins v. United States, etc., Co., supra, that the action for breach of the collateral agreement to refer was a remedy against the contract breaker who sued when he had promised not to. Comment seems superfluous upon any theory of law (if law be justice) that can come to such conclusions.

The Theory That Arbitration Agreements Violate the Spirit of the Laws Creating the Courts.

This is the accepted doctrine in New York, as shown in Meacham v. Jamestown, etc., Railroad, supra. Yet it is surely a singular view of juridical sanctity which reasons that, because the legislature has made a court, therefore everybody must go to the court.

The Theory That a Limited Arbitration, Not Ousting the Courts of Jurisdiction, May Be Valid.

This is thought to be the doctrine of Delaware, etc., Co. v. Pennsylvania, etc., Co., 50 N. Y. 265, and it is plainly accepted by the Supreme Court of the United States. Hamilton v. Liverpool, etc., Insurance Co., 136 U. S. at page 255, 10 Sup. Ct. 945, 34 L. Ed. 419, shows the familiar proviso in an insurance policy by which the amount of loss or damage to the property insured shall be ascertained by arbitrators or appraisers, and further that, until such an award should be obtained, the loss should not be payable and no action should lie against the insurer. This makes the appraisal or partial arbitration a condition precedent to suit. Gray, J., said:

"Such a stipulation, not ousting the jurisdiction of the courts, but leaving the general question of liability to be judicially determined, and simply providing a reasonable method of estimating and ascertaining the amount of the loss, is unquestionably valid, according to the uniform current of authority in England and in this country."

In Hamilton v. Home Insurance Co., 137 U. S. at page 385, 11 Sup. Ct. at page 138, 34 L. Ed. 708, the same learned Justice said (of a somewhat similar proviso in an insurance policy):

"If the contract * * * provides that no action upon it shall be maintained until after such an award, * * * the award is a condition precedent to the right of action."

But persons who would thus far avail themselves of compulsory arbitration must be careful, for it has been said:

"While parties may impose, as a condition precedent to applications to the courts, that they shall first have settled the amount to be recovered by an agreed mode, they cannot entirely close the access to the courts of law. * * * Such stipulations are repugnant to the rest of the contract and assume to divest courts of their established jurisdiction. As conditions precedent to an appeal to the courts, they are void."

Stephenson v. Insurance Co., 54 Me. 70, cited in Insurance Co. v. Morse, supra.

Finally, in Guaranty, etc., Co. v. Green Cove, etc., R. R. Co., 139 U. S. at page 142, 11 Sup. Ct. at page 514, 35 L. Ed. 116, Brown, J., considered a proviso in a mortgage to the effect that a sale by the trustee should be "exclusive of all other" methods of sale, and he laid down the law thus:

"This clause, * * * is open to the objection of attempting to provide against a remedy in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, and oust the jurisdiction of the courts, which (as is settled by the uniform current of authority) cannot be done."

This decision was filed in 1890. The latest opinion in this circuit known to me is Gough v. Hamburg, etc., Co. (D. C.) 158 Fed. 174, where Adams, J., lays down the rule without comment that any limitation upon the jurisdiction of courts contained in a contract is void.

Whatever form of statement the rule takes, the foregoing citations show that it always amounts to the same thing, viz.: The courts will scarcely permit any other body of men to even partially perform judicial work, and will never permit the absorption of all the business growing out of disputes over a contract by any body of arbitrators, unless compelled to such action by statute. Even such cases as Mittenthal v. Mascagni, 183 Mass. 19, 66 N. E. 425, 60 L. R. A. 812, 97 Am. St. Rep. 404, show no more than a belated acceptance of the right to confine litigation by contract to a particular court, for even that opinion does not recognize the right of mankind to contract themselves out of all courts. For a comparison of earlier cases in Massachusetts with the English cases, see an article on "Arbitration as a Condition Precedent," 11 Harvard Law Rev. 234.

The English Arbitration Act, supra, is such a statute. It has compelled the courts of that country to abandon the doctrine that it is wrong or wicked to agree to stay away from the courts when disputes arise. It is highly characteristic of lawyers that, when thus coerced by the legislature, the wisdom of previous decisions begins to be doubted. In Hamlyn v. Talisker Distillery, [1894] App. Cas. 202, Lord Watson said:

"The rule that a reference to arbitrators not named cannot be enforced does not appear to me to rest on any essential considerations of public policy. Even if an opposite inference were deducible from the authorities by which it was established, the rule has been so largely trenchanted upon by the legislation of the last 50 years * * * that I should hesitate to affirm that the policy upon which it was originally based could now be regarded as of cardinal importance."

Neither the legislature of New York nor the Congress has seen fit thus to modernize the ideas of the judges of their respective jurisdictions. It has not seemed necessary to pursue this subject beyond the courts of the United States, New York, and Massachusetts; but, with the possible exception of Pennsylvania, the result would not, I think, be different.

The question presented by these motions is to be regarded as one of general law; i. e., one wherein the courts of the United States are not bound to follow or conform to the decisions of the state jurisdiction in which they may happen to sit. This was intimated by Dallas, J., in Mitchell v. Dougherty, 90 Fed. 639, 33 C. C. A. 205, and explicitly held in Jefferson Fire Insurance Co. v. Bierce (C. C.) 183 Fed. 588.

Furthermore the question is one of remedy, and not of right. Such was substantially the holding in Mitchell v. Dougherty, supra; and in Stephenson v. Insurance Co., supra, it is pointed out that:

"The law and not the contract prescribes the remedy; and parties have no more right to enter into stipulations against a resort to the courts for their remedy, in a given case, than they have to provide a remedy prohibited by law."

Finally it has been well said by Cardozo, J., in Meacham v. Jamestown, etc., R. R. Co., supra, that:

"An agreement that * * * differences arising under a contract shall be submitted to arbitration relates to the law of remedies, and the law that governs remedies is the law of the forum."

It follows that the final question for determination under these motions is whether the law as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States permits the enforcement as a remedy of the arbitration clause contained in a contract, assuming that such clause (as here) is intended to oust the courts and all courts of their jurisdiction.

I think the decisions cited show beyond question that the Supreme Court has laid down the rule that such a complete ouster of jurisdiction as is shown by the clause quoted from the charter parties is void in a federal forum. It was within the power of that tribunal to make this rule. Inferior courts may fail to find convincing reasons for it; but the rule must be obeyed, and these motions be severally denied.²²

²² See Addison C. Burnham, Arbitration as a Condition Precedent, 11 Harv. L. Rev. 234.

There is considerable confusion in the cases, with seemingly the weight of American authority in accord with the actual decision in United States Asphalt Refining Co. v. Trinidad Lake Petroleum Co. See 3 Williston on Contracts § 1721.

"It is not necessary to cite authorities for what is so well settled, as that where a railroad or canal company and its contractors or in a contract between original and subcontractors, it is agreed that to prevent disputes the engineer of the work shall in all cases determine the amount or quality of the several kinds of work which are to be paid for under the contract, and decide every question which can or may arise relative to the execution of the contract on the part of the contractor, that his decision has been uniformly held to be final and conclusive." Thompson, J., in O'Reilly v. Kerns, 52 Pa. St. 214, 217 (1866). To the same effect, see Chandley Bros. & Co. v. Cambridge Springs Borough, 200 Pa. St. 230 (1901), where, however, the engineer exceeded his contract powers. And where arbitration and award are made conditions precedent to action, no action can be maintained in Pennsylvania without award.

NASHUA RIVER PAPER CO. v. HAMMERMILL PAPER CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1916. 228 Mass. 8, 111 N. E. 678, L. R. A. 1916 D, 691.)

Action by the Nashua River Paper Company against the Hammermill Paper Company. Demurrers to defendant's answer in abatement and Gowen v. Pierson, 166 Pa. St. 258 (1895). So enthusiastically is the freedom of contract view of these matters entertained in Pennsylvania that it was held there that a statute was unconstitutional which provided that "no provision in any contract providing, either in express words or in substance and effect, that an award or appraisal of an engineer, architect or other person shall be final or conclusive, nor any provisions that a certificate of an engineer, architect or other person shall be a condition precedent to maintaining an action on such contract, shall oust the jurisdiction of the courts; but any controversy arising on any contract containing such provisions or any of them shall be determined in due course of law, with the same effect as if such provisions were not in such contract: Provided, that this act shall not apply to municipal or other corporations invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use." Adinolfi v. Hazlett, 242 Pa. 25 (1913).

In Miles et al. v. Schmidt, 168 Mass. 339, 340 (1897), Morton, J., said: "Perhaps, if the question were a new one, no objection would be found to permitting parties to select their own tribunals for the settlement of civil controversies, even though the result might be to oust the courts of jurisdiction in such cases. But the law is settled otherwise in this state. * * * When the question is a preliminary one, or in aid of an action at law or suit in equity, such, for instance, as the ascertainment of damages, an agreement for arbitration will be upheld."

In Meacham v. Jamestown, F. & C. R. Co., 211 N. Y. 346 (1914), it was held, that a provision in a railroad construction contract for the arbitration of all disputes to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of the courts did not prevent an action on the contract in New York, though the contract was made outside the state and was to be performed in Pennsylvania, where such provision was valid and enforceable, since judicial comity does not require the enforcement of such a provision as between nonresidents where the contract is executed and to be performed without the state where enforcement is denied when the contract is made and performed within the state. See Ann. Cas., 1915 C, 854, note.

In Jureidini v. National British and Irish Millers Ins. Co., [1915] A. C. 499, arbitration and award as to the amount of a loss in case differences arose as to the amount were made, "independently of all other questions," a condition precedent to any right of action on the policy, and yet the repudiation in toto by the company of a claim for loss by fire on the ground of fraud and arson was held to preclude the company from relying on the arbitration clause as a bar to the action to enforce the claim. Some, and seemingly most, of the judges thought the arbitration clause applied only where the dispute was confined to the quantum of damages, but Viscount Haldane, L. C., went farther, saying (p. 505):

"There has been in the proceedings throughout a repudiation on the part of the respondents of their liability based upon charges of fraud and arson, the effect of which, if they are right, is that all benefit under the policy is forfeited. But one of the benefits is the right to go to arbitration under this contract, and to establish your claim in a way which may, to some people, seem preferable to proceeding in the courts; and accordingly that is one of answer in bar overruled, and case reported. Demurrers sustained, and case to stand on answer to the merits.

Rugg, C. J.⁸³ The question is whether, in a contract between a manufacturer and its sales agent, a provision is valid to the effect that:

"No action at law, equity or chancery shall be instituted or maintained by the corporation in any court of any state of the United States or in any Circuit or District Court of the courts of the United States against the company other than in the courts of the common pleas of the state of Pennsylvania."

This stipulation occurs in an ordinary commercial contract between a corporation domiciled in this commonwealth and another corporation incorporated under the laws of Pennsylvania.

It becomes necessary to review some of the cases. Nute v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 174, was an action upon a policy of insurance, one stipulation of which, incorporated in the contract by reference to the by-laws of the company, was in substance that any "action shall be brought at a proper court in the county of Essex." It was held that this stipulation was not binding, and that an action could be brought in any county where the venue properly might be laid. The general principle on which this decision was made to rest was that it was not within the province of parties to enter into an agreement concerning the remedy for a breach of contract, which is created and regulated by law. Considerations of public policy were adverted to as supporting the conclusion, but not given decisive weight. Chief Justice Shaw, in concluding the discussion, said:

"The greatest inconvenience would be in requiring courts and juries to apply different rules of law to different cases, in the conduct of suits, in matters relating merely to the remedy, according to the stipulations of parties in framing and diversifying their contracts in regard to remedies."

In Hall v. People's Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 185, the provision of the contract of insurance was explicit to the effect that no action should be brought upon the policy except in the county of Worcester. Chief Justice Shaw, in giving the opinion of the court, after adverting to Nute v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. as substantially deciding the question, said:

"The court were of opinion that a stipulation in an original contract, that in case of breach the suit shall be brought in a particular county, or, in other words, that a suit shall not be brought in a county in which it is directed by law to be brought, is not a proper matter of contract. After a contract has been made and broken, the remedy is the things which the appellants have, according to the respondents forfeited with every other benefit under the contract."

But is not that argument more specious than sound?

⁸³ Parts of the opinion are omitted.

regulated by law, and of course must be governed by the law of the forum where the remedy is sought. * * * It is a well settled maxim that parties cannot, by their consent, give jurisdiction to courts, where the law has not given it; and it seems to follow, from the same course of reasoning, that parties cannot take away jurisdiction, where the law has given it." * * *

So far as we are aware, the current of authority (with the exceptions presently to be noted) is unbroken in support of the principle laid down in Nute v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 174, although that principle is followed by compulsion of authority and under protest by Judge Hough in United States Asphalt Refining Co. v. Trinidad Lake Petroleum Co., Ltd. (D. C.) 222 Fed. 1006. * * *

In Mittenthal v. Mascagni, 183 Mass. 19, 66 N. E. 425, 60 L. R. A. 812, 97 Am. St. Rep. 404, the parties were both nonresidents. The action was on a contract made in Florence, Italy, where the defendant, a subject of the king of Italy, had his home and where the plaintiffs, citizens of New York, elected a domicile by a provision of the contract. It related to a concert tour through the various states of this country, and was partly to be performed in Florence, and contained the provision that the courts of Florence, Italy, should have exclusive jurisdiction of any difference between the parties, except that the defendant reserved a right of action in New York for a payment of his recompense due under the contract. It was held that under the circumstances of hurried travel through many different jurisdictions, it was reasonable that the parties should fix upon the jurisdiction of the domicile of the defendant as the one where disputes should be adjusted. As both the parties were nonresidents, they had no standing in the courts of this state as matter of strict right, but only as matter of comity. National Telephone Mfg. Co. v. Du Bois, 165 Mass. 117, 42 N. E. 510, 30 L. R. A. 628, 52 Am. St. Rep. 503. It, therefore, was regarded as appropriate to yield to the terms of a contract between the parties having such obvious foundation in convenience and reason, although the court well might have declined to exercise any jurisdiction of the case on the ground that the parties were aliens. Nute v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 174, was referred to in the opinion and not treated as overruled.

In this connection Palmer v. Lavers, 218 Mass. 286, 291, 105 N. E. 1000, 1002, may be adverted to, where it was said that:

"Where one of two parties to a possible litigation, in order to obtain a release from what is equivalent to an attachment, agrees that the judgment of a court of first instance shall be final, that agreement does not come within that principle [that is, the principle of Nute v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 174], and that it is an agreement which is binding and will be enforced."

That decision has no relevancy to the question now presented. Nor is the question here raised, whether the parties may by contract provide that their respective rights growing out of the agreement shall be determined according to the law of a particular jurisdiction. See Brandeis v. Atkins, 204 Mass. 471, 476, 90 N. E. 861, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 230; Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 124, 136, 1 Sup. Ct. 102, 27 L. Ed. 104; Greer v. Poole, 5 Q. B. D. 272, 274. * * *

The Nute Case lays down the general principle. * * * That case, as has been pointed out, states a general principle which has been adopted and prevails in all federal courts by reason of the binding decisions of the United States Supreme Court, in Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 445, 22 L. Ed. 365; and Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co., 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. Ed. 148. The same rule prevails generally in all states where the question has arisen. It relates to a matter as to which uniformity of decision and harmony of law among the several jurisdictions of this country is desirable. It would be unfortunate if contracts touching a subject of general commercial interest and which may be broadly operative as to jurisdiction, should be held valid in one state and invalid in all others. All these circumstances bring us to the conclusion that the clause in the contract here in question is unenforceable and that, therefore, the action can be maintained in the courts of this commonwealth.

The plaintiff's demurrers to the defendant's answer in abatement and to the part of the answer in bar setting up the same matter must be sustained. The case is to stand for disposition upon the issues raised by the answer to the merits. So ordered.²⁴

STEEN v. MODERN WOODMEN OF AMERICA.

Action by Louisa W. Steen, as beneficiary of death benefit certificate issued to Albert F. Steen, against the Modern Woodmen of America. On May 7, 1910, Albert F. Steen disappeared from his home in Chicago unaccountably and was never heard of again. The defendant was kept fully informed and October 15, 1917, plaintiff gave defendant notice of Albert F. Steen's disappearance and absence and requested payment of benefits under the certificate and on refusal of the request, brought this action in the superior court. The defendant in a special plea relied on the following amendments to its by-laws:

"Sec. 64. Action on Certificates Must be Brought Within Eighteen Months.—No action for recovery on a death claim based upon any benefit certificate heretofore or hereafter issued by this society can or shall be maintained until after the proofs of death and claimant's rights to benefits, as provided in these by-laws, shall have been filed with the head clerk and passed upon by the board of directors, nor unless brought within eighteen months from the date of death of the member. * * *

"Sec. 66. Disappearance No Presumption of Death.—No lapse of time or absence or disappearance on the part of any member heretofore or hereafter admitted into the society, without proof of the actual death of such member while in good standing in the society, shall entitle his beneficiary to recover the amount of his benefit certificate, except as hereinafter provided. The disappearance or long-continued absence of any member unheard of shall not be regarded as evidence of death or give any right to recover on any benefit certificate heretofore or hereafter issued by the society until the full term of the member's expectancy of life according to the National Fraternal Congress Table of Mortality has expired within the life of the benefit certificate in question, and this law shall be in full force and effect, any statute of any state or country or rule of common law of any state or country to the contrary notwithstanding. The term 'within the life of the benefit certificate,' as here used, means that the benefit certificate has not lapsed or been forfeited and that all payments required by the by-laws of the society have been made."

The special plea of defendant further averred that proof of the actual death of Albert F. Steen had never been furnished to defendant, and that the expectancy of life of Albert F. Steen according to the National Fraternal Congress Table of Mortality had not expired. To this special plea plaintiff filed a general demurrer, which was overruled. She elected to stand by her demurrer, and the superior court entered judgment in favor of defendant, which judgment was on appeal affirmed by the Appellate Court for the First District. That court granted a certificate of importance, and plaintiff further appealed.

THOMPSON, J.³⁵ * * * The only question presented by this appeal is the validity of section 66 of appellee's by-laws. Appellant contends that this by-law is void because its meaning is uncertain, it is unreasonable, and it is against the public policy and established law of the state. * * *

At the time this benefit certificate was issued there was a well-established rule of evidence in this state that the unexplained absence of a person from home without having been heard from for 7 years by those who would naturally have heard from him if he had been alive, although diligent efforts were made to find him, raised a presumption of death, unless the circumstances of the case were such as to account for his not being heard of without assuming his death. Whiting v. Nicholl, 46 Ill. 230, 92 Am. Dec. 248; Donovan v. Major, 253 Ill. 179, 97 N. E. 231. This is an arbitrary presumption, rendered necessary on grounds of public policy, in order that rights depending upon life or death of persons long absent and unheard of may be settled by some certain rule. * * *

This legal presumption of death from 7 years' unexplained absence arose by analogy under two early English statutes, the one exempting from the penalty of bigamy any person whose husband or wife should be continuously beyond the seas or should absent himself or herself for the space of 7 years together, and the other providing that persons in leases for lives who shall remain beyond the seas or absent themselves from the realm for more than 7 years shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed naturally dead. That the rule in question is merely a rule of evidence is unquestioned. Stevenson v. Montgomery, 263 Ill. 93, 104 N. E. 1075, Ann. Cas. 1915 C 112. It is so treated by all the text-book writers. It was a rule born of necessity, to prevent the prosecution for bigamy of a deserted spouse, on the one hand, and to settle the property affairs of the absentee, on the other hand. It grew up in England at a time when travel was fraught with every danger known to man and when means of communication were primitive. Since this rule of law was established the social aspects of our civilization have been almost revolutionized. The improbability that accident, injury, sickness, or death could overtake a member of this society without information of the fact reaching his family and friends is very great. In case of need he scarcely could fail to find assistance among the million members of his own fraternity. Hospital, police, burial, and other records are collected and preserved in practically every state in this country and newspapers are published in every city and village, and, except for the reasons for which the law was originally established, there is now no sound reason for continuing the rule except that it has existed for so long a time that convenience makes it the best rule to follow where no other rule is established by statute or by agreement.

The contract in question here is insurance on life, and the one essential fact necessary to mature this contract is the death of the insured. The burden is on the beneficiary to prove his death. The rule of law which appellant invokes is a rule of evidence and relates to the manner and quantum of proof necessary to establish death. By the common-law rule a finding of the death of the insured will be sustained on proof of seven years' continued absence without intelligence of such absent person. Under the by-law in question such proof is not sufficient unless the absence has continued for a period equal to the member's expectancy of life. There is no vested right in a rule of evidence, and parties may by contract change an established rule of evidence and provide that a different rule shall apply in determining controversies that may arise between the parties to the contract. Roeh v. Business Men's Protective Ass'n, 164 Iowa 199, 145 N. W. 479, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 221, Ann. Cas. 1915 C 813; Lundberg v. Interstate Business Men's Accident Ass'n, 162 Wis. 474, 156 N. W. 482, Ann. Cas. 1916 D 667; Cobble v. Royal Neigh- bors (Mo. App.), 219 S. W. 118. In Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co. v. Jones, 149 Ill. 361, 37 N. E. 247, 24 L. R. A. 141, 41 Am. St. Rep. 278, we said:

"No man or corporation has a vested right in the rules of evidence. They pertain to the remedies provided by the state for its citizens, and do not constitute a part of any contract."

To the same effect is our holding in People v. Rose, 207 Ill. 352, 69 N. E. 762, and in Chicago Transfer Railroad Co. v. City of Chicago, 217 Ill. 343, 75 N. E. 499.

The average duration of human life after any given age being now ascertained and stated in well-authenticated tables, which have been recognized by the courts as safe rules in the calculation of the value of annuities and in other similar cases, no good reason is perceived why the same tables may not be accepted as furnishing ground legally to presume the death of a person after the lapse of the period of probable duration of his life, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. These tables are scientifically made from actual experience in dealing with a given number of human lives at a given age. As we have said, the presumption of death on account of 7 years' unexplained absence is an arbitrary rule, established by necessity, and has no basis in fact or in experience. The purpose of the by-law under consideration is not to do away with presumption of death on account of disappearance and continued absence, but is to substitute certainty for uncertainty, to displace guesswork by science, and to supplant groundless conjecture by actual experience. The record shows that Albert F. Steen was born in 1870 and joined the society in 1897. He was then 27 years of age, and according to the National Fraternal Congress Table of Mortality, his expectancy of life was then 40.2 years. He disappeared in 1910 and was then 40 years of age. According to the same table his expectation of life was then 29.9 years. This by-law, it will be seen, does not oust the courts of jurisdiction nor destroy the cause of action. In the instant case it merely delays the cause. Suppose, however, the member had been 74 years of age when he disappeared. Then, according to the table adopted by the by-law, his expectancy of life would have been 7 years, and under those circumstances the rule fixed by the by-law and the common-law rule of evidence would have established death at exactly the same time; but, if the member had been 79 years of age at the time of his disappearance, his natural expectancy of life would have been 5 years, or, if he had been 85 years of age at the time of his disappearance, his expectancy would have been 3 years, and, if he had been 96 years of age, his expectancy would have been one year. Under these circumstances it will be noted that the by-law provides a rule of evidence much more favorable to the beneficiary than the common-law rule. The rule of evidence established by this by-law is for the mutual benefit of all the million members of this society. The insured had the benefit of this agreement as well as all other members, and his beneficiary must share its burdens. Parties have a right to agree as to what proof of death shall be furnished before the policy is payable. Appellee, as a legal entity, has no interest in this matter apart from its membership, because it is a society organized not for profit. The unjust losses that might be paid under the common-law 7 years' absence rule would fall on the members of the society. Appellee merely distributes the funds which are collected from the members. Where the common-law rule is invoked for the purpose of settling title to property by administration or succession, there is no incentive for the absentee to purposely absent himself and conceal his whereabouts, but rather the reverse. A by-law similar to the one challenged has been sustained in Cobble v. Royal Neighbors, supra; in McGovern v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Engineers, 31 Ohio Cir. Ct. 243, affirmed by the Supreme Court without an opinion, 85 Ohio St. 460, 98 N. E. 1128; in Kelly v. Catholic Mutual Benefit Ass'n, 46 App. Div. 79, 61 N. Y. Supp. 394; and in Porter v. Home Friendly Society, 114 Ga. 937, 41 S. E. 45.⁸⁶ * * *

It is further urged that the by-law is void because it is against the public policy and established law of the state. * * *

The courts must act with care in extending those rules which say that a given contract is void because against public policy, since, if there is one thing more than any other which public policy requires, it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into fairly and voluntarily, shall be held sacred and shall be enforced by the courts.

Because a contract may waive constitutional or statutory rights or may change an established rule of law does not necessarily render it void on the ground that it is against public policy. In Peoria Marine & Fire Ins. Co. v. Whitehill, 25 Ill. 382 (original edition, p. 466), this court held that an insurance company had the right in its policies to limit the time in which an action should be brought for a loss, and that the by-law was not against public policy simply because it fixed a period less than that fixed by the statute of limitations. In Pacaud v. Waite, 218 Ill. 138, we held that parties may make valid and binding agreements to submit question in dispute to the arbitrament of persons or tribunals other than the legally organized courts, and in Deibeikis v. Link-Belt Co., 261 Ill. 454, 104 N. E. 211, Ann. Cas. 1915 A 241, this court laid down the rule that a contract waiving the constitutional right of a trial by jury was not against public policy.

Much that we have said regarding the reasonableness of this by-law applies with equal force to the objection now being considered. The purpose of this by-law is to protect the members and their beneficiaries by protecting the benefit fund against doubtful and unjust claims. The time when a disappeared member will be presumed to be dead is based upon the actual experience of human life as shown by a standard table of mortality. We do not see how it can reasonably be said that a rule of evidence based upon human experience, rather than upon necessity and convenience, is contrary to public policy.

The Supreme Courts of other states passing upon this by-law, or others identical with it, have come to a conclusion directly opposed to the one we have reached. Haines v. Modern Woodmen (Iowa), 178 N. W. 1010; Garrison v. Modern Woodmen (Neb.), 178 N. W. 842; Sweet v. Modern Woodmen, 169 Wis. 462, 172 N. W. 143; Gaffney v. Royal Neighbors, 31 Idaho 549, 174 Pac. 1014; Hannon v. United Workmen, 99 Kan. 734, 163 Pac. 169, L. R. A. 1917 C 1029. These are well-considered opinions, but we think the conclusion reached in them violates sound and well-settled principles of law, and we cannot adopt the views expressed by these able and distinguished courts.

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, the judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

*Judgment affirmed.*⁸⁷

THE KING v. PORTER.

(Court of Criminal Appeal. [1910] 1 K. B. 369.)

Appeal against conviction.

At the Worcestershire Assizes, before Jelf, J., the appellant and one Brindley were tried on an indictment for conspiracy.

The fifth count of the indictment, after alleging that proceedings on a charge of felony had been taken against one Clark before Justices, and that on May 24, 1909, Clark was committed for trial at the Worcestershire quarter sessions, and that the appellant and Brindley entered into a recognizance each in 50*l.* conditioned for the appearance of Clark at the quarter sessions, charged that between April 30 and June 28, 1909, the appellant and Brindley, whilst the charge against Brindley was pending, well knowing the premises, unlawfully did conspire together and with Clark that Clark should indemnify the appellant and Brindley against their liability on their recognizance which the appellant and Brindley had duly entered into as sureties for the attendance of Clark at the next Worcestershire quarter sessions on June 28. The count then set out the overt acts of the appellants and Brindley in pursuance of the conspiracy.

In other counts the same conspiracy was alleged with intent to obstruct and pervert the due course of law and justice at the trial of ⁸⁷ See John H. Wigmore, Contracts to Alter or Waive the Rules of Evidence, 14 Ill. L. Rev. 87. See also 8 Am. St. Rep. 921, note; Ann. Cas. 1916 B, 690, note.

Clark, and with intent that Clark might evade justice and go unpunished.

Jelf, J., told the jury, quoting Wilson v. Strugnell (1881), 7 Q. B. D. 548, that a contract to indemnify a bail against his liability was contrary to public policy and therefore illegal, and that if the parties had entered into the alleged agreement they were guilty of a criminal conspiracy, even though the jury should find that the alleged intent had not been proved. The learned judge left the following questions to the jury with regard to the appellant:—“Was Porter a party to an agreement with Clark that if Brindley and Porter would go bail for him in 50*l.* then he would give them 50*l.* each as security so that Brindley and Porter should lose nothing if he absconded? “If so, was Porter a party to such agreement with Clark with the intention that Clark should abscond?” To the first question the jury answered “yes”, and to the second “No.” Jelf, J., held that this was a verdict of guilty on the fifth count, and the appellant was bound over on his own recognizance in 20*l.* to come up for judgment if called upon.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C. J. In this case the appellant and another man named Brindley were indicted for conspiracy. The indictment contains several counts, but the only one which it is necessary to consider is the fifth, which alleges an unlawful conspiracy by the appellant, Brindley and Clark that Clark should indemnify the appellant and Brindley against their liability on their recognizance which they had entered into as sureties for the appearance of Clark at quarter sessions. This count does not contain any averment of intent, and the question which we have to decide is whether that count as it stands without any averment of intent, discloses any offence.

It has been clearly established by a series of authorities that an agreement to indemnify bail is one which cannot be enforced. Judgments to this effect were delivered by Stephen, J., in Wilson v. Strugnell, 7 Q. B. D. 548, by Lord Esher, M. R., in Herman v. Jeuchner, 15 Q. B. D. 561, and by North, J., in Consolidated Exploration and Finance Co. v. Musgrave, [1909] 1 Ch. 37, and agreeing as we do with those judgments it is impossible for us to hold that a contract such as this is one which can be enforced. But that is not enough to dispose of the question in the case, for there are many contracts which, though not enforceable, are not contracts so unlawful as to render them the subject of an indictment for conspiracy. This question was very fully discussed in Rex v. Brailsford, [1905] 2 K. B. 730, and I there pointed out that “it cannot, of course, be maintained that every fraud and cheat constitutes an offence against the criminal law, but the distinction between acts which are merely improper or immoral and those which tend to produce a public mischief has long been recognized;” and after referring to the cases which had been cited in the argument as illustrations of that distinction, I went on to say: “Without saying that there cannot be acts upon which an innocent construction might be put or that in some cases it might not be for the jury to find as a fact whether the act was innocent or not, we are clearly of opinion that no such argument can possibly be urged in this case. In criminal as well as in civil cases persons are responsible for the natural consequences of their acts. * * * We are of opinion that it is for the court to direct the jury as to whether such an act may tend to the public mischief, and that it is not in such a case an issue of fact upon which evidence can be given."

Applying that principle to the present case we have to see whether Jelf, J., was right in drawing the conclusion of law on the facts found by the jury that the agreement entered into by the appellant and Brindley with Clark was an agreement to do something which tended to produce a public mischief. The findings of the jury were that the appellant was a party to an agreement with Clark that if Brindley and the appellant would go bail for him in 50*l.*, then Clark would give them 50*l.* each as security, so that they should lose nothing if Clark absconded, but that the appellant, in becoming a party to that agreement, did not do so with the intention that Clark should abscond. It has been contended for the appellant that in order that the appellant could be convicted of an indictable offence it was necessary that the jury should have found that the agreement was entered into with intent to obstruct and pervert the course of justice, and that, although there are counts in the indictment which contain averments to that effect, as the appellant was convicted on the fifth count also, which contains no such averment, the conviction cannot stand. It is in our opinion, difficult to conceive any act more likely to tend to produce a public mischief than that which was done in this case. It is to the interest of the public that criminals should be brought to justice, and, therefore, that it should be made as difficult as possible for a criminal to abscond; and for many years it has been held that not only are bail responsible on their recognizance for the due appearance of the person charged, but that, if it comes to their knowledge that he is about to abscond, they should at once inform the police of the fact. It has been suggested to us that the more modern view of bail is that it is a mere contract of suretyship, and that an agreement to indemnify bail, therefore, does not involve any illegality. If that were so, as soon as the bail had got his indemnity, he would have no interest whatever in seeing that the accused person was forthcoming to take his trial, and it is obvious that criminals, particularly if possessed of means, would very frequently abscond from justice. We have been asked to follow the opinion expressed by Martin, B., in Reg. v. Broome, 18 L. T. (O. S.) 19, that there is no objection to the indemnification of bail, which opinion was acted on by the Recorder of London in Rex v. Stockwell, 66 J. P. 376. It is sufficient to say that we do not agree with the opinion of Martin, B.

In these circumstances we are of opinion that Jelf, J., rightly held that the agreement entered into by the appellant was an illegal contract, not only in the sense of being unenforceable, but also as being one which clearly tended to produce a public mischief, and that it amounted to a criminal conspiracy, without any necessity for a finding by the jury that there was an intent to pervert or obstruct the course of justice. The conviction was, therefore, a good conviction on the fifth count of the indictment, and the appeal consequently fails.

*Appeal dismissed.*²⁸

²⁸ But in New York, where cash bonds are permitted, a contract by one surety to give security and indemnity to another if the latter would also go bail for an accused was held legal in Moloney v. Nelson, 133 N. Y. 351, 355 (1899). Parker, C. J., said: "It is true that in some other jurisdictions, as is pointed out in the very careful opinion of the Appellate Division, it has been suggested, if not decided, that it is against public policy to allow bail to become indemnified, the reason given being that the object for which the bail is required is to assure the appearance of the prisoner to answer the charge against him, and that necessarily the bail had a direct pecuniary interest in preventing the escape of the prisoner, which he would not have were he fully indemnified. That is not the public policy of this state; for the giving of bail in criminal cases is regulated by statute, and the legislature has, by its provisions, provided that a personally responsible surety may be altogether omitted if the accused prefers to make a deposit of money; he may have his choice either to give a bond with sureties, or make a deposit of money. It is the loss of the money deposited, or the assurance that the sureties will be obliged to pay the amount of the bail, that is relied upon to secure the presence of the accused. It, therefore, cannot be said to be a part of the public policy of this state to insist upon personal liability of sureties, for there need not be such personal liability in any case if the accused makes a deposit of money in lieu of bail, as provided by statute." Accord, see Easig v. Turner, 60 Wash. 175 (1910).

And in Carr v. Davis, 64 W. Va. 522 (1908), it was held that a contract by an accused to indemnify one who signed his recognizance was legal, Brannon, J., for the majority of the court saying (p. 526): "The law allows bail. We may say that the law favors bail as a relief from prison in cases where bail is grantable and it would tend to defeat this merciful provision of law, if we should adopt the harsh rule that a man perhaps innocent, cannot use his property to indemnify his friend to relieve him from prison bars." In West Virginia there seems not to have been a statute such as existed in New York and Washington.

In either situation, if the contract is made with intent to have the accused flee from justice the contract is illegal. Dunkin v. Hodge, 46 Ala. 525 (1871). Compare Baehr v. Wolf, 59 Ill. 470 (1871). But except where there is such illegal intent, the American cases in general are in accord with the New York and the West Virginia cases, supra.

In Leary v. U. S., 224 U. S. 567 (1912), the contract alleged was that Leary, the intestate of the plaintiff in intervention, became surety on one Greene's bail bond to the United States upon the understanding and conditions that certain securities held in trust or on deposit by one Kellogg for Greene should remain in Kellogg's hands as security and indemnity to Leary for signing the bond. Greene failed to appear and the United States obtained a judgment against the plaintiff as Leary's administrator. And the question was whether the administrator of Leary or the United States, which claimed the trust funds as obtained through fraud against the United States, had a better right to the funds. On the question whether the contract between Greene and Leary was against public policy, Holmes, J., for the court, said (pp. 575-576), that

MILLS v. BENNETT.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee, 1895. 94 Tenn. 651, 30 S. W. 748,
45 Am. St. Rep. 763.)

Action by W. H. Mills against H. H. Bennett. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

McALISTER, J.³⁹ The only question presented for determination in this cause is whether a debtor may waive his exemptions for the benefit of his creditor. The stipulation for a waiver of exemptions was incorporated in the following note, viz.: "Memphis, Tenn., Aug. 23, 1894. Thirty days after date, I promise to pay to the order of G. M. Anderson five dollars. I do hereby agree to waive my rights to exemption under the laws of the state of Tennessee until the bill is paid in full. Value rec'd. H. H. Bennett. Due. Witness: J. M. Simms. Wm. H. Mills." Indorsed: "I do hereby transfer the within note to W. H. Mills. G. M. Anderson." The defendant, Bennett, is a daily laborer, in the employment of Stewart Gwynne & Co., a mercantile firm in the city of Memphis. The creditor is seeking by these proceedings to subject to the payment of his judgment wages due Bennett, which are exempt by law from execution, seizure, or attachment. Code, § 2931. It appears from the record that Bennett is the head of a family, with a wife and three children. This consideration, however, is immaterial, since it is not necessary in order to entitle the defendant to this particular exemption that he should have been the head of a family. Of course, this fact only emphasizes the necessity for such exemption, but it is not material as a matter of law. There are other exemptions which are dependent

"the ground for declaring the contract invalid rests rather on tradition than on substantial realities of the present day. It is said, that the bail contemplated by the Revised Statutes (§ 1014), is common-law bail and that nothing should be done to diminish the interest of the bail in producing the body of his principal. But bail no longer is the mundium, although a trace of the old relation remains in the right to arrest. Rev. Stat., § 1018. The distinction between bail and suretyship is pretty nearly forgotten. The interest to produce the body of the principal in court is impersonal and wholly pecuniary. If, as in this case, the bond was for $40,000, that sum was the measure of the interest on anybody's part and it did not matter to the government what person ultimately felt the loss so long as it had the obligation it was content to take. The law of New York recognizes the validity of contracts like the one alleged, and without considering whether the law of New York controls we are content to say merely that the New York decisions strike us as founded in good sense. Maloney v. Nelson, 144 N. Y. 182, 189; s. c., 158 N. Y. 351, 355."

In New York it seems that a so-called "implied agreement" to indemnify sureties on a bail bond will be enforced now that an express agreement to indemnify in such a case is valid. Badalato v. Molinari, 174 N. Y. Supp. 512 (1919).

On the validity of agreement to indemnify bail in a criminal case, see 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 58, note.

³⁹ Parts of the opinion are omitted.

upon this condition, and the validity of contracts entered into by the head of the family is considered from this point of view. It will be observed that the defendant in this case, upon the face of the note, waives all his exemptions,—those secured to him as the head of a family, and those to which he is entitled independent of the family. Is such a contract valid and enforceable?

It was held in the case of Denny v. White, 2 Cold. 283, that "the property exempt from execution in the possession of the head of a family is held by him for the use and benefit of the family; and, while he has the right to sell or exchange such property, it cannot be levied on and sold on execution by his consent, this being a privilege he cannot waive." Said the court, viz.: "The language of the act is imperative. The property exempt shall not be liable to seizure and sale by execution, and the head of the family cannot waive the right, as those dependent on him are under the protection of the law and secured in the enjoyment of the property." * * * Says the Supreme Court of Illinois, viz.: "That such a waiver, where the same is attempted to be made by an executory contract, is ineffectual, and will not be enforced, is definitely settled. * * * Such contracts contravene the policy of the law, and hence are inoperative and void. The owner may, if he choose, sell or otherwise dispose of any property he may have, however much his family may need it; but the law will not aid in that regard, nor permit him to contract in advance, that his creditor may use the process of the courts to deprive his family of its use and benefit when an exemption has been created in their favor. Laws enacted from considerations of public concern, and to subserve the general welfare, cannot be abrogated by mere private agreement." Recht v. Kelly, 82 Ill. 147. Says Judge Denio: "The maxim 'Modus et conventio vincunt legem' is not of universal application. It applies only to agreements in themselves legal. Where no rule of law or principle of public policy is concerned, the parties may by contract make a law for themselves. One object of municipal law is to promote the general welfare of society. The exemption laws seek to accomplish this by taking from the head of the family the power to deprive it of certain property by contracting debts which shall enable the creditors to take such property on execution. The parties to this contract sought to set aside these laws so far as this debt was concerned. This they could not do." The learned judge says: "I am of opinion that a person contracting a debt cannot agree with the creditor that, in case of nonpayment, he shall be entitled to levy his execution upon property exempt from execution by the general laws of the state. * * * If effect shall be given to such provisions, it is likely that they will be generally inserted in obligations for small demands, and in that way the policy of the law will be completely overthrown. Every honest man who contracts a debt expects to pay it, and believes he will be able to do so without having his property sold on execution. No one worthy to be trusted would therefore be apt to object to a clause subjecting all his property to levy on execution in case of nonpayment. It was against the consequences of this overconfidence and the readiness of men to make contracts which may deprive them and their families of articles indispensable to their comfort that the legislature has undertaken to interpose. Where a man's last cow is taken on an execution on a judgment rendered upon one of these notes, it is not sufficient to say that it was done pursuant to his consent, freely given when he contracted the debt. The law was designed to protect him against his own improvidence in giving such consent. The statutes contain many examples of legislation based upon the same motives. The laws against usury, those which forbid imprisonment for debt, and those which allow a redemption after the sale of land on execution are of this class." Kneettle v. Newcomb, 22 N. Y. 249.

The Supreme Court of Iowa, after a full consideration of the subject, said, viz.: "Without pursuing the discussion of the subject further, we are agreed in the conclusion that a person contracting a debt cannot, by a contemporaneous and simple waiver of the benefit of the exemption laws, entitle the creditor, in case of failure to pay, to levy his execution, against the defendant's objection, upon exempt property. Such an agreement is contrary to public policy, and will not be enforced." Curtis v. O'Brien, 20 Iowa, 376. * * *

The result of our examination is that the main current of judicial enunciation is against the validity of such contracts. Possibly the only court out of line is that of Pennsylvania. Such contracts are also sustained in Alabama, but under the authority of an express statute. Brown v. Leitch, 60 Ala. 313. We think the weight of reason as well as authority is opposed to such stipulations. In our view, it is immaterial whether the contract is made by a single man or the head of a family. In either case it contravenes a sound public policy, and, if enforced, abrogates the exemption statutes. The judgment is affirmed.⁴⁰

⁴⁰ The opinions of courts are more nearly unanimous on the question of contracts waiving in advance exemptions from execution than they are on that of contracts never to plead the statute of limitations. The conflict as to the statute of limitations question seems to be due mainly to the fact that judicial attitude towards statutes of limitation has sometimes been hostile and sometimes friendly. That a contract never to plead the statute of limitations is illegal as violating the legislative intent in supplying a statute of repose, see Crane v. French, 38 Miss. 503 (1860). Contra, see State Trust Co. v. Sheldon, 68 Vt. 259 (1895). See 95 Am. St. Rep. 411, note.

From a judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff brings exceptions. Affirmed.

MUNSON, J. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved that a verdict be directed in his favor, on the ground that the contract claimed by the plaintiff was void, as against public policy. The court held the contract void for the reason assigned, and directed a verdict accordingly. The case is here upon the plaintiff's exception to this holding.

The plaintiff called the defendant as witness. The evidence consisted of certain correspondence had by the parties; and the testimony of the parties to the circumstances in which the letters were written, the meaning that was attached to the language used, the matters inclosed for publication by one party and the services rendered by the other, subsequent transactions bearing upon their understanding of the relations they had sustained. The defendant claimed that no contract with the plaintiff was in fact consummated, and that the only contract ever contemplated was one for the publication of extracts from other papers at a legitimate charge for the space actually taken. The plaintiff did not claim to recover on this ground, but claimed to recover a reasonable compensation for the support and influence of his paper and his services as its editor. The plaintiff was a Democrat, publishing a Democratic paper of independent proclivities. The defendant was a Republican, seeking a nomination to Congress from a Republican convention. It appeared from the plaintiff's testimony that he considered defendant's proposal an application for the use and influence of his paper in the nature of a retainer; that he accepted it with the understanding that his paper and his services as editor would be at the command of the defendant during the campaign, to be settled for at its close; that he was to do all he could to influence the choice of delegates and secure the defendant's nomination; that original matter was within the scope of his contract, and that his editorials were written in that view; that he supported defendant because of this contract and the money he was to get out of it; that he expected to receive a larger compensation if defendant was nominated than he otherwise would; that he tried to conceal his relations with the defendant from the public, and understood that the defendant was trying to do the same; that he took this course because it would make his efforts in influencing voters in defendant's behalf more successful.

The case of Nichols v. Mudgett, 32 Vt. 546, decided by this court in 1860, is one of the few cases bearing upon this subject. The plaintiff in that case was a candidate for the office of town representative, and a creditor of the defendant. The defendant's party affiliations were such as would naturally lead him to vote for the opposing candidate. Conversations were had which resulted in a mutual understanding that the defendant should use his influence in favor of the plaintiff's election, and that, if the plaintiff was successful, the defendant's indebtedness should be treated as paid. Induced by this agreement, the defendant supported the plaintiff's candidacy until his election was declared. There was no agreement that defendant should vote for the plaintiff unless it was implied in the above understanding. He voted for the plaintiff, however, and did so because of the understanding. The suit was for the recovery of the indebtedness referred to, and the defendant claimed that it had been satisfied. The court considered that there was a sale of the defendant's influence and vote, held the agreement void, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The agreement in that case involved both the defendant's vote and his influence upon the votes of others, but the court's discussion of the subject does not leave much doubt as to what its conclusion would have been if the undertaking had been confined to the latter service. Certainly no distinction could properly be made between the two. But that contract had reference to the votes to be cast at an election, and the plaintiff contends that, inasmuch as caucuses and conventions are not creations of the law, contracts for services in influencing the choice of delegates and the action of a convention cannot be considered against public policy. In Liness v. Hessing, 44 Ill. 113, 92 Am. Dec. 153, the contract was for services of this character. It was suggested that there may have been a law in that state regulating primaries, but there is no intimation of one in the opinion, and we have found none in the examination we have been able to make. There the plaintiff sent the defendant $20, with a request that he use his influence to get plaintiff nominated for a certain office, and a direction to call upon him for $20 more if he got the nomination. The defendant kept the $20, and aided the plaintiff's opponent. The suit was to recover this money, but the defendant had judgment. The decision was announced by Justice Lawrence, who characterized the transaction as "an attempt to influence, by moneyed considerations, the action of the defendant in a matter where every person should be governed solely by a regard for the public welfare."

In Strasburger v. Burk, 13 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 607, decided by the city court of Baltimore, the defendant was the keeper of a lager beer saloon, and agreed to give his political influence and furnish beer and cigars to secure a caucus nomination for the plaintiff's father. The gratuitous furnishing of food or liquor to secure votes at an election was prohibited by the Code, but the only statutory recognition of primary elections was a provision for the preservation of order. The court considered that in applying the principles of public policy no distinction could be made between voluntary meetings of this character and elections ordained by law. Mr. McCrary adopts the conclusions of this opinion in his work on Elections, and applies the doctrine to the sale of influence, as well as the sale of votes. Mr. Redfield, in commenting upon the same opinion in 13 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) at page 610, says that the invalidity of contracts designed to control the freedom of elections results from the principles of common law, and that those relating to caucuses cannot be made an exception on the ground that such meetings are not recognized by the statute. We cannot doubt the correctness of this conclusion. The rule would largely fail of its purpose if not so applied.

When the voters are unevenly divided into two parties, the nomination of the stronger organization is usually equivalent to an election. And when party action is less decisive the subsequent efforts of the voters are ordinarily confined to a selection from the candidates regularly presented. The individual voter of a large electorate can seldom give an effective expression to a choice that is not in line with the action of some party convention. To secure a free and exact expression of the sovereign will, there must be a proper selection of candidates, as well as an honest election. If the choice of delegates and the action of the nominating convention are improperly determined, the election ballots will fail to express the real judgment of the voters.

It is not claimed in argument, and no ground occurs to us upon which it could be claimed, that this contract was any the less obnoxious to the law because the purchased influence was to be exerted through the columns of the plaintiff's paper. A newspaper is understood to present the views of some one connected with its management or views deemed consistent with some settled policy, and has a patronage and influence which are due to that understanding. As long as the editorial column is relied upon as a public teacher and adviser, there can be no more dangerous deception than that resulting from the secret purchase of its favor. We hold that the contract testified to and relied upon by the plaintiff is contrary to public policy, and therefore void.

Judgment affirmed.

Note. Since the delivery of the above opinion, we have seen Fitch v. De Young, 66 Cal. 339, 5 Pac. 364, where it was held, upon views similar to those expressed in concluding the opinion, that an article charging a publisher with selling the support and advocacy of his paper for money is libelous.⁴¹

⁴¹ On what contracts with newspapers are against public policy and therefore void, see 93 Am. St. Rep. 905, note.

In Stirtan v. Blethen, 79 Wash. 10 (1914), a contract employing an agent to start and carry through a movement for an election to recall certain officers, with expenses to be paid and without disclosing the real parties and actual motives responsible for the movement, was held illegal and void.

So contracts to pay for securing the promisor an appointment to public office are illegal. Meguire v. Corwine, 101 U. S. 108 (1879). See 7 Ann. Cas. 874, note. HENRY HOLCOMB v. THOMAS H. WEAVER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1884. 136 Mass. 265.)

HOLMES, J. The plaintiff in New Bedford was written to from New York on behalf of the Pasque Island Club, and requested to find a ment or recall, and the compensation, of public officials is that of lobbying contracts. In Trist v. Child, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 441 (1874), a contingent fee contract whereby Child was to get 25 per cent of what he could get Congress to allow on a claim of Trist against the United States and to receive nothing if Congress allowed nothing, was sought to be enforced. Swayne, J., for the court, said:

"Was the contract a valid one? It was, on the part of Child, to procure by lobby service, if possible, the passage of a bill providing for the payment of the claim. The aid asked by the younger Child of Trist, which indicated what he considered needful, and doubtless proposed to do and did do himself, is thus vividly pictured in his letter to Trist of the 20th February, 1871. After giving the names of several members of Congress, from whom he had received favorable assurances, he proceeds: 'Please write to your friends to write to any member of Congress. Every vote tells, and a simple request may secure a vote, he not caring anything about it. Set every man you know at work. Even if he knows a page, for a page often gets a vote.' * * *

"Before considering the contract here in question, it may be well, by way of illustration, to advert to some of the cases presenting the subject in other phases, in which the principle has been adversely applied.

"Within the condemned category are:—

"An agreement to pay for supporting for election a candidate for sheriff; to pay for resigning a public position to make room for another; to pay for not bidding at a sheriff's sale of real property; to pay for not bidding for articles to be sold by the government at auction; to pay for not bidding for a contract to carry the mail on a specified route; to pay a person for his aid and influence in procuring an office, and for not being a candidate himself; to pay for procuring a contract from the government; to pay for procuring signatures to a petition to the governor for a pardon; to sell land to a particular person when the surrogate's order to sell should have been obtained; to pay for suppressing evidence and compounding a felony; to convey and assign a part of what should come from an ancestor by descent, devise, or distribution; to pay for promoting a marriage; to influence the disposition of property by will in a particular way.

"The question now before us has been decided in four American cases. They were all ably considered, and in all of them the contract was held to be against public policy, and void. We entertain no doubt that in such cases, as under all other circumstances, an agreement express or implied for purely professional services is valid. Within this category are included, drafting the petition to set forth the claim, attending to the taking of testimony, collecting facts, preparing arguments, and submitting them, orally or in writing, to a committee or other proper authority, and other services of like character. All these things are intended to reach only the reason of those sought to be influenced. They rest on the same principle of ethics as professional services rendered in a court of justice, and are no more exceptional. But such services are separated by a broad line of demarcation from personal solicitation, and the other means and appliances which the correspondence shows were resorted to in this case. * * *

"The agreement in the present case was for the sale of the influence and builder who could erect a building for them cheaper than the New York builders. The letter continued, "but we only want parties that you can indorse in every way responsible and reliable." The plaintiff in reply introduced the defendant, who made his estimates, was employed, erected the building, and was paid. At an early stage of the proceedings, the plaintiff asked and obtained a promise from the defendant to pay him $250, "as a commission or compensation for his trouble in the matter," which is the promise sued upon. The plaintiff testified that this promise was made without the knowledge of the club, but that he expected no pay from them for procuring the defendant to erect the building. The court ruled that the plaintiff could not recover; and the plaintiff excepted.

The ruling was clearly right. The plaintiff was not asked merely to introduce a possible contractor, who was to be dealt with by the club on the same footing as any one else, and to stand at no advantage in bargaining with them by reason of the introduction, as in Rupp v. Sampson, 16 Gray, 398. He was asked to recommend some one as in every way responsible. His recommendation obviously was expected to have weight with the club, and did have it. If his agreement with the defendant was made before his recommendation, it had a necessary tendency to give a bias to what they knew the club relied on as disinterested. A recommendation under these circumstances would have been a fraud, even if gratuitous, and it is therefore immaterial whether the club was to pay for it or not, although it is hard to see why the plaintiff could not have recovered for his trouble if he had dealt fairly. If, then, the agreement was made at the time supposed, it was open to all the objections so fully stated in Fuller v. Dame, 18 Pick. 472, and was void exertions of the lobby agent to bring about the passage of a law for the payment of a private claim, without reference to its merits, by means which, if not corrupt, were illegitimate, and considered in connection with the pecuniary interest of the agent at stake, contrary to the plainest principles of public policy. No one has a right, in such circumstances, to put himself in a position of temptation to do what is regarded as so pernicious in its character. The law forbids the inchoate step, and puts the seal of its reprobation upon the undertaking. * * *

"We are aware of no case in English or American jurisprudence like the one here under consideration, where the agreement has not been adjudged to be illegal and void." See Herrick v. Barzee (Ore.), 190 Pac. 141 (1920); Adams v. East Boston Co. (Mass.), 127 N. E. 628 (1920). See also on lobbying contracts, 30 L. R. A. 737, note; 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, note; 121 Am. St. Rep. 726, note. Compare Wright v. Fissell (N. J. Eq.), 113 Atl. 699 (1921).

In Spaulding v. Maillet (Mont.), 188 Pac. 377 (1920), a contract between a lawyer and a person convicted of crime that the lawyer would use personal solicitation and influence to procure a recommendation from the judge or the district attorney that a petition for pardon should be favorably received was held void because of its bad tendency even though unlawful means were neither resorted to nor contemplated. On validity of contract to procure pardon, parol or commutation of sentence, see L. R. A., 1916 D, 580, note.

by that and other Massachusetts decisions. Rice v. Wood, 113 Mass. 133. See also Atlee v. Fink, 75 Mo. 100; Harrington v. Victoria Graving Dock Co., 3 Q. B. D. 549; Panama & South Pacific Telegraph v. India Rubber, Gutta Percha, & Telegraph Works, L. R. 10 Ch. 515.

The agreement was open to the same objections on another ground, whether made before or after the plaintiff had written his recommendation. It was made at all events before the defendant had completed his bargain with the club. The parties knew that the club were seeking to get the work done as cheaply as they could get a trustworthy man to do it. If the defendant had to pay the plaintiff, he would naturally charge it to the club in his estimate, or in some way make the club pay him back. The tendency of the contract was to induce the defendant to charge, and to make the club pay, more than was necessary or fair, when the plaintiff had led them to expect that they would be dealt with honestly and economically, and certainly with no adverse interest emanating from the plaintiff.

We may add, that, if the date of the promise in suit were material and left in doubt, we would assume the fact to be that which was most favorable to the ruling; and also that, if the promise was made after the plaintiff had written to New York recommending the defendant, the plaintiff would have a good deal of difficulty in showing a consideration which was not executed before the promise was made. For the trouble for which the plaintiff was to have a commission obviously meant his recommendation of the defendant. He does not appear to have taken any other.

VAN SLYKE v. ANDREWS ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1920. 178 N. W. 959.)

Action by V. H. Van Slyke against James C. Andrews and others. Motion by defendants James C. Andrews and others for judgment on the pleadings granted, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

⁴² On the validity of a contract to influence by apparently disinterested advice the conduct of a third person to whom the promisor owes no contractual duty, see L. R. A., 1917 F, 468, note.

Where there is a contractual duty, even that of an independent contractor as distinguished from an agent or servant, a contract inconsistent with the due performance of that duty may be illegal. In Woodstock Iron Co. v. Richmond & Danville Extension Co., 129 U. S. 643, the Extension Company had made a contract with the Georgia Pacific Railway Company to construct a road for the latter between certain points at $20,000 per mile "by the nearest, cheapest and most suitable route." It then contracted with the Iron Company to locate the railroad by way of a town which caused the road to depart from the nearest and most natural route by five miles and, therefore, at an addi-

TAYLOR, C.⁴³ * * * The complaint sets forth that plaintiff made an agreement with the defendants to resign the office of president of the bank on November 1, 1917, and to sell his bank stock to the defendants, or any of them, for $130 per share, and that in consideration thereof the defendants agreed to buy one-half of his bank stock at $130 per share, to elect him chairman of the board of directors of the bank and maintain him in that office for a period of fourteen months from November 1, 1917, to cause the sum of $14,000 to be paid to him, or to his widow in case of his death, by and through the bank in monthly instalments of $1,000 each, and to secure the continuance and ratification of the agreement by the incoming board of directors to be elected at the annual stockholders' meeting in January, 1918. * * *

We sustain respondent's contention that the contract set forth in the complaint is void as against public policy, and that no right of action can be founded thereon. The directors of a bank occupy a fiduciary relation to the bank and its stockholders which disables them from binding themselves by contract to take action in their official capacity for the personal benefit of any one. And if they undertake to bind themselves by contract to elect a designated person as an officer of the bank for a specified time at a specified salary, such contract is illegal and void as it might result in detriment to the interests of the bank. Dickson v. Kittson, 75 Minn. 168, 77 N. W. 820, 74 Am. St. Rep. 447; West v. Camden, 135 U. S. 507, 10 Sup. Ct. 838, 34 L. Ed. 254; Gage v. Fisher, 5 N. D. 297, 65 N. W. 809, 31 L. R. A. 557; *Noel v. Furthermore the national banking law expressly provides that any officer of a national bank may be removed at any time by the board of directors, and any contract which would restrict the right to exercise this statutory power is necessarily void. * * *

⁴⁴ In Spinks v. Davis, 32 Miss. 152 (1856), Handy, J., said: "The declaration in this case states, in substance, that the plaintiff contracted with and retained the defendant as an attorney-at-law, to collect certain claims to a large amount, due him from the estate of one John Carson, deceased, who resided in Alabama, and died insolvent, but was entitled to a distributive share of the estate of his father, William Carson, who had previously died in Tallahatchie county, in this state. * * *

"This agreement as stated is, in substance, that the defendant who was thus retained as the attorney of the plaintiff, to collect his debt, for compensation, should also become administrator of the debtor's estate, and thereby accom-

HOPKINS v. ENSIGN ET AL.

(Court of Appeals of New York, Second Division, 1890. 122 N. Y. 144,

This action was to foreclose a mortgage upon real estate in the city of Buffalo, and made by the defendant Mary A. Ensign to Truman C.

plish the object of his original engagement and collect the debt. The question is, do not these respective duties involve incompatible obligations, or, does not the faithful performance of one of them tend necessarily to the violation of the other?

"It was the duty of the attorney diligently to prosecute the claim according to law, and to collect it if it could be done by legal means. It was the duty of the administrator to scrutinize the claim rigidly, and to refuse payment if there was any doubt about its justness in fact, or its validity according to strict legal rules; to defend, upon the ground of the statute of limitations, the illegality or want of consideration of the claim, or any other bar which was a sufficient defence to it in law. And all such defences it was the plain duty of the attorney to resist. In short, the attorney was bound to protect the interest of his client, and the administrator was primarily bound to protect the legal interests of the estate. Under such circumstances, the attorney could not have performed his duty to prosecute the claim, if its validity had been doubtful, consistently with his duty to defend the estate against its collection. Hence, a strong temptation would necessarily arise to violate his duty in the latter capacity, and to pay the claim; because the attorney would thereby make a profit by his retainer in addition to the commission which he would at all events receive as administrator; and instead of acting as a faithful and impartial administrator, he stands under a strong temptation to abuse his trust to his own private gain. If the claim should be of such doubtful validity as to make it the duty of the administrator to resist its payment and to render a suit necessary, what is his attitude? He must either become the plaintiff's attorney in the suit against himself as administrator, or he must procure some one else to bring the suit against him. In this, there would be an almost irresistible inducement to malpractice and collusion; for, considering the infirmities of human nature, it is scarcely to be supposed, that he would make a very vigorous defense to a suit in which he was directly interested that the plaintiff should recover.

"But in this case, the main object of the arrangement was the collection of the plaintiff's claim, and to that the defendant was primarily bound by his agreement. The administration was to be undertaken merely as a means to that end. How, then, could the attorney properly perform his contract to collect the plaintiff's claim, when it might become his duty as administrator to resist it? Either by the force of his contract, and in furtherance of the object of the undertaking, or by the temptation to do wrong which his situation would render almost irresistible, he must act as administrator, so as to facilitate the end for which the whole arrangement was entered into, and thereby violate his duty in that capacity.

"The obligations are, therefore, manifestly inconsistent, and are calculated to induce a violation of one of two high public duties; and the agreement must therefore be condemned as illegal and against public policy, so far as it charged the attorney, upon his individual undertaking, to collect the claim by means of the administration.

"It is no answer to this view of the case to say, that the defendant might properly have performed his duty generally, as administrator, as well to others

White to secure the payment of $2,500 and interest, and by said White assigned to the plaintiff.

The mortgage was given to secure the plaintiff's assignor the amount of his claim against the defendant's husband for services rendered. The husband had died insolvent and the plaintiff's assignor, White, was intending to bid for the mortgaged property at the foreclosure sale when the defendant, who had arranged to buy the property at the sale, agreed that if White would refrain from bidding and if she should obtain the premises for the amount needed to satisfy the mortgage foreclosed, she would execute and deliver the bond and mortgage set forth in the complaint, which she did. Foreclosure and sale were decreed on the bond interested as to the plaintiff, and yet have properly paid the claim of the plaintiff; and that it is to be presumed that the arrangement was intended to be carried out by legal means, and not by those which were illegal. It is a sufficient objection to a contract, on the ground of public policy, that it has a direct tendency to induce fraud and malpractice upon the rights of others, or the violation or neglect of high public duties. Upon this principle, contracts to procure the making of a will in favor of a particular party, or to bring about a marriage between certain parties, and the like, are held to be illegal as being against public policy. For although the act contracted to be done may be just and beneficial as between the parties immediately concerned in it, and though it be accomplished in good faith and without undue means, yet the contract to procure it to be done is held to be against public policy, because its natural effect is to cause the party to abuse the confidence placed in him by those upon whom the influence is to be exerted, and thereby prejudicially to affect the rights of others. Fuller v. Dame, 18 Pick. 472; Collins v. Blanton, 2 Wils. 347, 1 Story, Eq. Jur., §§ 265, 266; Chit. Cont. 525, 526; 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 150-169, and cases there cited.

"It is urged, in support of this action, that by our laws a creditor has the right to take out letters of administration upon his debtor's estate, if parties having the prior right fail to do so; and that there can be no impropriety in the attorney's doing that which his client, who had the same temptation to do wrong as the attorney, is allowed to do.

"But the question is, not whether the attorney had the right to administer, but whether a contract by which he was either bound, or under a strong and direct temptation, to use his trust for the purpose of paying the claim of the plaintiff, is proper and legal. The creditor-administrator is under no contract to induce him to abuse his trust; and being known as a creditor, his acts will, in all probability, be closely examined by those interested in the estate. But the attorney appears as a disinterested person, in whom the parties may confide for the faithful performance of all his duties, and especially for the protection of the rights and interests of the estate. He is supposed not to be acting in his own right, but for the benefit of others, and impartially; and from the confidence that may well be presumed to be reposed in him, he will have much greater power to make underhand arrangements than would the creditor himself, who was known to be acting mainly for his personal interest. The policy of the statute allowing a creditor to administer upon his debtor's estate, proceeds on the ground of enabling the creditor to collect his debt, and that from necessity, because no one else will administer. But it is not to be extended to justify agreements made by third persons who may become administrators, the performance of which will have a direct tendency to cause malpractice and fraud in the administration."

and mortgage thus given by defendant. The General Term affirmed that decree and defendant appealed.

BROWN, J.⁴⁵ The defense to this action was placed upon two grounds: First, that the bond and mortgage in suit were obtained by duress; second, that they were not supported by a valid and legal consideration. The referee found that Mrs. Ensign executed the bond and mortgage "intelligently, and without duress, with full knowledge of all her rights," and as there was ample evidence to support that conclusion the exception to that finding need not be further referred to. The lack of a valid consideration to support the contract is said to result from the agreement on the part of the mortgagee not to bid at the foreclosure sale under the Potter mortgage, and it is contended that that agreement was one to prevent or suppress competition at a public sale, and was therefore void as against public policy. There is authority for this contention in many of the older cases. Jones v. Caswell, 3 Johns. Cas. 29; Doolin v. Ward, 6 Johns. 194; Wilbur v. How, 8 Johns. 444; Thompson v. Davies, 13 Johns. 112. See, also, 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 293. But the rule applied in these cases has been very materially modified by the later decisions of the courts, and it is now settled that agreements between two or more persons, that all but one shall refrain from bidding and permitting that one to become the purchaser, are not necessarily, and under all circumstances, void. They may be entered into for a lawful purpose, and from honest motives, and in such cases will be upheld; and they will not vitiate the purchase, or necessarily destroy the completed contracts to which they refer, and in respect to which they are made. People v. Stephens, 71 N. Y. 526-546; Marsh v. Russell, 66 N. Y. 288; Marie v. Garrison, 83 N. Y. 14-28; Myers v. Dorman, 34 Hun, 115; Kearney v. Taylor, 15 How. 494; Wicker v. Hoppock, 6 Wall. 94; Phippen v. Stickney, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 384; Maffet v. Ijams, 103 Pa. St. 266; Garrett v. Moss, 20 Ill. 549; Bank v. Sprague, 20 N. J. Eq. 159; In re Carew's Estate, 26 Beav. 187. * * *

The courts will now look to the intention of the parties, and if that be fair and honest, and the primary purpose be not to suppress competition, but to protect their own rights, and there be no fraudulent purpose to injure or defraud others interested in the result of the sale, the agreement may be upheld. The question is one of fact, to be determined by the trial court upon the evidence before it. We have then in this case to inquire as to the character of the agreement which the appellant assails. Mr. White, the mortgagee, had rendered a large amount of professional services to the surviving partner of the firm of Holt & Ensign, for which he had received no compensation, and for which compensation could not be compelled on account of Holt's insolvency. He might have secured the amount by bidding at the sale, and expected to reimburse himself in that way. He refrained from so doing on account of Mrs. Ensign's promise to pay the debt. It was her desire to obtain title to the property for the amount due on the Potter mortgage; and the only creditor of her husband's estate who appears to have been pecuniarily interested in that estate was willing she should do so. If all parties interested in the land had agreed that Mrs. Ensign might purchase the property freed from their claims upon paying to White the amount of his debt, no one could question the legality of such an agreement. Public policy would not forbid it, and no one being injured there would be no one who could complain. Substantially that is what was done. * * * We are of the opinion that this agreement was not illegal, although it had the effect incidentally to prevent competition between White and Mrs. Ensign. The referee has not found that the intention of the parties was to suppress competition, and the evidence shows that such was not their purpose. * * *

There is no analogy between such an agreement as we are considering and one made to suppress bidding when a contract for the performance of a public work is to be awarded to the lowest bidder, or one where the intention is to have property sell for less than its real value, and thus deprive those interested therein of their just rights. The first class are justly declared void on grounds of public policy, and the second because of their corrupt purpose, and the fraudulent intent of the parties to them. Here there was no corrupt intent, and no illegality in White's attempting to obtain payment or security for that which was equitably due to him, and there was no valid ground for the claim that his purpose was injurious to those interested in the sale. The purpose of the agreement being lawful, and the motive of the parties honest, in the absence of a finding of unlawful intent, the case falls within the principle of the authorities cited.

We are also of the opinion that White's relinquishment of his right to bid at the sale was a sufficient consideration to support the mortgage.

J. N. TILLOCK v. JOHN WEBB.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1868. 56 Me. 100.)

Assumpsit for a note of $48, given by the defendant to the plaintiff, dated April 13, 1867. Plea, general issue, with brief statement denying any consideration, and also alleging that the consideration was an unlawful one.

⁴⁶ But in England the rule is otherwise. In Rawlings v. General Trading Co., [1921] 1 K. B. 635, the Court of Appeal, reversing a decision reported in [1920] 3 K. B. 30, held that an agreement made by two persons at an auction sale of government stores that in order to keep down prices only one of them

The case was tried by the judge (without the intervention of a jury), whose decision was subject to exceptions in matters of law.

The judge found, as matter of fact, that the defendant, at Bucksport, at 4½ o'clock on one Sunday afternoon in July, 1865, hired a horse and carriage of the plaintiff, who was a stable-keeper, and took from the house where the defendant was living, two young ladies, one of whom had come from church about an hour previous, whither she had walked that day from her home, two or three miles distant; that he drove about one half a mile beyond her house, and while in the act of turning the horse and carriage for the purpose of going back to leave her at her house, upset and badly injured the buggy, and frightened and more or less thereby injured the horse for stable use; that after tying together the broken buggy, the defendant undertook to lead the horse back, but the horse got away from him and ran home with the buggy; that the plaintiff had the carriage repaired at an expense of $60; that the defendant paid the plaintiff $30, and gave the note in suit for the balance of damages claimed.

The judge ruled that the facts disclosed a sufficient consideration for the note, and that the consideration was lawful. To which ruling the defendant alleged exceptions.

APPLETON, C. J. The defendant hired of the plaintiff and his partner a horse and wagon to ride on Sunday. The hiring was not for any purpose of necessity or charity. Being illegal between the parties, it is not made legal because the hirer did a kind act by conveying a young lady home, who had been "to meeting" during the day. The contract, so far as disclosed, was indefinite as to time, distance, and use, and not being for any purpose of necessity or charity, was one which the law will not enforce, nor will it give compensation for its violation. Way v. Foster, 1 Allen, 408; Morton v. Gloster, 46 Maine, 520.

If the defendant injured the horse and wagon by his careless or negligent driving, the remedy for the bailors would be against him for breach of his duty as bailee,—that is, for a breach of the duties arising from and under the contract of bailment. But, as that contract was against the provisions of the statute, no action could have been maintained upon it.⁴⁷ should bid and that they should share the profits was not illegal or against public policy and was enforceable. Scrutton, L. J., dissented.

On contracts to suppress bidding at judicial sales, see Ann. Cas. 1917 D, 232, note; 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 719, note.

⁴⁷Maine is one of the jurisdictions holding that where a horse is hired on Sunday in violation of the Sunday statute and the hirer injures it through his negligence, as by immoderate driving, the hirer is not liable in tort in the absence of a statute making the violation of the Sunday laws no defense to a tort action, because in the judgment of the Maine court the other party,

The only consideration for the note is the liability of the defendant under a contract prohibited by law; but this cannot be regarded as a legal consideration. The rights of the parties remain as if no note had been given. The original contract, being void, was not susceptible of ratification. Day v. McAllister, 15 Gray, 433.⁴⁸

In Morton v. Gloster, 46 Maine, 520, and in Woodman v. Hubbard, 5 Foster, 520, the bailee was guilty of a conversion of the property bailed, and was held liable therefor in trover. Not so here. The defendant is not proved to have kept the horse and wagon longer or to have driven further than he agreed to. He is not shown to have been guilty of any act of conversion.

BENJAMIN SHARP, ADM'R OF ANNA SHARP v. MOSES FARMER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1838. 20 N. C. 255.)

This was an action of Assumpsit commenced in the name of Benjamin Sharp and his wife Anna, and upon the death of the wife, continthe bailor, cannot recover without relying on the illegal contract of bailment. Parker v. Latner, 60 Me. 528 (1872). But contra, see the horse driving case of Newbury v. Luke, 68 N. J. L. 189 (1902), where the court held that the Sunday overdriving of the horse and not the Sunday contract law violation was the proximate cause of the injury. Compare, however, Brunhoelzel v. Brandes, 90 N. J. L. 31 (1917), which while not a Sunday contract case was one of an infant's contract as bailee and the infant's negligence as to the bailed property, and where Garrison, J., said (pp. 32-33):

"In the present case the promise of the infant as bailee was that he would exercise reasonable care in driving the borrowed car. If injury came to the car, because of the failure of the bailee to exercise such care, he cannot be held liable therefor in tort without being in effect held liable for a breach of his promise. The facts that constitute the breach of such promise cancel all of the facts that constitute the alleged tort, leaving nothing over and above the breach of the contract upon which to found an action."

⁴⁸ But "the terms of an agreement made on Sunday may subsequently be adopted by the parties on a secular day as the terms of a [new] contract then made. In most, though not all, of the cases supporting the proposition that a Sunday contract may be ratified, it will be found that these conditions existed." 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1707, p. 2991.

⁴⁹ In the case of Sunday contracts, as of others, if legal and illegal are inextricably mixed so as not to be separated without making a new contract for the parties, as where the contract is for services at so much per seven day week, there can be no recovery on the contract. Stewart v. Thayer, 168 Mass. 519 (1897). Later, in the same case, it was held that there could be no quasi contract recovery for six-sevenths or any of the services. Stewart v. Thayer, 170 Mass. 560 (1898), Holmes J., for the court, pointing out, "that this contract was bad, not because of the time when it was made, but because of its contents. Unless the original contract had been split up, of which there was no pretense, there could be no question of fact whether a valid contract ued by the said Benjamin as her administrator. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and upon the trial at Edgecomb on the last circuit before his Honor Judge Saunders, it appeared that the plaintiff was entitled in right of his wife to a distributive share of the estate of one Jerusha Farmer, deceased, and thereupon made an agreement with the defendant, who was also a distributee, that the latter, instead of taking out letters of administration on the estate of the said Jerusha should collect and sell the estate, and, after paying the debts, divide the residue among those entitled to distribution. The defendant, in pursuance of this agreement, sold the property and paid the debts of the said Jerusha, and a balance remaining in his hands, the plaintiff demanded the share to which he was entitled in right of his wife, and upon the defendant's refusal to pay the same brought this suit.

His Honor being of opinion, upon these facts, that the right of action vested in the plaintiff alone in his own right, and not in the plaintiff and his wife, directed a nonsuit to be entered and the plaintiff appealed.

BUFFIN, C. J. The point, whether the right of action on this contract, supposing it to be a lawful and valid contract, is in the husband in his own right, or survived to him as administrator of the wife, involves much nice learning. We are relieved from going into it by other matter apparent on the record, upon which we are satisfied that neither the husband, nor the husband and wife, together, could have an action upon this contract. It is an agreement between the next of kin of an intestate for an administration of the estate and its distribution by one of them, without obtaining letters of administration, or taking the oath of office, or giving bond. This is prohibited by the act of 1715, Rev. Stat. ch. 10, secs. 4 and 5, under a penalty of fifty pounds. (See 1 Rev. Stat. ch. 46, sec. 8.) After a vast number of cases upon the subject, it seems to be now perfectly settled, that no action will be sustained in affirmance and enforcement of an executory contract to do an immoral act, or one against the policy of the law, the due course of justice, or the prohibition of a penal statute. The distinction between an act malum in se and one merely malum prohibitum was never sound, and is entirely disregarded; for the law would be false to itself if it allowed a party through its tribunals to derive advantage from a contract made against the intent and express provisions of the law. Lankton v. Hughes, 1 Maul & Selw. 593, and Beasley v. Bignold, 5 Barn, and Ald. 341, establishes this principle upon consideration of all the previous cases.⁵⁰ It will be seen at once that the court could not give

The nonsuit must therefore stand and the judgment be affirmed.

*Judgment affirmed.*⁵¹

RANDALL v. TUELL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1897. 89 Me. 443, 36 Atl. 910,

FOSTER, J.⁵² The only question presented in this case is whether an innholder, who has no license, under Rev. St. c. 27, can recover for board and lodging furnished by him in such inn.

While the statute contains no express provision declaring contracts by an unlicensed innholder to be void, it does, by § 13, expressly provide that "no person shall be a common innholder or victualer without a license, under a penalty of not more than fifty dollars."

It is the general doctrine, now settled by the great weight of authority, that where a license is required for the protection of the public, and to prevent improper persons from engaging in a particular business, and the license is not for revenue merely, a contract made by an unlicensed person in violation of the act is void.

Did the legislature, by the requirement of a license, intend to prohibit the exercise of the business without a license, or was the statute enacted for revenue purposes only?

It can hardly be contended that the statute is in any sense for mere revenue. The fee required is only one dollar. The licensee must show that he is a man of good moral character, must give bond not to violate the prohibitory law, and must allow no gambling on his premises. The legislative intent is best inferred from the language of the statute itself. The statute is explicitly prohibitory, and the license required is clearly for the protection of the public, and to prevent improper persons from engaging in a particular business.

The question has come before the courts not only in this, but in other states, and the great trend of authority is in but one direction.

A contract for shingles not surveyed as required by law was held void in Richmond v. Foss, 77 Me. 590, 1 Atl. 830, although the statute contained no express prohibition.

tion, cannot be enforced." Fuller, C. J., in Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co., 130 U. S. 396, 411-412 (1888).

⁵¹ On validity of family settlement of intestate's estate, see 6 A. L. R. 555, note.

⁵² The statement of facts and parts of the opinion are omitted.

In Cope v. Rowland, 2 Mees. & W. 149, it was held that a person acting as a broker without license could not recover his commissions, where the statute required a license, and imposed a penalty for its violation. "It is perfectly settled," says Baron Parke, "that where the contract which the plaintiff seeks to enforce, be it express or implied, is expressly or by implication forbidden by the common statute law, no court will lend its assistance to give it effect. It is equally clear that a contract is void if prohibited by a statute, though the statute inflicts a penalty only, because such a penalty implies a prohibition." * * *

In Tennessee the court say that the revenue test is to be applied only where there is doubt from the language of the statute itself whether or not the legislature intended to prohibit the exercise of the privilege without a license, and that under a statute providing that the business of a real estate broker shall not be pursued without a license it was held that an unlicensed broker could not recover his commission. Stevenson v. Ewing, 87 Tenn. 46, 9 S. W. 230.

If the statute in question was enacted for revenue purposes only, instead of being prohibitory, the plaintiff might properly recover. But we are satisfied that such was not the intention of the legislature. The statute being by implication prohibitory by reason of the penalty attached, the plaintiff is precluded from recovering. Basing his action upon a clear violation of the statute, he cannot successfully invoke the aid of the court. Miller v. Post, 1 Allen (Mass.) 434.

GRIFFITH v. WELLS.

(Supreme Court of New York. July, 1846. 3 Denio, 226.)

Error to Oneida, C. P. Griffith sued Wells before a justice of the peace in December, 1843, and declared in assumpsit for two half gallons of whisky and two glasses of beer, sold and delivered to the defendant, of the value of three shillings and six pence. The plaintiff, who was a grocer, proved his declaration. The defence was, that the plaintiff sold the liquor without having a license to sell spirituous liquors. The justice gave judgment for the plaintiff for 44 cents damages, besides costs. On certiorari, the C. P. reversed the judgment, on the ground that the plaintiff did not show a license to sell spirituous liquors. The plaintiff brings error.

On effect of contract by teacher without license or certificate of qualification, see 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 412, note. On right of one not admitted to practice, or unlicensed, to recover compensation for legal services, see 4 A. L. R. 1087, note.

BRONSON, C. J. Our excise law does not, in terms, prohibit the sale of strong or spirituous liquors without a license, nor declare the act liberal; but only inflicts a penalty upon the offender. 2 Rev. St. 680, §§ 15, 16. From this it is argued, that although the seller without a license incurs a penalty, the contract of sale is valid, and may be enforced by action. But it was laid down long ago, that "where a statute inflicts a penalty for doing an act, though the act be not prohibited, yet the thing is unlawful; for it cannot be intended that a statute would inflict a penalty for a lawful act." Bartlett v. Viner, Skin. 322. In the report of the same case in Carthew (page 252), Holt, C. J., said: "A penalty implies a prohibition, though there are no prohibitory words in the statute." Although this was but a dictum, the doctrine has been fully approved. De Begnis v. Armistead, 10 Bing. 107; Foster v. Taylor, 3 Nev. & M. 244, 5 Barn. & Adol. 887; Cope v. Rowlands, 2 Mees. & W. 149; Mitchell v. Smith, 1 Bin. 110, 4 Dall. 269; Leidenbender v. Charles, 4 Serg. & R. 159, per Tilghman, C. J.; Bank v. Merrick, 14 Mass. 322. When a license to carry on a particular trade is required for the sole purpose of raising revenue, and the statute only inflicts a penalty by way of securing payment of the license money, it may be that a sale without a license would be valid. Johnson v. Hudson, 11 East, 180; Brown v. Duncan, 10 Barn. & C. 93; Chit. Cont. (Ed. 1842) 419, 697. But if the statute looks beyond the question of revenue, and has in view the protection of the public health or morals, or the prevention of frauds by the seller, then, though there be nothing but a penalty, a contract which infringes the statute cannot be supported. Law v. Hodgson, 2 Camp. 147; Brown v. Duncan, 10 Barn. & C. 93; Foster v. Taylor, 3 Nev. & M. 244, 5 Barn. & Adol. 887; Little v. Poole, 9 Barn. & C. 192; Tyson v. Thomas, McClel. & Y. 119; Wheeler v. Russel, 17 Mass. 258; Bensley v. Bignold, 5 Barn. & Ald. 335; Drury v. Defontaine, 1 Taunt. 136, per Mansfield, C. J.; Cope v. Rowlands, 2 Mees. & W. 149; Houston v. Mills, 1 Moody & R. 325. Now I think it quite clear, that in the enactment of our excise law the legislature looked beyond the mere question of revenue, and intended to prevent some of the evils which are so likely to flow from the traffic in spirituous liquors. If revenue alone had been the object, licenses would have been allowed indiscriminately to all. But the statute forbids a license to any one, whether tavern-keeper or grocer, who is not of good moral character; and he must moreover give bond, with sureties, that his house or grocery shall not become disorderly. Sections 6, 7, 13. These regulations were evidently intended to protect the public, in some degree, against the consequences which might be expected to follow from allowing all persons, at their pleasure, to deal in strong liquors. And although the statute only inflicts a penalty for selling without a license, the contract is illegal, and no action will lie to enforce it. The justice was wrong; and his judgment has been properly reversed by the common pleas.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHN BISBEE v. MARY McALLEN.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1888. 39 Minn. 143, 39 N. W. 299.)

Action for goods sold and delivered. The defendant pleaded that unsealed weights and measures were used. The reply alleged that no sealed weights or measures were provided in the county of sale, that defendant bought with full knowledge of that fact and that all the goods sold were of the full weight and measure charged therefor. A demurrer to the reply was sustained and the plaintiff appealed.

VANDERBURGH, J.† The question presented for consideration in this case is raised upon the sufficiency of the second defence set up in the answer, where it appears that the goods alleged to have been sold to the defendant, and for the price of which this action is brought, were sold by weight and measurement, and that such weight and measurement were unlawfully ascertained and fixed by certain unsealed measures, scales, and weights, which had never been proved, tested, or sealed, as required by the statute. Under Gen. St. 1878, c. 21, § 11, a sale of goods, wares, and merchandise by any scale-beam, steelyard, weight, or measure, not proved and sealed in accordance with the provisions of that chapter, is made a misdemeanor, and subjects the person making such sale to a penalty of not less than five nor more than one hundred dollars. The provision for a penalty in this section implies a prohibition of such sales. That is to say, if goods are sold by weight or measure, the law absolutely requires that the scales or measures used should be approved by the sealer of weights and measures for the county, as the statute provides.

It stands admitted upon the record, then, in this case, that the sale in question here, as made, was prohibited, and in violation of the statute. The weighing or measuring is not a collateral matter, but is directly involved in the act of selling and the contract of sale. It regulates the quantity to be delivered and the amount to be paid. And where the statute has in view the prevention of fraud by the seller, then, though there be nothing but a penalty, a contract which infringes the statute cannot be upheld. Griffith v. Wells, 3 Denio, 226, and cases; Lewis v. Welch, 14 N. H. 294. Here the intent of the statute is clearly to prevent sales by unproved and unsealed scales or measures, and its object is undoubtedly to protect the public from fraud or imposition by the use of false or inaccurate balances and measurements. It covers all cases of sales by weight or measure, and this case is clearly within it. The doctrine appears to be too well settled to require extended discussion. Brackett v. Hoyt, 29 N. H. 264; Smith v. Arnold, 106 Mass. 269; Woods v. Armstrong, 54 Ala. 150 (25 Am. Rep. 671, notes and cases); Ingersoll v. Randall, 14 Minn. 304 (400). In some cases a remedy has been suggested and recognized outside the prohibited contract. Pratt v. Short, 79 N. Y. 437, 445. But no such question is involved in this case. In respect to defences of this kind, we adopt the language of the court in Lewis v. Welch, supra: "The objection that the contract is illegal as between the parties is never very creditable to him who makes it. But it is not out of favor to him that the objection is sustained, but from regard to the law. The advantage he derived from it is altogether accidental." The supposed hardships of particular cases must yield to the general purposes of the act, and the modification of the law, if any shall be found necessary, must be by the legislature.

⁵⁴ "Frequently a statute imposes a penalty on the doing of an act without either prohibiting it or expressly declaring it illegal or void. In cases of this kind the decisions of the courts are not in harmony. By some courts it is held that an agreement founded on or for the doing of such penalized act is void (9 Cyc. 476, and note 2); in accordance with the view of Lord Holt in an old case:

"Every contract made for or about any matter or thing which is prohibited and made unlawful by any statute is a void contract, though the statute itself doth not mention that it shall be so, but only inflicts a penalty on the offender, because a penalty implies a prohibition, though there are no prohibiting words in the statute." Bartlett v. Vinor, Carth. 251, 252.

"Other courts have held that if, for example, the penalty is imposed for the protection of the revenue, it may be presumed that the legislature only desired to make it expensive to the parties in proportion as it is unprofitable to the revenue. Others have regarded the question as one of legislative intent, and declared the proper rule to be that the courts will look to the language of the statute, the subject-matter of it, the wrong or evil which it seeks to remedy or prevent, and the purpose sought to be accomplished in its enactment; and if from all these it is manifest that it was not intended to imply a prohibition or to render the prohibited act void, the courts will so hold and construe the statute accordingly. Wheeler v. Hawkins, 116 Ind. 515, 19 N. E. 470; Dillon v. Allen, 46 Iowa, 299, 26 Am. Rep. 145; Lindsey v. Rutherford, 17 B. Mon. (Ky.) 245; Coombs v. Emery, 14 Me. 404; Bowditch v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co., 141 Mass. 292, 4 N. E. 798, 55 Am. Rep. 474; Lewis v. Welch, 14 N. H. 294; Ruckman v. Bergholz, 37 N. J. Law, 437; Pratt v. Short, 79 N. Y. 437, 35 Am. Rep. 531; Holt v. Green, 73 Pa. 198, 13 Am. Rep. 737; Aiken v. Blaisdell, 41 Vt. 655; Niemeyer v. Wright, 75 Va. 239, 40 Am. Rep. 720; Miller v. Ammon, 145 U. S. 421, 12 Sup. Ct. 884, 36 L. Ed. 759; St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. Ed. 188; Barton v. Muir, L. R. 6 P. C. 134.

"As a general rule, a contract founded on an act forbidden by a statute under a penalty is void, although it be not expressly declared to be so; but it does not necessarily follow that the unlawfulness of the act was meant by the legislature to avoid a contract made in contravention of it. The question is in a great measure one of legislative intent, and its determination depends, as in other cases, on the construction of the statute. Niemeyer v. Wright, 75 Va. 239, 40 Am. Rep. 720. Such was the conclusion of another court of high authority. Harris v. Runnels, 12 How. 79, 13 L. Ed. 901, which court notes a distinction between statutes to raise revenue and those which are made for the protection of the public from moral evils, and those, which it is known by experience, society must be guarded from by preventive legislation. The

MILLWARD v. LITTLEWOOD,

(Court of Exchequer, 1850. 5 Ex. 775.)

Assumpsit. Declaration on mutual promises to marry, the plaintiff, an unmarried woman, alleging a subsequent discovery that defend-court, following Baron Parke's opinion in Cope v. Rowlands, 2 M. & W. 149, says:

"A statute, containing a prohibition and a penalty, makes the act which it punishes unlawful, and the same may be implied from a penalty without a prohibition; but it does not follow that the unlawfulness of the act was meant by the legislature to avoid a contract made in contravention of it. When the statute is silent, and contains nothing from which the contrary can be properly inferred, a contract in contravention of it is void. It is not necessary, however, that the reverse of that should be expressed in terms to exempt a contract from the rule. The exemption may be inferred from those rules of interpretation, to which, from the nature of legislation, all of it is liable when subjected to judicial scrutiny. That legislators do not think the rule one of universal obligation, or that, upon grounds of public policy, it should always be applied, is very certain. * * * It must be obvious, from such diversities of legislation, that statutes forbidding or enjoining things to be done, with penalties accordingly, should always be fully examined, before courts should refuse to give aid to enforce contracts which are said to be in contravention of them."

"This court has lately applied the rule we have just stated, and with reference to a similar question, arising out of the construction of a town ordinance requiring sewer connections to be made, in Hines v. Norcott, 176 N. C. 123, 96 S. E. 899, where it was said:

"The case of Courtney v. Parker, 173 N. C. 479 [92 S. E. 324], does not conflict with our decision, and is not an authority in support of the defendant's contention. There the defendant had done the very thing which was, in express terms or by the clearest implication, forbidden by the statute, and which it was unlawful to do, and every time he made a sale in the same manner, he did the same thing which the statute was intended to prohibit, and which it declared should be unlawful and a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment. In other words, the statute declared that he should conduct his business in a certain way, and not otherwise, and that he should not conduct it at all "unless" he complied with the provisions of the statute. He did not pursue the prescribed method, but the one denounced, and his act was therefore held to be illegal and his contract tainted by it. That is not our case. There is nothing in the lease transaction which is immoral per se, and therefore it is our right to search out the intention of the council and the meaning of the ordinance, in the language of the latter, and discover, if we can, what was its purpose, and not destroy contracts, with perhaps disastrous results, unless we find that to have been the real meaning and object in view. Courtney v. Parker, supra, and cases cited therein. The ordinance does not, in terms or by implication, forbid the sale or leasing of premises having no sewer connections, but it is restricted to the injunction that in certain instances the owner should make such connections under a penalty for his failure to do so. There is no inhibition in this contract against the making of such connections, and the owner is perfectly free to make them at any time. There is not even a reference to the matter, one way or another.'" Walker, J., in Price v. Edwards, 178 N. C. 493, 497-499 (1919).

See Uhlmann v. Kin Daw, 97 Ore. 681, 193 Pac. 435 (1920), a decision under a ant was a married man. At the trial the plaintiff had a verdict and defendant moved to arrest the judgment.

ALDERSON, B.⁵⁵ It is unnecessary to decide whether a promise by a man to marry a woman after his wife's death is good, because here it is found as a fact that the plaintiff had no knowledge that the defendant was married. In my opinion the difficulty arises in respect of the promise alleged being a promise to marry within an indefinite time. What was decided by the recent case in the Court of Common Pleas, [Wild v. Harris, 7 C. B. 999,] I think, was rightly decided.

PARKE, B. * * * The promise by the defendant to marry the plaintiff implies, on his part, that he is then capable of marrying, and he has broken that promise at the time of making it. The consideration to support the promise is, that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, engaged to marry him within a reasonable time, and therefore she remained unmarried; and that is a sufficient consideration to bind the defendant. And if she discovered, on the day after the defendant's promise, that he was a married man, I should nevertheless say that the consideration would be sufficient.

statute requiring persons transacting business under an assumed name or designation to file a certificate with the county clerk, setting forth both the assumed name or designation and the true names and addresses of the persons. The statute provided that no person or persons carrying on business as aforesaid should maintain an action in any of the courts of the state without alleging and proving the filing of the certificate and that failure to file such certificate should be "prima facie evidence of fraud in receiving credit." The penalty clause read: "Any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100." The opinion of the court, which was concerned with the effect of the statute on contracts by parties violating the statute, ends: "Our conclusion is that failure to file the certificate affects only the qualification of the person to sue, and that upon filing a certificate the disqualification is removed, and a suit or action may be maintained on a contract made before or after such filing."

⁵⁶ "Where the impossibility is known to the promisor, but not known to the promisee, he must be taken to promise absolutely; as where a married man promises to marry a woman, who was then unaware of his being married [citing Wild v. Harris, 7 C. B. 999; Milward v. Littlewood, 5 Exch. 775]."

In Spiers v. Hunt, [1908] 1 K. B. 720, 723, Phillimore, J., suggests that Milward v. Littlewood, supra, rests "upon the ground of estoppel or warranty of capacity."

"Cases have arisen where a married man has deceived a woman into believing that he was unmarried, in which the courts have held that in a suit for damages the defendant is estopped to deny that he was unmarried. This is upon the theory of fraud; that the duty was upon him to know whether he was married or not and not to deceive the other contracting party. * * *

ROYS v. JOHNSON ET AL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1856. 7 Gray, 162.)

METCALF, J.⁵⁷ It is agreed by the parties that the plaintiff performed for the defendants the services for which he now seeks to recover payment and that they have not paid him. It is for them, therefore, to show that he is not entitled to recover. This, in our opinion, is not shown by the statement of facts submitted to us. It appears, indeed, from that statement, that the defendants, without a license, set up theatrical exhibitions, in which they employed the plaintiff as an actor; and it follows, of course, that they thereby violated the law, and subjected themselves to punishment. But it does not appear that the plaintiff knew that they had no license. Unless he knew that fact, he is in no legal fault; and where a defendant is the only person who has violated the law, he cannot be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong, to defeat the rights of a plaintiff who is innocent.

In the cases cited by the defendants' counsel, where defences were sustained because the claims were void for illegality, the parties suing knew, or were bound to know, that they or the parties sued were violating or undertaking to violate the law. And this distinguishes all those cases, as well in law as in common justice, from the case at bar. * * * In the present case, we treat the plaintiff as not knowing that the defendant had no license, because the statement of facts does not show that he knew it.

No case is cited in which the courts have permitted the married person to recover." Cornish, J., in Rich v. Fulton, (Neb.), 177 N. W. 175, 176 (1920). (1920).

See, however, Pollock v. Sullivan, 53 Vt. 507 (1881), holding that an action of tort for deceit will lie and implying that assumpsit should not. See also Edward W. Hope, Ignorance of Impossibility as Affecting Consideration, 32 Harv. L. Rev. 679.

Where a married man, known by the woman to be such, agrees to marry her after he gets a divorce from his wife, then even though the divorce suit is pending at the time, the agreement is illegal. Noice v. Brown, 38 N. J. L. 228 (1876), 39 N. J. L. 133 (1876). See, also, Paddock v. Robinson, 63 Ill. 99 (1872); Olson v. Saxton, 36 Ore. 670 (1917); Wilson v. Carnley, [1908] 1 K. B. 729.

But if a divorce has been granted and remarriage for a year or other specified time is forbidden, then even though it is forbidden by statute and not merely by court decree, the agreement, if it is one to marry after the forbidden period ends, is held to be legal. Mitchell v. Clem, 295 Ill. 150 (1920); Buelna v. Ryan, 139 Cal. 630 (1903). Compare Brown v. Odill, 104 Tenn. 250 (1899).

⁵⁷ Part of the opinion is omitted.

It is ignorance of a fact, and not of the law, that saves the plaintiff's case. He undoubtedly knew, or was bound to know, that unlicensed theatrical exhibitions were unlawful; but he was not bound to know that the defendants had no license and were doing unlawful acts.

JAMES H. LURTON, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR v. WILLIAM GILLIAM AND JAMES C. CHALLEN, DEFENDANTS IN ERROR.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1839. 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 577, 33 Am. Dec. 430.)

Appeal by defendant below from a judgment for plaintiffs. The action was for goods sold as per the following memorandum:

"P. M. Brown & James Lurton
To 2½ Yrds. Fine Cloth, $12.....$28.00
Trimmings for Coat..... 6.00

$34.00

"If Mr. Douglass is elected to Congress, P. M. Brown is to pay for the cloth; if Mr. Stuart is elected, James Lurton has it to pay." Mr. Stuart was elected.

SMITH, J.⁵⁶ * * * From the facts disclosed by the bill of exceptions, it appears that the contract for the cloth, although a contingent one as to the ultimate liability of the one or the other of the parties, was to be absolute, as to the party who should lose the bet. The purchase was made and the credit given, after the consummation of the bet.

It does not appear that the defendants in error were in any way parties to the bet, or encouraged it; and we do not perceive that their contract for the sale and delivery of the cloth, was tainted with a participation in the original agreement between the parties. Their mere knowledge of it could not certainly connect them with it; and having parted with their property under the arrangement, common honesty surely requires that the party at whose instance it was delivered, conformably to his agreement, should be held answerable for the value of the merchandise delivered. Money loaned to be used in Enactments of this character are often made for the purpose of protecting one class of men from the oppression and impositions of another class of men; and in such cases the really guilty party is never allowed any relief under the statute or permitted to set up the statute as a defense to relief sought by the other party." TYLER v. CARLISLE.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1887. 79 Me. 210, 9 Atl. 356, 1 Am. St. Rep. 301.)

PETERS, C. J. The plaintiff claims to recover a sum of money loaned by him while the defendant was engaged in playing at cards. The ruling at the trial was that, if the plaintiff lent the money with an express understanding, intention, and purpose that it was to be used to gamble with, and it was so used, the debt so created cannot be recovered; but otherwise if the plaintiff had merely knowledge that the money was to be so used. Upon authority and principle the ruling was correct. Any different doctrine would, in most instances, be impracticable and unjust. It does not follow that a lender has a guilty purpose merely because he knows or believes that the borrower has. There may be a visible line between the motives of the two. If it were not so, men would have great responsibilities for the motives and acts of others. A person may loan money to his friend,—to the man,—and not to his purpose. He may at the same time disapprove his purpose. He may not be willing to deny his friend, however much disapproving his acts. In order to find the lender in fault, he must himself have an intention that the money shall be illegally used. There must be a combination of intention between lender and borrower,—a union of purposes. The lender must in some manner be a confederate or participator in the borrower's act,—be himself implicated in it. He must loan his money for the express purpose of promoting the illegal design of the borrower, not intend merely to serve or accommodate the man.

In support of this view many cases might be adduced. A few prominent ones will suffice. Greene v. Collins, 3 Cliff. 494, Fed. Cas. No. 5,755; Gaylor v. Soragen, 32 Vt. 110; Hill v. Spear, 50 N. H. 253; Peck v. Briggs, 3 Denio, 107; McIntyre v. Parks, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 207; Bancher v. Mansel, 47 Me. 58. See Franklin Co. v. Lewiston Sav. Bank, 68 Me. 47.

Nor was the branch of the ruling wrong that plaintiff, even though a participator, could recover his money back if it had not been actually used for illegal purposes. In minor offenses, the locus penitentiæ continues until the money has been actually converted to the illegal use. The law encourages a repudiation of the illegal contract, even by a guilty participator, as long as it remains an executory contract, or the illegal purpose has not been put in operation. The lender can cease his own criminal design, and reclaim his money. "The reason is," says Wharton, "the plaintiff's claim is not to enforce, but to repudiate, an illegal contract." Whart. Cont. § 354, and cases there cited. The object of the law is to protect the public,—not the parties. "It best comports with public policy to arrest the illegal transaction before it is consummated," says the court in Stacy v. Foss, 19 Me. 335. See White v. Bank, 22 Pick 181. The rule allowing a recovery back does not apply where the lender knows that some infamous crime is to be committed with the means which he furnishes. It applies only where the minor offenses are involved.

*Exceptions overruled.*⁶¹

"A., a resident of this state, loans money to B., who gives a mortgage upon land situated in this state as security for the loan; but at A.'s request the mortgage and note are made to run to C., who is a nonresident, and this is done for the purpose of defrauding the state out of the taxes upon the mortgage. A. takes an assignment from C. of the note and mortgage, but does not place the assignment on record until foreclosure is sought. Upon B.'s default, A. commences foreclosure proceedings, and B. defends upon the ground that the contract was and is void as against public policy. Upon these facts the Nevada and Kansas courts have refused to foreclose the mortgage. Drexler v. Tyrrell, 15 Nev. 114; Sheldon v. Pruessner, 52 Kan. 579, 35 Pac. 201, 22 L. R. A. 709. But the decided weight of authority is against the holding of these courts. Crowns v. Forest Land Co., 99 Wis. 103, 74 N. W. 546; Nichols v. Weed Sewing purchase money should be paid by instalments in a period which was not to exceed twelve months; the defendant to have the option to purchase as aforesaid, and to pay 50*l.* down; and in case the brougham should be returned before a second instalment was paid, a forfeiture of fifteen guineas to be paid in addition to the 50*l.*, and also any damage, except fair wear. Averment, that the defendant returned the brougham before a second instalment was paid, and that it was damaged. Breach, nonpayment of fifteen guineas, or the amount of the damage. Money counts.

Plea 3, to the first count, that at the time of making the supposed agreement the defendant was to the knowledge of the plaintiffs a prostitute, and that the supposed agreement was made for the supply of a brougham to be used by her as such prostitute, and to assist her in carrying on her said immoral vocation, as the plaintiffs when they made the said agreement well knew, and in the expectation by the plaintiffs that the defendant would pay the plaintiffs the moneys to be paid by the said agreement out of her receipts as such prostitute. Issue.

The case was tried before Bramwell, B., at Guildhall, at the sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1865. It then appeared that the plaintiffs were coach-builders in partnership, and evidence was given which satisfied the jury that one of the partners knew that the defendant was a prostitute; but there was no direct evidence that either of the plaintiffs knew that the brougham was intended to be used for the purpose of enabling the defendant to prosecute her trade of prostitution; and there was no evidence that the plaintiffs expected to be paid out of the wages of prostitution.

The learned judge ruled that the allegation in the plea as to the mode of payment was immaterial, and he put to the jury the following questions: 1. Did the defendant hire the brougham for the purpose of her prostitution? 2. If she did, did the plaintiffs know the purpose for which it was hired? The jury found that the carriage was used by the defendant as part of her display, to attract men; and that the plaintiffs knew it was supplied to be used for that purpose. They gave nothing for the alleged damage.

On this finding the learned judge directed a verdict for the defendant, and gave the plaintiffs leave to move to enter a verdict for them for the fifteen guineas penalty.

M. Chambers, Q. C., in Hilary Term, obtained a ruled accordingly, Machine Co., 27 Hun, 200, s. c. 97 N. Y. 650; Callicott v. Allen, 31 Ind. App. 561, 67 N. E. 196; Jones on Mortgages, § 619, and note; Stilwell v. Corwin, 55 Ind. 433, 23 Am. Rep. 672. We think the rule is quite well settled that courts will not hold a contract void as against public policy, unless the contract itself requires that something be done which adversely affects the public welfare, or is forbidden by law, or the consideration is illegal or immoral. Callicott v. Allen, above." Holloway, J., in Murray v. White, 42 Mont. 423, 437-438 (1911).

on the ground that there was no evidence that the plaintiffs knew the purpose for which the brougham was to be used; and that if there was, the allegation in the plea that the plaintiffs expected to be paid out of the receipts of the defendant's prostitution was a material allegation, and had not been proved. Bowry v. Bennet, 1 Camp. 348.

[POLLOCK, C. B., referred to Cannan v. Bryce, 3 B. & A. 179.]

Digby, Seymour, Q. C., and Beresford, showed cause. No direct evidence could be given of the plaintiffs' knowledge that the defendant was about to use the carriage for the purpose of prostitution; but the fact that a person known to be a prostitute hires an ornamental brougham is sufficient ground for the finding of the jury.

[BRAMWELL, B. At the trial I was at first disposed to think that there was no evidence on this point, and I put it to the jury, that, in some sense, everything which was supplied to a prostitute is supplied to her to enable her to carry on her trade, as, for instance, shoes sold to a street-walker; and that the things supplied must be not merely such as would be necessary or useful for ordinary purposes, and might be also applied to an immoral one; but they must be such as would under the circumstances not be required, except with that view. The jury, by the mode in which they answered the question, showed that they appreciated the distinction; and on reflection I think they were entitled to draw the inference which they did. They were entitled to bring their knowledge of the world to bear upon the facts proved. The inference that a prostitute (who swore that she could not read writing required an ornamental brougham for the purpose of her calling, was as natural a one as that a medical man would want a brougham for the purpose of visiting his patients; and the knowledge of the defendant's condition being brought home to the plaintiffs, the jury were entitled to ascribe to them also the knowledge of her purpose.)]

Upon the second point, the case of Bowry v. Bennett, 1 Camp. 348, falls short of proving that the plaintiff must intend to be paid out of the proceeds of the illegal act. The report states that the evidence of the plaintiffs' knowledge of the defendant's way of life was "very slight;" and Lord Ellenborough appears to have referred to the intention as to payment, not as a legal test, but as a matter of evidence with reference to the particular circumstances of the case. The goods supplied there were clothes; without other circumstances there would be nothing illegal in selling clothes to a known prostitute; but if it were shown that the seller intended to be paid out of her illegal earnings, the otherwise innocent contract would be vitiated. Neither is Lloyd v. Johnson, 1 B. & P. 340, cited in the note to the last case, an authority for the plaintiffs, for there part of the contract would have been innocent, and all that the court says is, that it cannot "take into consideration which of the articles were used by the defendant to an improper purpose, and which were not;" they had no materials for doing so. The present case rather resembles the case of Crisp v. Churchill, cited in Lloyd v. Johnson, 1 B. & P. 340, where the plaintiff was not allowed to recover for the use of lodgings let for the purpose of prostitution. Appleton v. Campbell, 2 C. & P. 347, is to the same effect.

M. Chambers, Q. C., and J. O. Griffiths, in support of the rule. As to the first point, the expressions of Buller, J., in Lloyd v. Johnson, 1 B. & P. at p. 341, are strongly in the plaintiffs' favor, especially his remarks on the case of the lodgings: "I suppose the lodgings were hired for the express purpose of enabling two persons to meet there." But in this case it is impossible to say that there was any express purpose of prostitution; the defendant might have used the brougham for any purpose she chose, as to take drives, to go to the theatre, or to shop. Even if there were evidence, the jury have not found the purpose with sufficient distinctness. But secondly, the last allegation in the plea is material; the plaintiffs must intend to be paid out of the proceeds of the immoral act. The words of Lord Ellenborough in Bowry v. Bennett, 1 Camp. 348, are very plain; the plaintiff must "expect to be paid from the profits of the defendant's prostitution."

[Bramwell, B. At the trial I refused to leave this question to the jury, but it has since occurred to me that the matter was doubtful. The purpose of the seller in selling is, that he may obtain the profit, not that the buyer shall put the thing sold to any particular use; it is for the buyer to determine how he shall use it. Suppose, however, a person were to buy a pistol, saying to the seller that he means with it to shoot a man and rob him; is the act of the seller illegal, or is it further necessary that he should stipulate to be paid out of the proceeds of the robbery? If the looking to the proceeds is necessary to make the transaction illegal, is it not also necessary that it should be part of the contract that he shall be so paid?]

Suppose a cab to be called by a prostitute, and the driver directed to take her to some known place of ill-fame, could it be said that he could not claim payment?

[Bramwell, B. If he could, this absurdity would follow, that if a man and a prostitute engaged a cab for that purpose, and if, to meet your argument, the driver reckoned on payment, as to the woman, out of the proceeds of her prostitution, the woman would not be liable, but the man would, although they engaged in the same transaction and for the same purpose.]

If the contract is void for this reason, the plaintiffs were entitled to resume possession, and to bring trover for the carriage; a test, therefore, of the question will be, whether in such an action, if the jury found the same verdict as they have found here, on the same evidence, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover.

[Martin, B. I think they would; and that if the carriage had not been returned in this case, the plaintiffs would, on our discharging this rule, be entitled to determine the contract on the ground of want of reciprocity, and to claim the return of the article.]

POLLOCK, C. B.⁶³ We are all of the opinion that this rule must be discharged. I do not think it is necessary to enter into the subject at large after what has fallen from the bench in the course of the argument, further than to say that since the case of Cannan v. Bryce, 3 B. & A. 179, cited by Lord Abinger in delivering the judgment of this court in the case of M'Kinnell v. Robinson, 3 M. & W. at p. 441, and followed by the case in which it was so cited, I have always considered it as settled law that any person who contributes to the performance of an illegal act by supplying a thing with the knowledge that it is going to be used for that purpose, cannot recover the price of the thing so supplied. If, to create that incapacity, it was ever considered necessary that the price should be bargained or expected to be paid out of the fruits of the illegal act (which I do not stop to examine), that proposition has been overruled by the cases I have referred to, and has now ceased to be law. Nor can any distinction be made between an illegal and an immoral purpose; the rule which is applicable to the matter is, Ex turpi causa non oritur actio, and whether it is an immoral or an illegal purpose in which the plaintiff has participated, it comes equally within the terms of that maxim, and the effect is the same; no cause of action can arise out of either the one or the other. The rule of law was well settled in Cannan v. Bryce, 3 B. & A. 179; that was a case which at the time it was decided, I, in common with many other lawyers in Westminster Hall, was at first disposed to regard with surprise. But the learned judge (then Sir Charles Abbott) who decided it, though not distinguished as an advocate, nor at first eminent as a judge, was one than whom few have adorned the bench with clearer views, or more accurate minds, or have produced more beneficial results in the law. The judgment in that case was, I believe, emphatically his judgment; it was assented to by all the members of the Court of King's Bench, and is now the law of the land. If, therefore, this article was furnished to the defendant for the purpose of enabling her to make a display favorable to her immoral purposes, the plaintiffs can derive no cause of action from the bargain. I cannot go with Mr. Chambers in thinking that everything must be found by a jury in such a case with that accuracy from which ordinary decency would recoil. For criminal law it is sometimes necessary that details of a revolting character should be found distinctly and minutely, but for civil purposes this is not necessary. If evidence is given which is sufficient to satisfy the jury of the fact of the immoral purpose, and of the plaintiffs' knowledge of it, and that the article was required and furnished to facilitate that object, it is sufficient, although the facts are not expressed with such plainness as would offend the sense of decency. I agree with my brother Bramwell that the verdict was right, and that the rule must be discharged.

*Rule discharged.*⁶³

In the United States the courts are divided in opinion as to whether a landlord who leases premises knowing that the lessee will use them to run, or will sublet them to one who will use them to run, a house of prostitution, should be allowed to recover the rent. See 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 662, note; 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1104, note. In Ashford v. Mace, 103 Ark. 114 (1912), recovery was allowed where the landlord was indifferent as to the use. The court said that keeping a bawdy house was not a heinous felony "such as treason, murder, rape, etc." But against recovery, see Dougherty v. Seymour, 16 Colo. 289 (1891); Mitchell v. Campbell, 111 Miss. 806 (1916); Hunstock v. Palmer, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 459, 23 S. W. 294 (1893). See Ralston v. Broady, 20 Ga. 449 (1856). See also Levy & Co. v. Davis, 115 Va. 814 (1914), where the sellers of furniture to one who was to use it in her business of running a bawdy house were denied a recovery because the contract was in and of a business denounced by statute as a crime; and Standard Furniture Co. v. Van Alstine, 22 Wash. 670 (1900), where there was a conditional sale of furniture and house furnishing goods to a prostitute, knowing that she intended to put them to an immoral use and the seller was not allowed to recover them when the buyer defaulted in payments. The court in the case just cited thought that in a conditional sale the seller necessarily participated in or aided the illegal design of the vendee of which he had knowledge. See also C. M. & E. G. Ham v. Wilson (Miss.), 86 So. 298 (1920). Cf. Coburn v. Coburn (Tex. Civ. App.), 211 S. W. 248 (1919). As to sale of goods to keeper or inmate of house of ill fame, see L. R. A. 1917 B, 1168, note.

In Michael v. Bacon, 49 Mo. 474 (1872), the plaintiff was allowed to recover for papering and fitting up a house which he knew was to be used for gambling. On insurance on bawdy house or furniture therein, see 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 214, note; L. R. A. 1917 B, 257, note.

In Dougherty v. Seymour, supra, it was held that the fact that the written lease is silent as to the purposes for which the premises are to be used does not stand in the way of a denial of recovery to the landlord.

In Wilhite v. Roberts, 4 Dana (Ky.), 172, 175 (1836), where the action was debt on a penal bond and defendant pleaded the champerty and maintenance statute, there being no stipulation or recital in the bond evidencing a violation of the statute, Ewing, J., for the court, said:

"Though it be a general rule that nothing can be averred and proved against the stipulations of a written contract, this rule does not apply where the contract is illegal, or against the positive prohibition of a penal statute. * * *

"No instrument is so sacred, when tinged with illegality or fraud, as to raise it above the scrutiny of parol testimony. And indeed it would be highly impolitic that it should; for if this rule should prevail as applicable to illegal and vicious contracts, it would be an easy matter to place all contracts, however illegal or vicious, above the reach of the law. It would only be necessary for the parties, as is alleged in the case before the court, to have a secret, illegal

HOLMES, J. This is an action for the price of intoxicating liquors. It is found that they were sold and delivered in Massachusetts by the plaintiffs to the defendant, a Maine hotel keeper, with a view to their being resold by the defendant in Maine, against the laws of that state. These are all the material facts reported; and these findings we must assume to have been warranted, as the evidence is not reported, so that no question of the power of Maine to prohibit the sales is open. The only question is whether the facts as stated show a bar to this action.

The question is to be decided on principles which we presume would prevail generally in the administration of the common law in this country. Not only should it be decided in the same way in which we should expect a Maine court to decide upon a Maine contract presenting a similar question, but it should be decided as we think that a Maine court ought to decide this very case if the action were brought there. It is noticeable, and it has been observed by Sir F. Pollock, that some of the English cases which have gone farthest in asserting the right to disregard the revenue laws of a country other than that where the contract is made and is to be performed, have had reference to the English revenue laws. Holman v. Johnson, 1 Cowp. 341; Pollock, Con. (5th Ed.) 308. See also M'Intyre v. Parks, 3 Met. 207.

The assertion of that right, however, no doubt was in the interest of English commerce (Pellecat v. Angell, 2 Cr., M. & R. 311, 313), and has not escaped criticism (Story, Conf. Laws, §§ 257, 264, note, 3 Kent Com. 265, 266, and Wharton, Conf. Laws, § 484), although there may be a question how far the actual decisions go beyond what would have been held in the case of an English contract affecting only English laws. See Hodgson v. Temple, 5 Taunt. 181; Brown v. Duncan, 10 B. & C. 93, 98, 99; Harris v. Runnels, 12 How. 79, 83, 84.

Of course it would be possible for an independent state to enforce all contracts made and to be performed within its territory, without regard to how much they might contravene the policy of its neighbors' laws. But in fact no state pursues such a course of barbarous isolation. As a general proposition, it is admitted that an agreement to break the laws of a foreign country would be invalid. Pollock, Con. (5th Ed.) 308. The courts are agreed on the invalidity of a sale when the understanding and to introduce into a written contract, fair upon its face, stipulations that are legal, but highly penal, as a means to enforce a compliance with the terms of the secret illegal bargain. The arm of the law is not so short as to permit such evasions." See 16 Ann. Cas. 388, note; Ann. Cas. 1917 D, 426, note.

tract contemplates a design on the part of the purchaser to resell contrary to the laws of a neighboring state, and requires an act on the part of the seller in furtherance of the scheme. Waymell v. Reed, 5 T. R. 599; Gaylord v. Soragen, 32 Vt. 110; Fisher v. Lord, 63 N. H. 514; Hull v. Ruggles, 56 N. Y. 424, 429.

On the other hand, plainly, it would not be enough to prevent a recovery of the price that the seller had reason to believe that the buyer intended to resell the goods in violation of law; he must have known the intention in fact. Finch v. Mansfield, 97 Mass. 89, 92; Adams v. Coulliard, 102 Mass. 167, 173. As in the case of torts, a man has a right to expect lawful conduct from others. In order to charge him with the consequences of the act of an intervening wrongdoer, you must show that he actually contemplated the act. Hayes v. Hyde Park, 153 Mass. 514, 515, 516.

Between these two extremes a line is to be drawn. But as the point where it should fall is to be determined by the intimacy of the connection between the bargain and the breach of the law in the particular case, the bargain having no general and necessary tendency to induce such a breach, it is not surprising that courts should have drawn the line in slightly different places. It has been thought not enough to invalidate a sale, that the seller merely knows that the buyer intends to resell, in violation even of the domestic law. Tracy v. Talmage, 4 Kernan, 162; Hodgson v. Temple, 5 Taunt. 181. So of the law of another state. M'Intyre v. Parks, 3 Met. 207; Sortwell v. Hughes, 1 Curt. C. C. 244; Green v. Collins, 3 Cliff. 494; Hill v. Spear, 50 N. H. 253. (Dater v. Earl, 3 Gray, 482, is a decision on New York law.)

But there are strong intimations in the later Massachusetts cases that the law on the last point is the other way. Finch v. Mansfield, 97 Mass. 89, 92; Suit v. Woodhall, 113 Mass. 391, 395. And the English decisions have gone great lengths in the case of knowledge of intent to break the domestic law. Pearce v. Brooks, L. R. 1 Ex. 213; Taylor v. Chester, L. R. 4 Q. B. 309, 311.

However this may be, it is decided that when a sale of intoxicating liquor in another state has just so much greater proximity to a breach of the Massachusetts law as is implied in the statement that it was made with a view to such a breach, it is void. Webster v. Munger, 8 Gray 584; Orcutt v. Nelson, 1 Gray, 536, 551; Hubbell v. Flint, 13 Gray, 277, 279; Adams v. Coulliard, 102 Mass. 167, 172, 173. Even in Green v. Collins and Hill v. Spear, the decision in Webster v. Munger seems to be approved. See also Langton v. Hughes, 1 M. & S. 593; M'Kinnell v. Robinson, 3 M. & W. 434, 441; White v. Butt, 3 Cush. 448. If the sale would not have been made but for the seller's desire to induce an unlawful sale in Maine, it would be an unlawful sale on the principles explained in Hayes v. Hyde Park, 153 Mass. 514, and Tasker v. Stanley, 153 Mass. 148. The overt act of selling, which otherwise would be too remote from the apprehended result, an unlawful sale by some one else, would be connected with it, and taken out of the protection of the law by the fact that that result was actually intended. We do not understand the judge to have gone so far as we have just supposed. We assume that the sale would have taken place, whatever the buyer had been expected to do with the goods. But we understand the judge to have found that the seller expected and desired the buyer to sell unlawfully in Maine, and intended to facilitate his doing so, and that he was known by the buyer to have that intent. The question is whether the sale is saved by the fact that the intent mentioned was not the controlling inducement to it. As the connection between the act in question, the sale here, and the illegal result, the sale in Maine—the tendency of the act to produce the result—is only through the later action of another man, the degree of connection or tendency may vary by delicate shades. If the buyer knows that the sale is made only for the purpose of facilitating his illegal conduct, the connection is at the strongest. If the sale is made with the desire to help him to his end, although primarily made for money, the seller cannot complain if the illegal consequence is attributed to him. If the buyer knows that the seller, while aware of his intent, is indifferent to it, or disapproves of it, it may be doubtful whether the connection is sufficient. Compare Commonwealth v. Churchill, 136 Mass. 148, 150. It appears to us not unreasonable to draw the line as it was drawn in Webster v. Munger, and to say that, when the illegal intent of the buyer is not only known to the seller, but encouraged by the sale as just explained, the sale is void. The accomplice is none the less an accomplice because he is paid for his act. See Commonwealth v. Harrington, 3 Pick. 26.

The ground of the decision in Webster v. Munger is, that contracts like the present are void. If the contract had been valid, it would have been enforced. Dater v. Earl, 3 Gray, 482; M'Intyre v. Parks, 3 Met. 207. As we have said or implied already, no distinction can be admitted based on the fact that the law to be violated in that case was the lex fori. For if such a distinction is ever sound, and again if the same principles are not always to be applied, whether the law to be violated is that of the state of the contract or of another state (see Tracy v. Talmage, 4 Kernan, 162, 213), at least the right to contract with a view to a breach of the laws of another state of this Union ought not to be recognized as against a statute passed to carry out fundamental beliefs about right and wrong, shared by a large part of our own citizens. Territt v. Bartlett, 21 Vt. 184, 188, 189. In the opinion of a majority of the court, this case is governed by Webster v. Munger, and we believe that it would have been decided as we decide it, if the action had been brought in Maine instead of here. Banchor v. Mansel, 47 Maine, 58.

Exceptions sustained.

March 13, 1901.—May 22, 1901.

HOLMES, C. J.† This is the second time that this case comes before this court. 156 Mass. 211. It is a suit for the price of intoxicating liquors sold here. At the first trial it was found that they were sold with a view to their being resold by the defendant in Maine against the laws of that state; and on that state of facts it was held that the action would not lie. At the second trial it was found that the plaintiff's agent supposed, rightly, that the defendant intended to resell the liquors in Maine unlawfully, but that the plaintiffs and their agent were and were known by the defendant to be indifferent to what he did with the goods, and to have no other motive or purpose than to sell them in Massachusetts in the usual course of business. Seemingly the plaintiffs did not act in aid of the defendant's intent beyond selling him the goods. The judge refused to rule that the plaintiffs' knowledge of the defendant's intent would prevent their recovery, and the case is here again on exceptions.

The principles involved are stated and some of the cases are collected in the former decision. All that it is necessary for us to say now is that in our opinion a sale otherwise lawful is not connected with subsequent unlawful conduct by the mere fact that the seller correctly divines the buyer's unlawful intent, closely enough to make the sale unlawful. It will be observed that the finding puts the plaintiffs' knowledge of the defendant's intent no higher than an uncommunicated inference as to what the defendant was likely to do. Of course the defendant was free to change his mind, and there was no communicated desire of the plaintiffs to co-operate with the defendant's present intent, such as was supposed in the former decision, but on the contrary an understood indifference to everything beyond an ordinary sale in Massachusetts. It may be that, as in the case of attempts (Commonwealth v. Peaslee, 177 Mass. 267; Commonwealth v. Kennedy, 170 Mass. 18, 22), the line of proximity will vary somewhat according to the gravity of the evil apprehended, Steele v. Curle, 4 Dana, 381, 385-388, Hanauer v. Doane, 12 Wall. 342, 446, Bickel v. Sheets, 24 Ind. 1, 4, and in different courts with regard to the same or similar matters. Compare Hubbard v. Moore, 24 La. Ann. 591; Michael v. Bacon, 49 Mo. 474, with Pearce v. Brooks, L. R. 1 Ex. 213. But the decisions tend more and more to agree that the connection with the unlawful act in cases like the present is too remote. M'Intyre v. Parks, 3 Met. 207; Sortwell v. Hughes, 1 Curt. C. C. 244, 247; Green v. Collins, 3 Cliff. 494; Hill v. Spear, 50 N. H. 253; Tracy v. Talmage, 4 Kernan, 162; Distilling Co. v. Nutt, 34 Kan. 724, 729; Webber v. Donnelly, 33 Mich. 469; Tuttle v. Holland, 43 Vt. 542; Braunn v. Keally, 146 Pa. St. 519, 524; Wallace v. Lark, 12 S. C. 576, 578; Rose v. Mitchell, 6 Col. 102; Jameson v. Gregory, 4 Met. (Ky.) 363, 370; Bickel v. Sheets, Hubbard v. Moore, and Michael v. Bacon, ubi supra.

† The statement of facts in 179 Mass. 53, is omitted.

Although a different rule was assumed in Suit v. Woodhall, 113 Mass. 391, it will be seen that it equally was assumed by the instructions given at the trial, and that the exceptions and the point decided in that case concerned only the imputation to the plaintiffs of their agent's knowledge. M'Intyre v. Parks never has been overruled. Dater v. Earl, 3 Gray, 482; Webster v. Munger, 8 Gray, 584, 587; Adams v. Coulliard, 102 Mass. 167, 172; Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 376.

Exceptions to the admission of letters of the plaintiff's agent to them for the purpose of showing what they knew are not argued.

⁶⁴ See 15 L. R. A. 834, note; 32 Am. St. Rep. 450, note.

In Corbin et al. v. Houlehan, 100 Me. 246 (1905), where the sellers of intoxicating liquors, bought as the sellers knew, to be sold illegally in Maine, were suing for the unpaid balance of the purchase price, it appeared that the sellers aided the defendant in avoiding the seizure of the liquors by marking the goods, in accordance with a direction of the purchaser contained in the order, in the name of a person other than the purchaser, which name was adopted by him for this purpose, and it was known by the plaintiffs' agent that the name in which the liquors were to be shipped was fictitious, and adopted by the defendant for the purpose of avoiding their seizure, Wiswell, C. J., said:

"Independently of any statute, according to this well-settled principle, the courts of a state would not enforce a contract in behalf of a vendor to recover the purchase price of goods sold by him to a vendee, if the vendor not only had knowledge of the illegal purpose of the purchaser to sell them in violation of the laws of the state to which they were to be transported, but, as well, did some act in furtherance of this illegal purpose. A person should not and would not be allowed to resort to the courts of a state to enforce a contract which he had made for the purpose of violating or evading the laws of that state, or of aiding another to violate, even if the contract was recognized as valid by the laws of the state where it was actually entered into. There has been much discussion in the decided cases as to whether mere knowledge upon the part of a vendor of the illegal intention of the vendee with respect to the use of the goods purchased is sufficient to prevent him from obtaining a remedy in the courts of the state whose laws the vendee intended to violate by an illegal use of the goods purchased, or whether it was necessary, in order to prevent him from being entitled to a remedy in such courts, that he should have participated in the illegal purpose by aiding and facilitating the purchaser in some way. For a very full discussion of this question, see Hill v. Spear, 50 N. H. 253, 9 Am. Rep. 205, wherein the court, after a very full review of many authorities upon the question, decided that it was not sufficient that a vendor living in another state, who there sold and delivered intoxicating liquors to a vendee, who resold them in the state of New Hampshire in violation of the laws of that state, had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, that they were purchased by the vendee with the intention of there reselling them contrary to law, to prevent a recovery of the purchase price in the latter state. See also, Webster v. Munger, 8 Gray (Mass.) 587. But all courts, so far as we are aware, agree that when the vendor not only had knowledge of the illegal use to which the vendee intended to put the goods purchased, but also, in making such sale, did some act in furtherance of this illegal purpose, then he cannot resort to the courts of the state which were intended to be violated to enforce the collection of the purchase

CHURCH ET AL. v. PROCTOR.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, First Circuit, 1895. 66 Fed. 240, 13 C. C. A. 426.)

This was an action by Joseph O. Proctor, Jr., against Daniel T. Church and others, to recover damages for breach of a contract. On the trial in the circuit court, the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff. Defendants bring error.

ALDRICH, J.† At the time the parties entered into the contract involved in this controversy, Proctor, the plaintiff below, was engaged in a general fishing business at Gloucester, in the State of Massachusetts, and in preparing and placing on the general market different kinds of fish, and especially in splitting and slivering a fish called "menhaden," and placing the same upon the market; and the defendants, at Tiverton, price for the goods sold for this illegal purpose" (pp. 252-253).

In Hocking Valley Ry. Co. v. Barbour, 179 N. Y. S. 810, 813 (1920), Smith, J., said: "It is not necessary here to hold that one purchasing goods known to have been contracted to another makes a contract tainted with illegality. Where, however, the contract, as in the case at bar, is to give a bond for the very purpose of inducing the vendor to violate his contract known to have been made, a different question is involved, and the contract comes within the condemnation of the law as one made directly for an illegal purpose, and therefore tainted with illegality. Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 258, 6 L. Ed. 468; Rhoades v. Malta Vita Pure Food Co., 149 Mich. 235, 112 N. W. 940; Posner v. Jackson, 223 N. Y. 325, 119 N. E. 573."

In Hanauer v. Doane, 12 Wall. (U. S.) 342, 346-347 (1871), Bradley, J., said:

"With whatever impunity a man may lend money or sell goods to another who he knows intends to devote them to a use that is only malum prohibitum, or of inferior criminality, he cannot do it without turpitude, when he knows or has every reason to believe that such money or goods are to be used for the perpetration of a heinous crime, and that they were procured for that purpose. In the words of Chief Justice Eyre, in Lightfoot v. Tenant, 1 Bos. & P., 551, 556, 'The man who sells arsenic to one who, he knows, intends to poison his wife with it, will not be allowed to maintain an action on his contract. The consideration of the contract, in itself good, is there tainted with turpitude which destroys the whole merit of it. * * * No man ought to furnish another with the means of transgressing the law, knowing that he intended to make that use of them.' On this declaration, Judge Story remarks: 'The wholesome morality and enlarged policy of this passage makes it almost irresistible to the judgment; and, indeed, the reasoning seems positively unanswerable.' Story, Conf. L., Sec. 253. Can a man furnish another with the means of committing murder, or any abominable crime, knowing that the purchaser procures them and intends to use them for that purpose, and then pretend that he is not a participator in the guilt? Can he wrap himself up in his own selfishness and heartless indifference and say, 'What business is that of mine? Am I the keeper of another man's conscience?' No one can hesitate to say that such a man voluntarily aids in the perpetration of the offense and, morally speaking, is almost, if not quite, as guilty as the principal offender."

in the state of Rhode Island, were engaged in the business of catching and supplying menhaden, and possessed superior facilities for so doing. On the 3rd day of August, 1888, at Tiverton, the parties entered into an agreement. * * * By the terms of the contract expressed in writing, Church & Co. in effect agreed to deliver and Proctor in effect agreed to receive, such quantities of menhaden as might be reasonably required in his business, to be delivered and received during the period and at the place and price designated in the contract. * * * The meaning was that one of the parties should receive such quantities as his business required, and the obligation of the other party was to answer such requirements, but in no event to exceed their catch, as their undertaking was subject to the contingencies ordinarily incident to an enterprise of the character of that in which Church & Co. were engaged. * * *

So much as to the face of the contract and its meaning as interpreted with reference to the subject-matter generally, but it is said by Church & Co., that looking further to the subject-matter as disclosed by the record, the contract is altogether void, for the reason that it is against public policy. The ground of this objection, stated generally, is that Proctor, taking advantage of the scarcity of mackerel in 1888, conceived the idea of putting upon the markets generally the menhaden, as a food fish, split and salted, packed in barrels, tubs, pails, and other packages, and variously branded with misleading and deceptive marks and characters, as, for instance, "Alaska Mackerel, for Family Use." Proceeding upon the theory that the facts, if shown, would disclose a contract which would not be upheld, Church & Co. offered evidence to show the character of the marks and brands placed upon the casks and barrels containing the fish, and upon Proctor's objection, this evidence was excluded, subject to exception. At the conclusion of all the evidence in the case, the defendants moved for a verdict "on the ground that it appeared from the plaintiff's testimony that the purpose for which he intended to use and did use the fish which were the subject-matter of the contract sued upon was illegal, and against public policy, as being a fraud and an imposition on the public, and * * * illegal, in being in violation of chapter 114 of the Public Statutes of Rhode Island." The court below refused to direct the verdict, and the defendants excepted.

The record does not clearly show that Proctor's deceptive and unwarrantable purpose existed during the entire period covered by the contract, and for this reason the court below could not have properly directed a verdict upon the ground stated in the motion. We think, however, that Church & Co., under the line of defence disclosed, were entitled to show fully the purpose of Proctor at the time of the contract, the use which he made of the fish furnished, and the manner in which they were placed upon the market, and that the court erred in excluding evidence as to the marks and brands upon the casks and barrels. The evidence excluded was competent and material upon the issue raised by the defence, and would tend to show that the public was being deceived and cheated through false and misleading brands and characters used for the purpose of advancing the sale of a product beyond that which would result from its true merit.

The point is made that the Rhode Island statute does not apply, for the reason that the evidence shows that the fish in question were designated as "salted fish," while the statute has reference to "pickled fish." This is a distinction which the trade might make, but which, perhaps, the jury would not be required to make, or which, if made, might have been overcome by the jury in view of evidence that the fish were put up for the trade in barrels and casks and in closed packages of various forms. All pickled fish in the ordinary fish business are salted, although all salted fish are not pickled. In view of all the evidence, we cannot say that the jury would not have been warranted in finding that the witnesses in using the term "salted fish" intended to describe the fish in question as pickled. The purpose of the evidence, as to the manner of placing the fish upon the market, was a double one, first, to show that statute of Rhode Island was violated, and, second, to show a scheme which involved a fraud on the consumers of fish as an article of food. As bearing upon the general question whether Proctor's purpose and manner of doing business was such as to render the contract void as against public policy, we think the Rhode Island statute might properly be urged, and that it was material to know whether Proctor's manner of doing business conformed to the statute, or whether it was in plain violation of a statute intended to protect the public generally against fraud and imposition. Chapter 114 of the Public Statutes of Rhode Island, which was in force in 1888, provides, among other things, that "casks for menhaden and herrings shall be of the capacity to hold twenty-eight gallons," and "every cask before being packed or repacked for exportation shall be first searched, examined, and approved by a packer, and shall, when so packed or repacked for exportation, be branded legibly on one head with the kind of fish it contains and the weight thereof, or the capacity of the cask with the first letter of the Christian and the whole of the surname of the packer, the name of the town, and the words Rhode Island, in letters not less than three-fourths of an inch long, to denote that the same is merchantable and in good order for exportation." It is further provided, through section 8 of the same statute, that "every person who shall offer for sale in or attempt to export from the state any pickled fish which have not been approved by a sworn packer, or in casks which are not branded as aforesaid, shall forfeit fifty dollars for each offense." It is manifest that this statute regulating the packing of fish in Rhode Island was intended for the protection of the public generally, not Rhode Island consumers alone, but consumers generally. It was to prevent fraud upon the public, and public policy requires that no action shall be successfully maintained in favor of those who pack and ship food fish in open violation of the wholesome provisions of this statute. It is conceded that the plaintiff below not only did not conform to the statute, but that the packages were falsely marked. The maxim, "Ex dolo malo non oritur actio," fairly and forcibly applies to such a situation. If, upon a jury trial, the fact should be established that the packages prepared and shipped by Proctor were pickled fish, within the meaning of the Rhode Island statute, then for such time as he was actually engaged, or had the purpose to engage, in packing and shipping pickled fish, without conforming to the provisions of the statute, he would not be entitled to maintain his action for damages resulting from non-delivery of the subject-matter intended to be used in violation of the statute law. Bank v. Owens, 2 Pet. 527, 539; Miller v. Ammon, 145 U. S. 421, 12 Sup. Ct. 884; Forster v. Taylor, 5 Barn. & Adol. 887; Eaton v. Keegan, 114 Mass. 434; Pol. Cont. 322; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9; Benj. Sales, § 654.

Looking at the transaction aside from the local statute, and independent of the question whether the packages contained pickled or salted fish, the authorities conform to a wholesome and sound rule of public policy that no cause of action shall arise in behalf of a person engaged in a business which is illegal, or which is a fraud and imposition upon the public, and the law will not uphold or enforce a contract, or aid a party, where the purpose is to cheat and deceive the public generally. We feel bound to recognize the modern public policy indicated by the various statutes, as sustained by judicial authority, designed for the protection of the public, and which, in the interest of health and fair dealing, undertake to regulate traffic in food products. The point is taken that the purpose of Proctor to place this product (innocent of itself) upon the market in an improper manner was not known to Church & Co. at the time of the alleged breach, and that, therefore, the objection is not open to the defence. This is not an answer. The defence of public policy does not proceed so much upon the idea of relief to the defendant as protection to the public, by withholding legal remedy from a party contemplating or practising imposition. It would be a strange rule of law which would extend relief to a particeps criminis, and withhold relief from an innocent party who seeks to avail himself of its protection when the imposition is discovered. Cowan v. Milbourn, L. R. 2 Exch. 230; Spotswood v. Barrow, 5 Exch. 110; Holman v. Johnson, Cowp. 341. The wholesome and salutary maxim, "Ex turpi causa non oritur actio," has been so far enlarged that it may now be said that the law will not afford a remedy to a wrongdoer in a scheme to deceive and defraud the public, and this modern doctrine does not depend upon the consideration, or the innocence, or lack of innocence, of the party who seeks to interpose the objection. It becomes a defence, and may be interposed whenever the fraud is discovered. It must be observed, however, that it would not always be enough to avoid a contract for a sale of articles innocent of themselves that the party who acquired them, or sought to acquire them, occasionally used them unlawfully. In order that this doctrine should operate in avoidance of a contract, except where the illegality involves life, or offences of the higher grade, it must appear that the party acquiring the product intended to use it unlawfully when the contract was made, or when possession was sought, or that he was engaged in a general scheme involving illegality, or the general purpose was to use the product in a deceptive and fraudulent manner. The record shows that the "plaintiff testified that under the arrangement contemplated by him, and the contract made with the defendants, the fish were to be landed at Still's Wharf, at Tiverton, in the State of Rhode Island, and immediately there split and salted, and packed up in barrels, tubs, pails, and other packages, and marked and branded and shipped to fill these orders to various parts of the country, and that all the fish that were actually received by him under this contract with the defendants, and otherwise during the season of 1888, at Tiverton, R. I., were so packed and marked there on the spot," and shipped from that point. It also shows that the barrels, casks, and packages were variously branded "Alaska Mackerel," "Russian Mackerel," "California Mackerel," "Family White Fish," and "Fat Family Silversides." It is obvious that the real object of marking the packages thus was to make the product "appear to be what it was not, and thus induce unwary purchasers,"—Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 15 Sup. Ct. 154,—who could not scrutinize the contents, to buy it as mackerel.

Humanity is entitled to know what it buys and consumes. Government is instituted and maintained, and law is administered, for the protection of the people; and justice influenced by enlightened public policy, and controlled by legal principles, requires that contracts shall not be upheld and enforced for the benefit of a wrongdoer, where the subject-matter thereof is designed to be used in furtherance of a business enterprise which contemplates imposition upon the general public through false, misleading, and deceptive brands and labels, placed upon sealed packages of food products in a manner calculated to deceive, and forward the sale of such articles for what they are not. Looking at the record as a whole, however, it does not clearly and distinctly appear when the plaintiff below entered upon such scheme or business, and for this reason we cannot say there was error in the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for the defendants. If upon any subsequent trial this issue should be raised, and evidence adduced in support thereof, we think the jury should be instructed that no damages can be recovered, and no action maintained, covering any period in which the plaintiff below contemplated, or was actually engaged, in placing upon the market the fish described in the contract, under false, deceptive, and misleading brands, designed to attract and induce trade. During the time he entertained such purpose (Cowan v. Milbourn, L. R., 2 Exch. 230, 236; Materne v. Horwitz, 101 N. Y. 469, 5 N. E. 331), or was actually engaged in such business, the law will not help him.⁶⁵ The verdict should be set aside for the reasons stated, and it becomes unnecessary to consider the other questions raised by the plaintiffs in error.

⁶⁵ Compare United States v. Dietrich, 126 Fed. 671, 674 (1904), where, in discussing a contract with the United States, lawful when made but which became unlawful by statute as soon as the other party became a Senator of the United

Judgment of the circuit court reversed; new trial ordered.

SIMON KULLMAN ET AL., RESPONDENTS, v. JACOB GREENEBAUM ET AL., APPELLANTS.

(Supreme Court of California, 1891. 92 Cal. 403, 28 Pac. 674, 27 Am. St. Rep. 150.)

The action was brought to recover the sum of eighteen thousand dollars for the conversion by the defendants of mining stocks belonging to the plaintiffs valued at that sum, which the defendants refused to deliver to the plaintiffs upon demand made upon them on the second day of December, 1886. The complaint alleges that thereafter, on the tenth of December, 1886, they were fraudulently induced to sign a pretended composition of the creditors of the defendants, which was fraudulent and void as to them by reason of secret preferences of other creditors, of which the plaintiffs were ignorant, and which they rescinded upon discovery of the fraudulent preferences. The plaintiffs recovered judgment for the whole amount claimed as the value of the stocks. Order denying a new trial. Defendant appealed.

McFARLAND, J.* The main question in this case is about the validity of a composition deed, by which the respondents and the other creditors of appellants agreed to receive pro rata the proceeds of the sale of appellants' assets, and thereupon to release them from all claims and demands. Respondents contend that said agreement is invalid, because a fraudulent preference was given to certain of the creditors who signed it, and the court below so found. The court found, as facts, that some of the creditors at first refused to sign the agreement, and that, to induce them to sign, "some of the relatives and friends of the defendants did pay such creditors the full amount of their several demands, with the knowledge, but without the direction of the defendants, and not out of the assets of the said defendants, nor under any promise or expectation of repayment, and thereby did make a preference of such creditors, and induced them to sign the said composition; and that such creditors did receive a larger proportion or sum than secured by said agreement; of all of which facts the plaintiffs at the time of signing such com-States, Van Devanter, J., said: "It is well established by the English courts and by the courts of this country, federal and state, that where performance of a contract or agreement, lawful in its inception, becomes unlawful by reason of any subsequent event, the contract or agreement is thereby dissolved or terminated, in so far as it remains executory, and both parties are excused from its further performance." position were ignorant, and upon the discovery thereof notified the defendants," etc.

We think that the ruling of the court below was right, and in line with the current of authorities. The general rule is correctly laid down in Story's Equity Jurisprudence, § 378; and we stated it quite fully in the recent case of O'Brien v. Greenebaum, ante, [92 Cal.] p. 104. It is strenuously argued by counsel for appellants that the principle does not apply here, for the reasons that the payments to the preferred creditors were not made by the debtors or their agents; and particularly that the payments were not made out of the debtors' assets,—that is, out of the actual and disposable property which they then had. It is to be noticed, however, that the appellants knew of these secret payments to preferred creditors; and as the utmost good faith is required in such transactions, the appellants can hardly be said to be innocent of the imposition practised upon respondents. But beyond all that, the rule does not, by any means, rest solely upon the participation of the debtor in the fraud, and the diminution of the actual assets. In a composition agreement each creditor is a party as to each other creditor, as well as to the debtor. "Creditors sign upon the consideration that others sign upon the same terms; and if they are deceived, they are misled into an act to which they might not otherwise have assented." (See Story's Eq. Jur., § 379, and notes.) Solinger v. Earle, 82 N. Y., 393, was a case where a brother-in-law (as in the case at bar) had given his note to induce a creditor to sign a composition deed; and in the opinion of the court in that case there is aptly expressed the views which are determinative of the point in question against appellants in the case at bar. The court says: "The agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants, to secure to the latter payment of a part of their debt in excess of the ratable proportion payable under the composition, was a fraud upon other creditors. The fact that the agreement to pay such excess was not made by the debtor, but by a third person, does not divest the transaction of its fraudulent character. A composition agreement is an agreement as well between the creditors themselves as between the creditors and their debtor. Each creditor agrees to receive the sum fixed by the agreement in full of his debt. The signing of the agreement by one creditor is often an inducement to the others to unite in it.⁶⁶ If the composition provides for a pro rata payment to all the creditors, a secret agreement, by which a friend of the debtor undertakes to pay to one of the creditors more than his pro rata share, to induce him to unite in the composition, is as much a fraud upon the other creditors as if the agreement was directly between the debtor and such creditor. It violates the principles of equity and the mutual confidence as between creditors upon which the agreement is based, and diminishes the motive of the creditor who is a party to the secret agreement to act in view of the common interest in making the composition. Fair dealing and common honesty condemn such a transaction." * * *

NATHAN F. HUCKINS v. IRA HUNT.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1885. 138 Mass. 366.)

Contract in two counts. The first count was upon a negotiable promissory note for $217.50, given to the plaintiff by the defendant; the second count was for a like amount, upon an account annexed, for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant before the making of the note. The case was submitted to the superior court, and, after judgment for the defendant, to this court, on appeal, upon agreed facts, the material parts of which appear in the opinion.

MORTON, C. J. The plaintiff does not contend that he is entitled to recover upon the note upon which his first count is founded. The note was given in consideration, and upon the secret agreement, that the plaintiff should execute a deed of composition entered into between the defendant and his creditors, which purported to treat all the creditors equally. The decisions are numerous and uniform that such a note is void. Harvey v. Hunt, 119 Mass. 279, and cases cited.

But he contends that he is entitled to recover the balance of his account, for which the note was given, in the same manner as if he had not executed the composition deed. In other words, his claim is that the law will regard the rights of the parties as if the composition deed and the corrupt agreement by which it was accompanied had never been made.

We do not understand this to be the law. If two persons make an illegal contract, being in pari delicto, so long as it remains executory, the law will not aid either party to enforce it; but, so far as it is executed, the law will not lend its aid to either party to relieve him several creditors. The engagement of each creditor to accept less than his claim is the consideration to each of the others for his like engagement. Each creditor signing has a right to assume that each one is to receive the benefit stipulated in the agreement; that it sets forth truly the terms of composition as to all the parties. Any separate agreement by which one of the creditors secures to himself benefits not conferred on the others, and which agreement is not disclosed to them before they sign the composition, is a fraud upon them." GILLILLAN, C. J., in Newell v. Higgins, 55 Minn. 82, 84-85 (1893).

from the consequences of the illegal contract, or to rescind it. Myers v. Meinrath, 101 Mass. 366. Houston v. Buffinton, 105 Mass. 399; Cranston v. Goss, 107 Mass. 439.

In the case at bar, the plaintiff executed the composition deed and received the amount provided for therein in full satisfaction and payment of his account. This operated as an extinguishment of his debt. The agreement with the defendant that he would pay the full amount of the debt in the future was illegal, and avoided the composition deed as to the other creditors. Partridge v. Messer, 14 Gray (Mass.) 180. But the plaintiff was bound by it, and cannot set up his own illegality to relieve himself from its consequences.

His debt has been discharged and extinguished, and the law leaves the parties in the position in which they have placed themselves, and will not furnish a remedy to either, to undo what has been done. Mallaieu v. Hodgson, 16 Q. B. 689.

⁶⁸ In Frost v. Gage, 3 Allen (Mass.) 560 (1862), a creditor who was a son of the debtor and who had promised his share under the assignment as a fraudulent preference to another creditor who was assignee for the benefit of creditors, all the creditors having released the debtor at the assignee's solicitation on the assignment being made by the debtor, was denied a recovery of his share under the assignment. Bigelow, C. J., for the court, said that while the defendant if he had not been assignee in possession of the assets could not have recovered on the agreement with plaintiff, the latter for a like reason "ought not to be allowed to recover. The fraud in which he participated, and by which he aided in inducing creditors to become parties to the release of their debtor, taints the whole transaction as to him, and deprives him of the right of maintaining an action to enforce in a court of law that part of the agreement of composition to which the secret agreement did not immediately relate. It may be suggested that the application of this rule leads in the present case to the result of leaving in the hands of the defendant, who was equally guilty with the plaintiff, the fruits of the fraud. But this is often the consequence of allowing a party to plead in defense the illegality of a transaction on which a cause of action is founded" (p. 563).

But in some states only the fraudulent preference is void, the composition standing and the fraudulent creditor being allowed to recover upon it, and only when the preference actually is paid to the creditor does it become voidable at the election of the other creditors. In Glens Falls Nat. Bank v. Van Nostrand, 85 N. Y. Supp. 50, 51-2 (1903), Spencer, J., said:

"The taking of a secret preference by a creditor joining in a composition agreement does not nullify the composition. The debtor and the preferred creditor both remain bound by its terms. Nonpreferred creditors may rescind if the secret agreement for preference has been executed, but so long as such agreement remains executory it is unenforceable because of its illegality and cannot be employed for any purpose. This is, in substance, the decision of the Court of Appeals in the case of Hanover Nat. Bank v. Blake, 142 N. Y. 404, and must be regarded as the settled law of the land." In 103 App. Div. 598 the judgment was "unanimously affirmed" without opinion. See accord Barlett v. Blaine, 83 Ill. 25 (1876). See also Lobdell v. State Bank of Nauvoo, 180 Ill. 56, 58-59 (1899); White v. Kuntz, 107 N. Y. 518 (1887).

CHAPTER IX.

CONTRACTS WITHIN THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS.¹

SECTIONS 4 AND 17 OF AN ACT FOR PREVENTION OF FRAUDS AND PERJURIES, ST. 29, CAR. II, C. 3 (1677).

IV. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That from and after the said four and twentieth day of June [1677] no action shall be brought^[1] whereby to charge any executor or administrator upon any special promise, to answer damages out of his own estate; (2) or whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriages of another person; (3) or to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage; (4) or upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them; (5) or upon any agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof; (6) unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, and signed ¹ On the authorship and general interpretation of the statute of frauds, see Crawford D. Hening, The Original Drafts of the Statute of Frauds and Their Authors, 61 U. of P. Law Rev. 283; George P. Costigan, Jr., Has There Been Judicial Legislation in the Interpretation and Application of the "Upon Consideration of Marriage" and Other Contract Clauses of the Statute of Frauds? 14 Ill. L. Rev. 1.

"When the law requires a thing to be recorded, or in writing, or under seal, or attested, these, often, are not requirements of the law of evidence. They are matters of form required, in some cases, as necessary to the constitution of a thing, as in the case of wills and deeds; in some, that the matter may be available as the ground of an action, as in the case of things included in ss. 4 and 17 of the Statute of Frauds. In any case they belong to the substantive law of particular subjects; and when testimony or facts offered in evidence are rejected as not conforming to these or the like requirements, it is the substantive law of the case that excludes them. [Note 1: When a judge says, 'I found my judgment on one of the most useful rules in the law, namely, that when parties have put their contract into writing, that writing determines what the bargain is' (Martin, B., in Langton v. Higgins, 4 H. & N. 402)—he is not stating a rule of evidence. As to the statute of frauds, see Bedell v. Tracy, 65 Vt. 494. As to the requirement of a seal, see Blewitt v. Boorum, 142 N. Y. 357].” Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 390-391 and note 1.

In James v. Smith, [1891] 1 Ch. 384, 386, Kekewich, J., said: "It is no part of my judicial duty to say whether on the whole the statute of frauds has been a beneficial or mischievous statute, as to which I am, of course, aware there have been many opinions. It is quite easy for the advocates on one side or the other to argue in any case from the separate points of view which they hold."

by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized.

XVII. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That from and after the said four and twentieth of June no contract for the sale of any goods, wares and merchandizes, for the price of ten pounds sterling^a or upwards, shall be allowed to be good, except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part of payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorized.

THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS' SECTIONS OF THE AMERICAN UNIFORM SALES ACT.

Sec. 3. Subject to the provisions of this act and of any statute in that behalf, a contract to sell or a sale may be made in writing (either with or without seal) or by word of mouth, or partly in writing and partly by word of mouth, or may be inferred from the conduct of the parties.

Sec. 4. (1) A contract to sell or a sale of any goods or choses in action of the value of five hundred dollars^a or upwards shall not be enforceable by action unless the buyer shall accept part of the goods or choses in action so contracted to be sold or sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the contract or in part payment, or unless some note or memorandum in writing of the contract or sale be signed by the party to be charged or his agent in that behalf. (2) The provisions of this section apply to every such contract or sale notwithstanding that the goods may be intended to be delivered at some future time or may not at the time of such contract or sale be actually made, procured, or provided, or fit, or ready for delivery, or some act may be requisite for the making or completing thereof, or rendering the same fit for delivery; but if the goods are to be manufactured by the seller especially for the buyer and are not suitable for sale to others in the ordinary course of the seller's business, the provisions of this section shall not apply. (3) There is an acceptance of good within the meaning of this section when the buyer, either before or after delivery of the goods, expresses by words or conduct his assent to becoming the owner of those specific goods.

SMITH v. CARROLL.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1886. 112 Pa. St. 390, 9 Atl. 24.)

Assumpsit to recover the amount of a certain legacy. The defendant, executor under the will, promised to pay the legacy although the entire personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts of decedent. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant took a writ of error.

^a The states usually adopted $50.00 as the amount, but some fixed a lower and some a higher amount even before the Uniform Sales Act was adopted.

^b The states adopting this act do not all adopt this sum. It varies from $50.00 to $2,500. Local statutes should be consulted.

GREEN, J.⁴ We think the radical difficulty in this case is that it is an action against one who is an executor, to hold him personally liable upon a verbal promise to pay a legacy. Since our act of April 26, 1855, (Purd. 724, pl. 4,) the decisions appear to be uniform that such a promise confers no right of action against the executor individually. * * *

In the following cases it was held that the existence of assets, when coupled with a verbal promise only, was not sufficient to impose an individual liability. In Okeson's Appeal, 59 Pa. St. 101, Sharswood, J., said:

"The cases appear to hold that, on a promise by an executor or administrator to pay a legacy or distribute share in consideration of assets, the consideration and promise must be co-extensive. Rann v. Hughes, 7 Term R. 350, note; Pratt v. Humphrey, 22 Conn. 317. However that may be, it is clear that the executor cannot be made liable de bonis propriis on an oral promise on the mere consideration of assets. That would be to charge him upon a promise to answer damages out of his own estate, and therefore within the act of April 26, 1855, (P. L. 308.) It has been accordingly held in Hay v. Green, 12 Cush. 282, that a verbal promise by an administrator to pay a distributive share in the estate of a decedent was within the statute of frauds, though there were assets; and in Philpot v. Briant, 4 Bing. 717, a promise, by the executor of an acceptor of a bill of exchange, to pay out of his own estate in consideration of forbearance, is held to be void if not in writing."

In Burt v. Herron, 66 Pa. St. 404, we said:

"To charge the executors, upon their own promise, with proof of assets, the action must have been against them personally, and their promise in writing, by the act of April 26, 1855."

Whether, therefore, there were assets in the hands of the defendant in this case or not, his verbal promise to pay the plaintiff her legacy imposed no personal liability upon him, and no right of action was thereby conferred. * * *

*Judgment reversed.*⁵

⁴ The statement of facts is abbreviated and parts of the opinion are omitted.

⁵ But in Mackin v. Dwyer, 205 Mass. 472 (1910), where the defendant besides being executor was specific devisee and where the promise to pay the general legacy to the plaintiff, though there was insufficient personalty, was made on condition that plaintiff would refrain from making a contest of the will, Morton, J., for the court said:

"We do not think that the promise comes within the statute. The defendant was, as he contends, executor by virtue of his appointment by the testator when the promise was made (Rand v. Hubbard, 4 Met. 252, 256), but the promise was for his own benefit and was an original and not a collateral undertaking on his part. By reason of the plaintiff's forbearance to contest the will he secured the undisputed confirmation of his title to the real estate which was specifically devised to him, and the plaintiff gave up and lost the opportunity to contest the allowance of the will. To permit the defendant to set

A. B. SMITH LUMBER CO. v. PORTIS BROTHERS.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas, 1919. 140 Ark. 356, 215 S. W. 590.)

Suit by Portis Bros. against the A. B. Smith Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

HUMPHREYS, J.⁶ * * * The question is: Was there any legal evidence to support the finding of the court that the undertaking was original? The record disclosed that appellant was a lumber company, and that appellees were merchants; that E. C. Eaker, representing appellant, bought a lot of piling from Charles McRiley; that as a part of the purchase price, he paid McRiley's mercantile account to appellees with a draft on appellant company; that he requested appellee to continue the credit to McRiley as before, as he had made arrangements to buy McRiley's output of piling; that appellee refused to do so without security; that Eaker then told him to let McRiley have goods to the amount of $400 every two weeks and he would pay for them. Charles McRiley gave testimony to the same effect. There was therefore sufficient legal evidence in the record to support the finding of the court that the undertaking on the part of appellant was original.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.⁷

up the state of frauds under such circumstances would be to allow him to perpetrate a fraud by means of it. Nelson v. Boynton, 3 Met. 396; Alger v. Scoville, 1 Gray, 391; Browne, St. Frauds (5th ed.), § 212. Moreover the promise of an executor, to come within the statute, must be to pay out of his own estate a debt or obligation primarily due from the estate of the deceased. In the present case the estate of the deceased did not owe and never has owed the plaintiff anything on account of the legacy, for the reason that it was a general one and there were no assets with which to pay it, the personal property being exhausted by the payment of debts and the expenses of administration, last sickness and funeral and of the specific legacies. There was therefore no debt due from the estate to which the defendant's promise as executor could apply, and for this reason also the promise was not within the statute."

See also Bellows v. Sowles, 57 Vt. 164 (1884).

⁷ Certain elementary truths about promises to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another are:

(1) There must be a debt or other liability to answer for coexistent with the duty to answer. If, therefore, a novation is accomplished through the new promise, the new promise is not within the statute. Frohardt v. Duff, 156 Ia. 144 (1912); Booth v. Elghmie, 60 N. Y. 238 (1875); Griffin v. Cunningham, 183 Mass. 505 (1903).

"A promise to pay the debt of a third person is not within the statute where it is agreed between the parties, the creditor, debtor and promisor, that the debt shall be extinguished and the creditor shall look only to the promisor for payment upon the new promise. In such case no other person remains liable for the debt but the promisor, and his undertaking is not collateral but original to pay his own debt, and not to answer for the debt of another. There is then what is known in the civil law as a delegation, and the creditor takes a new

DAVIS v. ABELL.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1919. 185 Ky. 843, 216 S. W. 104.)

Action by C. B. Davis against J. L. Abell, in which J. L. Abell made his answer a cross-petition against T. M. Davis and wife and a counterclaim against plaintiff. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals and defendant J. L. Abell cross-appeals. Affirmed in part on the original appeal, and reversed in part on cross-appeal.

SAMPSON, J.⁸ In 1911 four men, B. C. Davis, J. L. Abell, W. I. Clark, and T. M. Davis, organized a partnership under the firm style of Smithland Tile Company for the purpose of engaging in the business of manufacturing and selling brick and tile in the town of Smithland. They were equal in the business. C. B. Davis and Abell were solvent debtor, who is called the delegated debtor." Earl, C., in Meriden Britannia Co. v. Zingsen, 48 N. Y. 247, 250 (1872).

See note in 126 Am. St. Rep. 487, on what, within the meaning of the statute of frauds is a contract to answer for or pay the debt of another.

For the promise to be within the statute it must be collateral and not original, and to be collateral there must be a debt default or miscarriage to which it can be collateral. That may be a voidable contract obligation, like that of an infant in most jurisdictions. Dexter v. Blanchard, 11 Allen (Mass.) 365 (1865); Brown v. Farmers and Merchants Nat. Bank, 88 Tex. 265 (1895). On a guaranty of the contract of a person under disability, see 33 L. R. A. 359, note.

Whether the promise is original or collateral is often a question of fact. See 9 Ann. Cas. 895, note; Ann. Cas. 1915 B, 257, note; 126 Am. St. Rep. 487, note. To be collateral "it is always reducible to this form: 'Deal with X and if he does not pay you, I will.'" Huffcut's 2nd Amer. Ed. of Anson on Contracts, p. 82. If the promisor says, "Deal with X and I will see you paid," some courts treat the promise as original and some as collateral. It would seem to be one or the other as the facts of the case determine. See Pigott, B., in Mountstephen v. Lakeman, L. R. 7 Q. B. 196, 205 (1871). See Lakeman v. Mountstephen, L. R. 7, H. L. 17 (1874). See also, 5 B. R. C. 99, note.

(2) The liability, as in the principal case, may be prospective. That is, the special promise will be within the statute even though it alone induced the creation of the principal debt. Moses v. Norton, 36 Me. 113 (1853); Matthews v. Milton, 4 Yerg. (Tenn.) 576 (1833).

(3) Under "debt, default or miscarriages" are included tort liabilities and, indeed, all civil liabilities. Kirkham v. Marter, 2 B. & Ald. 613 (1819).

(4) The promise to pay the debt is not within the statute if made to the debtor; for the promise to come under the statute must be one to pay the debt of another, and while "another" might have been construed to mean merely another than the promisor it has been construed to mean another than either the promisee or the promisor, and, therefore, the statute applies only to promises made to the person or persons to whom another is answerable. S. Landow & Co. v. Gurian (Conn.), 107 Atl. 517 (1919); Meyer v. Hartman, 72 Ill. 442 (1874); Goetz v. Foos, 14 Minn. 265 (1869); Staver Carriage Co. v. Jones, 32 Okla. 713 (1912); Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 A. & E. 438 (1840). That is seemingly due to the notion that the mischief sought to be remedied by the statute was perjured claims by creditors that promises had been made to them.

⁸ Parts of the opinion are omitted.

while T. M. Davis and Clark had little or no property. T. M. Davis was the son of C. B. Davis, and it appears from the evidence that the son was taken into the partnership at the instance and request of the father, and upon the assurance of the father that the son's obligation incurred by reason of the partnership, and on its account would be assumed and paid by the father. * * *

Appellant's chief contention is that C. B. Davis is not liable for that part of the partnership obligation which was primarily due from his son T. M. Davis, in the absence of a writing to that effect, and he seeks to avoid responsibility for this one-fourth of the debts on the ground that one is not bound for the debt or default of another, unless his undertaking be in writing and signed by the person to be charged, and he cites the statute of frauds. While this is ordinarily the rule, and the statute of frauds is applied in such case, it has no application here, because the indebtedness is that of the firm of which C. B. Davis was a member and as such liable for the entire indebtedness. In other words, the obligations of the firm were the obligations of C. B. Davis, and his promise to pay the debt of the firm was the promise to pay his own debt, and, this being true, it takes the case out of the statute of frauds. The promise of Davis made to the bank and other creditors, appears to be reasonably well established by the evidence and is binding, and it may be enforced, though not in writing and signed by the party to be charged. * * *

WOLFF & HENRICKS v. KOPPEL.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1843. 5 Hill 453.)

Error to the New York C. P., where Koppel sued Wolff & Henricks to recover the price of certain goods alleged to have been sold by the latter as factors acting under a del credere commission. The agreement del credere was by parol; and one point made in the court below was ⁹ "The debt of a partnership is the debt of each of its members, and a new promise by one or more of the partners, made after the dissolution of the firm, to pay a partnership debt, is not, within the meaning of the statute of frauds, a promise to pay the debt of another." "A corporation is, in law, a different person from any of its members. A promise by a stockholder to pay a corporation debt is in every sense a promise to pay the debt of another." Campbell, J., in Hanson v. Donkersley, 37 Mich. 184, 186 (1877). See Home Nat. Bank v. Estate of Waterman, 134 Ill. 461 (1890); Richardson Press v. Albright, 224 N. Y. 497 (1918). that the defendant's engagement, not being in writing, was void by the statute of frauds. The court held otherwise; and, after judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants sued out a writ of error.

COWEN, J.¹⁰ It is objected that the contract of a factor, binding him in the terms implied by a del credere commission, is within the statute of frauds and should, therefore, be in writing. * * * But a guaranty, though by parol is not always within the statute. Perhaps, after all, it may not be strictly correct to call the contract of the factor a guaranty, in the ordinary sense of that word. The implied promise of the factor is merely that he will sell to persons in good credit at the time; and in order to charge him, negligence must be shown. He takes an additional commission, however, and adds to his obligation that he will make no sales unless to persons absolutely solvent; in legal effect, that he will be liable for the loss which his conduct may bring upon the plaintiff, without the onus of proving negligence. The merchant holds the goods, and will not part with them to the factor without this extraordinary stipulation, and a commission is paid to him for entering into it. What is this, after all, but another form of selling the goods? Its consequences are the same in substance. Instead of paying cash, the factor prefers to contract a debt or duty which obliges him to see the money paid. This debt or duty is his own, and arises from an adequate consideration. It is contingent, depending on the event of his failing to secure it through another—some future vendee, to whom the merchant is first to resort. Upon non-payment by the vendee, the debt falls absolutely on the factor. As remarked by Parker, Ch. J., in Swan v. Nesmith, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 220, the form of the action does not seem to be material in such case; that is to say, whether the merchant sue for goods sold, or on the special engagement. The latter is perhaps the settled form; but still the action is, in effect, to recover the factor's own debt. In the late case of Johnson v. Gilbert, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 178, the defendant, in consideration of money paid for him by the plaintiff, assigned a chattel note and guaranteed its payment. In such a case the declaration must be on the guaranty to pay the debt of another; but this is so in form merely. We held that the contract was to pay the defendant's own debt; that it was not a contract to pay as the surety of another. All such contracts and many others are, in form, to pay the debt of another, and so literally within the statute, but without its intent. A promise by A to B, that the former will pay a debt due from the latter, is not within the meaning, though it is within the words. Conkley v. Hopkins, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 113; Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Ad. & Ell. 438. So are a numerous class of cases, where the promise is made in consideration of the creditor relinquishing some lien, fund or security. Theobald, Pr.

and Surety, 45, and cases cited. The merchant gives up his goods to be sold, and pays a premium. Is not this in truth as much and more than many of those cases require which go on the relinquishment of a security? Suppose a factor agrees by parol to sell for cash, but gives a credit. His promise is virtually that he will pay the amount of the debt he thus makes. Yet who would say his promise is within the statute? The amount of the argument for the defendant would seem to be, that an agent for making sales, or indeed, a collecting agent, cannot, by parol, undertake for extraordinary diligence, because he may thus have the debt of another thrown upon him. But the answer is, that all such contracts have an immediate respect to his own duty or obligation. The debt of another comes incidentally as a measure of damages.

CINCINNATI TRACTION CO. v. COLE.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 1919. 258 Fed. 169, 169 C. C. A. 237.)

Action by James O. Cole and others, as executors of Clinton Crane, partners as C. Crane & Co., against the Cincinnati Traction Company, There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

COCHRAN, J.¹² * * * The trial was by jury, and the principal error assigned is the overruling of defendant's motion for a directed verdict. * * *

The motion was based upon two grounds. One was that the promise, the basis of the action, was one to answer for the debt of another, and, not being in writing or evidenced thereby, was void under the Ohio statute of frauds (section 8621, General Code of Ohio), which is in the usual form of such statutes. We proceed to consider this ground before stating the other.

The promise was claimed to have been on or about November 9, 1909. If made at all, the conditions under which it was made were these: The Heffron Construction Company had then nearly completed ¹¹ This judgment was affirmed by the Court for the Correction of Errors, in Wolff & Henricks v. Koppel, 2 Denio (N. Y.) 368 (1845).

That a del credere factor's contract is not within the statute is conceded. Conturlier v. Hastie, 8 Exch. 40 (1852). See Sutton & Co. v. Grey, [1894] 1 Q. B. 285. In 3 Williston on Contracts, § 484, the suggestion in the principal case that this is because the guaranty by the agent is a mere incident of the larger transaction is seemingly approved. But see Professor Henning's explanation in note 13, post, this chapter.

a contract with defendant, made March 30th, previously, by which it was to do certain work on its premises for $15,561.75, of which $9,548.78 had been paid, upon monthly estimates, to an assignee of the Heffron Company, and possibly as much as $2,000 more had been earned, the larger part of which was retained percentage. That company was indebted to plaintiffs in the sum of $2,949.20 for lumber used in that work. Plaintiffs had a right to take out a lien on defendant's premises therefor, which would be unaffected by the assignment or payments thereunder. Section 8334, General Code of Ohio. The defendant, by its contract, had the right to retain out of subsequent payments an amount sufficient to indemnify it against this lien, and, in case of deficiency, had recourse against the Heffron Company and a surety company to make it good.

Plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the making of the promise came about by their refusal to deliver more lumber needed to complete the contract, that it was made in consideration of their promise to continue delivering and not to take out a lien, and that it was to pay plaintiffs, at least conditionally (i. e., if the Heffron Company did not), both for the lumber previously delivered and that thereafter delivered. Thereafter plaintiff delivered lumber which came to $524.71, making the whole amount due them $3,474.06, for the recovery of which the action was brought. * * *

The plaintiff in error bases its contention that the promise sued on was within the statute and hence void, solely upon the fact that, so far as plaintiff's evidence tended to establish the making thereof, it was only a conditional promise; i. e., a promise to pay if the Heffron Company did not. If this did not bring it within the statute, it does not contend that it was within it. The charge of the lower court to the jury presupposed that it was a question for them whether such was the character of the promise. They were told that, if such was its character, there could be no recovery, and that they could find for plaintiffs only in case they determined that the promise was an absolute one; i. e., "to pay—not if the Heffron Company did not pay, but pay anyhow." They were further charged that the written assurance was not sufficient to take the promise out of the statute, for two reasons, to wit, want of authority on the part of the officer of defendant, who had given it, to give it, and the necessity of parol evidence to explain a reference in the letter from plaintiffs, to which it was an answer.

The position of plaintiff in error, that the only promise which plaintiff's evidence tended to establish was a conditional promise, is difficult to combat. The sole witness thereto testified, on cross-examination, that the "precise language" used was, "we will pay this account if Heffron Construction Company does not," and that the language was in substance, "We will see that this account is paid if the Heffron Construction Company does not pay it." His testimony on direct examination is not inconsistent with such having been the language used, and all other pertinent evidence, apart, perhaps, from the absolute assurance referred to, tended to make out a conditional promise; and we will dispose of the case on the assumption that such was the character of the promise. The plaintiff in error is now so cocksure that, this being so, the promise was within the statute and it was entitled to a directed verdict, that we eliminate every other consideration bearing on its being so entitled on this ground, in order that we may meet it where it has chosen to rest its case. Possibly it was not always of this view, i. e., not until after the lower court had charged that, if such was the character of the promise, there could be no recovery. This may account for its not having requested the peremptory instruction until after the jury had been charged.

The plaintiff in error's contention amounts to this: that every conditional promise to pay the debt of a third person is within the statute. Is this so? To answer this question it is necessary to interpret the statute. A statute may be viewed as a symbol. A symbol has been defined to be "a soul in a body." Rather, perhaps, it should be put that it is a body with a soul. Its phraseology is its body, and its thought is its soul. Sometimes the thought of a statute and its phraseology do not coincide. Where such is the case, it is its thought, and not its phraseology, which is the statute. The sole description of what is covered by the statute here is "a special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person."¹⁸ We take ¹⁸ Do the words "any special promise" in debt, default or miscarriage clause of section 4 of the statute mean anything different from the words "contract" and "agreement?" It is generally assumed in the cases and text books that they do not, but in an article in 57 U. of P. Law Rev. 611, entitled, A New and Old Reading on the Fourth Section of the Statute of Frauds, Professor Crawford D. Henning insists that they do. He declares that "special promise" means "special assumpsit" (Id., 615), and was used in contradistinction to debt and account. The statute was not meant to prevent the creation of debts without writing, but was meant to prevent the enforcement of oral special promises to answer for the debts of others.

Analyzing the situations to which the guaranty clause of the statute may be applied into (A), promises made when the debt of the other person is contracted and (B), promises made afterwards to pay a pre-existing debt, he resolves them as follows:

In situation (A), if by the oral transaction the defendant became a debtor, the statute had no application, but if he became a special promisor to answer for the credit given to another, i. e., for the debt of another, the statute applied.

In situation (B), where there is a substitution of debtors—a novation—there is a new debt and not a special promise and the statute does not apply. Where there is a debt created against the new party who comes in, even if the old debtor still remains a debtor and is to have his debt paid by the discharge by payment of the newcomer's debt, the same thing, says Professor Henning, should be true.

He says: "In other words, I submit that in the English law of contracts at it that it is the thought of the statute that it is only a conditional promise to pay the debt of a third person—i. e., to pay it if he does not—that is covered by the statute; for it is only such a promise that is a promise to answer for the debt of another within its meaning. It follows that an absolute promise to pay a debt of a third person is not within the statute. Gibbs v. Blanchard, 15 Mich. 292; National Bank v. State Bank, 93 Iowa, 650, 61 N. W. 1065, 57 Am. St. Rep. 284; Lakeman v. Mount Stephen, L. R. 7 Eng. & Ir. App. 17.

In Wald's Pollock on Contracts (3d Ed. by Williston) p. 170, it is said:

"A promise to be primarily liable, or to be liable at all events, the date of the statute, there were three species of simple contractual liability, as later set forth in Buller's Nisi Prius, p. 126:

"(1) Accountability, dependent upon a bailment.

"(2) Debt, dependent upon quid pro quo, which might arise upon sale or loan or on some act done on request.

"(3) Assumpsit or special promise dependent upon consideration.

"I shall endeavor to show that the practical distinction between these three species of contract was the reason why the English Parliament endeavoring, in 1677, to suppress the perjurous falsification of parol guaranties denounced parol special promises or assumpsits, but left untouched parol debts, and parol accountabilities; and finally it is proposed to show that the distinction thus made by the British Parliament should still be preserved between these three species of contract in order to apply the statute today to the effective suppression of perjury" (p. 615).

A perusal of the article is recommended, but one special argument in it should be noted here. In determining whether the new party becomes a debtor the old law, of course, must be regarded. "Before the statute [of frauds] forbearance [to sue plaintiff's debtor or forbearance] in any form whatever [would not give rise to a debt but] was only a consideration. Before the statute forbearance to sue was never known to create a debt" (p. 617). "English courts have ever since 1677 consistently treated cases of forbearance as cases within the statute" (p. 618). "But unfortunately, some American decisions, wholly at variance with the above line of English cases, adopt as a criterion a question of fact requiring due process of judicial telepathy for its determination—whether the defendant's main or only his subordinate purpose was to pay the debt of another; and whether his main or only his subordinate purpose was to subserve some purpose of his own" (p. 621). In a note it is added that many of the cases laying down this main purpose test "will be found on scrutiny to be cases of bailments or receiverships to account" (p. 621, n).

Professor Hening thus justifies the del credere agency cases as without the intent of the statute and what the English judges call the property cases, namely, the cases holding "that the surrender of property to the defendant on which the plaintiff has a lien in exchange for the defendant's promise to pay the thus secured debt of a third person is not a special promise to answer for the debt of another within the statute" (p. 632) he explains as either cases where the defendant under the arrangement became a debtor or where he became a bailee to sell and account and so his promise was without the intent of the statute.

See also Charles K. Burdick, Suretyship and the Statute of Frauds, 20 Col. L. Rev. 153; John Delaire Falconbridge, Guarantees and the Statute of Frauds, 68 U. of Pa. L. Rev. 1, 137.

whether any third person is or shall become liable or not, is not within the statute, and need not be in writing."

But it does not follow that, because a conditional promise only is within the statute, every such promise is within it, or, to go back to the phraseology of the statute, that because a promise to answer for the debt of another person only is within the statute that every promise to do so is within it. Whether every such promise is within it depends on its thought; for, as stated, the thought of the statute, and it alone, is the statute. A close observation of its phraseology takes note of the fact that it says nothing whatever as to the person to whom the promise is made. Seemingly, therefore, a promise of the character called for, made to any person, is within it. But, indisputably, such is not the case. Amongst the differences as to what is within the statute there is none here. In the case of Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 A. & E. 438, it was held that a promise for a sufficient consideration made to the debtor to pay his debt is not within the statute. Lord Denman said:

"The statute applies only to promises made to the person to whom another is answerable."

Wald's Pollock on Contracts (3d Ed. by Williston) p. 170, puts it that a promise is not within the statute "unless it is made to the principal creditor."

The case of Eastwood v. Kenyon, decided in 1840, is the first case in which this question seems to have arisen. The position was not argued out. It was taken per saltum. The only possible ground upon which it can be based is that a promise which is not made to the person to whom the third person is answerable—i. e., to the creditor—is not within the thought of the statute. That such a promise is not within its thought suggests that possibly there may be other promises to answer for the debt of a third person which are not within its thought, and hence not covered by the statute. And so we find. The clause of the statute of frauds involved here is the second clause of the original statute of Charles II. The first clause thereof provides that no action shall be brought "whereby to charge any executor or administrator upon any special promise to answer damages out of his own estate." These two clauses are found in juxtaposition in the same section of the Ohio statute, but in the reverse order. This first clause expressly limits the promise covered by it to a promise to answer out of the promisor's own estate. This suggests that it is the thought of the second clause that the promise covered by it is a promise to answer out of the promisor's own estate, and that therefore it does not cover a promise to answer out of the debtor's estate which may be in the promisor's hands. It is so held, and as to this, too, there is no difference of opinion. Throop on Verbal Agreements, § 13, says:

"And there is a class of cases under the second clause, not appearing to depend upon its wording, which bears a very close resemblance with respect to the principle which governs them, and the facts calling for its application to a corresponding class under the first clause. We refer to those where the promise to pay the debt of another is held to be good without writing, because the promisor held a fund proceeding from the debtor and applicable to the fulfillment of the promise, in contemplation of which the promise was made. The similarity in the situation of the promisor under such circumstances, and that of an executor or administrator having sufficient assets to pay the debt of the decedent, and who, in consideration thereof verbally undertakes to pay it, is very striking. And the principle upon which each description of promise has been held to be without the statute is substantially the same. For while the first clause expressly provides that it shall be applicable only to a promise by the executor or administrator to answer damages out of his own estate, the second manifestly has the same meaning with respect to a liability incurred by one person to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another."

The authorities are numerous to the effect that a promise to answer for the debt of a third person out of such person's funds, in the promisor's hands, is not within the statute. We cite only the authoritative case of Eastbrook v. Gebhart, 32 Ohio St. 415. The third paragraph of the syllabus, which gives the law of the case, is in these words:

"E contracts with S to build a house, and S contracts with G to furnish labor and materials. G refuses to furnish such labor and materials except upon promise, made to him by E that he himself will pay the bill out of the funds coming to S. Held to be a contract not within the statute of frauds, so as to make a writing necessary."

The Supreme Court said:

"The first part of the charge relates to the nature of the alleged promise made by Estabrook. The court told the jury plainly that, if this promise was merely to answer for Showalter's debt, there could be no recovery for want of writing; but if there was a new contract between Gebhart and Estabrook, by which, to induce Gebhart to furnish the labor and material, Estabrook undertook to pay, out of the funds which would be coming to Showalter, that Gebhart furnished the * * * material relying on this promise, which he would not otherwise have done, and that Showalter was irresponsible and assented to this arrangement, then the contract might be enforced."

But this does not exhaust all the possibilities of a promise to answer for the debt of another, not being within the thought of the statute, and hence not within it. We have already noted that the statute says nothing whatever as to the person to whom the promise is made. It is equally silent as to the person by whom it is made. Seemingly, therefore, a promise of the character called for, made by any person, is within the statute. But is this so? Our observation of the statute has brought to our attention that its phraseology is indefinite in three particulars, to wit, as to the person to whom it is made, as to the estate out of which the promisor is to answer for the debt, and as to the person by whom the promise is made. We have found that, though the statute is indefinite in phraseology in the first two particulars, it is definite in its thought as to each of them. In view of this, one would naturally expect it to be definite, also, in thought in the third particular, thus making it definite in thought all around. And the means of making it is at hand, just as it is at hand in the other two particulars. In the first particular, it consists in the radical difference between the creditor and any other person; and in the second, in such difference between the promisor's own estate and that of the debtor. So in the third particular it consists in the radical difference between a promisor who has no personal concern in the debt of the third person, and one who has such concern therein. Possibly, if one is duly sympathetic, he will sense that it is the thought of the statute that it is a promise made by a person who has no personal concern in the debt, and none other, which is covered by it, just as it was sensed that it was its thought that it was a promise made to the creditor, and none other, which is so covered. And it seems fitting that, if it is only a promise made to the creditor to answer for the debt out of the promisor's own estate that is within the thought of the statute, that it is only such a promise made by one who has no personal concern in the debt that is within its thought. Why should one who has no personal concern in the debt and one who has be placed on the same footing? The object in view in the enactment of the original statute of frauds is thus stated therein:

"For the prevention of many fraudulent practices which are commonly endeavored to be upheld by perjury and subornation of perjuries."

The interest prompting a legislature to protect from perjury is not the same in the case of one who has a personal concern in the debt as in that of one who has no such concern therein. Where the promisor has a personal concern in the debt, the making of the promise is not dependent solely on the testimony of witnesses. The fact of having such concern is a corroborating circumstance in support of testimony tending to show the making of the promise. It renders its making more likely.

These circumstances tend to lead one to take the position, independent of authority, that it is only a promise made by one who has no personal concern in the debt that is within the thought of the statute and hence within the statute itself. When we come to tradition, we find numerous decisions, some of which are authoritative as to us, in which the promise involved has been held not to be covered by the statute, which can be, and which, in our judgment, should be, placed on this ground. The personal concern of the promisor in the debt may be either in its creation or in its payment. It is in its creation, if it is made before or at the time of the creation of the debt. It is in its payment, if made after the creation thereof. The decisions which are authoritative as to us were in cases where the personal concern of the promisor was in the creation of the debt. They are Emerson v. Slater, 22 How. 28, 16 L. Ed. 360; Davis v. Patrick, 141 U. S. 479, 12 Sup. Ct. 58, 35 L. Ed. 826; Crawford v. Edison, 45 Ohio St. 239, 13 N. E. 80. * * *

We know no authoritative case where the promise was made after the creation of the debt and the personal concern of the promisor was in its payment. But numerous cases of this character can be cited, the decision in which that the promise was not within the statute can and should be placed on the ground that, as the promisor had personal concern in the payment of the debt the promise was not within the thought of the statute. We cite but two, to wit, the early case of Williams v. Leper, 3 Burrow, 1886, and that of Landis v. Royer, 59 Pa. 95.

The promise sued on in Williams v. Leper was made to a landlord, who was about to distrain the goods of the tenant for arrears of rent, by one to whom the tenant had conveyed his goods for the benefit of his creditors. That sued on in Landis v. Royer was made to a materialman, who supplied lumber to a contractor in erecting a house for the promisor, and who had a right to take out a mechanic's lien on the building. Judge Sharswood said:

"It was the debt of the defendant's own building, the payment of which could legally be enforced against-it; though it may not have been personally his debt, his property was answerable for it, and his engagement to pay was in relief of his property."

Judge Campbell, in the course of his opinion in Corkins v. Collins, 16 Mich. 478, thus put the matter:

"When, by the release of the property from a lien, the party promising to pay the debt is enabled to apply it to his own benefit, so that the release inures to his own advantage, it is quite easy to see that a promise to pay the debt in order to obtain the release may be properly regarded as made on his own behalf, and not on behalf of the original debtor, and any possible advantage to the latter is merely incidental, and is not the thing bargained for. That promise is therefore in no proper sense a promise to answer for anything but the promisor's own responsibility, and need not be in writing."

In cases of this kind the promisor is personally concerned in the payment of the debt, for thereby his property is relieved of it. Possibly there is stronger reason for saying that the promise in cases of this kind is not within the statute than that in cases of the other kind. The ground upon which this may be so is this: According to the phraseology of the statute, the only promise which is within it is one to answer for the debt of another person. This means that the debt shall be solely and exclusively the debt of the third person, and not that of the promisor. Where the creditor has a lien, or the right to take out a lien, on the property of the promisor to secure the debt, it may be said that in a sense it is not solely and exclusively the debt of the third person, but is also the debt of the promisor. This is so, in that the property of the promisor is obligated to the payment of the debt. If this reasoning is sound, then it can be said that the ground upon which such a promise is not within the statute is that it is not covered by its phraseology.

This, however, cannot be said of the promise in cases of the other kind. But in reality, notwithstanding the creditor has such lien, or the right to take it out, the debt is solely and exclusively the debt of the third person. In no real sense is it the debt of the promisor. The ground, therefore, upon which to place it that the promise is not within the statute, is that which we have set forth. The statute, according to its thought, covers only a promise to answer for the debt of a third person by one who has no personal concern in the debt. It does not cover a promise by one who has a personal concern therein; and in such a case the promisor has such concern. His property is obligated for it, and by its payment will be relieved of the obligation. If, then, such is the true ground thereof, it follows that in any case where the promisor has a personal concern in the debt, whatever may be the basis thereof, the promise is not within the thought of the statute, and hence not within the statute. The decisions in cases of this kind, therefore, that the promise is not within the statute, indirectly uphold the position that the promise in cases of the other kind are not within it.

We have stated that these decisions can and should be placed on the ground that the statute only covers a promise made by a person who had no personal concern in the creation or payment of the debt, as the case may be, the promises involved therein not being so made, but by one who had such concern, not that they were actually placed on this ground.

Indeed it cannot be said that the courts who rendered them were clearly conscious that the decisions could be justified on the reasoning which we have put forth. From the quotations made it will be seen that the ground expressed is that the leading object of the promisors is to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of the promisor. Sometimes the ground is stated to be that a new consideration or benefit has moved to the promisor; and the fact of personal concern has a tendency to support the contention that the promise was absolute, and not a conditional one, and hence not within the statute on this ground. The decisions themselves have been much criticized, though it is recognized that what they stand for is established law. It has been urged that such promises come within the terms or language of the statute, that to exclude them is judicial legislation and that the rule which they establish is anomalous. It has been suggested that, if the promisor is to be liable at all, it should not be on the promise, but in quasi contract for the benefit received.

The decisions have also been a source of error in the reasoning on which they have been based, in that it has sometimes been thought that they were authority for the position that, in every case where a consideration moves to the promisor, the promise is within the statute, which is not the case. We would submit that the position that it is the thought of the statute that only a promise by a person who has no personal concern in the creation or payment of the debt to which it relates is within it is reasonable. It cannot be said that a promise by a person who has such concern therein is within the terms or language of the statute. The statute is silent as to the person by whom the promise is made. It is no more within the terms or language thereof than a promise to answer otherwise than out of the promisor's own estate, or than a promise to answer to the debtor or one other than the creditor. The position, therefore, reads no exception into the statute. It is simply one of three limitations on its scope, which one is constrained to put when one passes through its unlimited phraseology to its thought and looks at that phraseology from the other side. And there is nothing in this position that is calculated to lead one into error. Of course, some limitation must be put upon the words "personal concern." The concern must be such as that which existed in the cases cited and others like unto them; i. e., immediate and pecuniary.

If, then, the views here advanced are sound, a full expression of the thought of the statute as to the character of the promise covered by it would be somewhat like this: It is a promise to answer for the debt of another (i. e., to pay if he does not), made to the creditor by one who has no personal concern in the debt, the answering therefor to be out of his own estate.

Wald's Pollock on Contracts (3d Ed. by Williston) p. 169, characterizes the contract to which the statute relates as "a contract of suretyship or guaranty." Ames, in his Lectures on Legal History, p. 95, characterizes it as "guaranty." And such is what we take to be the ordinary conception of a contract of suretyship or guaranty. In order, then, to bring a promise within the statute, it is not sufficient that it is a promise to answer for the debt of another; i. e., to pay his debt if he does not. The promise must also be to the creditor by one who has no personal concern in the debt, and to pay same out of his own estate. Though it may be a conditional promise, if it is not to the creditor, or not by one who has no personal concern in the debt, or is not to pay it out of the promisor's own estate, it is just as much not within the statute as it would have been, had it been, not a conditional, but an absolute, promise.

We come now to apply the legal positions thus advanced to the case in hand. The defendant had a personal concern in the creation of so much of the debt as was created after the making of the promise, and in so much thereof as had been theretofore created. It had such concern in the creation of the former portion, for it would result from plaintiffs' continuing to deliver lumber, and thereby the completion of the work which the Heffron Company had contracted to do would be furthered. It had such concern in the payment of the latter portion, for thereby its property would be relieved of the lien which plaintiff had a right to take out. Such being the case, the defendant's promise, whatever may have been its character, was not within the statute.

But this is not the only ground upon which it can be said that the promise was not within the statute. To say the least, it was open for the jury to find that the promise was to answer for the debt, not out of its own estate, but out of the Heffron Company's funds. There yet remained to be paid it under the contract over $6,000, of which over $2,000 had been already earned. By the company's contract with defendant it had the right to apply subsequent payments to this indebtedness, and under the contract, and the bond given simultaneously therewith, defendant had recourse against it and the surety company for any deficiency. It must be held, therefore, that this ground of the motion for a peremptory instruction is not well taken. * * *

*Finding none of the assignments well taken, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.*¹⁴

ALDRICH v. AMES.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1857. 9 Gray 76.)

SHAW, C. J.¹⁵ * * * The case in substance, is, that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, and for a valuable consideration, became bail for John A. Crehore, upon which the defendant promised the plaintiff to indemnify and save him harmless.

The ground of defense is, that this was an alleged promise of the defendant to pay the debt of another, and therefore that the action cannot be maintained without an agreement in writing, because it is within the statute of frauds.

The court are of opinion that this ground is wholly untenable. This is a promise by the defendant to another, to pay his debt, or, in other words, to save him from the performance of an obligation which might result in a debt. But it is a promise to the debtor to pay his debt, and thereby to relieve him from the payment of it himself, which is not within the statute of frauds.

¹⁴ On promise to pay debt of another in consideration of relinquishment of lien by promisee as within the statute of frauds, see Ann. Cas. 1913 D, 319, note.

¹⁵ Part of the opinion is omitted.

The theory of the statute of frauds is this; that when a third party promises the creditor to pay him a debt due to him from a person named, the effect of such a promise is to become a surety or guarantor only, and shall be manifested by written evidence. The promise in such case is to the creditor, not to the debtor. For instance, if A, a debtor, owes a debt to B, and C promises B, the creditor, to pay it, that is a promise to the creditor to pay the debt of A. But in the same case, should C, on good consideration, promise A, the debtor, to pay the debt to B and indemnify A from the payment, although one of the results is to pay the debt to B, yet it is not a promise to the creditor to pay the debt of another, but a promise to the debtor to pay his debt.

This rule appears to us to be well settled as the true construction of the statute, well confirmed by authorities. Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Ad. & El. 438, and 3 P. & Dav. 276; Harrison v. Sawtel, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 242; Chapin v. Merrill, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 657; Chapin v. Lapham, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 467; Alger v. Scoville, 1 Gray (Mass.) 395.

Exceptions [by defendant] overruled.

JOHN HARTLEY, DEFENDANT IN ERROR, v. CORNELIUS SANFORD, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1901. 66 N. J. L. 627, 50 Atl. 454, 55 L. R. A. 206.)

Action by John Hartley against Cornelius Sandford. Judgment for plaintiff (48 Atl. 1009), and defendant brings error. Reversed.

DIXON, J.¹⁶ The material facts in this case, as disclosed by the record, are that the defendant's son was indebted to M., who desired additional security; that thereupon the defendant applied to the plaintiff to become surety for the son, and promised him that, if he was compelled to pay the debt, he (the defendant) would reimburse him; that accordingly the plaintiff became surety for the son, and subsequently was obliged to pay the debt. This suit was brought upon the promise, which was oral only. It appears that at the trial in the Passaic circuit the jury were instructed to find for the plaintiff if they were satisfied the promise had been made, but the question as to the legal sufficiency of the promise was reserved and certified to the supreme court, which afterwards advised the circuit that the promise was valid, and thereupon judgment was entered on the verdict. * * *

The advice of the supreme court was based upon its opinion that under the adjudications in this state the promise of one person to indemnify another for becoming surety of a third is not within the statute. The cases cited in that opinion to support this view are Apgar's Adm'rs v. Hiler, 24 N. J. Law, 812; Cortelyou v. Hoagland, 40 N. J. Eq. 1; and Warren v. Abbett (N. J. Sup.) 46 Atl. 575. Of these, the only one of controlling authority here is that of Apgar's Adm'rs v. Hiler, which is a decision of this court. That decision does not sustain the broad proposition for which it was cited. This court there held merely that, between two persons who had signed the same promissory note as sureties for another signer, the oral promise of one surety to indemnify the other was valid. This promise was deemed outside of the statute, because by signing the note the promisor had himself become a debtor, and so his promise to indemnify was to answer for his own debt. In Cortelyou v. Hoagland several stockholders and directors of a corporation had promised to indemnify another stockholder and director for indorsing a corporate note, and Warren v. Abbett was of similar character. In the Cortelyou Case the chancellor rested his decision on Apgar's Adm'rs v. Hiler, which, as above stated, was essentially different and on Thompson v. Coleman, 4 N. J. Law, 216, which was a promise to indemnify a constable for selling under execution goods claimed by an outside party,—a case where the promisee had no redress except on the promise, and therefore clearly outside of the statute. If the decisions in Cortelyou v. Hoagland and Warren v. Abbett are to be supported on prior New Jersey adjudications, such support must be found in the doctrine that where the consideration of a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another is a substantial benefit moving to the promisor, then the statute does not apply. This rule was recognized in Kutzmeyer v. Ennis, 27 N. J. Law, 371, and Cowenhoven v. Howell, 36 N. J. Law, 323. To support those decisions on this rule, it must be held that the payment of a corporate debt is substantially beneficial to the stockholders or directors of the corporation,—a proposition which seems to be denied in other tribunals. Browne, St. Frauds, § 164. In the promise now under consideration there was no such element, and no case has been found in our reports involving the present question. We should therefore decide the matter on principle, or as nearly so as related adjudication will permit.

Looked at as res nova, it seems indisputable that the defendant's promise was within the statute. It was to respond to the plaintiff in case the defendant's son should make default in the obligation which he would come under to the plaintiff as soon as the plaintiff became surety for him,—an obligation either to pay the debt for which the plaintiff was to be surety, or to reimburse the plaintiff if he paid it. In this statement of the nature of the promise there is, I think, every element which seems necessary to bring a case within the purview of the statute. The parties, in giving and accepting the promise, contemplated (1) an obligation by a third person to the promisee; (2) that this obligation should be the foundation of the promise, i. e., that the obligation of the son to the promisee should attach simultaneously with the suretyship of the plaintiff, and thereupon should arise the obligation of the promisor for the fulfillment of the son's obligation; and (3) that the obligation of the promisor should be collateral to that of the son, i. e., if the latter should perform his obligation, the promisor would be discharged, while, if the promisor was required to perform his obligation, that of the son would not be discharged, but only shifted from the promisee to the promisor.

An examination of the cases will show that not many of them are in conflict with this view, when they are free from differentiating circumstances. In the leading case of Thomas v. Cook, 8 Barn. & C. 728, such a circumstance appears in the fact that the promisor was himself a signer of the bond against which he promised to indemnify the promisee, and thus the promise was, in a reasonable sense, to answer for that which, as to the promisee, was the promisor's own debt. On this difference may be explained the decisions in Jones v. Letcher, 13 B. Mon. 368; Horn v. Bray, 51 Ind. 555, 19 Am. Rep. 742; Barry v. Ransom, 12 N. Y. 462; Sanders v. Gillespi, 59 N. Y. 250; Ferrell v. Maxwell, 28 Ohio St. 383, 22 Am. Rep. 393; and others,—resting on the rule applied in Apgar's Adm'rs v. Hiler, 24 N. J. Law, 812. The remark of Bayley, J., in Thomas v. Cook, that a promise to indemnify was not within either the words or the policy of the statute, has caused much of the confusion existing on this subject, but is more than counterbalanced by the observations of Lord Denman in Green v. Cresswell, 10 Adol. & E. 453, and Pollock, C. B., in Cripps v. Hartnoll, 4 Best & S. 414, to the effect that a promise to indemnify may be also an undertaking to answer for the debt or default of another; and that when it is it comes within the operation of the statute. Another circumstance taking cases out of the simple class with which we are now concerned is that mentioned in Kutzmeyer v. Ennis, 27 N. J. Law, 371, 376, viz., the existence of a new consideration beneficial to the promisor, or, as it is sometimes expressed, moving to the promisor. Such cases are Smith v. Sayward, 5 Greenl. 504; Lucas v. Chamberlain, 8 B. Mon. 276; Mills v. Brown, 11 Iowa, 314; Reed v. Holcomb, 31 Conn. 360; Smith v. Delaney, 64 Conn. 264, 29 Atl. 496, 42 Am. St. Rep. 181; Potter v. Brown, 35 Mich. 274; Comstock v. Norton, 36 Mich. 277; Harrison v. Sawtel, 10 Johns, 242, 6 Am. Dec. 337; Sanders v. Gillespie, 59 N. Y. 250; Tighe v. Morrison, 116 N. Y. 263, 22 N. E. 164, 5 L. R. A. 617. Cases of still another character are sometimes cited in support of the statement that contracts to indemnify are outside of the statute, such as Cripps v. Hartnoll, 4 Best & S. 414; Reader v. Kingham, 13 C. B. (N. S.) 344; Anderson v. Spence, 72 Ind. 315, 37 Am. Rep. 162; Keesling v. Frazier, 119 Ind. 185, 21 N. E. 552; Beaman's Adm'rs v. Russell, 20 Vt. 205, 49 Am. Dec. 775. But these judgments rest on the same idea as Thompson v. Coleman, 4 N. J. Law, 216,—that there existed no other liability to the promisee than that of the promisor, and so manifestly the statute was not applicable. On the other hand, there is sufficient judicial authority for the proposition that an undertaking to indemnify a person for becoming surety for another is, in the absence of any modifying fact, a promise within the statute. Green v. Cresswell, 10 Adol. & E. 453; Simpson v. Nance, 1 Speer, 4; Brown v. Adams, 1 Stew. 51, 18 Am. Dec. 36; Kelsey v. Hibbs, 13 Ohio St. 340; Clement's Appeal, 52 Conn. 464; Bissig v. Britton, 59 Mo. 204, 21 Am. Rep. 379; Nugent v. Wolfe, 111 Pa. 471, 4 Atl. 15, 56 Am. Rep. 291; Draughan v. Bunting, 31 N. C. 10; Hurt v. Ford (Mo.) 44 S. W. 228; and May v. Williams, 61 Miss. 126, 48 Am. Rep. 80,—were decided on this basis. In the case last mentioned, Porter, J., stated the true rules very clearly and concisely.¹⁷

"It cannot be said that the promise to indemnify the surety is made to him as debtor and not as creditor. It is true that both the principal and surety are bound to the fourth person, the state; but the contract of the promisor is not to discharge that obligation. He assumes no duty or debt to the state, nor does he agree with the promisee to pay to the state the debt which may become due to it if default shall be made by the principal in the bond. It is only when the promisee has changed his relationship of debtor to the state and assumed that of creditor to his principal by paying to the state the penalty for which both he and his principal were bound that a right arises to go against the guarantor on his contract. It is to one who is under a conditional and contingent liability that the promise is made; but it is to him as creditor, and not as debtor, that a right of action arises on it. Nor do we think it sufficient to take the case from the operation of the statute that the liability of the principal arises by implication rather than by express contract. The statute makes no distinction between a debt due on an implied and one due by express contract. It is the existence of the debt against the principal and not the manner in which it originates that makes voidable a parol promise by another to become responsible for its payment. Nor are we able to perceive that the contract of the promisee is anterior to that of the principal in the bond. Until the surety assumes responsibility by executing the bond, the agreement of the promisor to indemnify is only a proposition which may be withdrawn by him or declined by the promisee. It is only when the proposition is acted on by the promisee that the contract becomes absolute; but at the very instant that it thus becomes a contract there also springs up an implied contract of the principal to do and perform the same act, viz.: to indemnify the surety against loss. It arises at the same moment, exists to the same extent, is supported by the same consideration, broken at the same instant, and is discharged by the same act, whether it be done by the principal in the bond or by the promisee in the contract to indemnify. It is the debt of the principal, and, being his debt, no third person can be bound for its payment unless the contract be evidence by writing. This, we think, is the fair import of the statute, and it ought not to be refined or frittered away."

In Alabama even the promise of one surety to hold his co-surety harmless is held to be within the statute. Posten v. Clem, 201 Ala. 529 (1918), Anderson, C. J., speaking of the rule as "wholesome and salutary as closing the door to

No doubt, there are opposing cases which cannot be explained on any distinguishing circumstances. Such seem to be Chapin v. Merrill, 4 Wend. 657; Jones v. Bacon (N. Y.) 40 N. E. 216; Dunn v. West, 5 B. Mon. 376; Vogel v. Melms, 31 Wis. 306, 11 Am. Rep. 608; and Wildes v. Dudlow, L. R. 19 Eq. 198. But some of these cases merely follow Thomas v. Cook, ubi supra, without noticing the distinction which later discussion has justified, while others appear to have been induced by the injustice of a refusal to enforce a promise on the strength of which the promisee incurred his liability, rather than by a ready purpose to execute the will of the legislature. * * *

Our conclusion is that the promise proved at the trial was insufficient to sustain the action, that the judgment for the plaintiff should be reversed, and that, in accordance with the reservation at the trial, a verdict and judgment should be entered in favor of the defendant.

*Judgment reversed.*¹⁸

confusion, fraud and perjury by not permitting co-sureties on notes, bonds and other instruments to promote contests between themselves through oral promises and agreements as to their indemnity and liability" (76 So. at p. 884). But see Ferrell v. Maxwell, 28 Oh. St. 383 (1876) contra, although Ohio holds promises to indemnify in general to be within the statute. Kelsey v. Higgs, 13 Oh. St. 340 (1862). See also, contra, Rose v. Wollenberg, 31 Ore. 269 (1897). On such contracts between sureties as regards the statute of frauds, see 39 L. R. A. 378, note; 1 A. L. R. 383, note.

¹⁸ There is much confusion in the cases as to contracts of indemnity and the statute of frauds, partly due to faulty analysis and partly to a difference in attitude on the part of courts toward the statute. Some so-called indemnities are clearly within the statute, for it is not the words used but the real nature of the promise and the intent of the legislature that must determine the result. A promise to indemnify one who advances money to a third person by way of loan to that person is clearly within the statute. Benninghoff v. Robbins, 54 Mont., 66 (1917). So is a contract to indemnify an employer from loss through the dishonesty of a servant. Com. v. Hinson, 143 Ky. 428 (1911). But see Quinn-Shepherdson Co. v. United States Fidelity and Guaranty Co., 142 Minn. 428 (1919). In these cases there are three parties, C, the (prospective) creditor, D, the (prospective) debtor, and S, the surety promisor, who is to perform if D does not and who makes his promise to C, the creditor. Logically this situation falls within the statute, and also, by all presumptions of legislative intent, the statute is a defense. The trio in this relation may be thus diagrammed in triangular form:

The broken line represents D's obligation first to exonerate, and then, if exoneration has not taken place, to indemnify S.

But when we come to the situation dealt with in Aldrich v. Ames, reported, ante, and in the principal case of Hartley v. Sandford, there is more complication, for a fourth party, I, the so-called indemnifier of the surety, appears. There are still C, the (prospective) creditor, D, the (prospective) debtor, and

AMES v. FOSTER ET AL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1871. 106 Mass. 400,
8 Am. Rep. 343.)

MORTON, J. The only question involved in this case arises under that clause of the statute of frauds which provides that no action

S, the man who goes on the bond as surety promisor; but if the bond is given in a civil suit (or if it is given in a criminal action and if the prisoner is in the given jurisdiction obligated to indemnify his bail), another trio may materialize as a result of I's promise to save S harmless and to indemnify him if he will go on the bond. The materialization will take place if S, the surety, has to pay C, the obligee original creditor, for forthwith D, the principal debtor will become obligated to reimburse S, the surety, and I, the indemnifier, will be bound to pay S only if D does not pay S. Logically the promise of I, after D fails to reimburse S, is that of a surety for D to S. See the following double triangle diagram:

The broken lines represent as before the obligations first to exonerate and then to indemnify. D in each triangle is the principal debtor. He becomes such in the second triangle only because he fails to pay as debtor in the first, and S has to pay.

But logic does not settle the matter. There still remains the question of legislative intent. Even with reference to the single trio situation, which logically is within the statute whether the promise of the surety is to the creditor or to the debtor, we disregard logic and through a forced construction of the word "another" say that the promise is not within the statute if made to the debtor instead of the creditor. That is on the theory that Parliament intended, and our American legislatures have intended, to remedy the mischief of perjured claims of suretyship only when made by creditors. And that, too, though in many American jurisdictions the creditor, as beneficiary of the promise to the debtor that the promisor will pay the debt to the creditor, may recover against the promisor on the oral promise, despite a plea of the statute of frauds, although he could not have recovered on the promise if it had been made to himself and the statute had been pleaded. See Wood v. Moriarity, reported ante, p. 639. See also Eddy v. Roberts, 17 Ill. 505 (1856), where the defendant for a consideration promised the creditor to pay the debtor's debt to the creditor, where, for a different consideration, he promised the debtor to pay it, and where, though the creditor was denied a remedy on the promise to him, he was allowed to recover as beneficiary of the defendant's promise to the debtor despite a plea of the statute of frauds. See 12 Ann. Cas. 1101, note, where the cases are collected. If logic may give way to legislative intent so strikingly in the single trio situation, still more possible, and even more plausible, is the argument that Parliament was legislating for only the single trio situation, and that the double trio situation, as illustrated in the principal case of Hartley v. Sandford, was not meant to be affected by the statute.

shall be brought "to charge a person upon a special promise to answer for the debt, default or misdoings of another, unless the promise, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged, or his agent." Gen. Sts., c. 105, § 1, cl. 2.

The plaintiffs in the original action claim to hold the defendant upon the ground of an express promise to pay the amount of a debt due the plaintiffs by the owners of the steamer N. P. Banks, for wood and coal furnished prior to October 1, 1868. At this time, McKay & Aldus, of Boston, owned three-fourths of the steamer, and the other fourth was owned by parties in New York. In December, 1868, McKay & Aldus went into bankruptcy, having previously mortgaged their interest to the defendant Ames. In the spring of 1869 the plaintiffs heard that the steamer was to be carried to New York to be sold, and they threatened to attach her, and thereupon Ames promised to pay the bill if they would not attach her.

It is to be observed that Ames was not originally liable upon the bill, being merely a mortgagee. Howard v. Odell, 1 Allen (Mass.) 85. The plaintiffs do not claim that they had a lien upon the vessel. They had no right to attach the interest of McKay & Aldus, who were in bankruptcy. The only legal consideration, therefore, of the defendant's promise, was the forbearance of the plaintiffs to attach the interest of the New York owners. Upon this state of facts, the learned judge who presided at the trial instructed the jury that "if, for the benefit and at the request of Ames, the said Foster gave up or surrendered some advantage which he had, as a means of collecting his debt or the like, and in consideration thereof Ames promised to pay this bill, he would be liable, although the promise was not in writing." We do not think that these instructions, applied to the facts of this case, were correct or sufficient. As we have seen, the only consideration of the defendant's promise was that the plaintiffs forbore to attach the interest of the New York owners; and we are of opinion that the jury should have been instructed that such promise was within the statute of frauds.

The defendant's promise was, in its primary and essential character, a promise to guarantee the debt of another. Its object was, to secure the payment of the old debt, which was not extinguished. The defendant's liability was collateral and contingent, would exist as long as the original debt existed, and would be extinguished whenever the original debtors should pay that debt. It was not in any sense his debt; the original party remained liable; and there is an entire absence of any liability on the part of the defendant or his property, except such as arises from his express promise. Forth v. Stanton, 1 Saund. (6th ed.) 211, note. When all these elements concur, we know of no case in this commonwealth which sanctions the doctrine that such promise loses its character as collateral, and becomes an original promise, because there is a consideration which is beneficial to the promisor.

On such a theory, the majority cases can be supported and yet the logic of the minority cases be conceded. The double trio situation, on this theory, is not within the mischief aimed at by the statute.

On the application of the statute of frauds to a promise to indemnify, see 6 Ann. Cas. 671, note; Ann. Cas. 1912 A, note; Ann. Cas. 1915 A, 867, note; 42 Am. St. Rep. 187, note; 1 A. L. R. 383, note.

In Alger v. Scoville, 1 Gray (Mass.) 391, 396, Shaw, C. J., says that "it has been held that when the leading and obvious object of the promisor was to induce the promisee to forego some lien, interest, benefit or advantage held by him, and to transfer that interest, or confer that or some equivalent benefit on the promisor, although the effect may be to discharge neither from an obligation, still it is a new, independent and original contract between the parties, and is not within the statute of frauds required to be in writing."

In Curtis v. Brown, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 488, Shaw, C. J., states that "it is no sufficient ground to prevent the operation of the statute of frauds, that the plaintiff has relinquished an advantage, or given up a lien, in consequence of the defendant's promise, if that advantage has not also directly enured to the benefit of the defendant, so as in effect to make it a purchase by the defendant of the plaintiff. The cases in which it has been held otherwise are those where the plaintiff in consideration of the promise, has relinquished some lien, benefit or advantage for securing or recovering his debt, and where by means of such relinquishment the same interest or advantage has enured to the benefit of the defendant. In such cases, although the result is that the payment of the debt of the third person is effected, it is so incidentally and indirectly, and the substance of the contract is the purchase, by the defendant of the plaintiff, of the lien, right or benefit in question."

It is equally true that it is no sufficient ground for taking the case out of the statute, that the defendant has received some benefit from the consideration of his promise. If this were so, then every promise to guarantee the debt of another, made upon a pecuniary consideration paid by the promisee to the promisor, would be taken out of the statute. In all cases, the question is, whether the promise is in substance a promise to pay the debt of another, or whether it is a promise by the promisor to pay his own debt, the extent of which is measured by the amount due by another.

We think the authorities in this state have gone no further than to decide that a case is not within the statute, where, upon the whole transaction, the fair inference is, that the leading object or purpose and the effect of the transaction was the purchase or acquisition by the promisor from the promisee of some property, lien or benefit which he did not before possess, but which enured to him by reason of his promise, so that the debt for which he is liable may fairly be deemed to be a debt of his own, contracted in such purchase or acquisition. Nelson v. Boyne- ton, 3 Met. (Mass.) 396; Fish v. Thomas, 5 Gray (Mass.) 45; Burr v. Wilcox, 13 Allen (Mass.) 269; Furbish v. Goodnow, 98 Mass. 296; Browne on St. of Frauds (3d ed.), § 214, c. d.

Applying this test to the facts of this case, it is clear that the promise of the defendant Ames was within the statute. It is true, or probable, that he indirectly received some benefit from the forbearance of the plaintiffs to attach the interest of the New York owners, but the purpose or effect of the transaction was not to transfer to him any lien or advantage. He acquired no rights which he did not before possess, and it is impossible to regard the promise as an original promise founded upon the consideration of a purchase by him. We are of opinion, therefore, that the jury should have been instructed in accordance with the request of the defendant Ames, that the plaintiff upon the facts found was not entitled to recover.

*Exceptions sustained.*¹⁹

HARBURG INDIA RUBBER COMB COMPANY v. MARTIN.

(Court of Appeal. [1902] 1 K. B. 778.)

Appeal from a decision of Mathew, J.

The plaintiffs, a foreign company carrying on business in Germany, were judgment creditors of an English company called the Crowdus Accumulator Syndicate, Limited, of which the defendant was a director and in which he held a large number of shares. He had also financed the syndicate.

The plaintiffs had issued a writ of fi. fa. upon the judgment, which the sheriff had failed to execute, because he could not effect an entry. The defendant then had an interview with a Mr. Winter, the plaintiffs' agent in England, at which he verbally promised Winter that he would indorse two bills of exchange, each for half the amount of the debt, and payable respectively at three and six months. On the faith of this promise Winter withdrew the writ. The action was brought for breach of the defendant's promise.

At the trial Mathew, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs, holding that s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds did not apply.

In the course of his judgment the learned judge said: "What is the result of the evidence? At the time when the defendant came to Mr. Winter the plaintiffs were in a position to take possession of the goods of the syndicate; they were in a position analogous to that of persons having possession of the goods, and their legal position is recognized in Williams v. Leper (1766), 3 Burr. 1887 and in Edwards v. Kelly (1817), 6 M. & S. 204. Those cases have been discussed with approval, and very sensible and reasonable cases they are, and in their facts they closely approach the present case. They are discussed in the notes to Forth v. Stanton, 1 Williams' Saund. 209 a. What was the object of the arrangement here? The object was to protect the goods of the syndicate; it was not to pay the debt of another. It is pretty clear that what the defendant suggested was that he should have time to sell all which belonged to the company. If, in fact, the object of the contract was to protect the goods, that would be sufficient to take the case out of the statute.

"But there is another point still more clearly in favor of the plaintiffs, namely, that the promise was given for the purpose of obtaining a direct personal advantage for the defendant himself. He had invested a large sum in the syndicate, and would lose every farthing of it unless time were given for the syndicate to get on its legs. With that object—and I should gather it was the sole object he had in view—he made the promise. That again is a ground for saying that the case is not within the statute of frauds, as is clear from Sutton & Co. v. Grey, [1894] 1 Q. B. 285.

"Under these circumstances it seems to me clear that the statute of frauds does not apply, and my judgment must be for the plaintiffs."

The defendant appealed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L. J.²⁰ The material facts of this case are very short. The plaintiffs had supplied goods to a company called the Crowdus Accumulator Syndicate. The syndicate did not pay what was due from them for the goods, and the plaintiffs recovered judgment against them, and placed a writ of fi. fa. in the hands of the sheriff to realize the amount of their judgment. The sheriff found that the works of the syndicate had been stopped and their place of business closed, and he did not take possession. After this there was a meeting between the defendant and Mr. Winter, the plaintiffs' agent. A conversation took place at that meeting, and the jury have found that Mr. Winter's account of it is accurate. To put the result of the conversation shortly, the defendant then verbally promised Mr. Winter that he would indorse some bills for the amount of the judgment debt. It is said that amounted to an oral promise to give a guarantee of the judgment debt owing by the syndicate to the plaintiffs.

It is said on behalf of the defendant that this was a promise by him by word of mouth to make himself answerable for the debt of the syndicate. It is said on behalf of the plaintiffs that this was not a promise to make himself answerable for the debt of another—that is, the syndicate—but that it was a contract of indemnity, by which, I suppose, is meant a new contract in the nature of an original obligation.

²⁰ Parts of the opinions are omitted.

The question which we have to decide is whether this bargain is "a promise to answer for the debt of another" within s. 4 of the statute of frauds. Mathew, J., has held that it is not. I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with that conclusion. It seems to me that this contract was as plainly as possible a promise by the defendant to make himself answerable for the debt of the syndicate.

Our attention has been called to a great number of cases in which the court has treated various transactions as being outside s. 4. Most of the earlier cases were what I may call "property cases." They were cases in which either the person who made the promise had property which he wished to relieve from liability, or there was property which he wished to acquire. It is not necessary for me to go through those cases, but I cannot agree that the present case comes within any of that class. The defendant's promise was not, as it seems to me, either a new contract of purchase, or a new contract for the release of any property which either was his or in which he had an interest.

Our attention was next called to the exception which has been established by what I may call the "del credere cases," beginning with Couturier v. Hastie, 8 Exch. 40, and coming down to Sutton & Co. v. Grey [1894], 1 Q. B. 285. It has been said, and I think truly, that these cases are of a different species from the property cases. I say of a different species, not of a different genus, because I think there is a wider genus, which can be plainly and simply defined, within which both of these species fall. So far as I can see, the authorities have left us with a general rule, which I will attempt to define presently, and each of these two classes of cases falls within that general rule. In each of them, I think, the form of the promise given by the promisor has never been held to be conclusive of the matter. He may, or he may not, promise in terms to answer for the debt of another; but, whether he does so or not, it is the substance, not the form, which is regarded.

Before leaving these instances I wish to mention one other class, which I do not treat as an exception from s. 4, but which, I think, does not come within the section at all. I mean the cases which have been spoken of as "indemnity cases." Of course in one sense all guarantees, whether they come within s. 4 or not, are contracts of indemnity. But the difference between those indemnities which come within the section and those which do not is very shortly thus expressed in the notes to Forth v. Stanton, Williams' Notes to Saunders, ed. 1871, vol. i. p. 234: "These cases establish that the statute applies only to promises made to the person to whom another is already or is to become answerable."

That, to my mind, is an accurate definition of a guarantee or indemnity which comes within s. 4 of the statute, as distinguished from an original liability which is not within the section, and which has no reference to the debt of another, but creates a new liability which is undertaken by the promisor, and has been called in the course of the argument a contract of indemnity. * * *

In my judgment, the circumstances of the present case show plainly that there was a guarantee of the payment of a debt for which the syndicate was primarily liable, and not an original promise by the defendant to keep the plaintiffs indemnified. In my judgment, a contract of indemnity does not come within s. 4, but I think there is nothing to justify us in holding that in the present case the contract is a contract of indemnity. In my opinion, it is a contract of guarantee—"a promise to answer for the debt of another."

I will now go back to those cases which, so far as the words of the contract are concerned, might come within s. 4, but which have been held not to come within it because of the object of the contract. Whether you look at the "property cases" or at the "del credere cases," it seems to me that in each of them the conclusion arrived at really was that the contract in question did not fall within the section because of the object of the contract. In each of those cases there was in truth a main contract—a larger contract—and the obligation to pay the debt of another was merely an incident of the larger contract. As I understand those cases, it is not a question of motive—it is a question of object. You must find what it was that the parties were in fact dealing about. What was the subject-matter of the contract? If the subject-matter of the contract was the purchase of property—the relief of property from a liability, the getting rid of incumbrances, the securing greater diligence in the performance of the duty of a factor, or the introduction of business into a stockbroker's office—in all those cases there was a larger matter which was the object of the contract. That being the object of the contract, the mere fact that as an incident to it—not as the immediate object, but indirectly—the debt of another to a third person will be paid, does not bring the case within the section. This definition or rule for ascertaining the kind of cases outside the section covers both "property cases" and "del credere cases."

Can we then in the present case find any larger contract? I cannot. It seems to me plain upon the evidence that the only matter which was present to the mind of the defendant, and was presented by him to Mr. Winter, was this: "Will you forbear for a time? Will you give the syndicate, which I believe has a future before it, an opportunity of turning round? I believe that if it has that opportunity, it will do well and will be able to pay you. And to induce you thus to forbear I will give you bills which shall secure the payment at specified periods of the judgment debt, in case the syndicate does not pay you itself." That, I think, is the true effect of the conversation, and it seems to me that was the whole of the contract, and there was neither a purchase nor a del credere arrangement, nor anything else beyond that bargain. And the mere fact that the defendant had, as he seems to have done, financed the syndicate to a large extent, and that that was his motive for thus coming forward and bargaining for forbearance, cannot make any difference in the object of the contract. That might have been the motive which induced him to make himself answerable for the debt of the syndicate, but it was not the object of the contract. The object was simply to obtain the forbearance of the creditors in respect of the debt.

It was suggested that the true definition of cases which do not come within s. 4 should be, not those in which the obligation to pay the debt of another is an incident of a larger contract, but those in which the main object is to secure the promisor's own personal interest. But, I think, if such a definition were adopted, there would be nothing left to come within s. 4, because in every case there must be a consideration for which the promisor bargains to come to him from the promisee. That is as true of mere forbearance as of anything else. If the contract is that the promisor will be answerable for the debt due to the promisee if he will forbear, if the main object is to obtain that forbearance, and the promisor wishes to obtain it, that would be sufficient to take the case out of the statute. In my opinion so to hold would be simply to repeal s. 4. * * *

In my opinion the judgment of Mathew, J., should be reversed, and the appeal allowed. * * *

STIRLING, L. J. * * * In my opinion the decision in Guild & Co. v. Conrad, [1894] 2 Q. B. 885, does not apply. It is, I think, impossible to arrive [here] at the conclusion at which the learned judges arrived in that case, namely, that the defendant's contract was to pay the debt whether the syndicate, of which he was a director, could or could not pay it. In Guild & Co. v. Conrad, it was found that the contract was not to pay if the foreign firm did not pay, because there was no expectation at that time that the foreign firm would be able to pay, but the contract was to provide funds to enable the plaintiffs to meet certain acceptances. In the present case it seems to me that the transaction in contemplation was to give time to the syndicate in the expectation that in the interval they would be placed in funds by which they would be enabled to pay all their debts. The important element corresponding to that which existed in Guild & Co. v. Conrad, namely, the absence of any expectation that the syndicate would ever be able to pay, is here wanting.²¹

²¹ In Guild & Co. v. Conrad, [1894] 2 Q. B. 885, the defendant orally promised the plaintiff that if the plaintiff would accept certain bills for a firm in Demerara in which the defendant's son was a partner the defendant would "find funds to enable the plaintiff to meet these acceptances." At the time that defendant made the oral promise there was no expectation that the Demerara firm would be able to pay. The defendant was held liable on the promise despite a plea of the statute of frauds, and Lindley, L. J., said: "The nature of the promise is all-important, because, if it was a promise to pay if the Demerara firm did not pay, then it is void under the statute of frauds as not being in writing. But if, on the other hand, it was a promise to put the plaintiff in funds in any event, then it is not such a promise as is within the statute of frauds." The defendant's promise, as one to pay in any event, was

That being so, we have to consider whether the contract was "to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person" within the meaning of s. 4 of the statute of frauds. Undoubtedly the decisions run fine in these cases * * *

I come then to Couturier v. Hastie, 8 Ex. 40, in which it was held that a contract by a del credere agent was not within the statute. From the judgment of Bowen, L. J., in Sutton & Co. v. Grey, 69 L. T. (N. S.) 354, at p. 355, it is clear that he regarded Couturier v. Hastie as going to the very verge of the law, and he referred to the observations upon it made by Page Wood V.-C. in Wickham v. Wickham, (1855) 2 K. & J. 478, at p. 487. In Sutton & Co. v. Grey, [1894] 1 Q. B. 285, there was a contract between a firm of brokers and the defendant of which the terms were that he should introduce clients to them, and that the plaintiffs should transact business on the Stock Exchange for the clients thus introduced, and that, as between the plaintiffs and the defendant, he should have half the commission earned by the plaintiffs in respect of any transactions by them for any clients introduced by him, and he should pay to the plaintiffs half of any loss which might be incurred by them in respect of those transactions. The plaintiffs claimed to recover from the defendant half the loss which they had incurred in Stock Exchange transactions which they had entered into on behalf of a person who had been introduced to them by the defendant, and it was held that, the defendant having an interest in the transactions equally with the plaintiffs, the principle of Couturier v. Hastie applied. * * *

But, as it seems to me, * * * the word "interest" means some species of interest which the law recognizes. In the present case the defendant had no such interest in the property which was about to be seized by the sheriff. He was a director of the syndicate who had, no doubt, a deep interest, in the popular sense of the word, in its proceedings. He held a large number of shares: I believe he was the largest shareholder in the syndicate. He had also financed the syndicate, but he had nothing in the nature of a charge on their property; he was at the utmost a general creditor of the syndicate.

It has been contended that we ought to read the words "interest in the transaction" in a wide sense, and as importing a "business interest" in the syndicate—that kind of interest which a creditor and a shareholder of a company has in its prospects. To do this would, I think, go a long way to repeal s. 4 of the statute of frauds, and to extend the doctrine of Couturier v. Hastie very much further than I am prepared to extend it.

also referred to as a promise to indemnify. It would seem to be more properly designated as an original promise. For an argument against taking out of the statute such promises to pay irrespective of the liability of the original debtor, see 1 Williston on Contracts, § 456.

For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to be allowed, and the judgment of Mathew, J., reversed.

COZENS-HARDY, L. J. * * * Primâ facie the contract falls within s. 4 of the statute, unless it can be brought within some recognized or some logical exception. One great peculiarity is this, that neither the plaintiffs nor the defendant had possession of or had any interest in the goods of the syndicate. But it has been forcibly and most ably argued that the case is brought within the recognized exceptions from the section, because the defendant, though he had no legal right to or interest in the goods, yet had in a business sense an interest in them. It has been argued that we ought to look at the object of the promise which the defendant made, and that if we can come to the conclusion that his object in giving the promise was to secure a benefit for himself, and not to secure forbearance for the syndicate, then we ought to hold that the case is not within the statute at all. I cannot agree with that argument. It seems to me to involve a confusion between object and motive. I cannot doubt that the object of the promise which was made by the defendant was to secure the forbearance of the plaintiffs, for three months and six months, in enforcing the debt due from the syndicate.

If that be so, the authorities do not, as it seems to me, in any way support Mr. Russell's contention. They have been divided conveniently into three classes. The first consists of what have been called "the property cases." I do not think they can be dealt with more accurately, and certainly not more shortly, than they were by Williams, J., in his judgment in Fitzgerald v. Dressler, 7 C. B. (N. S.) at p. 394, where he said: "At the time the promise was made the defendant was substantially the owner of the linseed in question, which was subject to the lien of the original vendors for the contract price. The effect of the promise was neither more nor less than this, to get rid of the incumbrance, or, in other words, to buy off the plaintiffs' lien. That being so, it seems to me that the authorities clearly establish that such a case is not within the statute." And he referred to Williams v. Leper, 3 Burr. 1887; Castling v. Aubert, 2 East. 325; and Anstey v. Marsden, (1804) 1 B. & P. (N. R.) 124.

Then stress has been laid on what have been called "the document cases." Those cases seem to me to stand on an entirely different footing. If I go to a banker or to another person who holds documents as security for a debt, and I ask him to hand over the documents to me on payment of the debt, that is simply a purchase of the security. Although in this way I have become answerable for the debt of another, that is not the main object of the contract.

The third class consists of those cases which have been called "the del credere cases." When they are fairly regarded, they seem to me to amount only to this: that a contract, e. g., for the employment of a del credere agent, need not be in writing, although it incidentally involves the answering for a debt of another person. In other words, if the court can find that there is a main contract, the object of which is not to answer for the debt of another, that contract is not within s. 4, even though incidentally it may result in a liability to answer for the debt of another.

For these reasons I agree with the Lords Justices, and think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

MARY E. BAILEY, APPELLANT, v. JOSEPH N. MARSHALL.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1896. 174 Pa. St. 602, 34 Atl. 326.)

DEAN, J. Whether the debt in controversy be that of him who has assumed to pay it, or of another, is in most cases a question of fact. There can be no precise legal definition of liability under the act of 26th of April, 1885, P. L. 308, which will determine, in all cases, perhaps in but very few, the answerability of him who promises to pay. The act says: "No action shall be brought whereby to charge * * * the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt or default of another unless the agreement * * * shall be in writing." This is clearly meant to relieve an alleged guarantor or surety; it was never intended to relieve him who had a personal beneficial interest in the assumption. There cannot be a better construction of this statute than in Nugent v. Wolfe, 111 Pa. 471, where we held, the present chief justice rendering the opinion, that: "It is difficult, if not impossible, to formulate a rule, by which to determine, in every case, whether a promise relating to the debt or liability of a third person is or is not within the statute; but as a general rule, when the leading object of the promise or agreement is to become guarantor, or surety to the promisee for a debt, for which a third party is and continues to be primarily liable, the agreement, whether made before or after or at the time with the promise of the principal, is within the statute, and not binding unless evidenced by writing. On the other hand, when the leading object of the promisor is to subserve some interest or purpose of his own, notwithstanding the effect is to pay, or discharge the debt of another, his promise is not within the statute."

Applying these principles to the facts in the case before us, to what conclusion do they impel us? In September, 1892, Mary E. Bailey held a note against Davis Pennock in sum of $1,000, with power of attorney to confess judgment. At this time, Marshall, the defendant, entered a judgment against Pennock for $5,000, issued execution, and levied on all the real and personal property of Pennock; the amount actually due and payable on his $5,000 judgment did not exceed, as appeared afterwards from his own statement, $200. The plaintiff was standing there with her judgment ready for entry, on which she could immediately issue execution, seize and bid upon the property; just at this juncture, Marshall, knowing her rights, sent for her and said: "I will stand by thee and see thee is paid every cent if thee says nothing and does nothing." She accepted his proposition, neither entered her judgment nor took any steps to collect. The sheriff's sale went on, and Marshall bought the larger part of the real and personal property, and was credited on his purchase with the amount of his own judgment.

We notice by the testimony that Marshall denies the statement of Mrs. Bailey; we express no opinion as to the credibility of the witnesses; the question is, if the jury believed Mrs. Bailey's testimony, would the court have been warranted in granting the compulsory nonsuit on the ground that the promise was to answer for the debt or default of another? What was the leading object of Marshall in making the promise by which he lured her to inaction? Clearly, it was not to pay Pennock's debt, nor Mrs. Bailey's claim. His sole purpose was to silence her as an antagonistic bidder at the sheriff's sale; this was no benefit to Pennock, the debtor; it was an advantage to Marshall, and he reaped the full fruits of it; she was silenced by his promise, and he got the property at his own figure. His leading object was to subserve his own interest; in fact, he had no other object; having accomplished it, he is now called upon to answer, not for Pennock's debt, but for his own, and if Mrs. Bailey be believed, he ought to pay.

²² "It is frequently said that where the main purpose and object of the promisor is not to answer for the debt of another, but to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, the promise is not within the statute and need not be in writing. * * * But this general rule was undoubtedly deduced from cases where property was placed in the hands of the promisor, as a fund out of which the promisee was to be paid. Williams v. Leper, 3 Burr. 1286 (1766); Edward v. Kelley, 6 Maule & S. 208 (1817). The promise was a promise to account and not the special promise or assumpsit contemplated by the statute. The courts, however, have gradually come to speak of this as a 'new and beneficial consideration moving toward the promisor' and 'enuring to his benefit,' and so sufficient consideration to take his promise without the statute. They have not kept the fundamental distinction clearly in mind between cases where the promise was to account, with a transfer of property, and a special promise or special assumpsit with sufficient consideration to support a simple contract.

"As a consequence much confusion has arisen under this section of the statute, and while a majority of cases decided under the theory that 'the leading purpose and object of the promisor must be to promote some interest of his own' are cases where property has been transferred and so analogous to Williams v. Leper, supra, [citations], still the generality of expressions used is such that the rule has been extended to cases which do not bear the least resemblance to those on which the rule is based [citations]. * * * In Penn-

MACHINIST v. GREEN.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1920. 109 Atl. 45.)

Action by Abraham Machinist against Abraham Green, resulting in verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepts. Exceptions overruled.

Action for the breach of an oral contract. Trial by the court, and verdict of $200 for the plaintiff.

The defendant excepted to the court's refusal to order a nonsuit and a directed verdict in his favor, upon the ground that the oral contract was a promise to answer for another's debt and within the statute of frauds.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiff agreed to loan one Garber $1,200 to enable him to purchase of one Plodzick 230 cords of wood. The defendant was a creditor of Plodzick in the sum of $2,500, and was actively interested in collecting it and pressing Plodzick to pay it, and when he learned of the contract between Garber and Plodzick, he made a demand upon Plodzick to have the $1,200 paid to him. The first payment in the sum of $500 for wood delivered was by the plaintiff's check payable at Garber's request to Plodzick's order, and by him indorsed and delivered to the defendant. When all but 30 of the 230 cords of wood had been delivered, Plodzick and the defendant went to the plaintiff, and Plodzick requested him to pay the balance of $700 to the defendant. The plaintiff did not obtain Garber's consent to this payment, but paid the $700 to the defendant, partly in reliance on the representations of Plodzick and the defendant that all of the 230 cords of wood were delivered, and partly in consideration of the defendant's agreement and undertaking that if they were not, they would be, and that he would be responsible for any shortage. The defendant did not know, or even suppose, that the full amount of wood had not been delivered. Garber refused to pay the plaintiff $1,200, but retained $300 until the shortage should be made good, and has never paid it.

The defendant's promise to the plaintiff was made as incidental to and in connection with his efforts to collect his claim against Plodzick.

It is the defendant's contention that his promise to be responsible for any shortage of wood was a promise to answer for the debt of another, and therefore within the statute of frauds. P. S. c. 215, § 2. This position cannot be sustained. The defendant's purpose in making the promise was to induce the plaintiff to pay to him the full balance due upon the wood contract. He was seeking in this manner to collect a sylvania this 'new and beneficial consideration' is not required; but the leading purpose and object of the promisor must be to subserve some interest of his own." 59 U. of Pa. L. Rev. 577.

On whether an oral promise to pay another's existing debt, made in order to secure a benefit to the promisor, without releasing the original debtor, is within the statute of frauds, see 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1077, note; 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242, note.

portion of a debt due him from Plodzick. This was his sole object, and to effectuate that purpose he promised the plaintiff, in effect, to indemnify him in case he should suffer loss by reason of the transaction. The promise of the defendant was not made by him for the benefit of another, but for his own benefit.

In determining whether an agreement is within the statute of frauds, "the distinction is between a promise the object of which is to promote the interest of another and one in which the object is to promote the interest of the party making the promise. The former is within the operation of the statute, the latter is unaffected by it." 1 Reed, St. Fr. c. 3, § 70; Calkins v. Chandler, 36 Mich. 324, 24 Am. Rep. 593; Wills v. Cutler, 61 N. H. 405, 409; Janvrin v. Powers, 79 N. H. 44, 104 Atl. 252. Moreover, the oral agreement of the defendant was an original promise, given to the plaintiff, who relied upon it to his injury. It was not a collateral undertaking to answer for the debt or default of another, but was the personal obligation of the defendant to be responsible for any loss that the plaintiff might sustain by complying with the defendant's request.

The consideration for the defendant's promise was the payment of the money to him by the plaintiff, and had no connection with the original transaction. It was an independent valid agreement, entered into by the parties to this action, and was not within the statute of frauds. Allen v. Thompson, 10 N. H. 32; Robinson v. Gilman, 43 N. H. 485; Britton v. Augier, 48 N. H. 420; Provenchee v. Piper, 68 N. H. 31, 36 Atl. 552.

PHILPOT v. WALCOT.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1882. 1 Freeman 541.)

Assumpsit upon mutual promises of marriage. The question was, whether it, being without writing, were not within the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries?

Wyndham was of opinion, that it was not within the words nor meaning of the statute; because this promise is for the marriage itself, and not made in consideration of marriage for some collateral matter.

But the other three judges were against him, that it was within the words, the meaning and the mischief of the statute, and as much a catching promise as any that the Act intended to prevent. Jud' pro def' Hil. 33, 34, Car. 2, Rot. 536.²³

²³ This case was later overruled. In Harrison v. Cage, as reported in 1 Ld. Raym. 386, 387-8, it is stated: "Note, it was ruled in this case at Norfolk Summer Assizes last past by Ward Lord Chief Baron, that this promise had no need to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 4. WELD v. WELD ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Kansas, 1905. 71 Kan. 622, 81 Pac. 183, 114 Am. St. Rep. 517.)

Action by Augustus Weld against Judith R. Weld and John W. Kidder. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

BURCH, J. Judith R. Kidder executed and delivered to Augustus Weld her promissory note for a sum of money, and secured its payment by a mortgage upon her real estate. Subsequently she married him, in consideration of his parol agreement that the marriage should operate as a satisfaction of the note. Still later he brought an action against her to recover on the note and to foreclose the mortgage. She pleaded payment, and upon a trial the jury returned a general verdict in her favor, and made answers to special questions as follows:

"Question No. 1. Did the plaintiff and the defendant Judith R. Weld (then Judith R. Kidder), before they were married, and after the note in suit had been given, enter into a parol contract or agreement whereby it was mutually agreed between them that, in consideration the said Judith would thereafter marry the plaintiff, the note in suit should upon such marriage be by the said parties mutually regarded as paid or satisfied? Ans. Yes.

"Question No. 2. If you answer the proceeding question 'yes,' then did the defendant Judith R. Weld, in pursuance of such alleged contract, and as a performance thereof on her part, marry the plaintiff? Ans. Yes."

Judgment was rendered for the defendant for costs. It is now urged that the evidence supporting the plea of payment was inadmissible, because the contract, being oral, is within the statute of frauds, and marriage is not a sufficient part performance to remove the bar, and that the evidence admitted was not sufficient to sustain the verdict.

It is true the statute of frauds provides that no action shall be brought to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage, unless the agreement upon which the action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person by him or her lawfully authorized. Gen. St. 1901, § 3174.

Mr. Northey said at the bar, that the statute intended only agreements to pay marriage portions, and that it had often been ruled so by Holt, Chief Justice. Quod Holt non negavit." See also Cork v. Baker, 1 Stra. 34.

In many of the American statutes of frauds there is in the "upon consideration of marriage" clause, an express exception from the writing requirement of mutual promise to marry: Stimson's "American Statute Law," I, p. 460. But even in the absence of such express exception, such oral promises are deemed not to be within the statute of frauds. See Clark v. Pendleton, 30 Conn. 495 (1850); Short v. Stotts, 58 Ind. 29 (1877); Withers v. Richardson, 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 94 (1827); Wilbur v. Johnson, 58 Mo. 600 (1875); Cf. Morgan v. Yarborough, 5 La. Ann. 316 (1850).

It is likewise true that authorities may be found to the effect that generally marriage is not a sufficient part performance to avoid the effect of the statute. But there is no question of part performance in this case. The contract was fully executed when the defendant married the plaintiff. Nothing further was to be done by either party to satisfy her obligation. The agreement was not that the plaintiff would after marriage deliver money or property or securities to the defendant in consideration of the marriage, or that he would after marriage execute and deliver to her legal documents affecting her property rights. It simply was that the debt should be paid when they were married.

Some of the evidence on behalf of the defendant as given by different witnesses is as follows: "They were out in the yard, and they came into the house, and he put his hand on her shoulder and said: 'Well, Anna, you needn't worry about the debt; after we are married the debt will be paid.' About three weeks after they were married they came back to our house. She and I were preparing something for dinner. We were in the dining room, and he was outside pitching a tent. He came into the room. He slapped her on the shoulder, and he said to me: 'Anna need not worry no more about the debt; her mortgage is paid.' We were talking, he and I and his wife, about the indebtedness on the place. My recollection is now that he told her that there was no indebtedness on the place. Right then I said to him that to protect Anna, his wife, he ought to cancel the mortgage. He said that would be the first thing to do when they got home." The statute of frauds does not render void the verbal contracts to which it refers. They are valid for all purposes except that of suit. Stout v. Ennis, 28 Kan. 713. The parties may, if they desire, perform them, and, when performed, the statute has no application to them. 29 A. & E. Encycl. of L., 829, 941.

The plaintiff argues the case as if the contract were that he should enter of record a satisfaction of the mortgage. Such, however, was not the tenor of the agreement, and that duty followed, upon demand being made, whenever the debt was paid. Gen. St. 1901, § 4224. Since the parol evidence introduced established a contract fully performed, it was competent. The evidence might perhaps have been made the basis of different conclusions as to the existence of the contract relied upon as a defense to the action. It was therefore properly submitted to the jury for interpretation. The jury has performed its duty in that respect, and the trial judge has approved the result. Hence this court will not interfere.

Other assignments of error all converge in the proposition first discussed above, and need not be separately considered.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.²⁴

²⁴ Occasionally, as in the principal case, marriage, usually when coupled with other things, is deemed full performance and takes the contract out of the statute both at law and in equity. See Supreme Lodge of Knights of Pythias

In Remington v. Remington, (Colo.), 193 Pac. 550 (1920), an oral contract made before marriage, whereby husband and wife, each of whom had been previously married and had living children, arranged to preserve to themselves the right to dispose of their property and to protect their heirs or the beneficiaries under their wills in their property rights as against any claim which might arise because of the marriage relation was held not to be void under the statute of frauds as promises made in consideration of marriage. The contract was reduced to writing and signed after marriage, and Teller, J., for the court, said:

"It is true that in the recital it is stated that the parties, in consideration of marriage, made the agreement; but the agreement itself shows that it was not so made. Contracts in consideration of marriage provide for the moving of some benefit to one of the parties as an inducement for marrying. There is no such case here presented. The facts show that these parties were arranging to preserve to themselves respectively the right to dispose of the property held before marriage, and to protect their respective heirs, or the beneficiaries under their wills, in their property rights, as against any claim which might arise because of the marriage relation. The words 'in consideration thereof' are not to be construed as indicating that either party was induced to marry the other by reason of these covenants. Indeed, the covenants conflict with such an idea. The parties were agreeing that they would secure nothing from each other through the marriage relation. It is clear that the words 'in consideration thereof' were used to show a situation which would have been properly described by saying that the parties had made the oral agreement in contemplation of marriage.

"Furthermore, it is wholly immaterial, in the view we take of this question, what was the agreement made before marriage. The contract in question, reduced to writing and signed by the parties, is made upon a consideration of mutual promises, and in it each releases to the other all right in or control over the other's property, and likewise waives all right to claim the same under any law of descent. Whatever may be the rule in those states having special statutes limiting the rights of parties during coverture, or in states following the common law, there is no reason why in this state, where woman has been relieved of her disabilities and specifically authorized to contract with any and every one, she cannot make a binding contract during coverture, provided it is free from taint of fraud or duress."

The distinction between contracts in contemplation of marriage and contracts upon or in consideration of marriage is established. Some antenuptial contracts made in contemplation of marriage have been held to be supported by consideration other than the marriage and, therefore, not to be within the statute. Jorden v. Money, 5 H. L. Cas. 185 (1854); Riley v. Riley, 25 Conn. 154 (1856); Rainbolt v. East, Admr., 56 Ind. 538 (1877); Bader v. Hiscox, (Ia.), 174 N. W. 565 (1919); *Steen v. HALLAM, J. Plaintiff is in the business of buying and wrecking old buildings. Defendant was the owner of a lot on which was situated a two-story, twelve-room, frame dwelling, on a stone foundation. Plaintiff claims that defendant told him she wanted to dispose of the building for wrecking, that he looked it over and offered her $110.00 for all the material in the building, plaintiff to tear down the building and take material away. Plaintiff gave this further testimony:

"I then asked her if they had any insurance on the building? She told me there was $2,800. I says, 'Now you must carry that insurance Mutual promises to marry not being within the statute, two kinds of promises in consideration of marriage are generally deemed to be, namely, (1) promises to make marriage settlements, and (2) mutual promises to marry with a promise also by one party to convey or devise property to the other. The first kind clearly fall within the statute, but the second kind might easily have been treated as the same as mutual promises to marry. They have not been, however, and, as in general marriage is not regarded as part performance to take the case out of the statute, a writing is essential to recovery on them in the absence of proof of fraudulent intent. If the promisor made the promise with no intent to perform, then whether the contract is an oral antenuptial marriage settlement one or is an engagement contract with a property stipulation as part of it, most courts will give relief. See Peek v. Peek, 77 Cal. 106 (1888); Green v. Green, 34 Kans. 740 (1886). Cf. Jenkins v. Eldridge, 3 Story 181 (1844); Petty v. Petty, 4 B. Mon. (Ky.) 215 (1843); Tepper v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 151 N. Y. Supp. 1049 (1915). But see Hackney v. Hackney, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 452 (1847). In Green v. Green, 34 Kans. 740, 745, Horton, C. J., said that the court acted "upon the well established doctrine that fraud takes any case out of the statute of frauds." In Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 39 (1869), Wells, J., announced the following dictum: "In such cases the marriage, although not regarded as a part performance of the agreement for a marriage settlement, is such an irretrievable change of situation, that, if procured by artifice, upon the faith that the settlement had been, or the assurance that it would be, executed, the other party is held to make good the agreement, and not permitted to defeat it by pleading the statute." And in Colorado and Missouri there has been an inclination to regard marriage as part performance because of its irrevocable nature and of the feeling that the promisee is defrauded by the refusal to perform even if the promise was made with good intent. Moore v. Allen, 26 Colo. 197 (1899); Allen v. Moore, 30 Colo. 307 (1902); Nowack v. Berger, 133 Mo. 24 (1895). In other jurisdictions it is only where what constitutes part performance in the case of contracts for the sale of land has taken place that chancery will enforce the contract for real property marriage settlement despite its upon consideration of marriage feature. See Ungley v. Ungley, L. R. 4 Ch. D. 73 (1876); Surcome v. Pinniger, 3 DeG. M. & G. 571 (1853); Sharman v. Sharman, 67 L. T. (N. S.) 334 (1892); Neale v. Neales, 9 Wall. 1 (1869); Dugan v. Gittings, 3 Gill (Md.) 138 (1845).

For an argument that marriage should be deemed part performance in the case of those mutual promises to marry which also contain a promise by one party to settle property on the other, see 14 Ill. L. Rev. 1, 19-27.

On when a promise is made in consideration of marriage within the statute of frauds, see 10 A. L. R. 321, note.

until we get ready to wreck it, we won't be able to get at it right away'—we had other jobs ahead of it, and she agreed to carry the insurance for me. She asked me then: 'Well, how about the premiums I am paying on this? I am paying that out of my money.' I says, 'Well, in case of any loss, why then we'll divide with you fifty-fifty, you are to give us 50 per cent. of what you collect.' That was satisfactory to her. * * * So I gave her a $5.00 bill. * * * I rode down to my office, made a report to the bookkeeper that I had bought the building."

Next day the building burned. Defendant collected $1,603.25 insurance. Plaintiff sues for half the amount after deducting the purchase price. The jury found for plaintiff. The court gave judgment for defendant notwithstanding the verdict.

Plaintiff's first contention is that the agreement, "rightly construed," did not provide for a sale, but was an agreement to perform personal service, in wrecking a building, to be paid for in the material which composed the building, and that since the value of the material exceeded the value of the service, plaintiff was to give back the change in cash. It seems to us that the transaction was not a contract for services but of sale of the building, or of the material in it.

Plaintiff contends that if the agreement is to be construed a sale, it was a sale of fixtures to be removed and was valid though verbal. In other words that it was not a sale of an interest in land, which must, under the statute of frauds, G. S. 1913, § 7002, be evidenced by a writing, but a sale of personal property, governed by the statute of frauds applicable thereto, Laws of 1917, c. 465, § 4 (Gen. St. Supp. 1917, § 6015—4), and since part payment was made, no writing was required. The trial court, on the trial, treated the transaction as a sale of personal property, and instructed the jury that if plaintiff's version of the transaction was true and the $5.00 was paid they should find for plaintiff. On further consideration the court was of the opinion that it was a sale of an interest in land and void because not in writing.

We agree with the conclusion of the trial court. There is much confusion in the decisions as to when a sale of things attached to land, but which are to be removed, is to be considered a sale of land, and when a sale of personal property.

It is quite generally held that a contract to sell things affixed, but which the seller is to detach and pass title after separation, is an executory contract to sell personal property. Wilson v. Fuller, 58 Minn. 149, 59 N. W. 988; 1 Benjamin on Sales, § 133. Some decisions hold that a contract may partake of that nature, if the parties so intend, even though the buyer is to make the separation, and that the fact that the vendee is to make the separation is important only as bearing upon the intent of the parties as to when title is to pass. Wetkopsky v. New Haven Gas Light Co., 88 Conn. 1, 90 Atl. 30, Ann. Cas. 1916 D, 968.²⁵

Where the negotiation contemplates an immediate transfer of title, there is, as to natural products, such as trees and grasses, a line of well-considered decisions, holding that if the thing sold is to be immediately, or within a reasonable time, severed from the soil, and is not to be left to attain additional strength or increase from the land, the sale is one of personal property and not of an interest in land. Chafin v. Carpenter, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 580, 38 Am. Dec. 381; Banton v. Shorey, 77 Me. 48; Leonard v. Medford, 85 Md. 666, 37 Atl. 365, 37 L. R. A. 449; Marshall v. Green, L. R. 1 C. P. D. 35.²⁸

On the other hand, there are well-considered decisions holding that, inasmuch as such natural products are part of the land, a sale which contemplates the transfer of a present estate or interest is necessarily a sale of an interest in land. Bent v. Hoxie, 90 Wis. 625, 64 N. W. 426; Green v. Armstrong, 1 Denio 550; Stuart v. Pennis, 91 Va. 688, 22 S. E. 509. This court is committed to this doctrine. Herrick v. Newell, 49 Minn. 198, 51 N. W. 819; Kirkeby v. Erickson, 90 Minn. 299, 96 N. W. 705, 101 Am. St. Rep. 411; Kileen v. Kennedy, 90 Minn. 414, 97 N. W. 126; La Plant v. Loveland, 142 Minn. 89, 170 N. W. 920.

²⁸ The usual distinction as to crops is between fructus naturales and fructus industriales, the former being treated as land and the latter as goods, for statute of frauds purposes.

As to trees, "the conflict among the American cases on the subject cannot be wholly reconciled. In Massachusetts, Maine, Maryland, Kentucky and Connecticut sales of growing trees, to be presently cut and removed by the vendee, are held not to be within the operation of the fourth section of the statute of frauds. * * * The courts of most of the American states, however, that have considered the question, hold expressly that a sale of growing or standing timber is a contract concerning an interest in lands, and within the fourth section of the statute of frauds. * * *

"In all its other relations to the affairs of men, growing timber is regarded as an integral part of the land upon which it stands; it is not subject to levy and sale upon execution as chattel property; it descends with the land to the heir, and passes to the vendor with the soil. Jones v. Timmons, 21 Ohio St. 596. Coal, petroleum, building stone, and many other substances constituting integral parts of the land, have become articles of commerce, and easily detached and removed, and, when detached and removed, become personal property, as well as fallen timber; but no case is found in which it is suggested that sales of such substances, with a view to their immediate removal, would not be within the statute. Sales of growing timber are as likely to become the subjects of fraud and perjury as are the other integral parts of the land, and the question whether such sale is a sale of an interest in or concerning lands should depend not upon the intention of the parties, but upon the legal character of the subject of the contract, which, in the case of growing timber, is that of realty. This rule has the additional merit of being clear, simple, and of easy application,—qualities entitled to substantial weight in choosing between conflicting principles." Bradbury, J., in Hirth v. Graham, 50 Oh. St. 57, 64-65 (1893). See also, Gibson v. Stalnaker (W. Va.), 106 S. E. 243 (1921).

On the sale of growing trees as a sale of an interest in land within the statute of frauds, see 9 Ann. Cas. 192, note; 18 Ann. Cas. 971, note; Ann. Cas. 1916 A, 243, note; 19 L. R. A. 721, note; 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 278, note; 128 Am. St. Rep. 875, note.

In the Kirkeby case, but not in the others cited, it was also said that the part of the agreement which gave the vendee the right to enter upon and occupy the vendor's land for the purpose of cutting and removing the grass confers an interest in land. We hesitate to reaffirm this reasoning. The right to enter seems more properly a mere license, effectual until revoked. Herrick v. Newell, 49 Minn. 198, 200, 51 N. W. 819; Volk v. Olsen, 54 Misc. Rep. 227, 104 N. Y. Supp. 415; Whitmarsh v. Walker, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 313.³⁷ But we approve the result reached, on the ground that the standing grass was real estate, and the sale of it the sale of an interest in land.

There is a difference in principle between trade fixtures of a tenant and either natural products or buildings. Trade fixtures are for most purposes personal property.³⁸ Some decisions hold generally, in transactions between seller and buyer, that "in applying the statute of frauds, buildings are not classed with forest trees, but with growing crops, nursery trees and fixtures attached to realty." Long v. White, 42 Ohio St. 59. Some hold there can be no difference in principle, between fixtures attached to the building, and the building itself if it is to be severed or torn down and removed. Wetkopsky v. New Haven Gas Light Co., 88 Conn. 1, 90 Atl. 30, Ann. Cas. 1916 D, 968. Some authorities, holding contracts for sale of buildings to be contracts for sale of personalty, limit their reference to houses to be immediately removed. Wetkopsky v. New Haven Gas Light Co., 88 Conn. 1, 90 Atl. 30, Ann. Cas. 1916 D, 968; Tyler on Fixtures, p. 729.

We are not prepared to say there may not be some difference between buildings and natural products, though we might find it difficult to construe the statute as permitting an oral sale of the owner's house but requiring a writing on the sale of a shade tree. We are not prepared to say that there can be no difference between buildings and fixtures ³⁷ "A license is a permission or authority to enter the land and do certain acts or series of acts, the parties not intending to convey any interest in the land; and it is well settled that such a license need not be in writing, under the statute of frauds. Thus a license to enter land and to cut timber, or to gather the growing crops, is valid though not in writing. Whitmarsh v. Walker, 1 Met. 313." Morton, C. J., in Johnson v. Wilkinson, 139 Mass. 3 (1885).

See City of Berwyn v. Berglund, 255 Ill. 498 (1912); Newton v. Long, 107 Miss. 349 (1914).

³⁸ As to trade fixtures, see Lee v. Gaskell, 1 I. B. D. 700 (1876); Moody & Jemison v. Aiken, 50 Tex. 65 (1878); South Baltimore Co. v. Muhlbach, 69 Md. 395 (1888). It seems clear, as Professor Williston has contended for years, that while affixed they are real property with a right on the part of the tenant to sever and make them personalty; that a sale by the tenant to the landlord is merely a surrender of the right to sever; and that a contract sale by the tenant to third parties is a contract to transfer the title to them on severance, i. e., as goods, so is a contract to sell goods. Williston on Sales, § 65; 3 Williston on Contracts, § 519. But as Professor Williston there admits: "This distinction has not yet been sufficiently observed by the cases."

attached to them, as for example between a large building of steel, concrete, brick or stone, and hooks on a wall, but whether there are or not, we are of the opinion that there is but one safe or satisfactory rule to apply to such a building as is here involved, namely, a large and substantial two-story frame dwelling built on a permanent stone foundation, not to be immediately removed, and that is to hold that a sale or a contract of sale giving to the buyer a present interest and a right of removal is a sale of an interest in land, which under our statute must be in writing. This we think is in accord with the weight of the authority. Hogsett v. Ellis, 17 Mich. 351; Meyers v. Schemp, 67 Ill. 469; Volk v. Olsen, 54 Misc. Rep. 227, 104 N. Y. Supp. 415; White v. Foster, 102 Mass. 375, 378; Dudley v. Foote, 63 N. H. 57, 56 Am. Rep. 489; Rogers v. Cox, 96 Ind. 157, 49 Am. Rep. 152; Johnston v. Mortgage & Trust Co., 129 Ala. 515, 521, 30 South. 15, 87 Am. St. Rep. 75; Hutchins v. Masterson, 46 Tex. 551, 555, 26 Am. Rep. 286; Lavery v. Pursell, 39 L. R. Ch. Div. 508; Williston on Sales § 66.

We hold that since there was no writing there was no binding contract and plaintiff has no property rights in the building or in the insurance money.

*Judgment affirmed.*²⁹

HARRIET McCULLOUGH v. JANET FINLEY.

(Supreme Court of Kansas, 1904. 69 Kans. 705, 77 Pac. 696.)

BURCH, J. James McClaren died in 1869, leaving a will devising to his widow a life-estate in the land in controversy, consisting of an eighty-acre tract, with remainder in fee to his daughters, the plaintiff and the defendant. On March 16, 1874, these sisters orally agreed to divide the land, the plaintiff taking the south forty acres and the defendant the north forty acres, and on the same day the widow conveyed her interest in the respective tracts to her daughters by separate deeds. The husband of the defendant was also named as grantee in the deed to the defendant of her share of the land.

The defendant took possession of her part of the land, and has at all times since been in the actual possession of it, claiming to be the owner; has made lasting and valuable improvements upon it; has paid all taxes assessed against it, and has received all the rents and profits accruing from it since 1874. The plaintiff lived on or near the tract deeded to her for a few years and then sold it, keeping the proceeds as if the land had been her own. She has known since 1874 that her sister claimed the exclusive right to the north forty, and throughout the years made no claim upon it of any kind until she commenced this suit, in February, 1902. The devisee of the life-estate died in 1888. The plaintiff now denies that her verbal agreement and her conduct and the conduct of her sister in reliance upon the agreement are sufficient to exclude her from title to, and possession of, the land.

The courts have little forbearance toward claims so destitute of moral and conscientious quality. The statute of frauds was enacted to prevent, and not to foster, injustice, and the rule is settled in this state that possession, the payment of taxes, and permanent improvement under a parol agreement, with knowledge and acquiescence, remove the contract from the operation of the statute. Holmden v. Janes, 42 Kan. 758, 21 Pac. 591; Newkirk v. Marshall, 35 id. 77, 10 Pac. 571; Holcomb v. Dowell, 15 id. 378.³⁰ Upon the same principle a parol partition acted ³⁰ "The authorities in this country as to what acts of part performance will be sufficient, in the view of a court of equity, to take an oral contract for the sale or lease of lands out of the statute are not altogether harmonious, and this court has not been disposed to carry the doctrine of part performance quite to the extent to which it has been carried by the decisions of some of the courts. Certain acts of part performance, however, have uniformly been held sufficient. Thus, we have held in many cases, that taking possession of the land with the consent of the vendor, paying the purchase money, and making lasting and valuable improvements, are sufficient acts of part performance to justify the specific performance of an oral contract of purchase. Thorton v. Heirs of Henry, 2 Scam. 218; Updike v. Armstrong, 3 id. 564; Stevens v. Wheeler, 25 Ill. 300; Blunt v. Tomlin, 27 id. 93; Mason v. Blair, 33 id. 194; *Fleming v. In other cases it is held that taking possession and paying the purchase money is sufficient. Fitzsimmons v. Allen's Admr., 39 Ill. 440; Temple v. Johnson, 71 id. 13; Ferbrache v. Ferbrache, 110 id. 210; Ramsey v. Liston, 25 id. 114; Shirley v. Spencer, 4 Gilm. (Ill.) 583. In other cases it is held that taking possession and making valuable improvements is sufficient part performance. Keys v. Test, 33 Ill. 316; Kurtz v. Hibner, 55 id. 514; Wood v. Thornly, 58 id. 464; Langston v. Bates, 84 id. 524; Kaufman v. Cook, 114 id. 11; Bohanan v. Bohanan, 96 id. 591; Bright v. Bright, 41 id. 97; Padfield v. Padfield, 92 id. 198." Bailey, J., in Morrison v. Herrick, 130 Ill. 631, 640, 641 (1889).

"He [the appellant] invokes the rule that acts relied on as part performance must be referable to and done in pursuance of the contract, and seems to assume that this includes only acts which were stipulated to be done in the contract itself, and as a part thereof. We do not understand this to be the law. While the phrase 'part performance' is commonly used as a short and convenient statement of the general ground upon which verbal agreements regarding real estate are enforced, yet the whole doctrine rests upon the principle of fraud, and proceeds upon the idea that the party has so changed his situation, on the faith of the oral agreement, that it would be a fraud upon him to permit the other party to defeat the agreement by setting up the statute. Hence the term 'part performance' falls far short of expressing the whole doctrine and theory of courts of equity in this matter. The change of situation necessary to create this equitable estoppel must, of course, have been made in reliance upon, and in pursuance of, the oral agreement, and so con-

upon in this case will not be disturbed. Crimmins v. Morrissey, 36 Kan. 447, 13 Pac. 748; Duffey v. Rafferty, 15 id. 9, 13; 21 A. & E. Encycl. of L., 2d ed., 1137 et seq.

It is said that the defendant's possession must be referred to the deed from her mother as life-tenant and that she could not hold adversely to her cotenant of the fee. This proposition ignores the agreement between the parties under which the land was divided between them, and under which the plaintiff surrendered all right to the defendant's portion. The cotenancy of the fee was then at an end. The plaintiff no longer held any estate in remainder in the defendant's part of the land, and the defendant was at perfect liberty to take title to the life-interest in her own portion and held the entire estate adversely to the plaintiff.

At the time the agreement to divide the land was made, the defendant lacked a month of being of age. The contract, however, was voidable only and became binding when the defendant failed to disaffirm within a reasonable time after attaining majority. (Gen Stat. 1901, Sec. 4183.)

The case of Love v. Blauw, 61 Kan. 496, 59 Pac. 1059, 48 L. R. A. 257, 73 Am. St. Rep. 334, has no application because the partition in this case was between owners of the fee, and not between life-tenants on one side and remainder-men on the other.

The findings of fact are assailed as unsupported by the evidence. In a few unimportant particulars the court may have embodied in its findings some facts which the record only suggests, but every fact essential to a judgment in favor of the defendant was abundantly sustained.

The facts relied on as an estoppel to the plaintiff's recovery were sufficiently pleaded, and the judgment of the district court is nected with the performance of the contract that, from the nature of the case, the defendant should understand it was done in reliance upon his agreement. The acts done must be related to and connected with the contract, and the defendant's performance of it. * * * But this change of situation is not confined to doing what the contract stipulated,—that is, 'part performance,' strictly so called." Mitchell, J., in Brown v. Hoag, 35 Minn. 373 (1886).

In a few American jurisdictions, courts of equity refuse to read a part performance exception into the statute. "This court has repeatedly decided that a bill to enforce a parol contract for the sale of land cannot be maintained in this state, and that part performance will not take a parol sale of lands out of the statute of frauds. The statute contains no exceptions in regard to such contracts, and it is not for us to create exceptions where none exist in the statute." Peyton, J., in McGuire v. Stevens, 42 Miss. 724, 732 (1869). "In four states the doctrine of part performance is wholly rejected. These states are Kentucky, Mississippi, North Carolina and Tennessee. But in at least two of those states the vendee under the oral contract may enforce in equity a lien for the purchase-money paid and for the value of his improvements, after accounting for rents and profits." 36 Cyc. 648.

³¹"According to the English authorities and also the decisions in some states, a partition by agreement must, to be valid under the statute of frauds, be in writing. In perhaps a majority of the states, however, a parol partition is upheld when followed by possession by the various tenants of the portions

JOHN H. DOUGHERTY v. HERALD CATLETT.

BAILEY, J.† The only questions presented by this appeal are those arising upon the plea of the statute of frauds. It appears from the declaration that, prior to the date of the contract upon which the suit is brought, the plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement in writing, by which the defendant, in consideration of a certain sum of money then paid to him by the plaintiff, and of certain other payments thereafter to be made, agreed to convey to the plaintiff certain lands in Vermilion county; that the plaintiff thereupon entered into possession of said lands; that while so in possession he sold an undivided half of the lands to one McCabe, the defendant conveying said undivided half to McCabe at the plaintiff's request; that after such conveyance was made and while the plaintiff was still in possession of the remaining undivided half, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a verbal agreement whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and surrender to the defendant said undivided half still in his possession, the defendant agreeing, in consideration thereof, to pay the plaintiff the sum of $3,500; that the plaintiff thereupon surrendered to the defendant the possession of said undivided half of said premises, and that the defendant retained the same in his possession, and afterwards sold and conveyed it to a third person, with the plaintiff's knowledge, for the sum of $4,000. The suit is brought to recover of the defendant the consideration of said verbal agreement.

The second section of the statute of frauds of which the defendant seeks by his plea to avail himself is as follows: "No action shall be brought to charge any person upon any contract for the sale of lands, tenements or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, for a longer term than one year, unless such contract or some memorandum allotted to them,—a view which is based on different ground by different courts. Thus it is stated that such a partition is valid in the case of a tenancy in common because it involves merely a severance of the possession between the various owners, and not a transfer of title, as this is already severed. Sometimes it is stated that a partition will be presumed from the exclusive possession by one tenant of a part of the premises for a considerable length of time. Occasionally the state statute of frauds, applying in terms only to a sale of lands, was held not to include a partition. And sometimes the theory appears to be that one taking part in such a parol partition is estopped to deny its validity as against one who has received his share and erected improvements thereon. A parol partition, followed by the taking of possession of their allotted part by the various cotenants, has been upheld in courts exercising equitable powers on the ground that the partition is in effect an agreement for the mutual transfer of the various interests, and that the taking of possession constitutes such part performance as takes the case out of the statute and authorizes a decree for specific performance." 1 Tiffany on Real Property, 2 Ed., pp. 700-702.

† The statement of facts is omitted.

or note thereof shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto lawfully authorized in writing signed by such party."

The execution by the defendant to the plaintiff of the written contract of sale alleged in the declaration vested in the plaintiff an equitable interest in the lands therein described, and there can be no doubt that such interest was an interest in or concerning lands within the meaning of said statute. That the statute of frauds embraces equitable as well as legal interests in land is well settled. Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 229. As said by Mr. Justice Story in Smith v. Burnham, 3 Sumner 435, "A contract for the conveyance of lands is a contract respecting an interest in lands. It creates an equitable estate in the vendee in the very lands, and makes the vendor a trustee for him. A contract for the sale of an equitable estate in lands, whether it be under a contract for the conveyance by a third party, or otherwise, is clearly a sale of an interest in lands, within the statute of frauds." See also Richards v. Richards, 9 Gray (Mass.) 313; Hughes v. Moore, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 176; Simms v. Killian, 12 Ired. (N. Car.) 252; Dial v. Crain, 10 Tex. 444; Catlett v. Dougherty, 21 Ill. App. 116; Jevne v. Osgood, 57 Ill. 340.

The plaintiff contends that the acts performed by him under his oral contract to sell and surrender his interest in said lands to the defendant constitute such a performance as should take the case out of the statute. The only act of performance alleged in the declaration is the delivery of possession of the premises sold to the defendant. There is no allegation of any cancellation or surrender of the defendant's contract to convey the lands to the plaintiff on payment of the purchase money, nor is the cancellation of said contract averred, either directly or inferentially. It will therefore be presumed that said contract is still held by the plaintiff as a valid and subsisting legal obligation against the defendant. The averments of the declaration, therefore, as we interpret them, show a partial and not a complete performance.

The doctrine of part performance is a doctrine of equity and does not prevail at law. Mr. Browne, in his Treatise on the Statute of Frauds § 451, says: "It is settled by a long series of authorities, that a part execution of a verbal contract within the statute of frauds has no effect at law to take the case out of its provisions," and in support of this statement a large number of cases are cited in a note. To same effect see 2 Reed on the Statute of Frauds, § 548, and authorities cited in note. The same rule has been frequently announced by this court. Warner v. Hale, 65 Ill. 395; Wheeler v. Frankenthal, 78 id. 124; Creighton v. Sanders, 89 id. 543.

The plaintiff's contention is, that the facts averred in the declaration amount to a rescission of the defendant's contract to convey, and that such rescission, coupled with a delivery of possession, should be held to be tantamount to a complete performance. The difficulty with this view is that no rescission is averred, either directly or inferentially. The only averment is that the plaintiff had surrendered the possession to the defendant who already had the legal title, and that the defendant subsequently conveyed the land, with the plaintiff's knowledge, to a third person. A surrender of possession did not necessarily involve a rescission of the defendant's contract, since such surrender of possession may be entirely consistent with an intention on his part to retain the defendant's contract with a view of subsequently enforcing it against him. The pleading must be construed most strongly against the pleader and as the declaration contains no averment of a rescission or of any facts from which a rescission must be necessarily implied, it must be presumed that none was made or intended. If the plaintiff relied on the theory of a rescission he should have averred it, and not having done so, he cannot recover upon a theory not supported by his declaration.

We are unable to see that any special force is to be given, in this connection, to the averment that the defendant had conveyed the land to a third person with the plaintiff's knowledge. It might perhaps have been different if such conveyance had been made with the plaintiff's consent and approbation. The legal effect of the conveyance, so long as it does not appear to have been made with the plaintiff's consent, is merely to place it out of the defendant's power to perform his contract to convey the land to the plaintiff, but it has no tendency to work a rescission or cancellation of the contract, or to absolve the defendant from his liability thereon, and this is in no way affected by the mere knowledge of the plaintiff that the conveyance was being made. We are of the opinion that the demurrer to the defendant's plea was properly overruled. The judgment of the appellate court will therefore be affirmed.

GRAESER v. GORDON ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1920. 179 N. W. 352.)

Action for services rendered resulted in judgment as prayed. The defendants appeal. Affirmed.

LADD, J.³³ The petition alleges that defendants employed plaintiff to obtain an easement over "the south thirty feet of Holcomb Avenue, West, across outlot A, lying between Home Park addition and the east bank of the Des Moines river, now included in the city of Des Moines, Iowa," to be used in conveying ice from the river to icehouses, and that for services so rendered defendants promised to pay plaintiff the sum of $300; that plaintiff procured the said easement for defendants on conditions approved by them, and demanded judgment accordingly. Defendants interposed a general denial, and pleaded that the contract, if any, was "for the creation, transfer, and conveyance of an interest in real estate," and that the contract was not in writing, and may not be proven orally. * * * Gordon admits in his affidavit "that defendants agreed with plaintiff that they would pay him $300 if he would secure for them from the city access to said river across said strip of ground for any and all purposes whatsoever, and especially for obtaining sand and gravel," but denies any agreement in his testimony, while plaintiff says he undertook to obtain only a right of way for the ice. In either event the contract might have been found to have been for services, and not for the creation or transfer of an interest in land. An agreement to procure a conveyance is not within the statute of frauds. Bannon v. Bean, 9 Iowa 395; Cooley v. Osborne, 50 Iowa 526.³⁴ The jury might well have found the contract to have been for services such as were rendered, and not for the purchase of an easement. See Miller v. Davis, 175 N. W. 11.

³⁴ It is a question of fact whether service is contracted for or an interest in land is being bought from the so-called agent. In Cooley v. Osborne an agreement by mortgagees to foreclose the mortgage and convey to another the land so acquired was held not within the statute. Bannon v. Bean, where the agreement was to procure a conveyance of lands by another, may be supported, while Cooley v. Osborne may not.

³⁵ "The lessees, by the written instrument, agreed to drill and operate for oil, and of what they would thus produce from the wells and thereby severed from the realty, they were to yield and pay to the lessor one-sixth. Hence, when the parties entered into the parol contract as found by the lower court, [namely, that if the lessees, who had given notice of intention to surrender the lease would continue to drill and operate the lands for oil the royalty payable should be one-eighth of the oil produced and saved instead of the one-sixth provided in the lease, with certain increases in royalty in events which did not happen] they were not contracting for an interest in or concerning real estate, but for a division of personal property in proportions different from those named in the written lease. The royalty is an incident to the written instrument as a means of compensation to the lessor for the grant and privileges therein conveyed." Price, J., in Nonamaker v. Amos, 73 Oh. nership between appellant and Desjardins, and that the lots and the buildings erected thereon are partnership property; and the claim of appellant is that the statute of frauds has no application to such a case.

It is well settled that an oral contract by two or more persons to purchase real estate for their joint benefit is within the statute. But it has been a mooted question whether a partnership can be created by parol for the purpose of buying and selling lands for profit. There is a very considerable conflict in the cases upon that question, but the decided weight of authority seems to have answered it in the affirmative. That an agreement for a partnership, for the purpose of dealing and trading in lands for profit, is not within the statute, and that the fact of the existence of the partnership, and the extent of each party's interest, may be shown by parol is now quite generally accepted as the established doctrine. Dale v. Hamilton, 5 Hare 369; Essex v. Essex, 20 Beav. 449; Holman v. McCrary, 51 Ind. 358; Richards v. Grinnell, 63 Iowa 44; Chester v. Dickerson, 54 N. Y. 1; Black v. Black, 15 Ga. 449; Fall River Whaling Co. v. Borden, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 458; Bunnel v. Tainter, 4 Conn. 568; Pennybacker v. Leary, 65 Iowa 220; Gibbons v. Bell, 45 Tex. 417; Perronett v. Pyme, 34 N. J. Eq. 26. * * *

The cases we have cited, and many others, proceed upon the theory that the real estate of a partnership is treated and administered in equity, as between partners and for all the purposes of the partnership, as personal property and partnership assets. From its status in equity, of being stock in trade and partnership assets, it is readily deducible that it is immaterial whether the legal title to the partnership land is in all the partners, or in one, or in some number less than the whole; that it is not material whether the partnership was already established and engaged in its business when the land was acquired and brought into the partnership stock, or whether the partnership was established and the land acquired and put in contemporaneously, or whether the partnership was established for the express and special purpose of dealing in and making profit out of the very land itself which is in question; and that the facts of the existence of the partnership, and that the lands were acquired and used for partnership purposes, being shown by parol, it is immaterial whether such partnership was formed by written articles or by parol. Browne's Stat. Frauds, § 261a.

The doctrine of the cases we have cited, so far as it involves the provisions of the statute of frauds, seems to proceed upon the ground of a trust implied from the relation of co-partnership.

The matter here at issue is a close question and beset with difficulties whichever view is taken. It seems difficult to demonstrate, to a certainty, that the doctrine above stated should prevail and take partnership agreements and partnership property out of the statute, and equally difficult to satisfactorily demonstrate that such agreements are within the statute, as held in Smith v. Burnham, 3 Sum. (U. S.) 437; Bird

v. Morrison, 12 Wis. 138, and other cases.³⁷ Upon the whole, we are inclined to follow the view which seems to obtain in England and in most of the states of the Union, that partnership agreements and partnership lands, as between the partners and for all partnership purposes, are not within the statute.

The bill in the case at bar shows that the parties agreed to purchase the five lots and erect buildings thereon, each party contributing one-half of the money necessary for the enterprise, the lots and buildings then to be sold, and the profit or loss arising from the enterprise to be divided equally between them. This was manifestly a partnership agreement. The bill then shows that the parties purchased the lots "in pursuance of the agreement," and that, at the same time and as a part of the same transaction, money was raised by placing mortgages on the lots and the purchase price of the lots paid with such money. Whose money, then, was it that was applied in payment of the lots? It is admitted that, by the terms of the partnership agreement, all liabilities that the partners, or either of them, should create in furtherance of the enterprise, were to be, as between the partners, treated and considered as joint liabilities to be met and shared by them in equal shares. This would seem to stamp the money that was received on the mortgages and paid on the lots as partnership money. Since, then, the money, by force of the agreement, was partnership money it follows that, when $3,750 of it was, at the time of the purchase, paid as the purchase money of the lots, a resulting trust at once arose by operation of law, out of the transaction, in favor of the partnership. See Wallace v. Carpenter, 85 Ill. 590.

³⁷ See also Langley v. Sanborn, 135 Wis. 178 (1903); Huntington v. Burdeau, 149 Wis. 263 (1912).

So in Michigan it has been said, that "A partnership agreement to buy and sell lands generally falls within the statute of frauds. Nester v. Sullivan, 147 Mich. 493, 111 N. W. 85, 1033, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106. And this is likewise true when but one transaction is involved, and where it may be treated as a joint adventure only. Tuttle v. Bristol, 142 Mich. 148, 105 N. W. 145." Fellows, J., in Morrison v. Meister (Mich.), 180 N. W. 395, 396 (1920).

But a contract between real estate men to divide commissions is different. "We do not regard the contract as constituting a partnership agreement. It was no more nor less than an agreement between real estate agents to divide and share commissions in certain proportions accruing from the sale of a specific parcel of real estate—an arrangement very common among real estate agents. To hold that this agreement constituted a partnership between the parties would be to say that every agreement between real estate agents for a division of commissions in the event of a sale of a specific parcel of real estate constituted such real estate agents partners—a proposition which we apprehend is without support in reason or authority. Neither did it involve any interest in real estate within the meaning of sections 2302 or 2304, Stats. It created no estate or interest in, nor any trust or power over or concerning, lands, nor was it a contract for the sale of any lands or any interest in land; so that, whether or not it was a partnership agreement, it was not affected by the statute of frauds." Owen, J., in Etscheld v. Thieffenthaler (Wis.), 177 N. W. 887, 888 (1920).

Our conclusion, therefore, is that, without regard to the question whether or not the partnership agreement mentioned in the bill of complaint was in writing, a proper case for the interposition of a court of chancery was stated in the bill, and it was error to sustain the demurrer and dismiss said bill.

The decree is reversed, and the cause is remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer.

*Decree reversed.*³⁸

STANDIFER ET AL. v. COMBS ET AL.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1919. 184 Ky. 708, 212 S. W. 921.)

CLARKE, J.³⁹ Leslie Standifer filed this action in equity to quiet his title to 150 acres of land lying on First creek in Perry county, Ky.,

³⁸ In Goldstein v. Nathan, 158 Ill. 641, 64 (1895), Phillips, J., said: "There is a wide distinction, however, in an agreement for one to become interested in the profits of certain land already purchased and owned by another, and an agreement to share in the benefits to be derived from lands to be thereafter acquired. Where lands are purchased by a partnership and paid for with the moneys thereof, or acquired as partnership property in the usual course of business of such partnership, a court of equity may treat such real estate as partnership funds, and, as a consequence, as personal property. This rule grows out of the nature of the partnership relation, and is rendered necessary for the purpose of doing justice between the parties, or between the firm and others doing business and having dealings therewith. (Black v. Black, 15 Ga. 445.) In this case, the land was not purchased by appellant in the name of appellee and the purchase money furnished by appellant. It is not a case of a purchase of lands paid for out of partnership funds and a deed taken to appellee. No partnership funds existed. There was therefore no resulting trust in appellant, and whatever interest he is alleged by the bill to have acquired was by virtue of his contract. The lot was owned by appellee at the time of the contract and paid for by his money, and any interest in the land or the proceeds growing out of the alleged contract cannot be severed and made to apply to the profits as distinct from the land itself. If the appellant acquired an interest in appellee's lot by virtue of his contract, it attached upon the contract being made. If such interest attached and the land had not been sold, the appellant would have been entitled to his moiety therein. Had appellee died before sale, and appellant had an interest in the lot, he would have the right to sell and wind up the partnership affairs. It is only by having acquired an interest in the lot that he could have acquired an interest in the proceeds of the sale. We hold, that where two separate owners of real estate, purchased by their separate funds, enter into a co-partnership with reference to a sale thereof, by a parol contract, such contract is within the statute of frauds. McCormick's Appeal, 57 Pa. St. 54; Vose v. Strong, 144 Ill. 108; Smith v. Burnham, 3 Sum. (U. S.) 435."

alleging both title to and possession of same as was necessary he should do to maintain the action. Section 11, Kentucky Statutes. * * *

There is no evidence whatever of an actual adverse possession by plaintiff of any part of the land in controversy for any continuous period, but an attempt was made to prove the establishment of an agreed division line between his and Elhanon Combs' lands, and this proof, it is argued by his counsel, is sufficient to establish both his title to and possession of the land up to the division line, including the land in controversy, under authority of Turner v. Bowens, 180 Ky. 755, 203 S. W. 749; Le Moyne v. Hays, 145 Ky. 415, 140 S. W. 552; Rice v. Blair, 161 Ky. 280, 170 S. W. 657; Warden v. Addington, 131 Ky. 296, 115 S. W. 241; and Garvin v. Threlkeld, 173 Ky. 262, 190 S. W. 1092.

These cases are but a few of the many from this court wherein an agreed division line which had been established, marked, and acquiesced in for a considerable length of time by the parties has been upheld, but, as was pointed out in the recent case of Bordes v. Leece, 183 Ky. 146, 208 S. W. 780:

"The result of such an agreement must not be the mere transfer of the lands owned by one party to the other, as this is in contravention of the statute against frauds. The principle upon which such an agreement is upheld and enforced is that the mere establishment of the true dividing line is not a sale or transfer of land by one party to another, and hence not an agreement within the statute of frauds, requiring it to be in writing and signed by the parties to be bound, but is an ascertainment and demarcation of the lands already owned by the parties, and is enforced in the interest of putting an end to controversies."

And as said in Garvin v. Threlkeld, supra:

"While the validity of parol agreements to settle disputed boundaries was long resisted on the ground that, in effect, they passed the title to real property without the solemnities required by the statute, it is now settled that, where the dividing line is uncertain and there is a bona fide dispute as to its location, and the parties agree on the dividing line and execute the agreement by marking the line or building a fence thereon, such an agreement is not prohibited by the statute of frauds, nor is it within the meaning of the provisions of the law that regulate the manner of conveying real estate. The reason for the rule is that the parties do not undertake to acquire and to pass the title to real estate, as must be done by written contract or conveyance. They simply by agreement fix and determine the situation and location of the thing that they already own; the purpose being simply by something agreed on to identify their several holdings and to make certain that which they regarded as uncertain."

Plaintiff utterly failed to bring his claim within the rule of these cases, because not only was the evidence in our judgment insufficient upon the question of any agreement upon a division line and its recognition as such by the parties, but there is no evidence whatever of a bona fide or any kind of a dispute as to the ownership of this land when it is claimed the asserted division line was agreed upon. Plaintiff neither exhibited nor claimed any title or pretense of title to any of the land now seemingly for the first time in dispute, except a denied parol purchase from Elhanon Combs which he did not plead, and which, if made, was clearly within the statute of frauds and unenforceable. The only acts of ownership of possession he attempted to prove was an occasional cutting of timber on the land.

It is therefore apparent plaintiff failed to prove either title to or possession of the land, and the chancellor did not err in dismissing the petition.

JOHN DOYLE v. JOHN DIXON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1867. 97 Mass. 208, 93 Am. Dec. 80.)

Contract for a breach of an agreement by the defendant as part of the sale of his grocery business at Chicopee.

The defendant requested the judge to rule that the plaintiff could not recover upon an oral agreement not to go into the grocery business in ⁴⁰ "Where the dividing line is uncertain, and there is a bona fide dispute as to its location between adjoining landowners, who agree on the dividing line and execute the agreement by marking the line or building a fence thereon, * * * such an agreement, followed by possession with reference to the boundary so fixed, is conclusive on the parties, although the possession may not have been for the full statutory period, it being sufficient to show that the dividing line was actually established, and thereafter recognized or acquiesced in by the parties for a considerable time. Garvin v. Threlkeld, 173 Ky. 262, 190 S. W. 1092." Clay, C., in Holbrooks v. Wright, 187 Ky. 732, 220 S. W. 524, 527 (1920).

See "Payne v. McBride, 96 Ark. 168, 131 S. W. 463, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 661, and other cases decided by this court, holding in effect that, the owners of adjoining lands being in dispute as to the dividing line, their oral agreement as to the boundary establishes the line, which, when followed by possession with reference thereto, is conclusive upon them.

"The agreements in cases of this kind do not operate as a conveyance, so as to pass title from one to another, but they proceed upon the theory that the true boundary line is in dispute, and that the agreement serves to fix the true line to which the title of each extends. The parties thereafter hold up to the line as they did before by virtue of their respective deeds. The theory is that the parties have simply by agreement settled the location of their boundary lines, which was in doubt, instead of having the court settle it for them. So when they orally agree upon the line, and the agreement is accompanied by possession to the agreed line, such agreement will be valid and binding." Hart, J., in Sherrin v. Coffman, 143 Ark. 8, 219 S. W. 348, 349 (1920).

On oral agreements as to boundary line as within the statute of frauds, see 8 Ann. Cas. 83, note; 16 Ann. Cas. 150, note; Ann. Cas. 1912 B, 662, note; 102 Am. St. Rep. 246, note. Cf. 110 Am. St. Rep. 677, note.

Chicopee within five years, because such agreement was not to be performed within one year from the making thereof and was within the statute of frauds; but the judge ruled the contrary. The defendant alleged exceptions.

GRAY, J.⁴¹ It is well settled that an oral agreement which according to the expression and contemplation of the parties may or may not be fully performed within a year is not within that clause of the statute of frauds which requires any "agreement not to be performed within one year from the making thereof" to be in writing in order to maintain an action. An agreement therefore which will be completely performed according to its terms and intention if either party should die within the year is not within the statute. Thus in Peters v. Westborough, 19 Pick. 364, it was held that an agreement to support a child until a certain age at which the child would not arrive for several years was not within the statute, because it depended upon the contingency of the child's life, and, if the child should die within one year, would be fully performed. On the other hand, if the agreement cannot be completely performed within a year, the fact that it may be terminated, or further performance excused or rendered impossible, by the death of the promisee or of another person within a year, is not sufficient to take it out of the statute. It was therefore held in Hill v. Hooper, 1 Gray, 131, that an agreement to employ a boy for five years and to pay his father certain sums at stated periods during that time was within the statute; for although by the death of the boy the services which were the consideration of the promise would cease, and the promise therefore be determined, it would certainly not be completely performed. So if the death of the promisor within the year would merely prevent full performance of the agreement, it is within the statute; but if his death would leave the agreement completely performed and its purpose fully carried out, it is not. It has accordingly been repeatedly held by this court that an agreement not hereafter to carry on a certain business at a particular place was not within the statute, because, being only a personal engagement to forbear doing certain acts, not stipulating for anything beyond the promisor's life, and imposing no duties upon his legal representatives, it would be fully performed if he died within the year. Lyon v. King, 11 Met. 411; Worthy v. Jones, 11 Gray, 168. An agreement not to engage in a certain kind of business at a particular place for a specified number of years is within the same principle; for whether a man agrees not to do a thing for his life, or never to do it, or only not to do it for a certain number of years, it is in either form an agreement by which he does not promise that anything shall be done after his death, and the performance of which is therefore completed with his life. An agreement to do a thing for a certain time may perhaps bind the promisor's representatives, and at any rate is not performed if he dies within that time. But a mere agreement that he will himself refrain from doing a certain thing is fully performed if he keeps it so long as he is capable of doing or refraining. The agreement of the defendant not to go into business again at Chicopee for five years was therefore not within the statute of frauds. * * *

*Exceptions overruled.*⁴²

⁴² See Hill v. Jamieson, 16 Ind. 125 (1861); Foster v. McO'Brien, 18 Mo. 88 (1853); Erwin v. Hayden (Tex. Civ. App.), 48 S. W. 610 (1897).

The question is whether by dying the promisor would at once go out of business for five years and longer. If he would, then the fact that he might die within the year would keep the contract from coming under the "not to be performed within a year" provision of the statute. But some courts refuse to regard death as so time destroying. See Gottschalk v. Witter, 25 Oh. St. 76 (1874); McGirr v. Campbell, 75 N. Y. Supp. 571 (1902). The principal case seems to accord with common sense.

The leading American case on contracts not to be performed within a year is Warner v. Texas & Pacific Ry. Co., 164 U. S. 418 (1896). That case lays down the rule that if the contract may be performed within the year it does not fall within the statute, even though the parties contemplated a longer life for it. That is the general American view.

"On the first proposition, neither the contract alleged nor the one proven by specific terms nor by necessary implication extended its performance beyond a year. Where this is the case, it does not matter that the parties may have thought or held the opinion that work under the contract might be extended beyond that period. It will not thereby be rendered void under the statute. Reckley v. Zenn, 74 W. Va. 43, 81 S. E. 565; McClanahan v. Coal & Mining Co., 74 W. Va. 543, 82 S. E. 752; Kimmins v. Oldham, 27 W. Va. 258. A contract is not brought within the terms of the statute because it was not expected to be performed within a year, if it is one that under all the circumstances admits of performance within a year. Warren, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Holbrook, 118 N. Y. 586, 23 N. E. 908, 16 Am. St. Rep. 788, and note; Dant v. Head, 90 Ky. 255, 13 S. W. 1073, 29 Am. St. Rep. 369, and note." Miller, P., in Rua v. Bowyer Smokeless Coal Co. (W. Va.), 99 S. E. 213, 216 (1919).

"As early as the case of Peter v. Compton, Skin. 353, [1693] the great majority of the judges declared that where the agreement was to be performed upon a contingent, and it does not appear within the agreement that it is to be performed after the year, there a note in writing is not necessary, for the contingent might happen within a year; but where it appears by the whole tenor of the agreement that it is to be performed after a year, there a note is necessary; otherwise, not. This has been the generally-accepted rule since that case was decided. Parol agreements to do something for an indefinite period which may be terminated within a year are valid. To be within the statute, it must be such an agreement as does not admit of performance, according to its language and intention, within a year from the time it is made.

"The following contracts by parol have been held to be enforceable and not within the statute of frauds: To pay upon the death of a third person. To pay upon the termination of a suit. To pay on the day of the promisor's marriage. * * * To marry upon restoration to health. To pay out of one's estate after death. To pay during life of promisee. To pay during coverture." Van Syckel, J., in Eiseman v. Schneider, 60 N. J. L. 291, 292-293 (1897).

A conflict of opinion has developed as to the kind of contract where the parties contemplate more than a year's performance but provide for shortening it on notice. An example is a contract for two years' service, but the contract to be terminable by either party during the period on three months' notice. The question is whether such a contract is performable within the year as distinguished from destroyable.

That such a contract is within the statute, see Dobson v. Collis, 1 H. & N. 81 (1856); Hanau v. Ehrlich, [1912] A. C. 39 (a decision of the House of Lords affirming [1911] 2 K. B. 1056); Meyer v. Roberts, 46 Ark. 80 (1885); Harris v. Porter, 2 Harr. (Del.) 27 (1835); Wilson v. Ray, 13 Ind. 1 (1859); Biest v. VerSteeg Shoe Co., 94 Mo. App. 137, 70 S. W. 1081; Wagniere v. Dunnell, 29 R. I. 580 (1909). That such a contract is not within the statute, see Roberts v. Rockbottom Co., 7 Metc. (Mass.) 46 (1843); Blake v. Voigt, 134 N. Y. 69 (1893). Cf. Weatherford, etc., Co., v. Wood, 88 Tex. 191 (1895).

"If the contract permits its destruction by the parties, that destruction is merely carrying out the terms of the agreement and nothing more." Smith, J., in Johnston v. Bowersock, 62 Kana. 148, 160 (1900). Even in Hanau v. Ehrlich, supra, where the question was whether a contract of employment for two years determinable on six months' notice by either party during that period was or was not an agreement not to be performed within a year, Earl Loreburn, L. C., admitted that "If you are to look at the words of this statute without any previous guidance at all, to my mind either construction contended for is possible as a matter of language and pure interpretation of the meaning of language," ([1912] A. C. 39, 41). Lord Atkinson thought "the language of this statute is ambiguous," ([1912] A. C. 39, 42) and Lord Alverstone said that he could "quite see that if there were an absolutely clear slate it might be possible to construe the statute somewhat differently" (id.) but all the judges agreed that the interpretation of the language in Dobson v. Collis, supra, [1 H. & N. 81] in 1856, followed frequently since at nisi prius, should be reaffirmed.

On contract not to be performed within one year but terminable at option of parties as within the statute of frauds, see 17 Ann. Cas. 207, note; Ann. Cas. 1912 B, 731, note.

On whether a contract which depends upon contingency for performance within a year is within the statute of frauds, see 4 Ann. Cas. 174, note; Ann. Cas. 1916 E, 1136, note; 128 Am. St. Rep. 599, note.

It is, of course, perfectly clear that impossibility of performance demonstrated within the year, as by the death within the year of one contracting to serve more than a year, would not constitute performance within the year to take the case out of the statute.

A question has arisen whether a contract to work for another for a year beginning tomorrow morning can be performed within a year. As the contract will be completed at the end of the day a year from today, it can be and will be performed within the year if parts of the day are not regarded. Some courts so hold. Smith v. Gold Coast Limited, [1903] 1 K. B. 285, 538; Dickson v. Frisbee, 52 Ala. 165 (1875). Others hold the contract within the statute. Billington v. Cahill, 4 N. Y. Supp. 660 (1889). See Raymond v. Phipps, 215 Mass. 559 (1913). Compare the question when a person becomes 21 or 25. Is it the day before his birthday? In re Shurey, [1918] 1 Ch. 263, says yes, and the American cases generally seem to be in accord.

On validity within statute of frauds of a contract for a year's employment

TRIMBLE, J.⁴⁸ This is a suit for damages for breach of an oral contract. Plaintiff's husband, William Bird, was foreman on one of defendant's ranches, and on September 27, 1910, was engaged in the digging of a ditch thereon. While so doing, the sides of the ditch caved in and killed him. He left his widow, the plaintiff and several minor children, the youngest of whom was six months old. Plaintiff intended and was about to bring a suit for damages against defendant on the ground that her husband's death was caused by defendant's negligence. Defendant, knowing this, went to plaintiff some two weeks after her husband's death and proposed to her a settlement, offering and agreeing that, if she would not bring a suit or cause him any trouble, he would pay her $20 per month until her youngest child became 18 years of age, a period of 17½ years. He told her such an arrangement would be all right and it would be better for her to get the money in installments this way than to have all the money paid into her hands at once. After making certain that he would "always" pay it to her, that is, that he would pay during the aforesaid time whether the child lived or died, she accepted the offer, and they separated with the clear understanding and agreement that she would not bring her contemplated suit and he would pay her $20 monthly throughout the time above mentioned, a period of 210 months.

Defendant at once began paying her the monthly sums of $20, and continued to do so down to and including the month of February, 1914, a period of 41 months. In the meantime she had married her deceased husband's brother and moved to Minnesota, and defendant sent her the monthly checks for $20 while there and also for a time after their return from that state. Her husband finally went back to Minnesota, and, when she got ready to follow him, defendant refused to continue making the payments, unless, so she says, she would leave her husband, whom defendant considered worthless.

The defendant concedes that he paid her monthly payments down to February, 1914, but denies that there was any agreement between them or settlement of her cause of action, insisting that the payments he made were in the nature of a voluntary "pension" paid by him to help her because she was in need. He also concedes that he refused to continue the payments if she went back to her husband.

At the close of plaintiff's case and at the close of all the evidence, defendant demurred, but was overruled. The jury found a verdict for plaintiff, upon which judgment was rendered, and defendant has appealed.

The main contention is over the question whether the alleged agreement, upon which plaintiff grounds her suit, is within or without that clause of the statute of frauds forbidding an action upon any oral agreement to commence in the future, see 5 Ann. Cas. 330, note; 133 Am. St. Rep. 611, note.

ment "that is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof." Section 2783, R. S. 1909.

An oral contract which neither party can perform within the year is within the statute; and, even though full performance has been made by the complaining party after the expiration of said year, no action can be maintained on the contract. Defendant insists that the contract herein is of this character. He says plaintiff's agreement not to sue for the death of her husband could be fully performed only by refraining from suit throughout the full period of the general statute of limitations, which of course, is more than a year, and that therefore the contract is one which neither party could perform within the year. But plaintiff's cause of action for the death of her husband arose under sections 5426 and 5427, c. 38, R. S. 1909, and was therefore governed by the limitation contained in that chapter, which gives the widow, in case there are minor children, only six months in which to sue, and in no event could a suit be maintained by any one unless brought within a year after the cause of action accrued. Section 5429. Hence the contract in this case clearly contemplated that plaintiff's part thereof would be performed within the year from the date of such contract, which was two weeks subsequent to the date of her husband's death, and this last date was when her cause of action accrued. Manifestly, therefore, the contract herein is one which contemplated that the plaintiff should perform within the year and which the plaintiff did perform in full before the expiration of that time.

Under these circumstances, the question arises: Does full performance by the plaintiff within the year take the case out of the statute and allow her to maintain the suit? This is a question on which the courts of the different jurisdictions do not entirely agree. The great majority of them, however, uphold the doctrine that in such case the statute does not apply. 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 835; 20 Cyc. 291. Such is the English rule, and is the one followed by most of the American states. See cases cited in support of the text in the above authorities, a few of which are: Donnelan v. Read, 3 B. & Add. 899, 110 English Reports, 330; ⁴⁴ Johnson v. Watson, 1 Ga. 348; MacDonald v.

⁴⁴ In Reeve v. Jennings, [1910] 2 K. B. 522, the plaintiff Reeve, a dairyman, brought suit for an injunction against the defendant Jennings, a former employee of the plaintiff, to restrain him from committing breaches of his agreement of service by engaging on his own account in the business of a dairyman. The agreement of service was oral, was made on April 11th, 1908, and was to the effect that the defendant should serve plaintiff at an increased salary stated, but otherwise on the same terms and conditions as those contained in a written agreement of service which the parties had made at the time of a former employment. That previous agreement provided for plaintiff's employment of defendant in plaintiff's trade or business of a dairyman at a stated wage per week for a time not stated, but to be "until this agreement is determined as hereunder provided" and with the clause "This agreement may be determined by either party giving the other one week's notice

Some courts seem to require that, after full performance within the year by one party, nothing more must remain to be done by the other party except the payment of money. Whether this applies only to cases wherein such other party might, upon performance, have paid the money within the year, and not to cases where the money could not have been so paid, does not always seem to have been made clear. It may be well to note that in the contract now under consideration plaintiff fully performed within the year and nothing remained for defendant to do except to continue that which he had been doing from the making of the contract, namely, the payment of the installments at the time and throughout the period called for in the contract. But without regard to whether the rulings of some of the courts apply to one or both of the situations above referred to, it is certain that the great majority of them hold that where it is the intention of the parties that one of them should perform within the year, and such party has fully performed within that time, then the other party cannot escape even though he is not to perform, and cannot perform, within the year. A number of states, however, hold to the contrary doctrine, namely, that if the contract is not to be performed by one party within the year, recovery cannot be had against him by the other even though such other party has fully performed and has done so within the year. 29 Am.

in writing to terminate on a Saturday," and under that previous agreement the defendant agreed that he would serve plaintiff until the determination of the agreement and that within 36 months after quitting or being discharged from said service he would not engage in any way in the business of a dairyman within a radius of four miles as the crow flies from plaintiff's place of business. After serving plaintiff from April 11, 1908, to February 6, 1910, the defendant on the latter date left plaintiff's employ and started in the business of dairyman on his own account within four miles of plaintiff's place of business. The sole question in the case was whether the statute of frauds was a defense to plaintiff's suit. The provision of the statute invoked was that part of section 4 relating to agreements "not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof." The case was started in the county court and the county court judge held that the statute of frauds provision did not apply to the contract in question and gave judgment for the injunction asked. The defendant appealed and the King's Bench Division held in his favor on the ground that while an agreement in its terms to be performed on one side within a year is not within the statute of frauds, the mere fact that the agreement is capable of being performed by one side within the year is not enough to keep the statute from applying, if it was not the intention of the parties that it should be performed within the year. For an English criticism of the decision, see A. E. Randall, Reeve v. Jennings, 17 Law. Quar. Rev. 80.

In Blanton v. Knox, 3 Mo. 342, the Supreme Court of our state held that as the plaintiff's part of the contract was to be performed within the year, and was fully performed (by the delivery of a slave) within that time, the contract was taken out of the statute. The case of Pitcher v. Wilson, 5 Mo. 46, was where under the contract neither party could perform within the year, and, even though plaintiff had fully performed after the year, the court held he could not recover. Instead of overruling the case of Blanton v. Knox, the latter case was distinguished from the former and the decision in the Blanton Case has been followed in a long line of decisions thereafter. Suggett's Adm'r v. Cason's Adm'r, 26 Mo. 221; Self v. Cordell, 45 Mo. 345; Winters v. Cherry, 78 Mo. 344; Smock v. Smock, 37 Mo. App. 56; Mitchell v. Branham, 104 Mo. App. 480, 79 S. W. 739; *Bless v. W. 552. * * * It follows that the contract in the case at bar is not within the statute concerning contracts not to be performed within the year, and the learned trial court did right in refusing to hold that it was. * * *

When plaintiff settled her original cause of action, it was forever extinguished and could not be revived. Her rights thereafter rested alone upon the new agreement. Simmons v. Globe Printing Co., 209 S. W. 130. The agreement settled the issue of defendant's negligence in the original cause of action between them and neither could reopen and litigate that issue. The evidence offered by defendant in the attempt to show that he was not negligent and would not have been liable in damages for the death of her husband was properly excluded.

This disposes of all the points raised and presented in plaintiff's brief, and, since they are not such as can be sustained, the judgment is affirmed.⁴⁵

OKIN v. SELIDOR.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1909. 78 N. J. L. 54, 78 Atl. 770, 138 Am. St. Rep. 588.)

GARRISON, J. Action was brought by the appellee in the District Court to recover the sum expended in repairing a cement sidewalk that had been badly laid by the appellant, who had agreed that the sidewalk should remain in good condition for five years. The making of this oral agreement was established to the satisfaction of the trial court. It was also proved without contradiction that within one year after the making of this agreement it was broken by the upheaval of the sidewalk and that the amount paid by the appellee in the repair of the sidewalk was $165, for which amount judgment was rendered. To reverse this judgment two sections of the statute of frauds are relied upon—first, that the agreement was one concerning an interest in land, and second, that it was not to be performed within one year from the making thereof.

The first ground is entirely untenable. It requires no argument to show that under an agreement to lay a sidewalk the contractor takes no interest in the land and the circumstances relied upon in the present case, viz., that the contractor accepted a lower price upon the condition that he might have the sand excavated in the course of the work, does not bring the agreement within the statute. This was a mere mode of payment, and the sand when excavated and applied to such payment was personal property and not land or any interest therein.

The second ground cannot avail the appellant for the reason that although his agreement covers five years it was not one that was not to be performed within one year and within such period its performance was required. This section of the statute of frauds is cast in this negative form, hence it applies wherever by no contingency covered by the contract the promisor can within one year from the making of his agreement be required to perform it. That was not the case here. The agreement was not that after the first year the sidewalk should be in good condition for four more years, but that it should be in such condition during the first year as well. As to a breach occurring during the first year, this agreement was therefore not one that was not to be performed within one year. The fact that an action for breaches occurring after the first year would be barred by the statute does not enter into the present case in which the cause of action arose within the year. The state of the case shows that the appellee, who was a builder, sold the property after the sidewalk had been laid, warranting the condition of the property for one year. The purchaser, one Butman, immediately notified the appellee that the sidewalk was broken up and was authorized to employ and pay one Jackson to repair it. Butman did this, paying Jackson for his work $165, which he was reimbursed by the appellee, who then brought this suit. Jackson testified at the trial without contradiction that he repaired the sidewalk about eight months after its installation. The appellee's action is not therefore barred by the statute. This result is in accord with the consensus of decisions under this section of the statute, which are collected in Cyc. under the title "Statute of Frauds," and in 29 Am. & Eng. Encycl. L. 942, under the somewhat less obvious title of "Verbal Agreements."

The judgment of the Second District Court of the city of Newark is affirmed.⁴⁶

LYDIA DERBY v. GEORGE W. PHELPS.

(Superior Court of Judicature of New Hampshire, 1822. 2 N. H. 515.)

This was an action of assumpsit on a promise of marriage. At the trial here, under the general issue, and a plea of the statute of limitations, the plaintiff proposed to prove, that in A. D. 1811, the defendant, being about to commence the study of his profession, desired the plaintiff to receive his addresses as a suitor, and at the end of about five years, when he expected to be settled in business, to marry him; and that, in pursuance of this offer, his addresses were received, and continued till the defendant's marriage with another lady, in A. D. 1820.

This evidence was objected to, as within the statute of frauds; but having been admitted, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to future consideration on the validity of the above objection.

WOODBURY, J.⁴⁷ Our statute "to prevent frauds and perjuries," provides, among other things, "that no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon an agreement made upon consideration of marriage, or upon any agreement, that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the time of making it, unless such promise or agreement" "be in writing," etc. 1 N. H. Laws, 178.

The defendant cannot avail himself of the first clause above cited; because, though once decided in Philpott v. Wallet, 3 Lev. 65, that a contract to marry must in all cases be in writing; yet, that decision has since been overruled in Cork v. Baker, 1 Sra. 34, and in Harrison v. Cage and wife, 1 Ld. Ray. 386; Salk. 24; 5 Mod. 411; Bull. N. P. 280; 2 Eq. Ca. Ab. 248; Skin. 196.

This clause of the statute is now held to reach not mutual promises to marry, but only promises for other things made in consideration of marriage. Bac. Ab. "Agreement," C. 3.

But under the other clause of the statute, we apprehend the objection to the evidence must be adjudged fatal. This was an agreement, which by the terms of it was not to be performed till the expiration of about five years; and hence comes within the very teeth of the statute. Had the tenor of the agreement been, that the contract should be fulfilled on a certain event, which might or might not have happened within a year, but which in fact did not happen till after a year, the agreement would not have been within the statute. 1 Salk. 280; Skin. 326; Stra. 34; Burr. 1278; 1 Bl. Rep. 353; 1 Ld. Ray. 317; Com. Rep. 49; Holt, 326; 3 Salk. 9; 10 John Rep. 244.

Action by A. R. Hientz & Co. against Joseph Burkhard. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed. *

⁴⁸ That mere engagements to marry not to be performed within a year are within the "not to be performed within a year" clause of the statute of frauds, see also Nichols v. Weaver, 7 Kans. 373 (1871); Ullman v. Meyer, 10 Fed. 241 (1882). But contra, see Brick v. Gunnar, 36 Hun. 52 (1885); Lewis v. Tapman, 90 Md. 294 (1900).

For cases of interest in which a decision of the point was avoided, see Clark v. Pendleton, 20 Conn. 495 (1850); Paris v. Strong, 51 Ind. 339 (1875); Blackburn v. Mann, 85 Ill. 222 (1877); McConahey v. Griffey, 82 Ia. 564 (1891); Lawrence v. Cooke, 56 Me. 187 (1868); Wilbur v. Johnson, 58 Mo. 600 (1875); Barge v. Haslam, 63 Neb. 296 (1901); Corduan v. McCloud, 87 N. J. L. 143 (1914); Clark v. Reese, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 619, 64 S. W. 783 (1901).

In Ullman v. Meyer, 10 Fed. 241 (1882), the court discusses the effect of the express statutory exception of mutual promises to marry from the New York "in consideration of marriage" clause of the statute of frauds and concludes that "if it had been intended to exclude promises of marriage altogether from the operation of the statute, it could have been plainly evinced by inserting the exception where it would naturally apply to all the classes of promises required to be in writing" (p. 243) and that, since the intention to exclude such promises from the statute was not so evinced the exception contained in the "in consideration of marriage" clause must be limited to that clause.

As was said by McCherry, C. J., in Lewis v. Tapman, supra, at p. 300:

"The objects of a contract to marry are totally unlike the purposes to be accomplished by any other contract; the relation it has in view is wholly distinct from the relation which any other contract could contemplate; the capacity of the parties to it to enter into it is far less restricted as to age than in any other agreement; it can only be made between a man and a woman; it has its origin in the natural law, and is the foundation of society. All these considerations indicate that the statute was not designed to embrace it. Why should a contract of this nature be placed in the same category with one for the sale of goods or the performance of labor and be made subject to the provisions of an enactment obviously intended to regulate suits on undertakings relating to the ordinary business and dealings in trade and commerce? Sir [Baron] Frederick Pollock observed in Hall v. Wright, E. B. & E. 793, 'I think that a view of the law which puts a contract of marriage on the same footing as a bargain for a horse or a bale of hay is not in accordance with the general feeling of mankind and is supported by no authority.'"

On promise of marriage as within the statute of frauds' provision as to contracts not to be performed within a year, see L. R. A., 1915 D, 1190, note.

BEAN, C. J. This action was brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract to furnish the ironwork for defendant's building, and comes here on an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit. For the purposes of this appeal, it is sufficient to say that the evidence tended to show that in August, 1894, the plaintiff and defendant entered into an oral contract, by the terms of which the plaintiff was to manufacture, and furnish to the defendant, the ironwork for a brick building about to be erected by him, according to certain plans and specifications, for the sum of $2,825, but that defendant subsequently, and before any work was performed, wrongfully refused to allow plaintiff to proceed with the execution of its contract. The ironwork referred to was not to be of the kind manufactured by the plaintiff in the usual course of business, or for the trade, but of special designs and measurements, suitable only for use in the construction of defendant's building. The court below ruled that the contract was "an agreement for the sale of personal property," within the meaning of subdivision 5, § 785, of Hill's Annotated Laws, and void because not in writing, and this ruling presents the only question to be determined on this appeal.

To determine whether a given contract concerning personal property, which does not exist in specie at the time it is entered into, but must be manufactured and brought into being under the contract, comes within the statute of frauds, is not without difficulty, and the decisions are by no means reconcilable. The chief difficulty in all such cases is encountered in determining when the contract is substantially for the sale of personal property, to be executed in the future, and when for work and labor and material only. If the former, it is within the statute. If the latter, it is not. Thus far the authorities, except in the state of New York, are substantially agreed; but there have been numerous decisions, and much diversity and even conflict of opinion, in relation to a proper rule by which to determine whether a contract is in fact for the sale of personal property, and therefore within the statute, or for work and labor and material furnished, and so without the statute. There appear to be substantially three distinct views upon the statute, which, for convenience, are generally designated as the English, the New York, and the Massachusetts rules, as represented by the decisions of their respective courts. In England, after a long series of cases in which various tests have been suggested, the rule seems to have been settled in Lee v. Griffin, 1 Best & S. 272, that "if the contract be such that, when carried out, it would result in the sale of a chattel, the party cannot sue for work and labor; but, if the result of the contract is that the party has done work and labor which ends in nothing that can become the subject of a sale, the party cannot sue for goods sold and delivered." In that case the action was brought by a dentist to recover £21 for two sets of artificial teeth made for the defendant's testatrix. The court held the contract to be for the sale of chattels, and within the statute. But this decision seems to stand alone, and is in direct conflict with the previous decisions of the English courts. Towers v. Osborne, 1 Strange, 506; Clayton v. Andrews, 4 Burrows, 2101; Rondeau v. Wyatt, 2 H. Bl. 63; Cooper v. Elston, 7 Term R. 14; Groves v. Buck, 3 Maule & S. 178; Garbutt v. Watson, 5 Barn. & Ald. 613; Smith v. Surman, 9 Barn. & C. 574. It is said to have been the result of Lord Tenderden's act, which expressly extended the statute to all contracts of sale, notwithstanding the goods "may not at the time of such contract be actually made, procured or produced or fit or ready for delivery, or some act may be required for the making or compelling thereof to render the same fit for delivery." Meineke v. Falk, 55 Wis. 432, 13 N. W. 545; Benj. Sales (6th Ed.) 108. In this condition of the English authorities, we are not prepared to go to the full extent of Lee v. Griffin. It is an extreme case, and, unless the decision was made to conform to Lord Tenderden's act, it antagonizes the opinions of some of the most eminent jurists of England, and is open to the objection that it practically permits the fraud which theoretically the statute seeks to prevent. To say that a contract of a dentist to manufacture and furnish a set of false teeth for his customer is "an agreement for the sale of personal property," within the meaning of the statute, is certainly giving it the widest possible operation, and has not found general recognition in this country, as a correct exposition of the doctrine, although the simplicity of the rule has commended it to many of the judges. In New York the rule prevails that a contract concerning personal property not existing in solido at the time of the contract, but which the vendor is to manufacture or put in condition for delivery, such as the woodwork for a wagon, or wheat not yet threshed, or nails to be made from iron belonging to the manufacturer, and the like, is not within the statute. Crookshank v. Burrell, 18 Johns. 58; Downs v. Ross, 23 Wend. 270; Sewall v. Fitch, 8 Cow. 215; Parsons v. Loucks, 48 N. Y. 17; Cooke v. Millard, 65 N. Y. 352; Higgins v. Murray, 73 N. Y. 352. But this rule seems to be peculiar to that state. By the Massachusetts rule the test is not the existence or nonexistence of the commodity at the time of the contract, as in New York, or whether the contract will ultimately result in the transfer of the title of a chattel from the vendor to the vendee, as in England, but whether the article is such as the manufacturer ordinarily produces in the course of business, and for the trade, or as the result of a special order, and for special purposes. If the former, it is regarded as a contract of sale, and within the statute. If the latter, it is held to be essentially a contract for labor and material, and therefore not within the statute. Thus, it is held that an agreement to build a carriage of a certain design is not within the statute (Mixer v. Howarth, 21 Pick. 205), but that a contract to buy a certain number of boxes of candles at a fixed price, which the vendor said he would thereafter finish and deliver, is a contract of sale, to which the statute applies. Gard- ner v. Joy, 9 Metc. (Mass.) 177. The result of the decisions in that state has recently been stated thus: "A contract for the sale of articles then existing, or such as the vendor, in the ordinary course of his business, manufactures or procures for the general market, whether on hand at the time or not, is a contract for the sale of goods, to which the statute applies. But, on the other hand, if the goods are to be manufactured especially for the purchaser, and upon his special order, and not for the general market, the case is not within the statute." Ames, J., in Goddard v. Binney, 115 Mass. 450. And this doctrine seems to be the one most widely adopted in this country. As to the latter part of the rule, relating to goods made on special orders, there is little if any conflict in the American cases. Baker, Sales, § 96; 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 443; Brown, St. Frauds, § 308; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. 707; note to Flynn v. Dougherty, 14 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 230 (Cal.) 27 Pac. 1080; Meincke v. Falk, 55 Wis. 427, 13 N. W. 545; Finney v. Apgar, 31 N. J. Law. 266; Phipps v. McFarlane, 3 Minn. 109 (Gil. 61); Hight v. Ripley, 19 Me. 137; Cason v. Cheely, 6 Ga. 554; Abbott v. Gilchrist, 38 Me. 260. Until legislation shall assert itself more positively,⁴⁹ the courts are put to their election as between these three rules, which, though each has its own merits, are not to be reconciled with one another. In the absence of a statute substantially the same as Lord Tenterden's act, we are unwilling to go to the extent of the doctrine of Lee v. Griffin; and in this case it is unnecessary for us to give a preference to either the New York or Massachusetts rule, because the contract in question is valid under either. It would be excluded from the operation of the statute by the rule adopted in New York, because the subject-matter of the contract did not exist in solido, or at all, at the time it was made; and it is not within the statute under the Massachusetts rule and the generally accepted American doctrine, because the ironwork was to be manufactured especially for the defendant, and upon his special order, according to a particular design, and was not such as the plaintiffs, in the ordinary course of their business, manufactured for the general trade. It follows that under either view the court below was in error in holding that the contract was void because not in writing. The judgment must therefore be reversed, and a new trial ordered.⁵⁰

"An interesting point is that decided a few months ago in The Prested Miners' Gas Co. v. Garner, [1910] 2 K. B. 776 (54 S. J. 750), where the parties entered into an agreement for the sale of goods which was not to be performed within a year. There was nothing in writing but there had been part acceptance within sec. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The point was whether

LUKE BALDWIN v. AARON D. WILLIAMS.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1841. 3 Metc. 365.)

WILDE, J.⁵¹ This action [of assumpsit] is founded on an oral contract [whereby plaintiff agreed to indorse to defendant without recourse two notes of one Gardner payable to plaintiff and held by him, and defendant agreed to pay therefor some cash and two other notes] and the question is, whether it is a contract of sale within the statute of frauds. * * *

The agreement of the defendant, as alleged in the declaration, was to pay for the plaintiff's two notes $2,000 in cash, in addition to two other notes; and that this was a contract of sale is, we think, very clear.

The other question is more doubtful. But the better opinion seems to us to be, that this is a contract within the true meaning of the statute of frauds. It is certainly within the mischief thereby intended to be prevented; and the words of the statute, "goods" and "merchandise," are sufficiently comprehensive to include promissory notes of hand. The word "goods" is a word of large signification; and so is the word "merchandise." "Merx est quicquid vendi potest."

In Tisdale v. Harris, 20 Pick. 9, it was decided that a contract for the sale of shares in a manufacturing corporation is a contract for the sale of goods or merchandise within the statute; and the reasons on which that decision was founded seem fully to authorize a similar decision as to promissory notes of hand. A different decision has recently been made in England in Humble v. Mitchell, 3 Perry & D. 141, 11 Adol. & E. 207. In that case it was decided that a contract for the sale of shares in a joint-stock banking company was not within the statute of frauds. But it seems to us that the reasoning in the case of Tisdale v. Harris is very cogent and satisfactory; and it is supported by several other cases.⁵² * * *

We think the present case cannot be distinguished in principle from Tisdale v. Harris; and upon the authority of that case, taking into consideration again the reasons and principles on which it was decided, the contract was governed by both statutes or whether the latter only applied. It was held that the agreement fell within both statutes. Consequently in the absence of writing no action could be brought notwithstanding that the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act were satisfied." 31 Can. L. T. 750.

⁵¹ The statement of facts is omitted.

⁵² "That contracts for the sale and delivery of shares of stock are subject to the mischief aimed at by the statute, must be admitted. We are of opinion that reason and the weight of authority favor the conclusion that shares of stock in an incorporated company, the shares having been issued, are goods within the meaning of the statute of frauds." Ostrander, J., in Sprague v. Hosie, 155 Mich. 30, 34 (1908). See Spencer v. McGuffin (Ind.), 130 N. E. 407 (1921). The cases are collected in 7 Ann. Cas. 930, note; 18 Ann. Cas. 598, note; Ann. Cas., 1917 C, 991, note.

we are of opinion that the contract in question is within the statute of frauds, and consequently that the motion to set aside the nonsuit must be overruled.⁵³

LEA v. BARBER.

(Warwick Assizes, 1794. 2 Anstruther, 425, n.)

Coram MACDONALD, C. B. Action for breach of contract. The agreement was to take an assignment of certain leasehold premises, a brick-ground, at 1000*l.* and to buy the stock, which was of much less value, consisting chiefly of half-made bricks, sheds, etc., at a valuation to be fixed by arbitrators. The arbitrators afterwards settled the price; but the defendant refused to complete the purchase. There being no memorandum of the contract, it was admitted to be void as to the land; but the plaintiff's counsel claimed to recover as to the personal property: it was ruled, on the authority of Cooke v. Tombs, [2 Anst. 420] that the agreement, being in its nature entire, could not be severed; and being void as to the land, was void in toto.

*The plaintiff was nonsuited.*⁵⁴

JOHN TOWNSEND v. EDWARD HARGRAVES.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1875. 118 Mass. 325.)

COLT, J.† The plaintiff relied on an oral contract of sale to the defendant of a quantity of wool in bales then in Boston, and held in store by one Williams. The sale was by sample at the invoice weight for a given price per pound, and the bales were specifically designated and appropriated by the terms of the contract.

On a similar problem in the law of trusts, where the courts divide, see 12 Mich. L. Rev. 524, n. 55.

† Parts of the opinion are omitted.

At the time of the great fire of November 9, 1872, a part of the wool had been sent to the railroad station in Boston, and was either there or at the defendant's mill in Maine, or in transit to the mill, and a part remained and was burned in the storehouse of Williams. The defendant denies his liability for the wool burned. * * *

The instructions given by the court applicable to this aspect of the case were not excepted to, and are not reported. It is to be presumed that they were apt and sufficient, unless the specific instructions requested by the defendant should have been given in whole or in part; and that is the remaining question. * * *

In the second request the judge was asked distinctly to rule that an acceptance of part of the wool would not operate upon the contract to render it valid retrospectively, or make the defendant liable to pay for that which had been destroyed by fire. This presents the question whether the date of the acceptance or the date of the agreement will be treated, as between the parties, as the time when the contract was made, and the risk of loss of the goods was cast on the buyer. * * * The decision of it depends upon the construction to be given to that part of the statute applicable to sales of personal property, which is incorporated in Gen. St. c. 105, § 5, and follows, with slight variation, the words of the seventeenth section of the English statute.

The purpose of this celebrated enactment, as declared in the preamble and gathered from all its provisions, is to prevent fraud and falsehood, by requiring a party, who seeks to enforce an oral contract in court, to produce, as additional evidence, some written memorandum signed by the party sought to be charged, or proof of some act confirmatory of the contract relied on. It does not prohibit such contract. It does not declare that it shall be void or illegal, unless certain formalities are observed. If executed, the effect of its performance on the rights of the parties is not changed, and the consideration may be recovered. Stone v. Dennison, 13 Pick. 1; Basford v. Pearson, 9 Allen, 387; Nutting v. Dickinson, 8 Allen, 540. The memorandum required is the memorandum of only one of the parties. The alternative acts of the seventeenth section proceed from one only. They presuppose a contract, and are in affirmance or partial execution of it. They are not essential to its existence, need not be contemporaneous, and are not prescribed elements in its formation. It is declared in the fourth section that no action shall be brought upon the promises therein named, unless some memorandum of the agreement shall be in writing; and in the seventeenth that no contract for the sale of goods "shall be allowed to be good," or, as in our statute, "shall be good and valid," unless the buyer accepts and receives part or gives earnest, or there is some memorandum signed by the parties to be charged, or, as in our statute, by the party to be charged. It is true there is difference in phraseology in these sections; but in view of the policy of the enactment, and the necessity of giving consistency to all its parts, this difference cannot be held to change the force and effect of the two sections. "Allowed to be good" means good for the purpose of a recovery under it; and the clause in the last part of the latter section, which requires the memorandum to be signed by the party or parties to be charged, implies that the validity intended is that which will support an action on the contract.⁵⁵ * * *

In carrying out its purpose, the statute only affects the modes of proof as to all contracts within it. If a memorandum or proof of any of the alternative requirements peculiar to the seventeenth section be furnished, if acceptance and actual receipt of part be shown, then the oral contract, as proved by the other evidence, is established with all the consequences which the common law attaches to it. If it be a completed contract according to common-law rules, then, as between the parties at least, the property vests in the purchaser, and a right to the price in the seller, as soon as it is made, subject only to the seller's lien and right of stoppage in transitu.

Many points decided in the modern cases support by the strongest implication the construction here given. Thus, if one party has signed the memorandum, the contract can be enforced against him, though not against the other,—showing that the promise of the other is not wholly void, because it affords a good and valid consideration to support the promise which by reason of the memorandum may be enforced. Reuss v. Pickasley, L. R. 1 Exch. 342.

The memorandum is sufficient if it be only a letter written by the party to his own agent, or an entry or record in his own books, or even if it contain an express repudiation of the contract. And this because it is evidence of, but does not go to make, the contract. Gibson v. Holland, L. R. 1 C. P. 1; Buxton v. Rust, L. R. 7 Exch. 1, 279; Ailen v. Bennet, 3 Taunt. 169; Tufts v. Mining Co., 14 Allen, 407; Argus Co. v. Albany, 55 N. Y. 495. * * *

And, except that the statute provides that no action shall be brought, there would be no good reason to hold that a memorandum signed, ⁵⁵ Some state statutes of frauds declare a contract not evidenced in writing void, and some of the courts accordingly deem a contract within the statute which does not comply with it to be void and not merely unenforceable. See Scott v. Bush, 26 Mich. 418 (1873); Pierce v. Clark, 71 Minn. 114 (1898); Laun v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 131 Wis. 555 (1907).

In the case of contracts "void" often means voidable at the election of the party not in default. "The rule is that in a contract 'void' is to be read 'voidable,' if the result of reading it as 'void' would be to enable a party to avail himself of his own wrong to defeat his contract. It may be stated either in the form that if one party is in default it is 'void as against him' or that if one party is in default it is 'voidable at the option of the other party.' The two amount to the same thing. But the contract is not 'void' in favor of or 'voidable at the option of' the party in default. He cannot say that it is void, and has no option of avoiding it in his own wrong." Lord Wrenbury in New Zealand Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Société Des Ateliers et Chantiers de France, [1919] 1 A. C. 1, 15. And in the case of the word void in a state statute of frauds, such a construction seems desirable. See Crane v. Powell, 139 N. Y. 379 (1898).

or an act of acceptance proved, at any time before the trial would not be sufficient. Bill v. Bament, 9 Mees. & W. 36; Tisdale v. Harris, 20 Pick. 9.

In a recent case in the Queen's Bench, a memorandum in writing made by the defendant, after the goods had been delivered to a carrier and been totally lost at sea while in his hands, was held sufficient to take the case out of the statute, and no notice is taken of the fact that the goods were not in existence when the memorandum was furnished. Cloth Co. v. Hieronimus, L. R. 10 Q. B. 140. * * *

It follows that it would have been erroneous to have given the instructions requested. Upon the point closely allied, namely, what effect, if any, the defendant's mistake or ignorance of a material fact, such as the destruction of the rest of the wool, would have on the alleged act of acceptance, we are not required by the terms of the request to pass.

The third and last request was also properly refused for the reasons above given. If the property in the wool passed by the terms of the original agreement, and the contract was taken out of the statute by the subsequent acceptance and receipt, then, as we have seen, as between the parties, the risk of loss was on the defendant at the time of the fire, and the plaintiff may recover the agreed price of the whole.

Exceptions overruled.

BALDEY AND ANOTHER v. PARKER.

(Court of King's Bench, 1823. 2 Barnewall & Cresswell, 37.)

Assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. Plea, general issue. At the trial before Abbott, C. J., the following appeared to be the facts of the case. The plaintiffs are linen-drappers, and the defendant came to their shop and bargained for various articles. Separate price was agreed upon for each, and no one article was of the value of 10*l*. Some were measured in his presence, some he marked with a pencil, others he assisted in cutting from a larger bulk. He then desired an account of the whole to be sent to his house, and went away. A bill of parcels was accordingly made out and sent by a shopman. The amount of the goods was 70*l*. The defendant looked at the account, and asked what discount would be allowed for ready money, and was told 5*l*. per cent.; he replied that it was too little, and requested to see the person of whom he bought the goods (Baldey), as he could bargain with him respecting the discount, and said that he ought to be allowed 20*l*. per cent. The goods were afterwards sent to the defendant's house, and he refused to accept them. The Lord Chief Justice thought that this was a contract for goods of more than the value of 10*l*. within the meaning of the seventeenth section of the statute of frauds, and not within any of the exceptions there mentioned, and directed a nonsuit; but gave the plaintiffs leave to move to enter a verdict in their favor for 70*l*. A rule having accordingly been obtained for that purpose.

ABBOTT, C. J.† * * * The first question is, whether this was one entire contract for the sale of all the goods. By holding that it was not, we should entirely defeat the object of the statute. For then persons intending to buy many articles at one time, amounting in the whole to a large price, might withdraw the case from the operation of the statute by making a separate bargain for each article. Looking at the whole transaction, I am of opinion that the parties must be considered to have made one entire contract for the whole of the articles.
* * *

HOLROYD, J. I am of the same opinion. The intention of the statute was that certain requisites should be observed in all contracts for the sale of goods for the price of 10*l*. and upwards. This was all one transaction, though composed of different parts. At first it appears to have been a contract for goods of less value than 10*l*., but in the course of the dealing it grew to a contract for a much larger amount. At last therefore it was one entire contract within the meaning and mischief of the statute of frauds, it being the intention of that statute that where the contract, either at the commencement or at the conclusion, amounted to or exceeded the value of 10*l*. it should not bind unless the requisites there mentioned were complied with. The danger of false testimony is quite as great where the bargain is ultimately of the value of 10*l*. as if it had been originally of that amount. It must therefore be considered as one contract within the meaning of the act.
* * * There was neither note nor memorandum in writing; no part of the price was paid, nor was there any such change of possession as that contemplated by the statute. * * *

YOUNG v. INGALSBE.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1913. 208 N. Y. 503, 102 N. E. 590.)

Action by William E. Young against Grenville M. Ingalsbe, as executor of Lyman H. Northup, deceased. From a judgment of the Appel-

⁸⁶ In Weeks v. Crie, 94 Me. 458, 464 (1900), the court said: "If the circumstances are such as to lead to a reasonable supposition that the parties intended that the whole series of transactions should constitute one trade, they may be regarded as one entire contract; otherwise not." See also New Richmond Roller Mills Co. v. Arnquist (Wis.), 174 N. W. 557 (1919). The rule was given an extreme application in Jenness v. Wendell, 51 N. H. 63 (1871). In Bundy late Division (151 App. Div. 375, 135 N. Y. Supp. 939) modifying and affirming a judgment for defendant entered upon the report of a referee to hear and determine the action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

COLLIN, J. The plaintiff claimed, as a creditor, a sum from the estate of Lyman H. Northup, deceased. The statute of limitations barred his recovery (except as to one item allowed by the judgment of the Appellate Division), unless a transaction between the plaintiff and the deceased constituted a sale by the latter to the former of his interest in certain books and the crediting by the former of the price upon the indebtedness, and prevented its application. The question for our determination is: Did the transaction effect that result?

The transaction as found by the referee was: The plaintiff and the deceased owned, with equal interests, a law library. The deceased was indebted to plaintiff and they, at a stated time, entered into an agreement, wholly unwritten, whereby the plaintiff purchased the interest of the deceased, the purchase price to be applied by the plaintiff upon the indebtedness. Immediately after the time when the agreement was made, the plaintiff accepted of the interest and caused to be pasted upon the backs of the books leather labels with his name printed thereon, took possession, and assumed and still assumes ownership of the books, and gave the deceased credit for the sum of $77 on account of and pro rata on the several items of the indebtedness.

The part of the statute of frauds revelant to the transaction is: "Every agreement, promise or undertaking is void, unless it or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his lawful agent, if such agreement, promise or undertaking: * * * (6) Is a contract for the sale of any goods, chattels or things in action for the price of fifty dollars or more, and the buyer does not accept and receive part of such goods, or the evidences, or some of them, of such things in action; nor at the time, pay any part of the purchase money." Personal Property Law (Consol. Laws 1909, c. 41) § 31.

The statute made void the verbal agreement in the present case unless there was, subsequent to and in pursuance of it, either the acceptance and receipt by the plaintiff of Northup's interest or the payment by him, at the time the agreement was made, of the purchase price or a part thereof. The rule of the common law that a mere contract for the sale of goods, where nothing remains to be done by the seller before making delivery, transfers the right of property, although the price has not been paid nor the thing sold delivered to the purchaser (Olyphant v. Baker, 5 Denio, 379; Bissell v. Balcom, 39 N. Y. 275), is devitalized by the statute in the cases within its provisions. In those cases the statute renders essential to the proof of a valid contract of sale, not only evidence of the verbal contract, but also evidence of a receipt and acceptance by the vendee of a part of the goods or of a payment at the time the oral agreement was made. The contract must be authenticated by a prescribed act of the parties in pursuance and part performance of it. The act may originate with the vendor or vendee; with the vendor if a delivery of part of the goods and their acceptance by the vendee is the ground for validating the contract; with the vendee if part payment is relied upon. In either case the participation and assent of both parties to it is necessary. The receipt of the goods by the vendee implies a delivery by the vendor. Delivery and receipt of the goods without acceptance is insufficient, and payment implies a receipt and acceptance of the consideration by the party to whom it is made. Hawley v. Keeler, 53 N. Y. 114; Pitney v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 65 N. Y. 6, 26. While the statute does not interdict the establishment of the verbal contract by parol testimony, it guards against the misunderstanding, misconception, or perjury of the parties by requiring proof of the mutual confirmatory act evidencing intelligence and finality concerning it on the part of each. A writing, of course, evidences the contract as to both parties. Where it is omitted, but the vendee has paid part of the price or the vendor has delivered and the buyer has accepted a part of the goods upon the strength of the agreement, those acts furnish unequivocal evidence of the existence of a contract of some sort between them, although its terms and the performance of the attesting act must after all depend upon the recollection of witnesses. The design of the statute requires that neither party can create the evidence which shall prove the unwritten contract as against the other. Shindler v. Houston, 1 N. Y. 261, 49 Am. Dec. 316; Rodgers v. Phillips, 40 N. Y. 519; Hinchman v. Lincoln, 124 U. S. 38, 8 Sup. Ct. 369, 31 L. Ed. 337.

The facts found by the referee in this case do not establish the contract. Upon the part of the deceased there was merely the naked, verbal agreement. He did not by any act or participation in any act subsequent to it assent to or recognize or confirm it. Each act of the plaintiff was individual and independent. His possession of the books, if had at the time of the agreement, was not on the strength of or pursuant to it, but under another and prior arrangement; and, if acquired subsequent to the contract, was without a delivery and through his sole and exclusive act. Under either hypothesis the title of the deceased to the books did not pass to the plaintiff by virtue of a receipt and acceptance because he did no act by which he relinquished his dominion or recognized and confirmed that of the plaintiff over them. Brand v. Focht, 1 Abb. Dec. 185; Marsh v. Rouse, 44 N. Y. 643; Stone v. Browning, 68 N. Y. 598; Rourke v. Bullens, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 549.

Manifestly the contract was not made valid by the credit given the deceased by the plaintiff and for two reasons: It was not made at the time of the agreement; the deceased was not in any way an actor in re-

WALKER v. NUSSEY.

(Court of Exchequer, 1847. 16 Meeson & Welsby, 302.)

Debt for goods sold and delivered, and on an account stated. Pleas,—1st, never indebted; 2d, a set-off for goods sold and delivered, and on an account stated. Issues thereon. At the trial, before the undersheriff of Yorkshire, it appeared that, the defendant having sold goods to the plaintiff to the amount of 4*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.*, the defendant, on a subsequent occasion, bought of him a lot of leather, of two sorts by sample. It was then verbally agreed between them, that the 4*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.* due to

"Many decisions from other jurisdictions holding that, where personal property is in possession of the buyer at the time of the sale, it is unnecessary for the owner to resume possession thereof in order that actual delivery may be made, are cited. Wilson v. Hotchkiss, 171 Cal. 617, 154 Pac. 1, L. R. A. 1016 F 389, Ann. Cas. 1917 B 570; Godkin v. Weber, 154 Mich. 207, 114 N. W. 924; 117 N. W. 628, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 498; *Smith v. These cases, however, hold that, where the property is in the possession of the buyer, his conduct touching the same must thereafter be inconsistent with his previous possession as bailee or agent of the seller. Charlotte, etc., R. Co. v. Burwell, 56 Fla. 217, 48 South. 213; Young v. Ingalsbe, 208 N. Y. 503, 102 N. E. 590; Wilson v. Hotchkiss, supra; Slikman Lbr. Co. v. Hunholz, 132 Wis. 610, 112 N. W. 1081, 11 L. R. Evidence showing acts of dominion and control thereover by the purchaser inconsistent with the facts upon which his prior possession was based would be sufficient for that purpose. Wilson v. Hotchkiss, supra." Slevins, J., in Deitrick v. Sinnott (Ia.), 179 N. W. 424, 426 (1920).

"All cases admit that the term 'actually receive' found in the statute [the Uniform Sales Act] means the acquisition of possession by the buyer, and whatever difficulties exist in regard to its meaning are largely due to the inherent difficulty of determining what is, in fact, possession." Pattison, J., in Castle v. Swift & Co., 132 Md. 631, 635 (1918).

On acceptance and actual receipt to satisfy the statute of frauds when the goods are in possession of the purchaser at the time of agreement, see 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1186, note; 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 498, note; L. R. A. 1916 F, 393, note. On acceptance of goods to satisfy the statute, see 96 Am. St. Rep. 215, note.

the defendant should go in part payment by him to the plaintiff for the leather. Next day the plaintiff sent in the goods to the defendant, with this invoice:—

“Halifax, Oct. 14th, 1846.

“Mr. William Nussey, bought of Thomas Walker.

	£	s.	d.
Dressed hide bellies, 287 at 9d.....	10	15	3
Insole, 376 at 6½.....	10	3	8
	20	18	11
By your account against me.....	4	14	11”

The defendant returned the goods within two days as inferior to sample, and wrote to the plaintiff to pay him the 4l. 14s. 11d. The plaintiff refused to receive the goods, and brought this action, stating in his particulars of demand, that the action was brought to recover the sum of 16l. 4s., as the “balance of the following account” (setting out the above invoice).

The undersheriff ruled, that there was nothing to show that the 4l. 14s. 11d. had been given by the defendant in earnest, or part of payment, under 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 17, and left nothing to the jury, except on the point of acceptance of the goods by the defendant, directing them to find for him if they thought he returned the goods in a reasonable time, without taking to them. The jury found a verdict for the defendant on both issues.

POLLOCK, C. B.⁵⁸ * * * There was nothing but one contract, whereas the statute requires a contract, and, if it be not in writing, something besides. The question here is, whether what took place amounted to a giving of earnest or in part of payment at the time of the bargain, the goods bought by the defendant not having been then delivered to him by the plaintiff. Nothing turns on the effect of their subsequent delivery. Had these parties positively agreed to extinguish the debt of 4l. odd, and receive the plaintiff's goods pro tanto instead of it, the law might have been satisfied, without the ceremony of paying it to the defendant, and repaying it by him. But the actual contract did not amount to that, and there has been no part payment within the statute.

*Rule refused.*⁵⁹

GAY v. SUNDQUIST.

(Supreme Court of South Dakota, 1919. 42 S. Dak. 327, 175 N. W. 190.)

Action by Thomas C. Gay against Ed Sundquist. From judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

WHITING, J. Appellant assigns error in the trial court's refusal to direct a verdict in his favor. The motion for directed verdict would assume the following facts to be supported by evidence: C., plaintiff, and S., defendant, entered into an oral agreement whereby S. sold to C. a bunch of lambs to be delivered in the future. Under the agreement, the purchase price would be far in excess of $50. At the time of such agreement, C. delivered to, and there was accepted by, S., C.'s check, both parties intending that the proceeds of such check should be applied in part payment of the purchase price of the lambs. There was, however, no evidence to show that such check was delivered and received under an agreement that it was to be an absolute payment of a part of such purchase price. The check was never presented for payment, but, within a few days after the oral agreement, S. advised C. that he (S.) had destroyed the check. The sole question presented by the motion for directed verdict and before us for determination is whether the giving of such check to, and receipt of same by, S. took this oral agreement out of our statute of frauds. Such statute (section 857, Rev. Code 1919) provides that such an oral agreement is invalid unless, "The buyer, at the time of sale, pays a part of the price."

Few authorities are to be found that are directly in point. It seems, however, to be settled by an almost unbroken line of decisions that a check may constitute a sufficient payment to satisfy the statute. 25 R. C. L. 619; 20 Cyc. 252; Hessberg v. Welsh (Sup.) 147 N. Y. Supp. 44; Logan v. Carroll, 72 Mo. App. 613; Groomer v. McMillan, 143 Mo. App. 612, 128 S. W. 285; McLure v. Sherman (C. C.) 70 Fed. 190.

But while the law is as above stated, the courts almost universally hold that the mere giving of a check is not, in the absence of an express or implied agreement to that effect, a payment or discharge of the debt; that from the mere fact that a creditor accepts a check from his debtor, there arises no presumption that he accepts the same in absolute payment; that the presumption is to the contrary; that the debt is not paid until the check is either paid or accepted at the bank on which it is drawn. In short, until proof to the contrary, a payment by check is presumed to be conditional. 21 R. C. L. 60; Nat. Bk. v. Railway Co., 44 Minn. 224, 46 N. W. 342, 9 L. R. A. 263, 20 Am. St. Rep. 566; Nat. Bk. v. McConnell, 103 Minn. 340, 114 N. W. 1129, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 616, 123 Am. St. Rep. 336, 14 Ann. Cas. 396; Groomer v. McMillan, supra; Hessberg v. Welsh, supra. That a payment by check should not be held to be an absolute payment in the absence of proof of an agreement that it is given and received as such is perfectly clear. The drawer can stop payment, at any time before acceptance or payment by bank, by serving notice on the bank. This follows from the fact that a check does not assign any part of the funds that may be in the bank to the credit of the drawer; and the bank does not become liable to the payee, unless and until the bank accepts or certifies the check. Section 1891, Rev. Code 1919. Furthermore, the bank may, even without right, refuse to honor the check, thus leaving the drawer liable on the original debt. The above facts must be presumed to be known to both parties to the check; and they are also presumed to know that it is within the power of one to make, and of the other to require, an absolute payment. The authorities, almost without exception, hold that, to take an oral contract out of the statute of frauds, the payment must be absolute. The case of McLure v. Sherman, supra, is sometimes referred to as supporting the proposition that the giving and receiving of a check in partial payment takes a contract out of the statute of frauds. An examination of the opinion in said case discloses that the court went no further than to hold that a check must be considered to possess a money value and might be a part payment on a contract. Logan v. Carroll is cited by respondent. In that case no question of absolute or conditional payment was raised—it was merely held that, “if a check was accepted as payment, the statute of frauds was satisfied.” But the highest court of the same state, in Groomer v. McMillan, supra, in no uncertain language has declared that, to take the contract out of the statute, the payment must be absolute. In the Groomer Case the payment was by check. After announcing the legal propositions we have referred to above, the court said:

“The statute requires that there shall be a payment on the price. And it must be remembered that this is a requirement of the law as a matter of public policy, and it can neither be waived nor evaded by the parties. If the creditor accepts something other than money, it must be agreed and understood that it is in absolute payment and discharge of the price. Otherwise the statute is of no force or effect. A seller of personal property desiring to make a valid contract under the provision of the statute of frauds, with a buyer who has no money with him, might expressly agree with the latter to take his check in absolute discharge of that much of the purchase price. But if he did so, he would have to take the risk of getting the money, provided, of course, the buyer had funds and a right to draw the check at the time he delivered it. For if he had no right to draw it, that would be a fraud on the seller, and his agreement to accept it as a discharge of the debt would be avoided.”

We commend the reasoning in this last case, the facts of which are on all fours with those of this case, but we refrain from quoting further. We cite in support of the proposition that the payment must be absolute in order to take the oral contract out of the statute: Hessberg v. Welsh (Sup.) 147 N. Y. Supp. 44; Leonard v. Roth, 164 Mich. 646, 130 N. W. 208; Johnson v. Morrison, 163 Mich. 322, 128 N. W. 243.

THE SALMON FALLS MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, v. WILLIAM W. GODDARD.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1852. 14 How. 446, 14 L. Ed. 493.)

NELSON, J. This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

The suit was brought by the plaintiffs in the court below to recover

⁶⁰ In Hunter v. Wetsell, 84 N. Y. 549 (1881), under a statute requiring part payment at the time of the contract, payment by a check good when drawn, the check being accepted as payment, was held to be payment at the time it was accepted. Finch, J., said:

"It is admitted that the check was then given, and it cannot be successfully denied that it was both delivered and received as a payment upon the contract-price of the hops, but it is claimed that the check was not, in and of itself, payment, and having been drawn upon a bank, could not have been in fact paid until afterward, and so there was no payment 'at the time' to satisfy the requirements of the statute. It is quite true that a check, in and of itself, is not payment, but it may become so when accepted as such and in due course actually paid. While not money, it is a thing of value, and is money's worth when drawn against an existing deposit which remains until the check is presented. We must assume that the check of the vendee in this case was good when drawn and was duly paid upon presentation in the usual and regular way, for it appears in the possession of the drawers, and they practically assert the fact of its payment by their counter-claim in the action, by which they seek to recover back the money so paid. There was therefore an actual and real payment made by the vendees to the vendor upon the purchase-price of the hops. It is said, however, that the actual payment of the money, as distinguished from the delivery of the check, was not 'at the time' of the contract, but at some later period. We do not know accurately when the check was paid. It may have been the same day. It may have been within a very few moments. It may not have been till the next day. We are not to presume, for the purpose of making the contract invalid, that it was held beyond the natural and ordinary time. In such event it is a very narrow construction to say that the payment was not made at the time of the contract. The purpose and object of the statute should not be forgotten. Its aim is to substitute some act for mere words, to compel the verbal contract to be accompanied by some fact not likely to be mistaken, and so avoid the dangers of treacherous memory or downright perjury. The delivery of the check was such an act. Indeed it would be an entirely reasonable and just construction to say that the delivery of the check and its presentment and payment constituted one continuous transaction, and should be taken as such without reference to the ordinary delay attendant upon turning the check into money. The statute does not mean rigorously, eo instanti. It does contemplate that the contract and the payment shall be at the same time, in the sense that they constitute parts of one and the same continuous transaction. We think, therefore, there the price of three hundred bales of brown, and of one hundred cases of blue drills, which they had previously sold to the defendant.

The contract for the purchase was made with the house of Mason and Lawrence, agents of the plaintiffs, in Boston, on the 19th September, 1850, and a memorandum of the same signed by the parties. A bill of parcels was made out under date of 30th September, stating the purchase of the goods by the defendant, carrying out prices and footing up the amount at $18,565.03; also the terms of payment—note at twelve months, payable to the treasurer of the plaintiffs. This was forwarded to the defendant on the 11th October, and in pursuance of an order from him, the three hundred bales were sent from their establishment at Salmon Falls by the railroad and arrived at the depot in Boston on the 30th October, of which notice was given to the defendant on the same day, and a delivery tendered. He requested that the goods should not be sent to his warehouse, or place of delivery, for the reason as subsequently stated by his clerk, there was no room for storage. The agents of the plaintiffs the next day renewed the tender of delivery by letter, adding that the goods remained at the depot at his risk, and subject to storage, to which no answer was returned. On the night of the 4th November, the railroad depot was consumed by fire, and with it the three hundred bales of the goods in question. The price was to be paid by a note at twelve months, which the defendant refused to give, upon which refusal this action was brought.

The court below, at the trial, held that the written memorandum, made at the time of entering into the contract between the agents of the plaintiffs and the defendant, was not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds, and as there was no acceptance of the goods, the plaintiffs could not recover.

As we differ with the learned judge who tried the cause, as to the sufficiency of the written memorandum, the question upon the statute is the only one that it will be material to notice. The memorandum is as follows:

“Sept. 19,—W. W. Goddard, 12 mos.
 300 bales S. F. drills.....7¼
 100 cases blue drills.....8¾
 Credit to commence when ship sails: not after Dec. 1—delivered free of charge for truckage.
 The blues, if color satisfactory to purchasers.

R. M. M.
 W. W. G.”

was a payment ‘at the time,’ within the meaning of the statute, and that the contract of sale was valid.”

On a check as payment for the purpose of taking a contract out of the statute of frauds, see L. R. A., 1918 B, 902, note.

The statute of Massachusetts on this subject is substantially the same as that of 29 Car. II. c. 3, § 17, and declares that no contract for the sale of goods, etc., shall be valid, etc., "unless some note or memorandum in writing of the bargain be made, and signed by the party to be charged thereby, or by some person thereunto by him lawfully authorized."

The word "bargain," in the statute, means the terms upon which the respective parties contract; and in the sale of goods, the terms of the bargain must be specified in the note or memorandum, and stated with reasonable certainty, so that they can be understood from the writing itself, without having recourse to parol proof; for, unless the essential terms of the sale can be ascertained from the writing itself, or by a reference contained in it to something else, the memorandum is not a compliance with the statute.

This brief note of the contract, however, like all other mercantile contracts, is subject to explanation by reference to the usage and custom of the trade, with a view to get at the true meaning of the parties, as each is presumed to have contracted in reference to them. And although specific and express provisions will control the usage, and exclude any such explanation, yet, if the terms are technical, or equivocal on the face of the instrument, or made so by reference to extraneous circumstances, parol evidence of the usage and practice in the trade is admissible to explain the meaning. 2 Kent. C. 556, and n. 3; ibid. 260, and n.; Long on Sales, 197, Ed. 1839; 1 Gale & Davis, 52.

Extraneous evidence is also admissible to show that a person whose name is affixed to the contract acted only as an agent, thereby enabling the principal either to sue or be sued in his own name; and this, though it purported on its face to have been made by the agent himself, and the principal not named. Higgins v. Senior, 8 M. & Wels: 834; Truman v. Loder, 11 Ad. & Ell. 589. Lord Denham observed, in the latter case: "That parol evidence is always necessary to show that the party sued is the party making the contract, and bound by it; whether he does so in his own name, or in that of another, or in a feigned name, and whether the contract be signed by his own hand, or that of an agent, are inquiries not different in their nature from the question, Who is the person who has just ordered goods in a shop? If he is sued for the price, and his identity made out, the contract is not varied by appearing to have been made by him in a name not his own."

So the signature of one of the parties is a sufficient signing to charge the firm. Soames v. Spencer, 1 D. & R. 32; Long on Sales, 58.

It has also been held, in the case of a sold note which expressed "eighteen pockets of hops, at 100s.," that parol evidence was admissible to show that the 100s. meant the price per cwt. Spicer v. Cooper, 1 Gale & D. 52; 5 Jurist, 1036.

The memorandum in that case was as follows: "Sold to Waite Spicer, of S. Walden, 18 pos. Kent hops, as under July 23, 1840; 10 pos. Barlow East Kent, 1839; 8 pos. Springall Goodhurst Kent, 1839, 100s. Delivered, JOHN COOPER."

Evidence was admitted on the trial to prove that the 100s. was understood in the trade to refer to the price per cwt., and the ruling approved by the King's Bench. Lord Denman put a case to the counsel in the argument to illustrate his view, that bears upon the case before us. Suppose, he said, the contract had been for ten butts of beer, at one shilling, the ordinary price of a gallon—and intimated that the meaning could hardly be mistaken.

Now, within the principles above stated, we are of opinion that the memorandum in question was a sufficient compliance with the statute. It was competent to show, by parol proof, that Mason signed for the firm of Mason and Lawrence, and that the house was acting as agents for the plaintiffs, a company engaged in manufacturing the goods which were the subject of the sale; and also to show that the figures $7\frac{1}{4}$ and $8\frac{3}{4}$, set opposite the three hundred bales and one hundred cases of goods, meant seven and a quarter cents, and eight and three quarter cents per yard.⁶¹

The memorandum, therefore, contains the names of the sellers,⁶² and of the buyer—the commodity and the price—also the time of credit

⁶¹ "Oral evidence may be received to show in what sense figures and abbreviations may be used and their meaning may be stated as it was understood between the parties. In this case it was competent to prove by oral testimony what was meant by the parties in stating that the cotton was sold at 19 1/16 basis; this being a term peculiarly known to cotton men in the purchase and sale of cotton." Higgins, J., in King Collie Co. v. Richards (Okla.), 184 Pac. 130, 131 (1919).

"Under this statute we have held that the writing, when alone relied upon to relieve from the bar of the statute, must in itself contain all of the terms of the contract. While we have said that the writing need not be formal, and may contain implied conditions and may use trade terms or abbreviations requiring explanation, without subjecting it to the fault of incompleteness, yet it must be so far complete in itself, after effect is given to the implied conditions and the trade terms and abbreviations are explained, as to show the bargain made. Nut House v. Pacific Oil Mills, 102 Wash. 114, 172 Pac. 841; Wright v. Seattle Grocery Co., 105 Wash. 383, 177 Pac. 813. * * *

"Again it is the rule that where the contract is alleged to consist, as it is in this instance, of an offer on the one side and the acceptance of the offer on the other, the acceptance to constitute a binding contract must be as broad as the offer, any conditions attached to the offer being in the nature of new proposals, which themselves must be accepted to make a binding contract. Olympian-Tribune Pub. Co. v. Byrne, 28 Wash. 79, 68 Pac. 335; Bringham v. American Bridge Co., 39 Wash. 3, 80 Pac. 788; Littell v. Saulsberry, 40 Wash. 550, 82 Pac. 909; Sillman v. Spokane Sav. & Loan Co., 103 Wash. 619, 175 Pac. 296." Fullerton, J., in Coleman v. St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber Co. (Wash.), 188 Pac. 532, 535-6 (1920).

⁶² The memorandum must state the name or description of each party to the bargain, (McElroy v. Seery, 61 Md. 339 (1883); see 13 Ann. Cas. 313, note), and must show which is buyer and which is seller. Schwartz v. Vig- and conditions of the delivery; and, in the absence of any specified time or place of delivery, the law will supply the omission, namely, a reasonable time after the goods are called for, and usual place of business of the purchaser, or his customary place for the delivery of goods of this description.

In respect to the giving of the note, which was to run during the period of the credit, it appears to be the uniform custom of the house of Mason and Lawrence to take notes for goods sold of this description. The defendant was one of their customers, and knew this usage; and it is a presumption of law, therefore, that the purchase was made with reference to it, there being no stipulation to the contrary in the contract of the parties.

We are also of opinion, even admitting that there might be some obscurity in the terms of the memorandum, and intrinsic difficulty in a proper understanding of them, that it would be competent, under the circumstances of the case, to refer to the bill of parcels delivered, for the purpose of explanation. We do not say that it would be a den, 182 N. Y. Supp. 907 (1920); Frank & Co. v. Eltringham, 65 Miss. 281 (1887).

While the memorandum in Salmon Falls Manufacturing Co. v. Goddard indicates Goddard as the buyer and is signed by the agent of the seller, where is the name of the seller?

"Without considering all the objections that have been urged against the memorandum it is sufficient to say that it is fatally defective in not containing the name of the purchaser or any designation of him whatever. In order to satisfy the statute the memorandum should not only have been signed by the defendant or her authorized agent, and have identified the property to be sold, but should also have contained the name of the other party to the contract, or should have described him with reasonable certainty. This was not done and the memorandum is therefore insufficient." Morton, J., in Lewis v. Wood, 135 Mass. 321 (1891).

"The memorandum contains the names of both parties to the contract, but does not disclose which is seller and which is purchaser. * * * No doubt both names must appear. * * * In this state the rule has been pushed further, so that, even if signed by an agent the principal's name must appear. Mentz v. Newwitter, 122 N. Y. 491. The extension of the rule, however, does not appear to hold in England." Blackmar, J., in Tobias v. Lynch, 182 N. Y. Supp. 643, 644 (1920).

"There can be no doubt that if a written contract is made in this form, 'A. B. agrees to sell Blackacre to C. D. for £1,000,' then E. F., the principal of A. B., can sue G. H., the principal of C. D., on that contract." Sir George Jessel, M. R., in Commins v. Scott, L. R., 20 Eq. 11, 15-16 (1875).

In Carr v. Lynch, [1900] 1 Ch. 613, the other party, not named, was deemed sufficiently described in the following memorandum: "Dear Sir: In consideration of your having this day paid me £50 I hereby agree to give you a further lease for 24 years of the Warden Arms to run immediately after the expiration of the now existing lease."

On the sufficiency within the statute of frauds of a memorandum of sale of lands disclosing that it is signed by one party for an undisclosed principal, see 12 Ann. Cas. 487, note.

note in writing, of itself sufficient to bind the defendant within the statute; though it might be to bind the plaintiff.

It was a bill of sale made out by the seller, and contained his understanding of the terms and meaning of the contract; and having been received by the buyer, and acquiesced in (for the order to have the goods forwarded was given after it was received), the natural inference would seem to be, that the interpretation given was according to the understanding of both parties. It is not necessary to say that this would be the conclusion if the bill differed materially from the written contract; that might present a different question; but we think it is so connected with, and naturally resulting from, the transaction, that it may be properly referred to for the purpose of explaining any ambiguity or abbreviations, so common in these brief notes of mercantile contracts.

A printed bill of parcels, delivered by the seller, may be a sufficient memorandum within the statute to bind him, especially if subsequently recognized by a letter to the buyer. 2 B. & P. 238 D.; 3 Esp. 180. And, generally, the contract may be collected from several distinct papers taken together, as forming parts of an entire transaction, if they are connected by express reference from the one to the others. 3 Ad. & Ell. 355; 9 B. & Cr. 561; 2 ibid. 945; 3 Taunt. 169; 6 Cow. 445; 2 M. & Wels. 660; Long on Sales, 55, and cases.

In the case before us, the bill of parcels is not only connected with the contract of sale, which has been signed by both parties, but was made out and delivered in the course of the fulfillment of it; has been acquiesced in by the buyer, and the goods ordered to be delivered after it was received. It is not a memorandum sufficient to bind him, because his name is not affixed to it by his authority; but if he had subsequently recognized it by letter to the sellers, it might have been sufficient. 2 B. & P. 238; 2 M. & Wels. 653; 3 Taunt. 169.

But although we admit, if it was necessary for the plaintiffs to rely upon the bill as the note or memorandum within the statute, they must have failed, we think it competent, within the principle of the cases on the subject, from its connection with and relation to the contract, to refer to it as explanatory of any obscurity or indefiniteness of its terms, for the purpose of removing the ambiguity.

Take, for example, as an instance, the objection that the price is uncertain, the figures $7\frac{1}{4}$ and $8\frac{3}{4}$, opposite the 300 bales and 100 cases of drills, given without any mark to denote what is intended by them.

The bill of parcels carries out these figures as so many cents per yard, and the aggregate amount footed up; and after it is received by the defendant, and with a knowledge of this explanation, he ordered the goods to be forwarded.

We cannot doubt but that the bill, under such circumstances, affords competent evidences of the meaning to be given to this part of the written memorandum. And so, in respect to any other indefinite or abbreviated item to be found in this brief note of a mercantile contract.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the proceedings remitted, with directions to award a venire de novo.⁶³

CURTIS, J.⁶⁴ I have the misfortune to differ from the majority of my brethren in this case, and, as the question is one which enters into the daily business of merchants, and at the same time involves the construction of a statute of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, I think it proper to state briefly the grounds on which I rest my opinion.

The first question is, whether the writing of the 19th of September is a sufficient memorandum within the 3d section of the 74th chapter of the revised statutes of Massachusetts. * * *

Does this writing show, upon its face, and without resorting to extraneous evidence, that W. W. Goddard was the purchaser of these goods? I think not. Certainly, it does not so state in terms; nor can I perceive how the fact can be collected from the paper, by any certain intendment. If it be assumed that the sale was made, and that Goddard was a party to the transaction, what is there, on the face of the paper, to show whether Goddard sold or bought? Extraneous evidence that he was the seller would be just as consistent with this writing as extraneous evidence that he was the purchaser. Suppose the fact had been that Mason was the purchaser, and that the writing ⁶³ In Falletti v. Carrano, 92 Conn. 636 (1918), the memorandum of a sale of flour was: "Sold to James Faletti, 50 bbl. Daisy flour in 98 lot, at 8.90 to be taken from the car, terms, cash. Carrano & Nobile—N. F. R." Roraback, J., for the court, said:

"The defendants also insist that the place of delivery mentioned in the memorandum of sale, which states that it was 'to be taken from the car' is so indefinite that the contract fails to meet the requirement of the statute of frauds. In the absence of any explanation, the meaning of this term is hardly intelligible, but the judge of the court below was not at liberty to pronounce this writing void [as he did] until he had brought to his aid in its interpretation all the light afforded by the collateral facts and circumstances. This could have been done by parol. Kilday v. Schanecupp, 91 Conn. 29, 32, 33; Shelinsky v. Foster, 87 Conn. 90, 97. Where an agreement in writing is expressed in technical or incomplete terms, parol evidence may be admissible to explain that which, taken alone, would be unintelligible, when such explanation is not inconsistent with the written terms of the instrument. Thus, if the language of the instrument is applicable to several persons, to several parcels of land, to several species of goods, to several monuments or boundaries, to several writings; or the terms be vague and general, or have divers meanings as 'household furniture,' 'stock,' 'freight,' 'factory prices' and the like; in all these and the like cases, parol evidence is admissible of any extrinsic circumstances, tending to show what person or persons, or what things, were intended by the party, or to ascertain the meaning in any other respect" (92 Conn. at pp. 639-640).

⁶⁴ The dissenting opinion of Daniel, J., and small parts of the dissenting opinion of Curtis, J., are omitted.

might be explained by evidence of that fact; it would then be read that Goddard sold to Mason, on twelve months' credit; and this evidence would be consistent with everything which the paper contains, because the paper is wholly silent as to the fact whether he was the seller or purchaser. In Bailey et al. v. Ogden, 3 Johns. 399, an action for not accepting sugars, the memorandum was:

"14 December.

J. Ogden and Co. Bailey and Bogart.

Brown, 12½,

White, 16¼.

60 and 90 days.

Debenture part pay."

Mr. Justice Kent, who delivered the opinion of the court, enumerating the objections to the memorandum, says, no person can ascertain from this memorandum which of the parties was seller and which buyer; and I think it would be difficult to show that the memorandum now in question is any more intelligible in reference to this fact.

Indeed, I do not understand it is supposed that, in the absence of all extraneous evidence, it could be determined by the court, as matter of law, upon an inspection of the paper alone, that Goddard was the purchaser of these goods. The real inquiry is, whether extraneous evidence of this fact is admissible.

Now, it is true, the statute requires only some note, or memorandum, in writing, of the bargain; but I consider it settled that this writing must show who is vendor and who is purchaser. In Champion v. Plumer, 1 B. & P. New Rep. 252, the memorandum contained the name of the vendor, a description of the goods, and their price, and was signed by the vendee; yet, it was held that the vendee could not maintain an action thereon, because it did not appear, from the writing, that he was vendee, though it was clearly proved by parol. * * *

It seems to me that the fact that the defendant was the purchaser is to say the least, as necessary to be stated in the writing as any other fact, and that to allow it to be proved by parol, is to violate the intent of the statute, and encounter the very mischiefs which it was enacted to prevent. * * *

I am aware that a latent ambiguity in a contract may be removed by extraneous evidence, according to the rules of the common law; and that such evidence is also admissible to show what, in point of fact, was the subject-matter called for by the terms of a contract. Bradlee v. Steam P. Co., 13 Pet. 98. So when an act has been done by a person, and it is doubtful whether he acted in a private or official capacity, it is allowable to prove by parol that he was an agent and acted as such. But these cases fall far short of proving that when a statute requires a contract to be in writing, you may prove by parol the fact that the defendant was purchaser, the writing being silent as to that fact; or that a writing, which does not state who is vendor and who purchaser, does contain in itself the essentials of a contract of sale.

It is one thing to construe what is written; it is a very different thing to supply a substantive fact not stated in the writing. It is one thing to determine the meaning and effect of a complete and valid written contract, and it is another thing to take a writing, which on its face imports no contract, and make it import one by parol evidence. It is one thing to show that a party, who appears by a writing to have made a contract, made it as an agent, and quite a different thing to prove by parol that he made a purchase when the writing is silent as to that fact. The duty and power of the court is a duty and power to give a construction to what is written, and not in any case to permit it to be added to by parol. Least of all when a statute has required the essential requisites of a contract of sale to be in writing, is it admissible, in my judgment, to allow the fact, that the defendant made a purchase, to be proved by parol. If this fact, which lies at the basis of the action and to which every other is but incidental, can be proved by evidence out of the writing signed by the defendant, the statute seems to me to be disregarded.

It has been argued that the bill of parcels, sent to Goddard by Mason and Lawrence, and received by him, may be resorted to for the purpose of showing he was the purchaser. But it is certainly the law of Massachusetts, where this contract was made, and the case tried, as I believe it is of most other states, and of England, that unless the memorandum which is signed contains a reference to some other paper, no paper, not signed by the party to be charged, can be connected with the memorandum, or used to supply any defect therein. This was held in Morton et al. v. Dean, 13 Met. 385, a case to which I shall have occasion more fully to refer hereafter. And in conformity therewith, Chancellor Kent lays down the rule, in 2 Com. 511, and refers to many authorities in support of it. I am not aware that any court has held otherwise.

That this bill of parcels was of itself a sufficient memorandum under the statute, or that it was a paper signed by the defendant, or by any person by him thereunto lawfully authorized, I do not understand to be held by the majority of the court.

Now the memorandum of the 19th September is either sufficient or insufficient, under the statute. If the former, there is no occasion to resort to the bill of parcels to show who was vendor and who purchaser; if the latter, it cannot, consistently with the statute, be made good by another paper not signed, and connected with it only by parol. To charge a party upon an insufficient memorandum, added to by another independent paper, not signed, would be to charge him when there was no sufficient memorandum signed by him, and therefore in direct conflict with the statute. It does not seem to me to be an answer, to say that the bill of parcels was made out pursuant to the memorandum. If the signed memorandum itself does not contain the essentials of a contract of sale, and makes no reference to any other paper, in no legal sense is any other paper pursuant to it—nor can any other paper be connected with it, save by parol evidence, which the statute forbids. In point of fact, it would be difficult to imagine any two independent papers more nearly connected than a memorandum made and signed by an auctioneer, and the written conditions read by him at the sale. Yet it is settled, that the latter cannot be referred to, unless expressly called for by the very terms of the signed memorandum. Upon what principle does a bill of parcels stand upon any better ground?

The distinction, heretofore, has been between papers called for by the memorandum by express reference, and those not thus called for; this decision, for the first time, I believe, disregards that distinction, and allows an unsigned paper, not referred to, to be used in evidence to charge the purchaser.

In my judgment, this memorandum was defective in not showing who was vendor and who purchaser, and oral evidence to supply this defect was not admissible.

But if this difficulty could be overcome, or if it had appeared on the face of the paper that Goddard was the purchaser, still, in my judgment, there is no sufficient memorandum. I take it to be clearly settled, that if the court cannot ascertain from the paper itself, or from some other paper therein referred to, the essential terms of the sale, the writing does not take the case out of the statute. * * *

The statute, then, requires the essential terms of the sale to be in writing; the credit to be allowed to the purchaser is one of the terms of the sale.

And if the memorandum shows that a credit was to be given, but does not fix its termination, it is fatally defective, for the court cannot ascertain, from the paper, when a right of action accrues to the vendee, and the contract shown by the paper is not capable of being described in a declaration. The rights of the parties, in an essential particular, are left undetermined by the paper. This paper shows there was to be a credit of six months, and contains this clause—"Cr. to commence when ship sails: not after December 1." According to this paper, when is this credit to commence? The answer is, when ship sails, if before December 1. What ship? The paper is silent.

This is an action against Goddard for not delivering his note on twelve months' credit, and it is an indispensable inquiry, on what day, according to the contract, the note should bear date. The plaintiffs must aver, in their declaration, what note Goddard was bound to deliver, and the memorandum must enable the court to say that the description of the notes in the declaration is correct. They attempt this by averring, in the declaration, that the contract was for a note payable in twelve months from the sailing of a ship called "The Crusader," and that this ship sailed on the sixth day of November. But the writing does not refer to the "Crusader;" and if oral evidence were admissible to prove that the parties referred to "The Crusader," this essential term of their contract is derived from parol proof, contrary to the requirement of the statute. It was upon this ground the case of Morton et al. v. Dean, [13 Metc. (Mass.) 385] and many other similar cases, have been decided. In that case, there was a memorandum signed by the auctioneer, as the agent of both parties, containing their names, as vendor and vendee, the price to be paid, and a sufficient description of the property. But it appeared that there were written or printed conditions read at the sale, but not referred to in the memorandum, containing the terms of credit, etc., and therefore that the memorandum did not fix all the essential parts of the bargain, and it was held insufficient.

But, further; even if oral evidence were admissible to show that the parties had in view some particular vessel, and so to explain or render certain the memorandum, no such evidence was offered, and no request to leave that question of fact to the jury was made. Mason, who made the contract with Goddard, was a witness, but he does not pretend the parties had any particular vessel in view, still less that they agreed on "The Crusader" as the vessel, the sailing of which was to be the commencement of the credit. I cannot perceive, therefore, how either of the counts in this declaration is supported by the evidence, or how a different verdict could have lawfully been rendered. * * *

I am authorized to state that Mr. Justice Catron concurs in this opinion.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

LEWIS v. ELLIOTT BAY LOGGING CO.

(Supreme Court of Washington, 1920. 191 Pac. 803.)

Action by B. A. Lewis against the Elliott Bay Logging Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss action.

MAIN, J. The purpose of this action was to recover damages for failure to deliver logs which it is claimed the defendant had sold to the plaintiff. The cause was tried to the court and a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $241.66. The defendant timely made motions for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and for a new trial, both of which were overruled, and judgment was entered upon the verdict. The defendant appeals. The essential facts may be stated as follows:

The appellant is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Washington, engaged in the logging business at Dabob, Wash. The respondent is engaged in the business of buying and selling logs. On the 25th day of April, 1917, the respondent visited Dabob, and looked over a boom of logs owned by the appellant, consisting of about 300,000 feet, and had a conversation with the president of the appellant company with reference to purchasing these logs, together with sufficient logs to be brought from the woods to constitute a raft. The logs at the time had not been rafted. Subsequently the 300,000 feet in the boom were rafted with other logs brought from the woods, and in the raft as made up there was approximately 470,000 feet. On the day following the conversation mentioned, one of the trustees of the appellant wrote respondent a letter, which contained the following:

"Having been away from camp the day you was here and Mr. Leber sold fir to you for $7—10—13, * * * so therefore under the condition we let you have fir at $7—10—13 delivered in Everett or Seattle. * * * "

After receipt of this letter, and on April 28, the respondent wrote appellant a letter, containing the following:

"Your letter of the 26th inst. is received, in which you agree to let me have the raft of fir logs to be delivered in Seattle, by you at $7.00, $10.00, and $13.00, * * * and I will take the fir logs as per your offer at the above prices. * * * "

It should be noted that in appellant's letter the subject-matter of the sale is referred to simply as "fir." There is no mention of the quantity. In the respondent's letter for the first time the subject-matter is referred to as "a raft of fir logs." As above stated, the logs were not delivered, and, since the price of logs had advanced, this action was brought for the purpose of recovering damages.

The first question to be determined is whether the letters referred to constitute a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the statute of frauds. One of the essentials of a memorandum under the statute is that it shall designate the subject-matter of the contract.

Considering, first, the letter signed by the appellant, there is no designation therein of the quantity, but the subject of the sale is referred to simply as "fir." The rule as stated in 1 Mechem on Sales, § 437, is that—

"The note or memorandum must also show what goods were sold and in what quantities. This rule requires that the goods shall be set out either by name or by such description as will enable them to be ascertained without other recourse to parol evidence to identify the goods or apply the description of them."

Under this rule it is necessary that the note or memorandum show in "what quantities" the goods are sold. In 25 R. C. L. 648, the rule is stated substantially the same as in Mechem, and is as follows:

"In case of contracts for the sale of goods the memorandum must designate with reasonable certainty the subject-matter of the sale, and where the sale is of a quantity of a commodity the quantity must be stated with reasonable certainty as well as its kind."

This rule requires that the quantity be designated in the memorandum. The letter written by the appellant, which referred to the subject-matter of the sale as "fir," did not sufficiently designate the quantity. The respondent, however, argues that the two letters should be considered together. It is true that where the memorandum consists of telegrams or letters they may be construed together, providing they are sufficiently connected by reference. In the letter of the respondent the quantity of the subject-matter, namely, "a raft of fir logs," is for the first time designated. Under the authorities above cited this was one of the essentials of the memorandum.

The question then arises, the memorandum of the appellant which is sought to be charged not sufficiently describing the subject-matter, can it be held upon the letter of the respondent which for the first time contains that essential term of the contract? Respondent cites a number of cases upon this question, all of which have been carefully read and considered, but none of them would sustain a holding that the appellant could be charged upon a memorandum which it did not sign, and which designated the quantity, where the writing signed by the appellant did not sufficiently designate the subject-matter in that respect. They are cases where the party sought to be charged signed a memorandum which contained all the essential terms of the contract, and which was simply accepted by the opposite party, or cases where the party sought to be charged had accepted the terms as they were written by the opposite party. They are therefore not applicable to the facts in the case now before us.

The respondent also cites a number of authorities to sustain his contention that the word "fir" as used in the letter of the appellant was a sufficient designation of the subject-matter, and that oral testimony was admissible for the purpose of showing that that word referred to a raft of logs and the quantity thereof. In all the cases cited, with possibly one exception which will be specially noticed, the memorandum contained language which made the quantity reasonably certain. It cannot be said that simply the word "fir" bears any relation to the quantity. We have not overlooked the rule that the situation of the parties and the surrounding circumstances at the time when the contract was made may be shown for the purpose of applying the contract to the subject-matter, but this rule does not go to the extent of permitting an essential term of the memorandum to be shown by oral testimony. The case of Brewer v. Horst & Lachmund Co., 127 Cal. 643, 60 Pac. 418, 50 L. R. A. 240, is probably the most closely in point of any case cited by respondent, but that case, when carefully read, is distinguishable. There a telegram to a hop dealer by his agent, stating "bought thirteen at eleven five-eighths net you; confirm purchase by wire," with the reply by the dealer to the effect that, "We confirm purchase eleven five-eight cents, like sample," was held to constitute a sufficient memorandum, since it was shown by parol evidence that according to the custom of the hop business the words were understood by the parties to mean an agreement to purchase a certain quantity of hops, of a certain grade, for a certain price. There is no showing in the present case that the word "fir," according to the custom of the business, had any particular meaning. The case of Wright v. Seattle Grocery Co., 105 Wash. 383, 177 Pac. 818, is cited and relied on by both parties, but that case does not discuss or determine the question here involved. There the memorandum designated the subject-matter as "1 car" of flour, and it was held that the parol evidence was admissible to explain what the term "1 car" of flour meant, and that the price agreed upon was in full for that quantity. There is nothing in that case which would sustain a holding that, where a memorandum does not sufficiently designate the subject-matter, in that it does not fix the quantity with reasonable certainty, this fact may be shown by oral evidence.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to dismiss the action.⁶⁵

PEARLBERG v. LEVISOHN ET AL.

(Supreme Court, Appellate Term, Second Department, 1920. 112 Misc. 95, 182 N. Y. Supp. 615.)

Action by Morris Pearlberg against Julius Levisohn and another, copartners trading as Julius Levisohn & Son. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

CROSEY, J.⁶⁶ * * * The defendants are manufacturers of clothing, and from them the plaintiff ordered some goods. The memorandum is made on a printed form taken from the order book of the defendants. At the head of it is the name of defendants' firm, with the statement that they are manufacturers of clothing. The printed part of the form contains a place for the date, order number, name of purchaser, directions for time and method of shipment, terms, etc., and below are columns showing the lot, style, and quantity of the different sized garments ordered, with the prices. This order has written on it the date, the name of the plaintiff, who was the purchaser, and a detailed description of the lot, style, and quantity, giving the different sizes and the different prices. All this writing was made by one of the defendants, and the paper was then given to the plaintiff; the defendants keeping a carbon copy of it for their use.

On the necessity that a memorandum within the statute of frauds shall contain the terms of sale, see 9 Ann. Cas. 1060, note. On the necessity of a written acceptance of a written offer to constitute a sufficient memorandum under the statute, see Ann. Cas., 1913 A, 1041, note.

⁶⁶ Parts of the opinion are omitted.

It is manifest that this is a memorandum of an agreement to sell to the plaintiff the goods specified at the prices named. All the necessary terms of a contract and all the terms of the agreement actually made appear on the face of the memorandum. It does not state the terms or the time of delivery, but there was no agreement as to either, and there need be none to make a valid agreement. The plaintiff was permitted to testify, over objection, that at the time he gave the order the defendants said the goods would be delivered in two or three weeks. But this was not a part of the agreement. The order is dated May 24, 1919, and the plaintiff told the defendants he wanted the goods for his fall trade, he being in the retail clothing business, so he had no need of them in two or three weeks; and the plaintiff did not attempt to hold the defendants to a delivery within that period. When the goods were not received, he visited the defendants several times, and finally, after two months had elapsed, the defendants told him the goods had been sold to others. Thereafter this action was brought. It is admitted that the prices of the suits went up after the order was placed, though there is a dispute as to the amount of the advance.

The memorandum does not contain any signature of the defendants, either in ink or pencil; but the printed firm name appears at the top of it, and it is contended by defendants that this is not a signing within the meaning of the statute. The statute does not specify any particular form of signing. It merely requires that the party to be charged shall have signed the memorandum. It has been held that cross mark is a good signature (Zacharie v. Franklin, 12 Pet. 151, 161-162, 9 L. Ed. 1035); also initials (Barry v. Coombe, 1 Pet. 640, 7 L. Ed. 295; Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. v. Goddard, 14 How. 446, 14 L. Ed. 493); even numerals, when used with the intention of constituting a signature (Brown v. Butchers' & Drovers' Bank, 6 Hill, 443, 41 Am. Dec. 755); and a typewritten name or imprint made by a rubber stamp has the same effect (Landeker v. Co-operative Bldg. Bank, 71 Misc. Rep. 517, 130 N. Y. Supp. 780; Degginger v. Martin, 48 Wash. 1, 4, 92 Pac. 674); and this is equally true, though the typewriting or stamp impression be made by another, if the person to be charged has directed it (Deep River National Bank's Appeal, 73 Conn. 341, 346, 47 Atl. 675).⁶⁷

These and similar cases establish the rule that any name or symbol used by a party with the intention of constituting it his signature, or which is adopted by the party as his signature, is sufficient; and from this it necessarily follows that the party's name printed on the memorandum fully satisfies the statute, if it is shown to have been adopted by him as his signature. This has been the law in England for more than a century, and has been followed quite generally in this country. Saunderson v. Jackson, 3 Esp. 180; Schneider v. Norris, 2 M. & S. 286; Evans v. Hoare, 1 Q. B. 593, 596; ⁶⁸ Hucklesby v. Hook, 82 L. T. N. S. 117; Cohen v. Wolgel, 107 Misc. Rep. 505, 176 N. Y. Supp. 764; Drury v. Young, 58 Md. 546, 553, 554, 42 Am. Rep. 343. See other cases in note, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 352. It has even been held that the name of a party printed on the loose cover of his order book is sufficient. Jones Brothers v. Joyner, 82 L. T. N. S. 768.⁶⁹ There ⁶⁸ In Evans v. Hoare the address of the firm at the head of a letter prepared by its clerk for the plaintiff to sign as a binding memorandum was held to be a signature there by the firm. See Kilday v. Schanupp, 91 Conn. 29 (1916), where the memorandum prepared by the defendant began: "Sold to J. Schanupp" and he was held to have signed it at the beginning.

On the place of signature, see L. R. A., 1917 A 153, note.

But in Guthrie v. Anderson, 47 Kans. 383, 389-390 (1891), where the memorandum recited that "the undersigned, husband and wife, owners * * * hereby bargain and sell the same to W. W. Guthrie," etc., Horton, C. J., said:

"The writing or memorandum was prepared by Mr. Guthrie, and his name appears in the body of the instrument as the party to whom the Andersons agreed to sell. But this is not equivalent to the instrument being signed by Mr. Guthrie. * * * If Mr. Guthrie had signed his name at the bottom or the top or anywhere upon the memorandum after it had been written or prepared or directed his name to be so written for acknowledgment, then it might be held that such a signature would satisfy the statute. But his name only appears * * * in the body of the instrument as one of the terms or a part thereof."

⁶⁹ In Jones Bros. v. Joyner the names of the plaintiffs were not found as is nothing in conflict with this holding in James v. Patten, 6 N. Y. 9, 55 Am. Dec 376, and similar cases, for they only decide that under a statute requiring the memorandum to be "subscribed" there had to be a manual signing of it at the end. But even these cases, so far as they say there must be a signature made by hand, have been seriously questioned. Landeker v. Co-operative Bldg. Bank, 71 Misc. Rep. 517, 130 N. Y. Supp. 780.

Where the statute (like the present form of ours) merely required that the memorandum be signed and not subscribed, it is complied with if the signature appears upon any part of the paper. Merritt v. Clason, 12 John. 102, 7 Am. Dec. 286, affirmed as Clason v. Bailey, 14 John. 484; New England, etc., Co. v. Standard Worsted Co., 165 Mass. 328, 331, 43 N. E. 112, 52 Am. St. Rep. 516; Barry v. Coombe, 1 Pet. 640, 7 L. Ed. 295. And the signing by one partner binds the firm. Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. v. Goddard, 14 How. 446, 455, 14 L. Ed. 493; Hughes v. Gross, 166 Mass. 61, 43 N. WILLIAM F. JOHNSON, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR v. JOHN C. DODGE,
DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1866. 17 Ill. 433.)

SKINNER, J. This was a bill in equity, for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land.

The bill and proofs show that one Iglehart, a general land agent, signatures, but as parties. On the leather cover in which removable memorandum books were slipped was stamped "James Jones." The stamped name was deemed part of the memorandum written in the removable memorandum book to supply the names of plaintiffs as sellers. If defendant had been suing, would it have served as a signature?

In Pearce v. Gardner, [1897] 1 Q. B. 688, where the "Dear Sir" of the address of a letter was read with the address on the envelope to make the memorandum required by the statute of frauds, Chitty, L. J., said (p. 691): "It is a matter of common knowledge that formerly letters were written on one sheet of paper, which was folded up and indorsed with the name and address of the person to whom it was sent. Subsequently, about 1840, adhesive envelopes were introduced, and since then the old method has to some extent come into use again as a combination of letter and adhesive envelope. In my opinion, it would be contrary to good sense to hold that there is any distinction between the effect produced by these three methods of sending a letter. The letter and its contents reached the plaintiff, and it seems to me that there is no difficulty in dealing with the whole as one document. It is suggested that this would be to introduce the mischief against which the statute was intended to provide; but the answer to this objection is that it has long been established that parol evidence is admissible to connect separate documents." Pearce v. Gardner was followed in Last v. Hucklesby, [1914] W. N. 157 (C. A.).

executed a contract in writing in the name of Dodge, the respondent, for the sale of certain land belonging to Dodge, to one Walters, and received a portion of the purchase money; that Walters afterwards assigned the contract to Johnson, the complainant; a tender of performance on the part of Walters, and on the part of Johnson, and a refusal of Dodge to perform the contract. The answer of Dodge, not under oath, denies the contract and sets up the statute of frauds as a defence, to any contract to be proved. The evidence, to our minds, establishes a parol authority from Dodge to Iglehart to sell the land, substantially according to the terms of the writing. It is urged against the relief prayed, that Iglehart, upon a parol authority to sell, could not make for Dodge a binding contract of sale, under the statute of frauds; that the proofs do not show an authority to Iglehart to sign the name of Dodge to the contract, and therefore that the writing is not the contract of Dodge; that the writing not being signed by the vendee is void for want of mutuality; that no sufficient tender of performance on the part of complainant is proved, and that the proof shows that the authority conferred was not pursued by the agent. Equity will not decree specific performance of a contract founded in fraud, but where the contract is for the sale of land, and the proof shows a fair transaction and the case alleged is clearly established, it will decree such performance.

In this case, the contract, if Iglehart had authority to make it, is the contract of Dodge and in writing; and it is the settled construction of the statute of frauds, that the authority to the agent need not be in writing, and by this construction we feel bound. 1 Parsons on Con. 42, and cases cited; Doty v. Wilder, 15 Ill. 407; 2 Parsons on Con. 292, 293, and cases cited; Saunders' Pl. and Ev. 541, 542, 551; Story on Agency, 50; 2 Kent's Com. 614. Authority from Dodge to Iglehart to sell the land, included the necessary and usual means to make a binding contract in the name of the principal. If the authority to sell may be created by parol, from this authority may be implied the power to use the ordinary and usual means of effecting a valid sale; and to make such sale it was necessary to make a writing evidencing the same. If a party is present at the execution of a contract or deed, to bind him as a party to it, when his signature is affixed by another, it is necessary that the person so signing for him should have direct authority to do the particular thing, and then the signing is deemed his personal act. Story on Agency, 51. In such case the party acts without the intervention of an agent and uses the third person only as an instrument to perform the mere act of signing. This is not such a case. The agent was authorized to negotiate and conclude the sale, and for that purpose, authority was implied to do for his principal what would have been incumbent on the principal to do to accomplish the same thing in person. Hawkins v. Chance, 19 Pick. 502; 2 Parsons on Con. 291; Story on Agency, chap. 6; Hunt v. Gregg, 8 Blackf. 105; Lawrence v. Taylor, 5 Hill, 107, 15 Ill. 411; Vanada v. Hopkins, 1 J. J. Marsh. 283; Kirby v. Grigsby, 9 Leigh, 387.

The mode here adopted was to sign the name of Dodge "by" Iglehart, "his agent," and it is the usual and proper mode in carrying out an authority to contract conferred on an agent. But if the signing the name of the principal was not authorized by the authority to sell, yet the signature of the agent is a sufficient signing under the statute. The language of the statute is, "signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other persons thereto by him lawfully authorized." If Iglehart had authority to sign Dodge's name, then the contract is to be treated as signed by Dodge; and if Iglehart had authority to sell, in any view, his signature to the contract, is a signing by "some other person thereto by him lawfully authorized," within the statute. Truman v. Loder, 11 Ad. and El. 589; 2 Parsons on Con. 291. It is true that authority to convey must be in writing and by deed; for land can only be conveyed by deed, and the power must be of as high dignity as the act to be performed under it. It was not necessary to the obligation of the contract that it should have been signed by the vendee. His acceptance and possession of the contract and payment of money under it, are unequivocal evidences of his concurrence, and constitute him a party as fully and irrevocably as his signing the contract could. 2 Parsons on Con. 290; McCrea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. 160; Shirley v. Shirley, 7 Blackf. 452.

We cannot question the sufficiency of the tender in equity, to entitle the complainant to specific performance. Webster et al. v. French et al., 11 Ill. 278. Nor do we find any substantial departure in the contract from the authority proved. While we hold that the authority to the agent who, for his principal contracts for the sale of land, need not be in writing, yet we should feel bound to refuse a specific performance of a contract made with an agent upon parol authority, without full and satisfactory proof of the authority, or where it should seem at all doubtful whether the authority was not assumed and the transaction fraudulent.

Decree [dismissing the bill] reversed.⁷⁰

⁷⁰In Illinois, and in a number of states, statutes have been passed requiring the agent's authority to be in writing. Morton v. Murray, 176 Ill. 54 (1858), mentioned in note 72, post, was decided under such a statute. Where an unauthorized agent makes a written contract of sale, an oral promise of the owner to perform will not prevent him from pleading the statute. Keaner v. Miesch, 204 Ill. 320 (1903).

On necessity that agent have written authority to make memorandum required by the statute of frauds, see 7 Ann. Cas. 1101, note.

"An auctioneer is [usually] the agent of both parties to the sale, and a memorandum thereof, signed by him at the proper time, if otherwise complete, is sufficient to charge both the vendor and the purchaser under the statute of frauds. McBrayer v. Cohen, 92 Ky. 479, 18 S. W. 123; Gill v. Hewett, 7 Bush, 10; Thomas v. Keer, 3 Bush, 619, 96 Am. Dec. 262.

EUGENE L. LEZINSKY CO., INC., v. CHARLES HOFFMAN ET AL.

(Supreme Court, Appellate Term, First Department, 1920. 111 Misc. 415, 181 N. Y. Supp. 732.)

Action by the Eugene L. Lezinsky Company, Incorporated, against Charles Hoffman and Jacob Hoffman. From a judgment entered in

"While it is sometimes stated that the auctioneer's authority ceases as soon as the sale has taken place, it is now generally held that his agency for the vendor is not necessarily coextensive with his agency for the purchaser. His agency for the purchaser ends with the sale; and, unless the memorandum be made and signed contemporaneously with the sale, or immediately thereafter, it is not binding on the purchaser. On the other hand, his agency for the vendor may or may not end with the sale. If he be a mere crier, who simply calls for bids and strikes the bargain, his authority ends with the sale; but, if he be given authority to advertise the property and to make all the necessary arrangements for carrying the sale into effect, his authority to bind the vendor does not end with the sale, but extends beyond it, and, until it is revoked, he may properly bind the vendor by a memorandum signed within a reasonable time." Clay, C., in Martin v. Mathis, 184 Ky. 20, 211 S. W. 198 (1919), citing White v. Dahlquist Manufacturing Co., 179 Mass. 427 (1901). On the sufficiency of the auctioneer's memorandum to satisfy the statute, see Ann. Cas. 1912 D, 1069, note.

But the other party to the contract cannot serve as agent to execute the memorandum for both, even if he is an auctioneer. In Bent v. Cobb, 9 Gray (Mass.) 397 (1857), Bigelow, J., said:

"In all cases of sales by auction, the auctioneer, acting only as such, is the competent agent of both parties, and his memorandum of a contract or agreement is binding on both. He is the agent of the vendor by virtue of his employment to make the sale, and he is made the agent of the vendee by the act of the latter in giving him his bid and receiving from him without objection the announcement that the property sold is knocked off to him as purchaser. But this rule is not applicable to cases where the auctioneer is also himself the vendor. The great mischief intended to be prevented by the statute would still exist if one party to a contract could make a memorandum of it which would absolutely bind the other. If such were its true construction it would be a feeble security against fraud, or, rather, it would open a door for its easy commission. A vendor could fasten his own terms on his vendee. If it was a written contract binding on the purchaser he could not show by parol evidence that the terms of the bargain were incorrectly or imperfectly stated. He could not vary or alter it by the testimony of those present at the sale. The publicity of a sale by auction would be no safeguard against a false statement of the terms of sale, made in the written memorandum signed by a party acting in the double capacity of auctioneer and vendor. The chief reason in support of the rule, that an auctioneer, acting solely as such, may be the agent of both parties to bind them by his memorandum, is that he is supposed to be a disinterested person, having no motive to misstate the bargain, and entitled equally to the confidence of both parties. But this reason fails when he is the party to the contract and the party in interest also. The purpose of the statute was, that a contract should not be binding unless it was in writing and signed by the party himself to be charged thereby, or by some third person, in his behalf, not a party to the contract, who might impartially note its contents.

"Nor can it make any difference as to the power of the vendor to make a favor of the plaintiff, after a trial before the court and jury, defendants appeal. Judgment reversed, and complaint dismissed.

FINCH, J. This is an action for damages for breach of an alleged contract for the sale of certain goods by defendants to plaintiff. The defendant denied generally, and as a defense set up the statute of frauds. It appears that the plaintiff's president went to the defendants' place of business and looked over their line of samples; memorandum binding on the vendee, that the sale is made by the former in a representative or fiduciary character as an executor, administrator, guardian or trustee. He is still the party to the contract, the price is to be paid to him, he is to deal with the purchase money; his interest and bias would naturally be in favor of those whom he represented, and, what is more material, in case of dispute or doubt as to the terms of the contract, his duties and interests would be adverse to those of the vendee. He would stand in a relation which would necessarily disqualify him from acting as agent of both parties. We do not mean to say that a contract would not be binding, made by an auctioneer, where, from the form in which it was written, an action might be brought to enforce the contract in his name. In such case, if he was only the nominal party to the contract and the record, not being himself the vendor, and having no interest in the sale except as auctioneer, his memorandum might be sufficient to bind both parties to the contract. But we confine our opinion to the case at bar, where the auctioneer was the vendor and a party having an interest, greater or less, in the contract, as well as a party to it in terms. Wright v. Dannah, 2 Campb. 203; Farebrother v. Simmons, 5 B. & Ald. 333; Rayner v. Linthorne, 2 Car. & P. 124; Bird v. Boulter, 4 B. & Ald. 443, and 1 Nev. & Man. 313; Smith v. Arnold, 5 Mason 417."

The auctioneer's authority is revocable moreover. "Between the fall of the hammer and the writing of his name in the memorandum, the bidder has a locus poenitentiae, and may withdraw his bid." Valliant, J., in Dunham v. Hartman, 153 Mo. 625, 630 (1899).

It would seem that a memorandum, if otherwise sufficient, will serve when signed by an agent even if it is not intended as a memorandum, if it would have served had the principal signed it under such circumstances.

"It seems to me that the unintentional by-product of satisfying the statute of frauds may be provided as completely by a note or memorandum signed by an agent of the party as by a note or memorandum signed by the party himself, provided, of course, that the agent had authority to sign the particular note or memorandum." Sargant, J., in Daniels v. Trefusis, [1914] 1 Ch. 788, 790.

In Grindell v. Bass, [1920] 2 Ch. 487, such "unintentional by-product" was held to have resulted from an answer in chancery signed by a solicitor which was deemed a sufficient memorandum for a party who did not coerce the answer. Although the solicitor was given no specific authority to sign a memorandum, but only to sign a defence which alleged the existence and terms of the contract, the solicitor was deemed "thereunto lawfully authorized" to sign within the meaning of the statute. But as to the solicitor's authority, see Thirkell v. Cambi, [1919] 2 K. B. 590.

Such "unintentional by-product" may be the result of a letter repudiating liability. Bailey v. Sweeting, 9 C. B. (N. S.) 843 (1861). In Thirkell v. Cambi, [1919] 2 K. B. 590, Scrutton, L. J., said that while such a letter may serve as a memorandum it must be both "a signed admission that there was a contract and a signed admission of what that contract was," to be sufficient.

that he procured from one of the defendants' employes a pad, on which was printed the defendants' names and a former address; that on this pad the plaintiff's representative wrote in duplicate various items of goods at stated prices, signed and handed the sheets containing the writing to defendants' employe, who retained the original and returned the copy to plaintiff's representative; the defendant making no writing thereon.

It is urged by the respondent, however, that the defendant must be deemed to have appropriated as its signature its printed name upon the sheet, and hence the alleged contract is not within the statute of frauds. With this contention I am unable to agree. Both in this country and England no case has gone further than to hold that a printed name, when at the top of an order blank or bill, may be appropriated or assigned to a particular transaction as a signature only where the remainder of the blank has been filled in by the party to be charged therewith or his duly authorized agent. Cohen v. Wolgel, 107 Misc. Rep. 505, 176 N. Y. Supp. 764; Hucklesby v. Hook, 82 Law Times Report, 117⁷¹ (the latter pointing out the distinction between the earlier English cases and the case at bar). Such decisions seem to mark the dividing line between those cases where the statute has been complied with and where it has not. In the one case you have taken the agreement out of the reach altogether of possible frauds and perjury, inasmuch as it is entirely out of the reach of verbal testimony only; whereas, in the case at bar, the vitals of the transaction are established or denied entirely by oral testimony. Wilson v. Lewiston Mills Co., 150 N. Y. 314, at pages 325, 326, 44 N. E. 959, 55 Am. St. Rep. 680.

The doctrine of appropriation of defendant's printed name as his signature to the contract must rest upon the principle that a man may say in any form, "This is my signature," but at the time he does so there must be a writing in existence, which must be the writing of the person to be charged therewith; for, if the writing is not then in existence, there is nothing to which the defendant's printed signature may be appropriated or assigned. This writing must be made by either the defendant or his duly authorized agent. The other party cannot be his agent for this purpose any more than he could for the purpose of appropriating the printed signatures. Wilson v. Lewiston Mills Co., supra.

The defendants' testimony in the case at bar furnishes an excellent example of the reason for the statute. Such testimony is that the plaintiff was trying to persuade the defendants to accept the order at the prices desired by the plaintiff, and the defendants refused, because a strike was in progress and labor costs could not be reckoned. Plaintiff finally wrote down what it wanted on what defendants allege to be a memorandum pad used for scrap, and not used for the purpose of taking orders, and left it with the defendants as a mere offer on the part of plaintiff, which the defendants never accepted. Plaintiff now seeks, solely by its own writing and oral testimony on its part, to bind the defendant, and the latter has to meet this issue likewise by oral testimony. As a result, the statute is entirely done away with, provided a plaintiff convinces a jury of the truth of his assertion.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed, with costs, and the complaint dismissed, with costs.⁷²

LEE v. VAUGHAN SEED STORE.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas, 1911. 101 Ark. 68, 141 S. W. 496, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 352.)

Action by Arthur G. Lee against the Vaughan Seed Store. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The appellant sued appellee on an alleged contract for the sale of onion sets, as follows: "Contract for onion sets between Vaughan's Seed Store of the city of Chicago, state of Illinois, party of the first part, and Arthur G. Lee, of the city of Ft. Smith, state of Arkansas, party of the second part. Said party of the first part sells said party of the second part the following amount of onion sets for delivery Jan. '08." Then follows description of the onion sets, and the terms of sale and shipment are set forth. The alleged contract was signed by appellant, and the name of appellee was printed in capital letters in the body of the contract, but was not written or printed at the bottom of the contract where the signature of appellant appears. Nor was the ⁷² See Cohen v. Woigel, 176 N. Y. Supp. 764 (1919).

Under a state statute requiring the authority of an agent to sign the memorandum to be in writing, it has been held that a signature by another at the party's request and with his mark or name is a signature by himself and not by agent. Morton v. Murray, 176 Ill. 54 (1898). Carter, C. J., said for the majority of the court: "One may write and execute an instrument by the hand of another when done in his presence and by his direction, and the fact may be proved by parol evidence and an action may be brought upon the instrument without violating the statute of frauds." On signing by proxy, see 22 L. R. A. 297, note.

name of appellee written anywhere in the instrument by the agent of appellee.

Appellant insisted that he had a contract with appellee for the delivery of the onion sets and appellee on the other hand claimed that it had not booked appellant's order and therefore had not approved or accepted same and had not entered into a contract for the sale and delivery of the onion sets. The court directed a verdict instead in favor of appellee, and appellant appealed.

Wood, J.† Section 3656 of Kirby's Digest provides: "No contract the sale of goods, wares and merchandise for the price of $30.00 or upward, shall be binding on the parties, unless, first, there be some note or memorandum signed by the party to be charged." Under the above section, in order to bind appellee to the alleged contract it must appear that same was signed by appellee. "The party to be charged" is the one against whom the contract is sought to be enforced. 20 Cyc. 272, and note. See, also, Vance v. Newman, 72 Ark. 359, 80 S. W. 574, 105 Am. St. Rep. 42; Century Dig. p. 2286, § 244, where cases are collected; Browne on the Statute of Frauds, § 365.⁷³

Does the printed name of appellee in the body, and on the back, of the instrument constitute a signature within the meaning of the above statute? Browne on the Statute of Frauds says: "In regard to the place of signature, there is no restriction. It may be at the top, or in the body of the memorandum as well as at the foot. * * * But the name, besides being in his handwriting, must always be inserted in such a manner as to authenticate the instrument as the act of the party executing it, or in other words, to show the intention of the party to admit his liability. The mere insertion of his name in the body of an instrument, where it is applicable to a particular purpose will not constitute a signature in the meaning of the statute, and although it be so inserted as to control and direct the entire instrument,

† The statement of facts is abbreviated and parts of the opinion are omitted.

⁷³ In some states the vendor is the party to be charged in a contract to sell land and the vendee may be sued in such states even if he has not signed if the vendor has. Evans v. Stratton, 142 Ky. 615 (1911); Brodhead v. Reinbold, 200 Pa. St. 618 (1901). But in the great majority of jurisdictions the party to be charged means the one against whom the contract is sought to be enforced in the action, i. e., usually the defendant, as noted in the principal case.

In Idaho, in Houser v. Hobart, 22 Ida. 735 (1912), and in Kerr v. Finch, 25 Ida. 34 (1913), the court held that the memorandum is invalid when signed by less than all the parties. In Kerr v. Finch the memorandum was signed by the vendor only and it was held invalid even at the suit of the vendee. The court admitted, that its view was that of a small minority, but said that "Precedent is strongly persuasive with this court, but not controlling, and, if devoid of reason and justice, will not be followed."

On the sufficiency of a signature of the memorandum by one party only, see 3 Ann. Cas. 1036, note; 13 Ann. Cas. 1121, note; Ann. Cas. 1912 C. 416, note.

still the better opinion seems to be that its insertion must also be intended as a final signature, and that if it appear that the instrument was to be further executed, it will not be taken to have already been sufficiently signed." Browne on the Statute of Frauds, § 357.

The agent of appellee was furnished with a form of contract containing blanks to be filled and with the name of appellee printed in the body and on the back thereof. The agent when he took the order for goods filled in the blanks, but he did not sign the name of appellee to the instrument and did not write it in the alleged contract. The letters of appellee to appellant written after the instrument was signed by appellant (but introduced by appellant himself) indicate that appellee's agent who took the order had no authority to sign appellee's name to the alleged contract. His authority according to these letters, was only to solicit orders and submit them for consideration and confirmation of appellee at its home office. But even if it could be assumed that the sales agent had authority to sign appellee's name, it does not appear that he did so.

"A signature consists both of the act of writing the party's name and of the intention of thereby finally authenticating the instrument." Greenleaf on Evidence, § 674, quoted in Vines et al. v. Clingfost, Ex., 21 Ark. 312, and in Seventh Street Colored Church v. Campbell, 48 La. Ann. 1546, 21 South. 184; Davis v. Sanders, 40 S. C. 510, 19 S. E. 138; Watson v. Pipes, 32 Miss. 466; 25 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1065.

A name merely printed in an instrument where according to its purport the name should be mentioned in the recitals is not a signature within the meaning of the statute of frauds. See Evans v. Ashley, 8 Mo. 181. There must be a writing, stamping or printing of the name by the party to be charged, in person or through a duly authorized agent with the intention of authenticating and finally adopting the writing as his own. There is no proof to that effect in this record. We conclude therefore that the name of appellee printed in the instrument under consideration did not constitute a signing thereof within the meaning of the statute of frauds. * * *

The judgment is correct, and is affirmed.⁷⁴

⁷⁴ But in Jones v. Victoria Graving Dock Co., L. R., 2 Q. B. D. 314, at 323-324 (1877), Lush, J., said:

"The signature required by the 4th section is not of the substance of the contract; it is matter of procedure only (Leroux v. Brown 12 C. B. 801), and is required as evidence of the contract. To prevent frauds and perjuries, the act will not allow any other kind of proof than the writing itself (if it be in writing) or a written admission that the contract was made, and that it was signed in either case by the party to be charged. But so that this kind of evidence is given, it matters not that the memorandum was not made at the time, or for what purpose the signature was put, if only it was put to attest the document as that which contains the terms of the contract."

And in John Griffith Cycle Corp., Ltd. v. Humber & Co., Ltd., [1899] 2 Q. B. 414, 417-418, A. L. Smith, L. J., said:

"It is undoubted law that the party to the contract himself may, by signing

ARNETT ET AL. v. WESTCOTT ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Kansas, 1920. 107 Kans. 693, 193 Pac. 377.)

Suit by Floyd Arnett and others against Sarah J. Westcott and others for specific performance. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

PORTER, J.⁷⁵ The appeal is from a judgment directing the specific performance of a contract wherein John A. Boylan agreed to convey to J. W. Wilson a farm of 160 acres in Cowley county.

In her lifetime the legal title was in Martha A. Scott. She died intestate August 7, 1910, and one-half of the property descended to her eight children and one-half to their father, Robert B. Scott. Robert B. Scott owned another farm of 160 acres, and upon his death in 1911 the full title to both farms vested in the eight children. The heirs were of full age, and all except Nancy C. Boylan were nonresidents, some living in Oklahoma and others in Missouri. John A. Boylan, husband of Nancy C. Boylan, had been acting as the agent of all the heirs, looking after both farms, collecting the rents, and paying the taxes. Some years before he had on behalf of the heirs sold the farm they had inherited from their father, and for several years had had an arrangement with them to sell the farm in controversy at a fixed price. He was also the administrator of the estate of Robert B. Scott. In July, 1917, he entered into a written contract to sell the farm to one of the plaintiffs, J. W. Wilson, for $11,500, the price the heirs had agreed upon, and the contract was deposited in a bank, together with Wilson's check for $1,000; the balance to be paid when the title papers were perfected. Boylan prepared a deed for the heirs to sign, reciting the consideration and designating the grantors as the only heirs at law of Martha A. Scott, deceased, and Robert B. Scott, deceased. The deed was sent around among the heirs, and all except Alec Scott signed and acknowledged it for the purpose of carrying out the contract. Alec Scott and his wife refused to sign, not because of any dissatisfaction with the terms of the sale, but because Alec claimed that in the sale of the father's farm the other heirs had defrauded him out of $500 of his share. J. W. Wilson, in the meantime had arranged to sell the property to the other plaintiffs, Arnett and Foster, for the same price at which he was to purchase it. The heirs who had signed a document subsequent to that containing the terms of the contract in the way required by the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. It is also undoubted law that a signature to a document which contains the terms of a contract is available for the purpose of satisfying s. 4 of the statute, though put altogether and not in order to attest or verify the contract. Jones v. Victoria Dock Co., L. R., 2 Q. B. D. 314." Though the House of Lords reversed the case, it was on other grounds.

the deed, together with Wilson and Arnett, consulted an attorney, who advised them that there were three things they might do: First, the plaintiffs could take the deed executed by seven of the eight heirs; second, a suit in partition could be brought (which Wilson and Arnett claim they understood would force the sale of the one eighth interest belonging to Alec Scott); and, third, the plaintiffs could abandon the contract. Boylan wanted to see the contract carried out, and induced some of the heirs to bring suit for partition, and suit was filed.

The sale in partition occurred in April, 1918. Boylan did not guarantee that Wilson would get the farm at the agreed price, but Boylan wrote him shortly before the sale that the only thing left for them to do was "to go up and bid it in if we can, and hope no one will run it up higher than the price we had set." Wilson and Arnett attended the sale and bid the amount they had agreed to pay Boylan. W. S. Scott and Ross Scott bid $12,000, and the property was struck off to them, and afterwards the sale was duly confirmed. On October 24, 1918, the check Wilson had left in the bank with the contract was taken down by him. The contract itself was left in the bank. Afterwards, on July 27, 1919, another check for $1,000 was placed in the bank payable to John A. Boylan. This was after the plaintiffs determined to begin suit for specific performance.

Two propositions are insisted upon: First, that there was no written contract between plaintiffs and the defendant heirs, and especially none between plaintiffs and W. S. Scott and Ross Scott, who now hold the title by virtue of their purchase at the partition sale. There was a written contract, however, between Boylan and Wilson, which is the contract the court ordered performance of. It is urged that Boylan only purported in the contract to act for the defendants, but that, in fact, he had no authority to act in their behalf, or at least that there was no way to prove that authority. That he did act in their behalf and under their authority are facts determined by the court, and there was abundant evidence to sustain the finding. It is of no consequence at all that in signing his name to the contract with Wilson, Boylan added the letters "Admr." It is conceded that, as administrator, he had no authority to make such a contract; in fact, he never claimed to possess such authority. He claimed to represent the defendant heirs under some arrangement with them, and Wilson so understood. If, in fact, he did have authority, though not in writing, to represent the defendant heirs, a court of equity would have the power, in a proper case, to compel the defendants to perform the contract, providing, of course, there was some memorandum in writing signed by the defendants which is sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds.

The chief contention of the defendants is that there was no such memorandum. They say that the warranty deed signed by them was never delivered, and therefore is not a sufficient memorandum. The appeal is prosecuted particularly in the interest of W. S. Scott and Ross Scott, who claim title under the partition sale. They testified, in substance, that they understood John Boylan had contracted to sell the land to Wilson for the amount expressed in the deed, which was agreeable to them; that they signed the deed to carry out the agreement whatever it was; they remembered about the sale of the other place negotiated by Boylan in the same way. Boylan was named as a defendant because of his wife's interest. He testified that he was the agent of the owners to sell the place, that he sold it, and that all of them, including Alec, were satisfied with the price and terms.

There can be no question that the deed was executed for the purpose of carrying out the contract made by Boylan with Wilson. Although not finally delivered, it was evidence of a ratification and confirmation by those who signed it of the contract Boyland had made as their agent. Painter v. Fletcher, 81 Kan. 195, 105 Pac. 500. Two of the heirs who had thus ratified the contract to convey obtained the whole title by virtue of the partition sale, and it is clear that a court of equity has the power to compel them to perform their contract and to convey the title subsequently acquired. Nor is delivery of the deed essential in order to establish the oral contract. If the deed has been executed, it may, and often will, constitute a sufficient memorandum of the oral contract. The writing required by the statute is merely evidence ~~of the~~ ^{of an} contract, and is not the contract itself.

"The writing does not become the contract, but simply the evidence thereof; and whether it remains in the hands of the one party or the other, if it is properly identified as the full expression of the contract, upon which the minds of the two parties met, it fulfills the purpose of the statute and renders the contract agreed upon enforceable." Ames v. Ames, 46 Ind. App. 597, 604, 91 N. E. 509, 512.

In Schneider v. Anderson, 75 Kan. 11, 88 Pac. 525, 121 Am. St. Rep. 356, it was held that:

"A writing * * * and an undelivered deed, executed by the grantor at the same time and as part of the same transaction, which is deposited by the parties in escrow, constitute a sufficient memorandum of a contract for the sale of lands to satisfy the statute of frauds." Syl. par. 1.

In the opinion it was said:

"The courts are at variance upon the question whether a deed alone, when executed by the vendor and deposited in escrow, to be delivered by the depositary to the grantee upon his paying the purchase price or performing some other condition, is itself a sufficient memorandum to avoid the statute of frauds. The cases are cited in 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 855. A majority say that the deed alone is not a sufficient memorandum. But the better reasoning seems to be the other way. The ground usually stated for holding that the deed is not a sufficient memorandum is that, until it is finally delivered or the condition is performed, it does not constitute a contract. The reason given seems to be beside the question, which, in this character of cases, is not, Was there a written contract? but is, Is there a sufficient memorandum signed by the party which is evidence that a contract existed or which tends to prove that fact? The evil the statute seeks to guard against is the use of oral evidence to prove a contract. This is obviated by the production of the deed which is a memorandum of a contract. * * *

"By far the best reasoned case we have examined is Jenkins v. Harrison, 66 Ala. 345, followed in Johnston v. Jones, 85 Ala. 286, 4 South. 748. It is said in the former case: 'A deed, drawn and executed with the knowledge of both parties, with a view to the consummation of the contract of sale, which, in itself and of itself, embodies the substance, though not all the details or particulars, of the contract, naming the parties, expressing the consideration, and describing the lands, though not delivered, and its delivery postponed until the happening of a future event, is a note or memorandum of the contract sufficient to satisfy the words, the spirit, and purposes of the statute of frauds.' "

75 Kan. 16, 17, 88 Pac. 527 (121 Am. St. Rep. 356.)

See note to same case, 121 Am. St. Rep. 356, 362, and note 132 Am. St. Rep. 811, 813.

The defendants insist that the case of Schneider v. Anderson, supra, goes not further than to hold that a deed may be a sufficient memorandum, but they insist that the contract sought to be enforced must be the same as the one shown in the deed, and they say that the contract between Boyland and Wilson provided for the payment of $1,000 in cash and $10,500 on the 1st day of October, 1917, while the deed provided for payment of $11,500 in cash, and that there is a material variance between the contract and the deed. We think there was no variance. Both the contract and the deed contemplated a cash transaction. Obviously the parties understood that the entire consideration was to be paid upon delivery of the deed. Several things remained to be done, the execution of the deed by all the parties, the furnishing of an abstract and its approval. The $1,000 deposited with the contract and the $10,500 which was to be paid when the transaction was closed would constitute a cash payment of the entire consideration.

In Anderson v. Anderson, 75 Kan. 117, 88 Pac. 743, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 229, the written contract relied upon consisted of letters signed by the parties to be bound thereby which had been lost or destroyed, and secondary evidence of the contents was held sufficient to establish the written contract. In that case, however, the contract had been performed on the part of the plaintiff.

Since an undelivered deed may constitute a sufficient memorandum, it is of no importance which party has the instrument in its possession or where it comes from. If the memorandum or writing "signed by the party to be bound thereby" is not in the possession of either party, if it be found discarded and abandoned in some ash heap or floating about the streets, and is produced at the trial and shown to have been signed by the parties sought to be bound, and otherwise answers the requirements of the statute, it is sufficient.

In Ames v. Ames, supra, it was said in the opinion:

"Thus, where a verbal agreement was made for the sale of land, a letter written by the vendor or purchaser to his own solicitor or agent stating the terms of the agreement, and not intended for the inspection of the other party, has been held to be a sufficient note or memorandum within the intent of the statute." 46 Ind. App. 605, 91 N. E. 512.

The opinion cites the case of Barry v. Coombe, 1 Pet. 640, 651 (7 L. Ed. 295), where it was said:

"An examination of the cases on this subject will show that courts of equity are not particular with regard to the direct and immediate purpose for which the written evidence of a contract was created."

In Charlton v. Columbia Real Estate Co., 67 N. J. Eq. 629, 60 Atl. 192, 69 L. R. A. 394, 110 Am. St. Rep. 495, 3 Ann. Cas. 402, the court said:

"Nor does it signify to whom the memorandum is addressed. It may be to the third person, and yet be a good writing to satisfy the statute of frauds. Form is not important. * * * The reason for this is clear. The memorandum is only necessary to evidence the contract, not to constitute it." * * *

*The judgment is affirmed.*⁷⁶

⁷⁶ But see Freeland v. Charnley, 80 Ind. 132 (1881); Morrow v. Moore, 98 Me. 373 (1903).

On an undelivered deed or a memorandum, see 22 L. R. A. 273, note; 3 Ann. Cas. 404, note. On deed delivered in escrow as a memorandum, see 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 390, note.

While a deed may serve as a memorandum within the statute, deeds probably do not have to conform to the statute. The question is primarily one of signature.

"It seems that the statute of frauds does not apply to deeds. Signature is unnecessary for the validity of a deed at common law, and it is not likely that the legislature meant to require signature where the higher solemnity of sealing (as it is in a legal point of view) is already present. But as in practice deeds are always signed as well as sealed, and distinctive seals are hardly ever used except by corporations, the absence of a signature would nowadays add considerably to the difficulty of supporting a deed impeached on any other ground." Pollock on Contracts, 8 ed., pp. 171-172.

"I must own that I think a deed is not within the statute of frauds, because, in my opinion, that statute was never meant to apply to the most solemn instrument which the law recognizes." Parke, B., in Cherry v. Heming, 4 Exch. 631, 636 (1849).

"So obsessed did the courts become with the notion that a seal imports a consideration, that in a long line of decisions they held that the presence of a seal on a contract or 'memorandum' dispensed with the recital of a consideration as required by the statute of frauds. Douglass v. Howland, 24 Wend. 35; Bush v. Stevens, 24 Wend. 256; Smith v. Northrup, 80 Hun. 65, 70, aff'd 145 N. Y. 627; 20 Cyc. 264." Seals at Common Law and By Statute, 3 Bench and Bar (N. S.) 25-26.

SMITH & NYE v. MUNSEL ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1920. 110 Atl. 12.)

Bill for specific performance by Smith & Nye, as executors, against Wingate W. Munsel and others. Decree for the plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Decree altered and affirmed, and cause remanded.

MILES, J.⁷⁷ The defendant and Hannah (Smith) Skeels on the 28th day of August, 1899, were joined in marriage. Both were advanced in years, and each had been previously married. Neither had children at the time of the marriage, nor have they had any since. April 27, 1914, Mrs. Munsel died, leaving an estate slightly in excess of $15,000. Previous to her death she made her will, devising and bequeathing her real and personal property to her relatives without leaving anything to the defendant. The defendant filed in the probate court his waiver of the provisions of his wife's will. This bill is brought to enjoin the defendant from claiming any of his deceased wife's estate, and for specific performance of a verbal antenuptial contract, reduced to writing subsequent to the marriage, and a written postnuptial contract, containing substantially the same terms as are contained in the alleged antenuptial contract. Both of these written contracts were executed by the defendant and his wife November 16, 1901. * * *

The second exception taken by the defendant is founded upon the claim that the alleged verbal contract is within the statute of frauds, and not binding in law or equity, and that the bar was not removed by reducing the contract to writing after the marriage. * * *

The master has found upon substantial evidence that Munsel and his wife entered into a verbal antenuptial contract, as alleged in the plaintiffs' bill; that after the marriage that contract was reduced to writing in the form of ante-nuptial and post-nuptial contracts. In considering this exception it should be kept in mind that the lack of a writing does not render a contract in consideration of marriage in any way illegal or void under the statute. The statute only affects the matter of evidence by which such a contract may be proved. Child v. Pearl, 43 Vt. 224, 230. If, then, the evidence required by the statute can be supplied, the statute cannot be availed of by the defendant. The plaintiffs claim that it has been supplied by reducing the verbal ante-nuptial contract to writing before suit was brought. This claim seems to be supported by Ide & Smith v. Stanton, 15 Vt. 685, 40 Am. Dec. 698. While the facts in that case are somewhat dissimilar to those in this case, the principle there involved is similar to the one here involved. It is there held that the statute has never required that the written evidence should be created at the time of making the contract, and that a written admission of a previous verbal contract will satisfy the statute. To the same effect is the rule laid down in Brown on Frauds (2d Ed.) 222-224, inclu-

Dutens*, 1 Ves. Jr. 196, 2 Cox, 235; Mountacue v. Maxwell, 1 Strange, 235; 20 Cyc. 158 D.

As authorities holding otherwise, McAnnulty v. McAnnulty, 120 Ill. 26, 11 N. E. 397, 60 Am. Rep. 552, Powell v. Myers, 64 S. W. 428, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 795, and Frazer v. Andrews, 134 Iowa, 621, 112 N. W. 92, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 593, 13 Ann. Cas. 556, are cited. If we view these cases from the point taken by the several courts of review, and carefully consider the facts of each case and the precise issue raised and determined, much, if not all, of the apparent conflict disappears. Some of the cases have turned on the peculiar provisions of the statutes, like the cases from New York and Wisconsin, others have turned on the relations which creditors bore to the contract, and still others have turned on the character of the writing relied upon as avoiding the statute.

The main question discussed in the McAnnulty Case was whether a marriage contracted subsequent to the making of a will revoked the will. The question of whether a subsequent written contract, purporting to be an ante-nuptial contract, was sufficient as against the statute was discussed by the court more briefly and without reference to or citation of any of the long list of cases upon that subject, and this, perhaps, can be accounted for upon the assumption that the court was of the opinion that the execution of the alleged contract had not been made out. Indeed, it discusses the evidence upon that subject in a manner indicating that such was its views. As an authority upon that subject very little weight can be given to it.

In the Powell Case a settlement had been made in accordance with a verbal ante-nuptial contract, and after the death of the wife the husband sought to avoid the settlement. It was held that he could not do so, though the ante-nuptial contract was within the statute, for the contract had been fully performed and was no longer executory. What was said with reference to the verbal ante-nuptial contract being within the statute was merely incidental and unnecessary to the decision of the case.

Frazer v. Andrews turned on the character of the writing. The court in that case expressly approved the rule declared in Kohl v. Frederick, supra, but distinguish that case from the one then in hand, in that there is nothing in the writing itself that shows it was executed to give effect to the previous verbal ante-nuptial contract. The court considers the case as if no ante-nuptial contract had been made, and as if the written contract was a post-nuptial contract. The court holds, however, by fair inference, that, if the written contract had contained a provision or statement that it was executed to give effect to the verbal ante-nuptial contract, or in consideration of such contract, it would have taken that contract out of the statute.

Satterthwaite v. Emley, supra, is sometimes cited as authority that a verbal ante-nuptial contract is not taken out of the statute by being reduced to writing after marriage. But the holding in that case goes no farther than as it affects creditors; but, as to a party to the contract or those claiming under such party, the court held that a subsequent writing, made after the marriage, evidencing the verbal ante-nuptial contract, would save that contract from the operation of the statute.

Rowell v. Barber, supra, a strong and well-considered case, in which many of the authorities are collected, clearly points out the effect that slight variations in the wording of the different statutes have upon the decisions of the court. In that case it was held that, because of the statute of Wisconsin which made a verbal ante-nuptial contract void, subsequently reducing it to writing after the marriage did not take it out of the statute; for, being void, there was nothing to revive or to be taken out of the statute; that in this respect it differed from the English and many of the state statutes which did not render the verbal contract void, but provided the kind of evidence by which it must be proved, that the object of those statutes was not to prohibit such contracts, but was to require such evidence as would prevent fraud and perjury after the death of one or the other of the parties. Such has been the construction given to our statute. Child v. Pearl, supra.

The so-called written ante-nuptial contract in this case removed the statute that otherwise would have barred a recovery on the verbal ante-nuptial contract, and this renders it unnecessary to consider what effect, if any, the so-called post-nuptial contract had upon the verbal ante-nuptial contract. * * *

We think the decree below is too broad. * * *

LOUISVILLE ASPHALT VARNISH CO. v. LORICK ET AL.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina, 1888. 29 So. Car. 533, 8 S. E. 8, 2 L. R. A. 212.)

McIVER, J.⁷⁸ This was an action to recover the sum of $83.05, the price of certain varnish and paint alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to defendants. The defense was a general denial. At the trial the plaintiff offered testimony tending to show that on the 16th October, 1885, one of its traveling salesmen, Hutchinson by name, took from Moore, a clerk of defendants, who, it was admitted, had authority to give the order, a verbal order for the articles specified in the account sued on, which Hutchinson immediately entered in his memorandum book as follows:

"No. 65

COLUMBIA, S. C., Oct. 16, 1885.

"Louisville Asphalt Varnish Co., Louisville, Ky. Ship Lorick & Lowrance, Columbia, S. C.:

1. Bbl. No. 1 Turpt. Asphalt Black Varnish,	-	-	-	55c
1. " D. Roof Paint C.	-	-	-	50c
12. 5 gall. Pails D. Roof, do.	-	-	-	55c

"Cr. by 2c gal., on acct. freight.

"60 days.

H. L. Hutchinson, Salesman."

On the same day, a copy of this order was sent by mail, by said salesman, to the plaintiff, who received it on the 29th October, 1885, and on the next day shipped the goods, by rail, to defendants. On the 17th October, 1885, the defendants wrote to plaintiff as follows: "Louisville Asphalt Varnish Co., Louisville—Gents: Don't ship paint ordered through your salesman. We have concluded not to handle it." This letter, however, was not received by plaintiff until after the goods had been shipped; and upon its receipt plaintiff wrote defendants, saying "that the shipment had gone before the request to cancel was received." When the goods arrived in Columbia, the defendants declined to receive them, but what became of them the testimony does not show. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, defendants moved for a nonsuit, which was granted, upon the ground that section 2020, Gen. St., (Statute of Frauds,) was fatal to a recovery. Plaintiff appeals, upon the several grounds set out in the record which make these two questions: First, whether there was such a note or memorandum in writing of the bargain as would satisfy the requirements of section 2020 of the General Statutes; second, if not, whether there was such an acceptance and actual receipt of the goods as would take the case out of the operation of that section.

It is quite certain that there was no formal agreement in writing, signed by the parties to be charged, for the sale of the goods in question, and we think it equally certain that there was no single instrument or memorandum in writing sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute; for the letter of the defendants, copied above, did not specify the necessary particulars as to quantity, nature, and price of the goods which were the subjects of the alleged contract of sale, and the copy of the order sent by the salesman to the plaintiff, which did contain all the necessary particulars, was not signed by the defendants. It is plain, therefore, that neither one of these papers, standing alone, would be sufficient. But as it is well settled that the whole agreement need not appear in a single writing, but may be made out from several instruments or written memoranda referring one to the other, and which, when connected together, are found to contain all the necessary elements, the precise, practical question in this case is whether the letter of defendants can be connected with the written order sent by the salesman, so that the two together may constitute a sufficient note or memorandum in writing to satisfy the requirements of the statute.

In Saunderson v. Jackson, 2 Bos. & P. 238, the action was for not delivering certain articles alleged to have been sold by defendant to plaintiff, and the question was whether there was a sufficient note or memorandum in writing of the bargain, under the statute of frauds. It seems that when the plaintiff gave the verbal order for the goods, he was furnished by the defendant with a bill of parcels, not signed, but written on a piece of paper, with a printed heading containing the name and place of business of defendant. Shortly after this, defendant wrote a letter to plaintiff, saying: "We wish to know what time we shall send you a part of your order," etc. The court held that the requirements of the statute were complied with, saying: "This bill of parcels, though not the contract itself, may amount to a note or memorandum of the contract, within the meaning of the statute. * * * At all events, connecting this bill of parcels with the subsequent letter of the defendants, I think the case is clearly taken out of the statute of frauds; for, although it be admitted that the letter, which does not state the terms of the agreement, would not alone have been sufficient, yet, as the jury have connected it with something which does, and the letter is signed by the defendants, there is then a written note or memorandum of the order which was originally given by the plaintiff, signed by the defendants." This case has been expressly recognized and followed in this state, in Toomer v. Dawson, Cheves, 68. The same doctrine was applied in Western v. Russell, 3 Ves. & B. 188. See, also, to the same effect, Drury v. Young, 58 Md. 546, 42 Amer. Rep. 343, where, as in the case now under consideration, the letter of defendant was written for the purpose of withdrawing from the contract; but as it referred to the previous order, the two, taken together, were held to satisfy the terms of the statute. * * *

In Beckwith v. Talbot, 95 U. S. 289, it was held that, while the general rule is "that collateral papers adduced to supply the defect of signature of a written agreement, under the statute of frauds, should on their face sufficiently demonstrate their reference to such agreement, without the aid of parol proof," yet such rule is not absolute, as "there may be cases in which it would be a violation of reason and common sense to ignore a reference which derives its significance from such proof." Accordingly, it was held in that case that "the defendant, unless he could show the existence of some other agreement, was estopped from denying that the agreement referred to by him in his letters was that which he induced the plaintiff to sign." Even in the case of Johnson v. Buck, 35 N. J. Law 338, which seems to be much relied on by the counsel for respondents, it is conceded that parol evidence may be received "to identify papers which, by a reference in the signed memorandum, are made parts of it." While it is true that some of the cases which we have cited arose under the fourth section of the statute of frauds, and not under the seventeenth section, which controls the present case, yet it is admitted by Kent, C. J., in Bailey v. Ogdens, 3 Johns. 412, that the words of the two sections are in this respect similar, and require the same construction, and it was so held in Townsend v. Hargraves, 118 Mass. 325.

It seems to us, therefore, that the letter of defendants, taken, as it must be, in connection with the order sent to plaintiff by the salesman, to which it expressly referred, and which was in writing, and specified all the necessary particulars as to price, quantity, quality, and time of payment, constituted a sufficient note or memorandum in writing of the bargain to take the case out of the statute of frauds. In the absence of any evidence that any other order was given, the language of the letter—"Don't ship paint ordered through your salesman"—must necessarily be regarded as referring to the order of which a memorandum in writing was taken at the time by the salesman, and a copy thereof immediately forwarded to the plaintiff, who at once filled the order, and shipped the goods to the defendants. This is a stronger case than that of Beckwith v. Talbot, supra, for there the letter of the defendant simply referred to "the agreement," without indicating when or how it had been made, while here the letter refers to a particular article "ordered through your salesman," and we hear of no other order through the salesman or in any other way. The only necessity for any parol evidence at all, if, indeed, there was any, was to identify the order sent by the salesman, and for this purpose, as we have seen, such evidence would be competent. Suppose the plaintiff had, on the 16th October, 1885, written a letter to defendants, proposing to sell them the articles mentioned in the salesman's order, in the quantities there stated, and at the prices and on the time there mentioned, and that defendants had replied by letter, simply saying, "I accept your offer," without repeating the particulars as to quantity, price, etc., it could not be doubted that, although defendants' letter—the only paper which they signed—did not contain in itself the necessary particulars of the bargain, yet the two letters, taken together, would be held a sufficient compliance with the statute. It seems to us that the transaction here in question was in principle practically the same as that in the supposed case, and we think there was error in holding that the contract sued on was void under the statute of frauds.

We do not see how it is possible to regard the letter of the defendants as a denial of the order given to the salesman by their clerk, Moore, who, it was conceded, had authority to give the order. * * * The manifest purpose of that letter was to countermand the order, and this necessarily presupposed that the order had been given. The terms used clearly show this: "Don't ship the paint ordered through your salesman. We have concluded not to handle it." This clearly means that the paint had been ordered, but that the defendants had subsequently changed their minds and "concluded not to handle it;" and we don't see how it can be construed to mean anything else. We have then an admission in writing that an order for the goods in question through the salesman had been given, and we have the order referred to, likewise in writing, and the two together fully satisfy the requirements of the statute. Under the view which we have taken of the first question raised by this appeal, the second question becomes immaterial, and need not, therefore, be considered. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.⁷⁹

⁷⁹ See Smith v. Colby, 136 Mass. 562 (1884), where the words "upon the terms agreed upon when at your place" in a signed paper let in the memorandum of those terms not signed by the defendant. But then, in Freeland v. Ritz, 154 Mass. 257 (1891), where the defendants agreed in writing to accept a lease "to be made subject in all respects to the agreement and lease between" the plaintiffs and their lessor, which latter lease was not then in existence but came into existence, it was held that the statute of frauds was satisfied. Lathrop, J., for the court, said:

"It is a well-settled rule of law that, while the memorandum must express the essential elements of the contract with reasonable certainty, these may be gathered either from the terms of the memorandum itself or from some other paper or papers therein referred to. If one of a series of papers which appear to have relation to the same contract is signed by the party to be charged, this is enough, as all the papers are to be considered together as forming one contract or memorandum. There is no doubt, also, that parol evidence is admissible to identify any paper referred to. * * *

"The defendants, however, contend that these principles apply only to papers already in existence when the instrument signed by the party sought to be charged is executed. * * * The last point decided in [Brown v. Bellowa, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 179] * * * is a direct authority for the proposition that it is no objection to a written contract that some of the terms are to be fixed by something to be done in the future, if that something is done before action is brought; and that if it is in writing the provisions of the statute of frauds are complied with. We are therefore of opinion that the statute of frauds is no defense to this action."

In Freeland v. Ritz the court cited Lerned v. Wannemacher, 9 Allen (Mass.) 412 (1864), where duplicate writings were delivered, each party signing one. The one signed by the defendants did not contain the names of the plaintiffs, as, apart from the plaintiffs' signatures, was true of the one signed by the plaintiffs. Later the agent of the defendants wrote some words on the memorandum delivered to the defendants and the plaintiffs signed the addition and redelivered the memorandum. Although neither memorandum referred to the other, the court said that "the intrinsic evidence which they afford that they refer to the same transaction is very strong and competent for the consideration of the jury" and that if the jury so found they could be read together to make the memorandum required by the statute.

On several writings as a memorandum within the statute of frauds, see 2 Ann. Cas. 293, note; 19 Ann. Cas. 1162, note; Ann. Cas. 1914 C, 1010, note. On telegrams as a memorandum, see 50 L. R. A. 240, note.

SIMPSON, C. J., (dissenting). * * * Was there evidence of a note or memorandum in writing, signed by the defendants or their agent thereunto lawfully authorized, sufficient to carry the case to the jury? There is no pretense that the order sent by plaintiff's salesman was signed by the defendants or their agent. On the contrary, the order was prepared and sent by the plaintiff's agent, and no doubt was sufficient to bind the plaintiff if it was the party sought to be charged, although the defendants might not be bound. It is not necessary that both parties should sign the contract. It is sufficient that the defendant, whether he be vendor or vendee, has signed the contract, and it is no objection that he has no remedy thereon against the plaintiff, inasmuch as the latter has not signed it. Chitty Cont. (11 edit.), 568. It may be urged, however, that it is not necessary that the whole of the terms of the contract should be confined in one memorandum, it being sufficient if they can be collected from several distinct writings having reference to the same subject-matter. This is true, and it has been held that if, after the transaction has taken place, it be recognized in a letter written by the party to be charged, which refers to the specific contract, and not merely to the subject-matter, this will satisfy the statute. Id. 546. Under this principle, plaintiff contends that defendants' letter, in which they wrote: "Don't ship paint ordered through your salesman. We have concluded not to handle it,"—was sufficient to carry the case to the jury, on the question whether a note or memorandum in writing of the contract sufficient to comply with the statute has been executed by the defendants. The rule upon this subject, as will be seen from its discussion by Mr. Chitty, (11th Ed.) 544 et seq., and the cases there cited in notes, seems to be this: The letter relied on must in itself contain the terms of the contract, quantity, quality, and price of the goods, etc., or it must refer to some other paper containing them in such way as by its own terms to connect itself with said paper. Now the letter here might possibly be construed as an admission by the defendants that they had ordered certain paints from the plaintiff, and that since said order they had concluded not to take said goods. But there is nothing in this letter which points distinctly to the contract sued on. It could as well apply to any other contract as this, and therefore a most important link is wanting, which could be supplied only by verbal testimony. If the case had gone to the jury, there was no testimony by which the memorandum made by plaintiff's salesman could have been connected with defendants' letter. It was said in Waterman v. Meigs, 4 Cush. 497, "that a letter from the purchaser to the vendor, alluding to a parol agreement for the sale of goods, and inquiring whether they will be ready at the time agreed upon, but not mentioning the quantity, quality, or price of the goods, or the time of payment, is not a sufficient memorandum to take the agreement out of the statute of frauds." See, also, Manufacturing Co. v. Goddard, 14 How. 446; Bailey v. Ogden, 3 Johns. 399. We think there was an absence of all testimony connecting defendants' letter distinctly and clearly with the memorandum made by plaintiff's agent, and sent by him as an order for the goods, so that the two could constitute one memorandum in writing, signed by the defendants; and, the letter itself failing to embody the contract as to the quantity, quality, and price of the goods, the nonsuit was inevitable. Thus far it has been admitted that the letter of defendants, impliedly, at least, acknowledged an order for paints, but there is great doubt whether such is a proper construction of said letter. It may well be construed as a denial of the order. This view strengthens the conclusion we have reached.

Judgment reversed.

ALBERT H. HAYES v. CHARLES E. JACKSON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1893. 159 Mass. 451, 34 N. E. 693.)

HOLMES, J. This is an action upon a contract for the sale of land. The judge has found for the plaintiff, and the only question is whether the memorandum was sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Pub. Sts. c. 78, sec. 1, cl. 4. The memorandum was as follows:

"Boston, April 6, 1889.

"Received of Albert H. Hayes one hundred dollars on account of sale of estate number 379 Columbus Avenue, for the sum of $14,140, subject to a mortgage of 8,000 dollars on 4½ per cent interest, and I agree to pay the 140 dollars as commission to James C. Tucker. Rents and insurance and interest to be adjusted to date. Title to be passed within ten days from date.

"C. E. Jackson."

On the face of it this discloses no defect. But as the defendant and the plaintiff agreed in their testimony that the assumption of the mortgage of $8,000 was part of the consideration, and went to make up the sum of $14,140 mentioned, we assume that the judge found accordingly, and that it is open to the defendant to argue that the memorandum does not agree with the fact, but sets forth an agreement which was never made to pay $14,140 for the equity of redemption. Whether this argument is sound or not we do not consider, because it seems to be disposed of by sec. 2 of our statute, that the consideration of such promise, contract, or agreement need not be set forth or expressed in the writing signed by the party to be charged therewith. This section was inserted in the Rev. Sts. c. 74, sec. 2, for the purpose of adopting and confirming the judgment of this court in Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 122, declining to follow Wain v. Warlters, 5 East, 10.⁸⁰ That ⁸⁰ In Wain v. Warlters it was held that a memorandum which did not state the consideration of a guaranty, although that consideration was fully executed, was insufficient, and the guaranty, being of the debt of another, could not be case concerned a promise to pay the debt of another, a subject on which there has been much controversy in this country (Browne on St. Frauds, secs. 390 et seq.), and went on the broad ground that it was not necessary to state the consideration. Marcey v. Marcey, 9 Allen, 8, 10; Wetherbee v. Potter, 99 Mass. 354, 362. The rule laid down in Wain v. Warlters was altered by statute in England, St. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, § 3,⁸¹ "because it was found, in practice, that it led to many unjust and merely technical defences to actions upon guarantees." 2 Smith Lead. Cas. (8th ed.) 262, 263, note to Wain v. Warlters. The second section of our statute goes further, and applies to all the contracts mentioned in sec. 1, no doubt for similar reasons among others. The defendant is sufficiently protected if all that he is to do is required to be in writing.

Of course it may be said that, in a bilateral contract like the present, the contemporaneous payment of the price is a condition of the promise, and therefore that the promise cannot be set forth truly unless the consideration is stated. But the language of the section is general, and should be read as no doubt it was meant. The only effect is that a promise set forth as absolute may be subject to an implied condition of performance on the other side. When such an implied condition exists it will be construed into the writing, and knowledge of the law gives notice of its possible existence. In some cases it has been held unnecessary to state the consideration, even when there is no provision like our sec. 2, although the consideration was executory. Thornburg v. Masten, 88 N. C. 293; Miller v. Irvine, 1. Dev. & Bat. 103; Ellis v. Bray, 79 Mo. 227; Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch, 142; Camp v. Moreman, 84 Ky. 635. In Howe v. Walker, 4 Gray, 318, Thomas, J., plainly indicated the opinion that sec. 2 of the statute applies in all cases, pointing out that this does not mean that when the parties are reversed the oral agreement will be sufficient to sustain an action.

The only case at all opposed to our conclusion, so far as we know, is Grace v. Denison, 114 Mass. 16. That was a bill for specific performance; not of the original agreement, but of the written document set forth, which document showed that a mortgage was to be given by the purchaser, but did not state what part of the purchase money was to remain secured in that way. Specific performance was refused, and in the judgment a brief reference was made to the statute of frauds, citing Browne on St. Frauds, secs. 376, 381; Fry on Spec. Perf. secs. 221, 222, and note 7. These sections state in general terms that the memorandum must contain the price, and do not apply in this state, so that the inference is that sec. 2 of our statute was overlooked by the court.

enforced because of the statute of frauds. Most American courts refused to follow the case, just as Massachusetts refused.

⁸¹ This is known as the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. In this country local statutes should be consulted. They vary from statutes requiring consideration to be stated to those saying it need not be stated in the case of guarantees or need not be stated at all.

It was not mentioned in the briefs of counsel, or in the judgment. The decision cannot overrule the statute, and is no authority for a distinction under it. So far as it went on the doctrines of specific performance only, as would seem from the reference to Fry on Spec. Perf. sec. 222, note 7, stating Baker v. Glass, 6 Munf. 212, and to Boston & Maine Railroad v. Babcock, 3 Cush. 228, 232, and from the fact that Mr. Justice Wells, who delivered the opinion of the court in Grace v. Denison, also wrote the decision in Wetherbee v. Potter, 99 Mass. 254, 362, it has no bearing on the case at bar.

Exceptions overruled.

FIELD, C. J.⁸² I do not assent to the opinion of the court. * * * The real difficulty in the case is, that the writing is ambiguous in regard to the price, and one question in the case might have been whether oral evidence was competent to remove the ambiguity, but no such question appears to have been raised. The evidence of the usage of real estate brokers with respect to the amount of their commissions, if competent, had some tendency to show that the writing should be construed as both the plaintiff and the defendant testified the contract really was. The opinion of the court proceeds solely on the ground that under our statute of frauds the contract of sale or a memorandum of the sale of land signed by the vendor, need not contain the price, or any of the other terms of the sale; that it is enough if the writing shows that the defendant has agreed to sell certain designated land to the plaintiff on some terms unexpressed, or if it contains an acknowledgment that such an agreement has been made. The reasons given for this opinion are, that by our statute, Pub. Sts. c. 78, sec. 2, "The consideration of such promise, contract, or agreement need not be set forth or expressed in the writing signed by the party to be charged therewith, but may be proved by any legal evidence." This provision was introduced in the Revised Statutes in consequence of the decision in Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 122; Rev. Sts. c. 74, sec. 2. In the report of the commissioners appointed to make the revision, they say: "This section is new in terms, and is proposed for the purpose of adopting and confirming the judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court upon the construction of the statute now in force. 17 Mass. Rep. 122." The decision in Packard v. Richardson was upon a written promise on the back of a promissory note signed by the defendants, as follows: "We acknowledge ourselves holden as surety for the payment of the within note." In the opinion it is said: "The consideration existing was, that these defendants were members of the company which made the note; and that a suit, which had been commenced, was stopped by the plaintiff, at their request. But this consideration was proved by parol, and the writing acknowledges no consideration whatever." 17 Mass. 128. The court declined to follow the decision in Wain v. Warlters, 5 East, 10

⁸² Parts of this dissenting opinion are omitted.

See Saunders v. Wakefield, 4 B. & Ald. 595. All these cases arose upon contracts of guaranty or contracts to pay the debt of another, and the consideration of the promise was executed. When these cases were decided it was not questioned that the memorandum of a contract of sale must contain the terms of the contract, and that one term of every contract of sale is the price.

Many of the United States have passed statutes on this subject similar to ours, viz.: Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, Nebraska, New Jersey, Virginia, and West Virginia. See Wood on St. Frauds, sec. 105, Appendix, 892-922. As it may be suggested that decisions in England and in states where no similar statutes exist are not applicable, I shall confine my citations chiefly, if not wholly, to our own decisions, and to the decisions of the courts of those states whose statute on this subject is similar to ours. It is substantially conceded that Grace v. Denison, 114 Mass. 16, is directly opposed to the opinion of the court in the present case, but it is said that the second section of our statute of frauds was overlooked by the court. It was a bill in equity against a vendor, for the specific performance of an agreement to convey land. The case arose on a demurrer for the cause "that such contract as the plaintiff alleges to be in writing and signed by the defendant is not sufficient to enable a court of equity to decree specific performance thereof." The only ground on which the demurrer was sustained was, that the memorandum of the agreement was not sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds. The court say: "The memorandum of agreement indicates that a part of the purchase money was agreed to be secured by mortgage of the premises to be conveyed. But it does not disclose nor furnish any means for the court to ascertain what part or amount is to remain upon mortgage, and what paid in cash upon delivery of the deed. * * * The writing being incomplete in one of its essential terms, and the court having no means to which it can lawfully resort to supply the defect, specific performance must fail." * * *

While some of the cases cited above are suits against the vendee and some suits against the vendor, it seems to me that this court has always held, in both classes of cases, that, in a contract to convey land or other property executory on both sides, the contract or memorandum, although it need be signed only by the party to be charged, must contain all the essential terms of the contract or bargain, and that the price agreed to be paid is an essential term. To say that the court in the decision of Grace v. Denison overlooked a well-known provision of our statute of frauds concerning consideration is, I think, unwarranted. * * *

When the whole contract or promise of the defendant is to do a certain thing, and this is an absolute promise, resting upon a consideration which has been executed, there is some reason in saying that the memorandum signed by the defendant need not contain the consideration or inducement of the contract or promise. But in a contract exe-entury on both sides, where the promises are mutual, and each is the consideration of the other, the promises are conditional, and one party agrees to perform his part of the contract only on condition that the other will perform his part, and it cannot be known what the promise of the one is without knowing the express or implied promise of the other. A promise to convey land because the promisee has actually received $1,000 is not the same as a promise to convey land if the promisor will pay $1,000 on receiving the conveyance, and a promise to convey land for $1,000 to be paid on the delivery of the deed is not the same as a promise to convey land for $10,000 to be paid on the delivery of the deed. The conditions on which the vendor agrees to convey are often many and complicated, and involve the assumption of mortgages and the performance of other acts. If a mere acknowledgment in writing by the vendor that he has agreed to convey specific land to the vendee on terms which are not expressed is sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, then it is open to the vendee to prove by oral testimony the price to be paid, and all other terms of the contract to be performed by him, and the statute will no longer prevent frauds and perjuries. If it is a condition of the promise of the vendor that it is not to be performed unless at the time of the performance the vendee pays money and gives or assumes mortgages, the condition qualifies the promise and is a part of it, and the writing should contain all that is essential to show what the promise or contract on the part of the vendor in fact was. The decision of the court seems to me in great part to nullify the statute. I have not considered whether the judgment of the court may not be sustained on some other ground than that stated in the opinion.

Mr. Justice Knowlton concurs in this opinion.⁸³

BIRD v. BLOSSE.

(Court of Chancery, 1683. 2 Ventris, 361.)

The case was thus: One wrote a letter, signifying his assent to the marriage of his daughter with J. S. and that he would give her 1500*l*.

⁸³ In agreement with the dissenting opinion, see Reid v. Diamond Plate Glass Co., 85 Fed. 193 (1898); Williams v. Robinson, 73 Me. 186 (1882).

In Drake v. Seaman, 97 N. Y. 230 (1884), where a statute requiring consideration to be stated had been repealed, Finch, J., for the court said:

"And if we conceded that the consideration might be wholly omitted from the memorandum, it would still be requisite that all the essential and material elements of defendants' own agreement [to pay plaintiff so much for his services as salesman] should be stated, and they are not stated where the very condition upon which they were to pay at all is omitted, and the subject matter of their agreement is absent."

On the necessity and sufficiency of a statement of consideration in a contract

And afterwards by another letter, upon a further treaty concerning the marriage, he went back from the proposals of his letter. And at some time after declared, that he would agree to what was proposed in his first letter.

This letter was held a sufficient promise in writing, within the Statute of 29 Car. 2, called the Statute against Frauds and Perjuries, and that the last declaration had set the terms in the first letter up again.⁸⁶

WEISENBERGER ET AL. v. HUEBNER ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1919. 264 Pa. 316, 107 Atl. 763.)

SIMPSON, J.⁸⁶ Plaintiffs filed a bill in equity, praying specific performance of an agreement for the sale of real estate, Gottlieb Huebner, one of the defendants, filed an answer, a decree pro confesso was entered against the other two defendants, evidence was taken, the court decreed a dismissal of the bill because the entire contract was not in writing as required by our statute of frauds of March 21, 1772 (1 Smith's Laws, p. 389), and plaintiffs appeal. * * *

On January 31, 1914, Samuel Weisenberger, one of plaintiffs, paid to Huebner the sum of $2,000, one-fourth of which was contributed by each of plaintiffs, and received a paper, of which the following is a copy:

"Harry A. Cyphers, Attorney at Law,
"Cor. Fourth Street and Brodhead Ave.,

"South Bethlehem, Pa., Jan. 31, 1914.

"Received from Sam. Weisenberger by hand of H. A. Cyphers, Esq., Two Thousand Dollars down money on acct. of purchase price for property at 3 & Spruce. Total price $18,500. Balance to be paid on or before April 1st, 1914, $18,500 less $2,000—$16,500.

"Gottlieb Huebner.

"I hereby approve of the within sale.

"Yours,

H. A. Cyphers."

within the statute of frauds, see 60 Am. St. Rep. 433, note; 3 Ann. Cas. 656, note; Ann. Cas. 1912 A, 1242, note; Ann. Cas. 1918 A, 134, note.

⁸⁶ "That report [Ventris's] does not show the formation or date of the contract sued upon. It must be taken, however, that the defendant's letter 'signifying his assent to the marriage of his daughter' was not an acceptance of terms, but only an offer or an incident in a continuing negotiation: for no court could have held even in the worst period of the Restoration, that an assent which concluded a contract could be revoked afterwards at will. Assuming this, the point decided was that after a revocation of this letter, cancelled in turn by a declaration (it seems not in writing) of adherence to the original proposal, the first letter was a sufficient memorandum of the terms therein expressed to satisfy the statute of frauds. This case is of some interest because the statute was then (35 Car. II A. D. 1683) only six years old." F. P. [Sir Frederick Pollock], 30 Law Quar. Rev., 5.

⁸⁶ Parts of the opinion are omitted.

The part of the paper above the date is Cyphers' ordinary printed letter head, and even if a court would be justified in assuming therefrom the property referred to was in South Bethlehem, and that "3 & Spruce" meant Third and Spruce streets in that city, the statute of frauds would still apply, for the receipt does not specify the size of the property, or whether it is at the corner of "3 & Spruce," and, if it is, at which corner. * * *

A different question would arise if the property referred to had a well-known name, as, for instance, the "Fleming Farm on French Creek," Ross v. Baker, 72 Pa. 186; or the "Hotel Duquesne Property," Henry v. Black, 210 Pa. 245, 59 Atl. 1070, 105 Am. St. Rep. 802; but there is nothing in the receipt to bring it within that class of cases. On the contrary, it is within the class of Mellon v. Davison, 123 Pa. 298, 16 Atl. 431, where the description was "a lot of ground fronting about 190 feet on the P. R. R., in the 21st Ward, Pittsburgh, Pa.," and Safe Deposit & Trust Co. v. Diamond Coal and Coke Co., 234 Pa. 100, 83 Atl. 54 L. R. A. 1917 A, 596, where it is held an agreement reformed by parol, so as to comport with the one actually made, even if it then specifies every essential fact required by the statute of frauds, cannot be the basis of a bill for specific performance, because, as reformed, it is only a parol agreement.⁸⁶ * * *

The decree of the court below is affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, at the cost of appellant.

PATRICK DOHERTY v. SARAH A. HILL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1887. 144 Mass. 465, 11 N. E. 581.)

Contract for breach of an agreement to convey to the plaintiff certain real estate in Stoneham. Answer, the statute of frauds.

J. H. Green, who claimed to act as agent for the defendant, and who executed the contract declared on, testified, for the plaintiff, that the estate referred to in said contract was placed in his hands by the defendant in May, 1884, at which time the defendant instructed him to sell it for the sum of $1,300; that on May 28, 1885, in reply to a telegram from him inquiring at what price she would sell, the defendant sent him the following telegram, signed by her: "Eleven hundred and fifty cash, if possible try for more;" that on May 30, 1885, the defendant wrote the witness a letter, which contained the following: "As I telegraphed you, I will sell the house in Lincolnville for $1,150; will pay last year's taxes and throw in insurance, which lasts until 1887. * * * I will make terms easy for the party purchasing it, say three or four hundred down and the other payments satisfactorily secured by mortgage;" and that, on June 1, 1885, and after receiving this letter, the witness received from the plaintiff $100 in cash, and executed and gave to the plaintiff the following paper, being the same declared on: "$100. Stoneham, June 1st, 1885. Rec'd of Patrick Doherty one hundred dollars to bind sale of estate on Congress Street owned by Sarah A. Hill. $350 cash. $850 in mortgage at 6 per cent. J. Horace Green, agent for Sarah A. Hill."

The witness further testified, that he had never paid back to the plaintiff the $100 received; and that he told the plaintiff he would pay interest on it, and that the plaintiff could have the money whenever he called for it. The plaintiff offered the contract of sale in evidence, to which the defendant objected; but the judge admitted it.

There was also evidence tending to show that the defendant, by her agent, one Kimball, sold said estate, on June 11, 1885, to one Almy, and delivered to Almy a deed thereof.

The defendant testified, and upon this point her testimony was not controverted, that in addition to the estate claimed to have been sold to the plaintiff, and which consisted of a lot of land with a dwelling-house on it, she owned, on June 1, 1885, several lots containing two or three acres in all, and all in one parcel, or other land on said Congress Street, upon the other side of the street and nearly opposite to the land in question; and that this parcel of land had no buildings upon it.

The plaintiff offered to show that the estate named in the agreement was the lot with the dwelling-house on it. The defendant requested the judge to rule that it could not be shown by extrinsic evidence to which of the defendant's estates on Congress Street the written memorandum referred; but the judge declined so to rule.

The plaintiff offered in evidence a draft of a deed from the defendant to him of the estate which the plaintiff claimed to have purchased, which draft was made by Green and sent by him to the defendant to be executed, and which the defendant refused to execute. To the admission of this draft in evidence the defendant objected; but the judge admitted it.

The defendant, for the purpose of showing the value of the estate as affecting the question of damages, offered to prove that said estate had been, since December, 1885, in the hands of a real estate agent in Stoneham, with authority to sell it for $1,200, but no purchaser had been found. The judge excluded the evidence offered.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $200; and the defendant alleged exceptions.

HOLMES, J. The memorandum would have satisfied the statute of frauds, if the evidence had shown that there was only one "estate on Congress Street owned by Sarah A. Hill," in Stoneham, where the memorandum is dated. Hurley v. Brown, 98 Mass. 545; Scanlan v.

Geddes, 112 Mass. 15; Mead v. Parker, 115 Mass. 413. But the evidence shows that there were more than one. The plaintiff argues that this is an ambiguity introduced by parol, and that therefore it may be removed by parol. 98 Mass. 548. But the statement seems to us misleading. The words show on their face that they may be applicable to one estate only, or to more than one. If, on the existing facts, they apply only to one, then the document identifies the land; if not, it fails to do so. In every case, the words used must be translated into things and facts by parol evidence. But if, when so translated, they do not "identify the estate intended, as the only one which would satisfy the description," they do not satisfy the statute. See Slater v. Smith, 117 Mass. 96, 98; Potter v. Duffield, L. R. 18 Eq. 4, 7.

The letter from the defendant to her agent did identify the estate, we will assume, as the only one owned by her which had a house upon it. But, of course, this letter was not of itself a sufficient memorandum. It has been held that an offer in writing, afterwards accepted orally, satisfies the statute. Sanborn v. Flagler, 9 Allen, 474, Browne, St. of Frauds (4th Ed.) § 345 a.⁸⁷ But this letter was only an authority to offer. It does not appear to have been exhibited to the plaintiff, as in Hastings v. Weber, 142 Mass. 232, and plainly was not intended to be. We express no opinion whether it would have been sufficient, if it had been shown and its terms had been accepted.

Again, the letter cannot be used to help out the memorandum, on the ground that the latter impliedly incorporates it. The memorandum, it is true, purports to be signed by an agent, and therefore may be said to refer by implication to some previous authority. But this implied reference is at most rather an implied assertion that authority exists (which may be oral), than a reference to documents containing the authority. Jefts v. York, 10 Cush. 392, 395. Boston & Albany Railroad v. Richardson, 135 Mass. 473, 475. It would hardly be argued as a defence to an action of deceit, against a person who had assumed to act as agent without authority, that the memorandum signed by him impliedly referred to and incorporated the written communications from his alleged principal, and that therefore the plaintiff must be taken to have known them, and that they did not confer the authority assumed. In this case, the agent had authority by telegram before he received the letter; the argument, therefore, would have to go the length of saying that all documents of authority were tacitly incorporated.

⁸⁷ "The authorities are almost unanimous in holding that an oral acceptance of a written option to sell land is valid. See 25 R. C. L. 674, and long list of cases there cited. The case of Wardell v. Williams, 62 Mich. 50, 28 N. W. 796, 4 Am. St. Rep. 814, is cited to us as holding a contrary doctrine. An examination of the case will show that the court in that case held the written memorandum incomplete, and that the precise question here presented was reserved." Vinje, J., in Russell v. Ives, (Wis.) 178 N. W. 300, 301 (1920).

On the necessity of a written acceptance of a written offer to constitute a sufficient memorandum under the statute, see Ann. Cas. 1913 A, 1041, note.

In Hurley v. Brown, ubi supra, it was held that a memorandum of an agreement to sell "a" house on a certain street should be presumed to mean a house belonging at the time to the contractor. It may be asked whether there is not at least as strong a presumption that a memorandum signed by an agent refers to property which he is authorized to sell. But unless the document of authority is specifically incorporated, then the memorandum is only of a sale of a house which the agent is authorized in some way to sell, and, so far as the memorandum goes, his authority may as well be oral as written. The difference may be one of degree, but the distinction is none the less plain between an identification by extrinsic proof of the usually manifest, external, and continuing fact that the party owned but one house on a certain street, and that by similar proof of possibly oral communications between principal and agent, which is precisely the kind of identification the statute seeks to avoid. See Whelan v. Sullivan, 102 Mass. 204, 206; Rossiter v. Miller, 3 App. Cas. 1124, 1141; Potter v. Duffield, ubi supra; Jarrett v. Hunter, 34 Ch. D. 182.

The same considerations would apply to an attempt to help out the memorandum by evidence that the estate intended was the only one which the plaintiff knew of as belonging to the defendant.

The remaining exceptions become immaterial. The draft of a deed of the premises was admissible, in connection with proof that it was offered to the defendant for execution, to show a breach, but not to aid the memorandum. The deed was not referred to by the previously executed memorandum, nor were its contents governed by the signature of the latter.

Evidence that a real estate agent had not sold the land for $1,200 was not evidence of its value.

*Exceptions sustained.*⁸⁸

⁸⁸ But in Norton v. Smith (N. C.), 103 S. E. 14 (1920), in holding that a memorandum which recited that "Whereas, J. A. Smith has sold to W. H. Norton his entire tract or boundary of land consisting of 146 acres" was "the same as if J. A. Smith had described it as 'his 146-acre tract of land'" and was a sufficient description, it appearing that J. A. Smith owned only one tract and that it contained 146 acres, Walker, J., for the court, said:

"Carson v. Ray, 52 N. C. 609, 78 Am. Dec. 267 is exactly in point. There the description was 'my house and lot in the town of Jefferson,' and it was held that it would 'undoubtedly' be sufficient, if in a will, to pass the testator's house and lot, in the absence of any proof to show that he had more than one. If, then, such a description would be sufficiently certain in a will, we cannot perceive any reason why it should not be so in a deed, as, in both instruments, the only requisite, as to the certainty of the thing described, is that there shall be no patent ambiguity in the description by which it is designated. A house and lot, or one house and lot in a particular town, would not do, because too indefinite on the face of the instrument itself. See Plummer v. Owens, 45 N. C. 254; Murdock v. Anderson, 57 N. C. 77. But 'my house and lot' im-

Witness Action.

On November 21, 1918, the plaintiff paid the defendant 10*l.* and received the following receipt:—

ports a particular house and lot, rendered certain by the description that it is one which belongs to me, and, upon the face of the instrument, is quite as definite as if it had been described as the house and lot in which I now live, which is undoubtedly good.

"Where the deed or will does not itself show that the grantor or deviser had more than one house and lot, it will not be presumed that he had more than one, so that there is no patent ambiguity, and if it be shown that he has more than one, it must be by extrinsic proof, and the case will then be one of a latent ambiguity, which may be explained by similar proof. * * *

"Every valid contract must contain a description of the subject-matter; but it is not necessary it should be so described as to admit of no doubt what it is, for the identity of the actual thing and the thing described may be shown by extrinsic evidence. Fry on Specific Performance, § 209; Pomeroy on Contracts, § 90, and note; Buckhorne L. & T. Co. v. Yarbrough, 102 S. E. 630, at this term."

In Mitchell v. Morgan (So. Dak.), 181 N. W. 958 (1921), "my farm at Esteline," the vendor owning only one, was held a sufficient description to satisfy the statute.

In Sholovitz v. Noorigian, (R. I.), 107 Atl. 94, 97-98 (1919), Sweetland, J., said:

"The description in the memorandum before us is, 'Harry Noorigian brick store and land at 46 Blackstone street.' It appears in evidence that the defendant Henry A. Noorigian was known as 'Harry Noorigian,' and there is no question raised but that by that name in the memorandum reference is made to the defendant. According to a commonly recognized presumption, since the memorandum was made in Woonsocket and both parties reside in Woonsocket and the defendant owns property on Blackstone street in Woonsocket, '46 Blackstone street' in the memorandum refers to No. 46 Blackstone street in the city of Woonsocket. As thus interpreted, the description is of the defendant's brick store and land at 46 Blackstone street in Woonsocket. This on its face is a definite description of a particular brick store and at least the land on which it stands.

"A description is required in a memorandum evidencing a sale of land in order that the property which is the subject of the contract may be identified. We cannot agree with the criticism of the said [trial] justice that, because there were two doors to the brick store of the defendant, one numbered 44 and the other 46, that said store is not identified when referred to as 'at 46 Blackstone street.' The fact that the other door is numbered 44 creates no uncertainty as to the identity of the store or building described in the memorandum.

"Neither in our opinion should the memorandum be held insufficient to charge the defendant because the width and depth of the lot, on which the store stands, is not set out therein. We have already said above that the description without question must be held to define at least the land on which the brick store stands and surely to that extent the defendant was bound to make conveyance. By reference to the evidence presented in the case at bar it appears that the defendant's brick store at 46 Blackstone street was situated at the easterly end of the defendant's property and that the land on which it stands and the small amount of land adjoining it was well defined and set

Received of Mr. Auerbach, 197, High Street, Shoreditch, 10l. on account of House being sold for 500l. from Mr. M. Nelson, Nelson Lodge, 143, Victoria Park Road.

Possession to be taken in six weeks after date.

Morris Nelson,

21/11/1918."

The plaintiff alleged that on November 21st, 1918, before signing this receipt the defendant verbally agreed to sell him his house and residence, Nelson Lodge, for 500l. with possession in six weeks, that the 10l. was paid as a deposit on account of the purchase money. The defendant having failed to complete, owing to the difficulty of finding another residence, the plaintiff brought this action for specific performance relying on the receipt as a sufficient memorandum of the alleged verbal contract within the statute of frauds.

In addition to denying the verbal contract, which was however fully proved by the evidence, the defendant also contended that the memorandum was insufficient as neither the purchaser nor the property was sufficiently indicated or described. The latter point is alone reported.

ASTBURY, J. The only question is whether the memorandum is sufficient within the statute of frauds. The vendor contends that it is insufficient for two reasons—namely, first the purchaser is not sufficiently indicated; secondly the property is not sufficiently described.

On these points the general observations of Jessel, M. R. in Shardlow v. Cotterell, 20 Ch. Div. 90 must be borne in mind. He said (at p. 93): "No description can be framed that will prevent all disputes, and the framers of the statute of frauds knew very well that they could not prevent perjury altogether, but could only go some way towards it; and it was considered that to require a note in writing was a useful check. It could be nothing more: it could not entirely prevent perjury, for parties may suborn witnesses to swear to the existence, destruction, and contents of a memorandum which never in fact existed. Looking at the statute in that light, what is a sufficient description? I consider that any two specific terms are enough to point out sufficiently what is sold. For instance, 'the estate of A. B. in the County of C.,' or 'the estate of A. B. which was devised to him by off from the remainder of the defendant's land by monuments, consisting of Blackstone street and Burts lane to the north and south respectively, the land of one Cunningham on the east, and the wooden building of the defendant on the west. * * *

"We are of the opinion that the description in question is in itself a sufficient description; that by the aid of parol evidence the finding would be warranted that the property described may be identified as all that portion of the defendant's property on Blackstone street which is east of the defendant's wooden building."

On the description of property by a street number, see L. R. A. 1918 C, 520, note. See also Baller v. Spivack (Mich.), 182 N. W. 70 (1921).

C. D.' would be sufficiently specific. If so, why should not 'the property which A. B. bought of C. D. on March 29, 1880,' be sufficient? Would anybody doubt that in a will 'the property which I bought from C. D. on March 29, 1880,' would be a sufficient description? If it is so in a will why not in a contract?"

In that case Jessel, M. R., and Baggallay, L. J., held that the following receipt alone, without referring to other documents, was a sufficient memorandum: "Pinxton, March 29, 1880. Received of Mr. A. Shardlow the sum of 21*l.* as deposit on property purchased at 420*l.* at Sun Inn, Pinxton, on the above date. Mr. George Cotterell, Pinxton, Owner." This was signed by the auctioneer. Jessel, M. R., said (20 Ch. D. 92): "It has not been contested that if the receipt had said 'on a house purchased' there would have been a sufficient description, but it has been argued that because the word 'property' is used, the description is insufficient, and Kay, J., has so decided." Further on (at p. 95) he agreed with Kay, J., that "You must have on the face of the contract a sufficient definite description of the thing sold to enable you to introduce parol evidence to show what the articles were to which that description refers." Baggallay, L. J., adopted (20 Ch. D. 96) the statement in Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, 5th Ed. p. 219 (7th Ed. p. 238), that "a general description of the estate is sufficient if parol evidence can be produced to show what property was intended."

It is plain in the present case that the point as to the non-identification of the purchaser is bad because the memorandum says: "Received of Mr. Auerbach. * * * 10*l.* on account of House being sold for 500*l.* from Mr. M. Nelson. * * *" and in the absence of evidence abundante the clear inference is that Auerbach, who paid the 10*l.* is the purchaser. The similar receipt in Shardlow v. Cotterell, 20 Ch. Div. 90, was sufficient on this point.

On the whole I also think there is a sufficient description of identity. In Shardlow v. Cotterell the description was "Property purchased at 420*l.* at Sun Inn, Pinxton, on the above date. Mr. George Cotterell, Pinxton, Owner." That was held sufficient. Here it is "House being sold for 500*l.* from Mr. M. Nelson." to Auerbach on November 21st, 1918. This is quite as explicit as the memorandum in Shardlow v. Cotterell.

In Plant v. Bourne, [1897] 2 Ch. 281, the description was vaguer still, namely, "twenty four acres of land, freehold, * * * at Totmonslow, in the parish of Draycott, in the County of Stafford." Byrne, J., held that there was no sufficient identification of the subject matter. The Court of Appeal however held that the vendor Plant was presumably selling his own 24 acres, and the description being therefore equivalent to "Plant's 24 acres at Totmonslow," was sufficient to let in extrinsic evidence to show that he had only 24 acres at that place. Lindley, L. J. (at p. 288), after referring to Ogilvie v. Foljambe, 3

Mer. 53, and Shardlow v. Cotterell, adopted the principle expressed by Lush, L. J., in the latter case to wit: "The general rule is, id certum est quod certum reddi potest, and I am of the opinion that this maxim applies here. In Ogilvie v. Foljambe, parol evidence was wanted just as much as here to show what was the subject matter of the contract and [Kay, J.'s, judgment in the present case, 18 Ch. D. 289, 291-95], if carried to its legitimate results, would establish that no contract can be good within the statute unless it describes the property in such a way that it is wholly unnecessary to resort to parol evidence." Chitty, L. J., said, [1897] 2 Ch. 290: "It would be refinement, and not promoting justice, if we were to hold this description fails because 'my' is not to be found before the 'twenty four' or the definite article 'the'." In other words the court assumes that a man is selling his own property and that the man who pays the deposit is the purchaser.

The description of the property as a house, being sold by Nelson to Auerbach for 500*l.* on November 21st, 1918, is sufficient to let in parol evidence identifying the only house answering that description. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to specific performance.

NOBLE v. WARD AND OTHERS.

(Court of Exchequer, 1866, L. R., 1 Exch. 117, and Court of Exchequer Chamber, 1867, L. R., 2 Exch. 135.)

In the Court of Exchequer, Jan. 12, 1866.

BRAMWELL, B.⁸⁸ This case was tried before me at Manchester, and the plaintiff was nonsuited. The case comes before us on a rule to set aside that nonsuit. I think it was wrong, at least on the ground on which it proceeded. The action was for not accepting goods on a sale by the plaintiff to the defendants. The defendants pleaded, among other things, that the contract had been rescinded, and that the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to deliver. The facts were, that a contract for the sale and delivery of goods from the plaintiff to the defendants, at a future day, was entered into on the 12th of August, which may be called contract A; that another contract for sale and delivery by the plaintiff to the defendants also at a future day was entered into on the 18th of August, say contract B; that before any of the days of delivery had arrived the plaintiff and defendants agreed, verbally, to rescind, or do away with, contract A, and to extend for a fortnight the time for the performance of contract B; that is to say, the plaintiff had a fortnight longer to deliver, and the defendants a fortnight longer to take and pay for those goods. This, on principle and authority, was a third contract, call it C. It was a contract in which all that was to be done and permitted on one side was the consideration for all that was to be done and permitted on the other. See per Parke, B., in Marshall v. Lynn, 6 M. & W. 117. It remains to add that the declaration would fit either contract B or contract C, and that goods were tendered by the plaintiff to the defendants in time for either of those contracts. My notes, and my recollection of my ruling, are that contract B was rescinded, and contract C not enforceable, not being in writing. I think that was wrong. Either contract C was within the Statute of Frauds, or not. If not, there was no need for a writing; if yes, it was because it was a contract for the sale of goods, and so within the seventeenth section of the statute. That says that no contract for the sale of goods for the price of 10*l.* or upwards shall be allowed to be good, except there is an acceptance, payment, or writing. The expression "allowed to be good" is not a very happy one, but whatever its meaning may be, it includes this at least, that it shall not be held valid or enforced. But this is what the defendant was attempting to do. He was setting up this contract C as a valid contract. He was asking that it should be allowed to be good to rescind contract B.

It is attempted to say that what took place when contract C was made was twofold. First, that the old contracts were given up; secondly, a new one was made. But that is not so. What was done was all done at once—was all one transaction, one bargain; and had the plaintiff asked for a writing at the time, and the defendants refused it, it would all have been undone, and the parties remitted to their original contracts.

I think, therefore, that on principle it was wrong to hold that the old contract was gone. * * *

The defendants appealed to the Exchequer Chamber.

In the Exchequer Chamber, Feb. 8, 1867.

WILLES, J. * * * In setting aside the nonsuit directed by the learned judge who tried the cause, the Court of Exchequer * * * held that what took place on the 27th must be taken as an entirety, that the agreement then made could not be looked on as valid, and that no rescission could be effected by an invalid contract. And we are of opinion that the Court of Exchequer was right. Mr. Holker [of counsel for the defendant] has contended, that though the contract of the 27th of September cannot be looked on as a valid contract in the way intended by the parties, yet since, if valid, it would have had the effect of rescinding the contract of the 18th, and since the parties might have entered into a mere verbal contract to rescind simpliciter, we are to say that what would have resulted if the contract had been valid, will take place though the contract is void; or, in other words, that the transaction will have the effect which, had it been valid, the parties would have intended, though without expressing it, although it cannot operate as they intended and expressed. But it would be at least a question for the jury, whether the parties did intend to rescind—whether the transaction was one which could not otherwise operate according to their intention; and a material fact on that point is, that, while they expressly rescinded the contract of the 12th of August, they simply made a contract as to the carrying into effect that of the 18th, though in a mode different from what was at first contemplated. It is quite in accordance with the cases of Doe d. Egremont v. Courtenay, 11 Q. B. 702, and Doe d. Biddulph v. Poole, 11 Q. B. 713, overruling the previous decision of Doe d. Egremont v. Forward, 3 Q. B. 627; see 11 Q. B. 723, to hold that, where parties enter into a contract which would have the effect of rescinding a previous one, but which cannot operate according to their intention, the new contract shall not operate to affect the previously existing rights. This is good sense and sound reasoning, on which a jury might at least hold that there was no such intention. * * *

MORRIS v. BARON AND COMPANY.

(House of Lords. [1918] A. C. 1, 9 B. R. C. 399, Ann. Cas. 1918 C, 1197.)

LORD FINLAY, L. C.⁹¹ My Lords, this action was brought for the recovery of 888*l.* 4*s.* the price of goods which had been sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants. The right of the plaintiff to recover this sum was not in dispute, but the defendants set up a counter-claim for damages for non-delivery of other goods by the plaintiff to the defendants. The case was tried by Bailhache, J., without a jury. He gave judgment for the plaintiff on the claim, and dismissed the counter-

⁹⁰ If, however, the new contract is not required to be in writing by the statute of frauds, as, for instance, where the original contract was one not to be performed within a year and when it had less than a year to run the new oral contract varying performance for the rest of the period was made, the new agreement governs. Williams v. Moss' Empires, Ltd., [1915] 3 K. B. 242. Cf. Blake v. J. Neils Lumber Co., 111 Minn. 513 (1910). As Shearman, J., said in Williams v. Moss' Empires, Ltd., supra, the cases of Goss v. Lord Nugent, 5 B. & Ad. 58 (1833) and Noble v. Ward, and cases following them "show that whenever the parties vary a material term of an existing contract [which would be invalid if it were not in writing] they are in effect entering into a new contract, the terms of which must be looked at in their entirety and if the new contract is one which is required to be in writing, then it must be wholly disregarded and the parties are relegated to their rights under the original contract. But if on the other hand there is nothing in the terms of the new contract which necessitates a written contract, then, although the original contract was one which was bound to be in writing, the new parol contract can be enforced because although it is not in writing it is nevertheless an effective contract."

claim on the ground that the defendants had not made a valid exercise of their option under the contract to have the goods in question delivered to them. The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment of Bailhache, J., on the counter-claim, and entered a judgment upon it for the defendants, the damages to be assessed by a referee. From that decision this appeal is brought to your Lordship's House by the plaintiff in the action.

The appellant is a worsted manufacturer and the respondents are merchants. On September 24, 1914, they entered into a contract in writing for the sale by the appellant to the respondents of 500 pieces of cloth; 223 of these pieces were delivered. Disputes arose between the parties, the respondents complaining of delay in delivery under the contract, and the appellant complaining of the respondents' failure to pay for the goods which had been delivered, and litigation ensued.

The first action was brought on March 19, 1915. In it the plaintiff (the present appellant) claimed 888*l.* 4*s.*, the price of the goods delivered, while the defendants (the present respondents) counter-claimed for damages in respect of the failure to deliver 277 pieces, the balance of the 500 pieces contracted to be sold. On April 20, 1915 (three days after the delivery of the counter-claim), the parties at an interview agreed to a settlement, and on April 22nd, the respondents sent a letter to the appellant setting out the terms of settlement. The appellant did not admit the correctness of the statement of the terms in this letter, but Bailhache, J., for the purposes of his judgment assumes its correctness, and I shall deal with the case on this basis, accepting the respondents' statement of the terms of settlement. The letter is as follows:

"24 and 26, Brook Street, Bradford, April 22nd, 1915.

"Messrs. The Troydale Mill Co., Leeds.

"Dear Sirs:—As personally arranged between Mr. Morris and Mr. Baron, we herewith confirm the terms agreed upon.

"Both to withdraw the legal proceedings and instruct the solicitors accordingly, and each to pay his own costs, you to allow 30*l.* (thirty pounds) to us to meet the expenses incurred through not fulfilling the orders.

"The account to be left over for three months so as to give us the opportunity of selling the goods, and the goods not delivered to be kept for us if we ask for them.

"We have the option of taking up the balance of pieces to complete the order, giving time to make.

"Yours faithfully,

"Baron & Co."

The three months' extension of credit which was given by the terms embodied in this letter for the goods delivered expired on July 22nd, 1915, and on the 27th, the appellant wrote asking for payment according to agreement. On the 28th the respondents wrote back saying that they would be pleased to pay the account if the appellant delivered the balance of the blue pieces to complete the order, as stated in the respondents' letter of April 22. On August 17th the respondents wrote as follows to the appellant:

"Gentlemen, we are surprised you have not replied to our letter of the 28th July. As explained in that letter, we shall be glad to pay your account on delivery of the balance of the pieces to complete the order.

"As you have not answered we must now ask you to deliver the balance of the blue pieces on or before the 21st September, 1915. Kindly let us know by return of post if you will do this."

A proposal was made by the respondents in September for a variation in the class of goods to be delivered, but this came to nothing.

On September 27th the respondents wrote pressing for delivery, and on February 15, 1916, the second action (that on which this appeal is brought) was begun by the appellant.

Notwithstanding the agreement of April 22, 1915, the respondents had consistently refused payment for the goods already delivered, insisting on their claim to keep back the payment until delivery of the further goods.

The statement of claim in the second action was for the 888*l.* 4*s.* for the goods delivered.

The defense admitted the plaintiff's claim, subject to the counter-claim.

The counter-claim set out the contract of September 24, 1914, the proceedings in the first action and the settlement embodied in the letter of April 22, 1915, alleging that the defendants had exercised their option thereunder, but that delivery had not been made, and claimed damages for non-delivery under the arrangement of April 22, 1915, or, alternatively, under the original contract of September 24, 1914.

The counter-claim was based before Bailhache, J., solely on the agreement of April 22, and after hearing the evidence of the parties he delivered judgment, disallowing the counter-claim on the ground that the demand by the respondents for the delivery of the goods under the arrangement of April 22, 1915, was not a valid exercise of the option inasmuch as it was coupled with a refusal to abide by the terms of the arrangement as to payment for the goods already delivered.

It was contended before your Lordships on behalf of the respondents that the payment of that money was not a condition precedent to the exercise of the option. But the real question is not whether payment was a condition precedent, but whether the respondents could make a valid claim to have the goods delivered under the option while refusing to observe their part of the bargain. It is perfectly true that the appellant did not, as he might have done, claim that the contract of April 22, 1915, was at an end, treating the respondents' conduct as repudiation. But the question remains whether they could validly exercise their option while repudiating their own obligation under the agreement which conferred that option. Bailhache, J., held that they could not, and I agree. It was contended that the obligation to pay the 888*l.* 4*s.* at the end of the three months did not go to the root of the contract and that the only remedy was an action for the amount. The question is whether the obligation was regarded by the parties as an essential part of the new contract, and I think that its terms show that it was so regarded. It is, indeed, in itself a very important question for a manufacturer whether he is to go on making goods without being paid for those which have been delivered, and the stipulation that he should have the money at the end of the three months appears to me to be an essential part of the contract. A party to a contract which imposes certain obligations and confers certain rights upon him cannot claim to exercise these rights while repudiating his obligations in material particulars. The option to take the goods might indeed have been exercised before the three months had expired, but it would not have been a valid exercise of the option within the three months if at the same time the defendant repudiated his obligation to pay at the end of that term.

For these reasons, I agree with the decision of Bailhache, J., on the contract of April 22.

An objection was also raised before Bailhache, J., to the enforcement of the new contract on which the counter-claim is based on the ground that it is not enforceable by reason of the 4th section of the Sale of Goods Act. This point was not argued before him owing to the view which he took on the point I have just dealt with. It was raised and fully argued in the Court of Appeal and in your Lordships' House.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the new agreement was not an agreement for the sale of goods but for the settlement of an action. It was no doubt the settlement of an action but a part, and a very material part, of that settlement appears to me to have been an agreement for the sale of goods. It is an agreement that the respondents should have an option of taking the balance of goods undelivered, and it was implied that they were to pay for them on the terms of the original agreement. Surely this is an agreement for the sale of goods. This point, I agree with the Court of Appeal, would be enough to defeat the counter-claim.

But the Court of Appeal went on to hold that the arrangement of April 22, 1915, not being enforceable, must be wholly disregarded and the parties relegated to their rights under the original contract.

The Court of Appeal treated the case of Noble v. Ward, L. R. 1 Ex. 117; L. R. 2 Ex. 135, as having decided as a matter of law that in a case to which the 4th section of the Sale of Goods Act applies, the original contract cannot be rescinded by a contract not complying with the section. In that case there was a valid contract, on August 18 for the delivery of goods by the plaintiff to the defendant, and at an interview on September 27th it was agreed that the time for delivery should be extended. The defendant refused to take delivery and an action was brought for non-acceptance, the declaration covering either the contract of August 18 or that of September 27. The case was tried before Bramwell, B., who directed a nonsuit on the ground that the contract of August 18 had been rescinded by the parol agreement of September 27, and that the parol agreement itself could not be sued on owing to the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds. The nonsuit was set aside by the Court of Exchequer, and Bramwell, B., was himself a member of the court and delivered the leading judgment. He pointed out that under s. 17 the contract of September 27 was not "allowed to be good," and that to treat it as having the effect of rescinding the old contract would be to hold that it was good for that purpose. A new trial was accordingly ordered. This decision was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, judgment being delivered by Willes, J. He said that no rescission could be effected by an invalid contract, and that it would be at least a question for the jury whether the parties did intend to rescind.

There are two observations to be made on this case.

In the first place, the agreement varying the first agreement was by s. 17 of the Statute of Frauds one which was not allowed to be good, while under s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which applies in the present case, it is merely not enforceable by action. There is a marked difference between the wording in this respect of the 4th section of the statute of frauds and the 17th section, as was pointed out in Leroux v. Brown, 12 C. B. 801, and, notwithstanding the obiter dicta (for they are no more) of some eminent judges, I do not think that the language of the two sections had the same effect.²² For the present purpose it is enough to say that both courts in Noble v. Ward, treated the contract as being invalid. The change made in the wording of the 4th section of the Sale of Goods Act as compared with s. 17 of the Statute of Frauds in my opinion altered the law. The agreement of April 22, 1915, in this case is not under that section invalid, as was the agreement in Noble v. Ward under s. 17 of the Statute of Frauds. It is only not enforceable by action.

In the second place, Noble v. Ward does not lay down as a matter of law that the parties cannot agree to rescind a written agreement which the law requires to be in writing by the substitution for it of another agreement not in writing, and therefore unenforceable. On the contrary Willes, J., in the Exchequer Chamber says that the question would be for the jury. If the law were as the Court of Appeal in the present case has laid it down, he would have said that the judge must rule that such a rescission could not take place.

The point which arises in such cases seems to me to have been well stated by Lord Denman in Stead v. Dawber (1839), 10 Ad. & E. 57, 64, 65. In that case there was an agreement for the sale of goods to be delivered "on the 20th to the 22nd." The plaintiff at the defendant's request verbally agreed to enlarge the time to the 23rd or 24th. Lord Denman, after saying that many cases had been cited, expressed himself as follows: "But it seems to us that we are mainly called on to decide a question of fact; what, namely, was the intention of the parties in the arrangement come to for substituting the 24th for the 22nd as the day of delivery; did they intend to substitute a new contract for the old one, the same in all other respects except those of the day of delivery and date of the accepted bill, with the old one?"

The present case is not a case in which there has been a mere attempt to vary the written contract by parol, the situation of the parties being otherwise unchanged. The legal proceedings then pending between the parties were withdrawn, each bearing his own costs, a sum of 30*l.* was to be allowed to meet expenses from non-delivery, three months' credit was given to the respondents to give them the opportunity of selling the goods, and the respondents were released from the obligation to take the balance undelivered, getting an option instead. Under these circumstances it seems to me to be out of the question to hold that merely because the option is not enforceable on account of the 4th section of the Sale of Goods Act, the rights of the parties are to be regarded as still governed by the original contract under which the respondents were bound to take delivery of the balance. Both parties treated the original contract as at an end until attention was called in the Court of Appeal to the case of Noble v. Ward, supra, and the respondents throughout insisted on the option given by the new arrangement and treated the obligation to take delivery as at an end. To go back to the default in making delivery before the first action would be to ignore the settlement for 30*l.* of that claim, and to give damages for a subsequent default would be to treat the respondents as having been willing after the settlement to perform the original contract, which they certainly were not.

The evidence in the present case points to the conclusion that the parties intended not merely to vary the original contract but to set it aside and substitute another for it, giving a mere option to take delivery of the percale undelivered. This is the effect of the language of the memorandum of April 22, 1915, and it was on this assumption that all the subsequent dealings and correspondence of the parties proceeded. It is true that neither party adhered to its terms. The appellant tried to get payment of the 888*l.* 4*s.* before the three months' further credit had expired, and the respondents refused to pay when it had expired, claiming to retain the money until the goods were delivered. But neither party ever referred to the original contract as governing their rights; on the contrary, they treated it as at an end.

Is the law such as to prevent effect being given to the intention of the parties to treat the original contract as rescinded?

All that Noble v. Ward decided was that it was a mistake to say that as a matter of law the original contract was rescinded, the variation being by parol and there being no change of circumstances. It did not decide that as a matter of law the first contract still existed. As was said in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, that would be a matter for the jury. There are some old cases in which it was held that there could not be an accord and a satisfaction by taking an unenforceable agreement in substitution for one which was enforceable (see Case v. Barber, T. Raym. 450 in the 33rd year of Charles II.; also Comyns Digest, "Accord" (B 4) 4, 6, and the case there cited of Wickham v. Taylor, T. Jones, 168, 33 Car. 2); but I do not think that these cases can be now regarded as good law. The non-enforceability of the new agreement would no doubt be a very material fact in arriving at a conclusion upon the question whether the new agreement without performance was taken in accord and satisfaction of the old, but it seems to me to be immaterial when once this has been established in point of fact.⁹⁸

In the present case the parties, in my opinion, took the new agreement such as it was with the other terms of settlement in accord and satisfaction of the original agreement, and there is nothing in law to prevent them from doing so. The respondents, therefore, must stand or fall by the agreement of April 22. It was upon that agreement that the case was brought before Bailhache, J., and the learned judge held that the respondents could not recover upon it because they not only failed to pay the 888*l.* 4*s.* at the expiration of the extended credit given by that agreement, but throughout insisted that they would not pay until the further goods had been delivered under the option.

In my opinion the decision of Bailhache, J., should be restored and this appeal allowed with costs here and below.

Order of the Court of Appeal reversed and judgment of Bailhache, J., restored.

IMPERATOR REALTY CO., INC., v. TULL.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1920. 228 N. Y. 447, 127 N. E. 263.)

CHASE, J. The parties to this action entered into a written contract under seal for the exchange of pieces of real property in the city of ⁹⁸ In his opinion Viscount Haldane said, that "While a parol variation of a contract required to be in writing cannot be given in evidence, the very authorities which lay down this principle also lay down not less clearly that parol evidence is admissible to prove a total abandonment or rescission. Now there is no reason why this should not be done through the instrumentality of a new agreement which does not comply with the statutory formalities just as readily as by any other mode of mutual assent by parol. What is, of course, essential is that there should have been made manifest the intention in any event of a complete extinction of the first and formal contract, and not merely the desire of an alteration, however sweeping, in terms which still leave it subsisting." [1918] A. C. at pp. 18-19.

New York. On the day fixed therein for carrying out the contract and making the conveyances, the defendant deliberately defaulted. The action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff.

At the trial the jury determined all of the issues in favor of the plaintiff and rendered a verdict for it. The defendant appealed from the judgment entered upon such verdict, and the Appellate Division reversed the judgment and dismissed the complaint. Imperator Realty Co., Inc., v. Tull, 179 App. Div. 761, 167 N. Y. Supp. 210. [Plaintiff appealed.]

One of the provisions of the contract is:

"All notes or notices of violations of law or municipal ordinances, orders, or requirements noted in or issued by any department of the city of New York against or affecting the premises at the date hereof, shall be complied with by the seller and the premises shall be conveyed free of the same."

There were several notices of violations of law or municipal ordinances, orders, or requirements noted in or issued by a department of the city of New York against or affecting the premises to be conveyed by the plaintiff at the date of the contract which, although aggregating an amount that is comparatively very small, were not satisfied or discharged on the day when the property was to be conveyed. The plaintiff sought to avoid the failure to procure the discharge of such violations by an alleged modification of the contract pursuant to a conversation between the president of the plaintiff and the defendant in which it is claimed that there were reciprocal promises. The president of the plaintiff testified that after the making of the contract, and on the same day thereof, it was agreed between the parties to the contract that either party in place of satisfying any of the so-called violations that might be filed against the pieces of real property therein mentioned might deposit with the New York Title Insurance Company a sufficient amount of cash to pay and discharge the same. There is evidence in the record to show that the plaintiff was able and willing on the day and at the time and place for closing the contract to carry out the same as therein provided except that he could not convey the property to be transferred by him free from such violations, and there is also evidence that he was able and willing to deposit a sufficient amount of cash to comply with and free the property from the violations as required by such oral agreement between the parties.

The conversation testified to by the plaintiff's president is denied by the defendant, but in our judgment the question whether the conversation occurred and the agreement was entered into by the parties as claimed by the plaintiff was a question of fact properly submitted to the jury. The objection that the oral agreement and waiver were not alleged in the complaint was not sufficiently taken by objection at the trial. If it had been so taken at that time, the plaintiff would have had an opportunity to apply for an amendment of its complaint.

It is claimed by the defendant that the contract with the plaintiff was in writing under seal and could not be changed as claimed by an oral agreement so as to be binding upon either party to it. The contract was also within the provisions of section 259 of the Real Property Law (Consol. Laws, c. 50), and it was therefore necessary that it should be in writing as stated in the statute.

Where a contract is reduced to writing and appears to include the entire agreement of the parties and to be free from fraud, the rule is quite universal that oral evidence will not be received of conversations or transactions leading up to the making of a contract or in connection with the execution thereof for the purpose of varying, modifying, reducing or extending the terms thereof. Lese v. Lamprecht, 196 N. Y. 32, 89 N. E. 365; Eighmie v. Taylor, 98 N. Y. 288.

After the execution of a written contract including one within the statute the parties may, of course, reconsider the subject-matter thereof and decide to modify or rescind it. The oral agreement found in this case was made after the execution of the written contract. It is not the right to make a new and independent contract to modify a prior unperformed written contract that we are considering, but the effect, if any, of an oral contract upon a contract under seal or required by the statute to be in writing. We must assume in this case that the oral contract as claimed by the plaintiff, to accept a deposit in cash in place of the payment of outstanding violations, was actually made upon a sufficient consideration. The jury has so found. The oral contract did not purport to be inconsistent with any material part of the written contract, nor to substitute a new oral contract for any material part of the written contract. The plaintiff was simply told in effect to let the violations stand unsatisfied until the due day and then provide for the expense of satisfying the same by a deposit in cash. The extent of the violations was inconsiderable. Both parties were inconvenienced by waiving the necessity of having them actually canceled and satisfied before the due day.

In Thomson v. Poor, 147 N. Y. 402, 409, 42 N. E. 13, 15, which was an action to recover upon a balance claimed to be due pursuant to a written contract which was within the statute, this court say:

"We know of no principle of law which will permit a party to a contract, who is entitled to demand the performance by the other party of some act within a specified time and who has consented to the postponement of the performance to a time subsequent to that fixed by the contract and where the other party has acted upon such consent and in reliance thereon has permitted the contract time to pass without performance, to subsequently recall such consent and treat the nonperformance within the original time as a breach of the contract. The original contract is not changed by such waiver, but it stands as an answer to the other party who seeks to recover damages for nonperformance induced by an unrecalled consent. The party may, in the absence of a valid and binding agreement to extend the time, revoke his consent so far as it has not been acted upon, but it would be most inequitable to hold that a default, justified by the consent, happening during its extension, should furnish a ground of action. It makes no difference, as we conceive, what the character of the original contract may be, whether one within or outside the statute of frauds. The rule is well understood that, if there is a forbearance at the request of a party, the latter is precluded from insisting upon nonperformance at the time originally fixed by the contract as a ground of action. * * * Until he gives notice of withdrawal he has no just right to consider the latter in default, although meanwhile the contract time has elapsed. We think the principle of equitable estoppel applies in such case."

The court further say that the principle of estoppel applies equally to sealed and unsealed contracts.

More recently this court in Arnot v. Union Salt Co., 186 N. Y. 501, 79 N. E. 719, held that, where the time of payment under a contract had been extended by parol and the party required to make the payment had acted upon such extension, the party waiving such time of payment cannot consider the debtor in default unless he withdraws the waiver before the time of payment has arrived.

The oral contract in the case before us modified the written contract simply as to the manner of charging the plaintiff with the amount required to satisfy the violations. Such oral contract if carried out in good faith made unnecessary the haste otherwise required to make the slight changes to comply with the notices which constituted the incumbrances or so-called violations.

The defendant by his mutual oral contract with the plaintiff is estopped from now claiming that the plaintiff who relied thereon was in default on the due day of the written contract because of its omission to then have the property free of the violations. He should not be allowed to take advantage of an omission induced by his unrevoked consent. Thomson v. Poor, supra; Arnot v. Union Salt Co., supra; Swain v. Seamens, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 254, 19 L. Ed. 554; Brede v. Rosedale Terrace Co., 216 N. Y. 246, 110 N. E. 430.

Parol evidence of the waiver constituting an estoppel as against the defendant under the circumstances was not error. Penn. Steel Co. v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 193 N. Y. 37, 85 N. E. 820. We do not think that the objections made by the defendant to the admission of evidence were upon a consideration of the whole record of sufficient consequence to have materially affected the jury or to require further consideration in this opinion.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed, and that of the Trial Term affirmed, with costs in the Appellate Division and in this court.

CARDOZO, J. (concurring in result). The statutes says that a contract for the sale of real property "is void unless the contract, or some note or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration, is in writing, subscribed by the * * * grantor, or by his lawfully authorized agent." Real Property Law (Consol. Laws, c. 50) § 259 (statute of frauds). In this instance, each party was a grantor, for the sale was an exchange. I think it is the law that, where contracts are subject to the statute, changes are governed by the same requirements of form as original provisions. Hill v. Blake, 97 N. Y. 216; Clark v. Fey, 121 N. Y. 470, 476, 24 N. E. 703. Abrogated by word of mouth such a contract may be (Blanchard v. Trim, 38 N. Y. 225), but its obligation may not be varied by spoken words of promise while it continues undissolved (Swain v. Seamens, 9 Wall. 254, 271, 272, 19 L. Ed. 554; Emerson v. Slater, 22 How. [U. S.] 28, 42, 16 L. Ed. 360; Goss v. Lord Nugent, 5 B. & Ald. 58; Harvey v. Graham, 5 Ad. & El. 61; Hickman v. Haynes, L. R. 10 C. P. 598; Abell v. Munson, 18 Mich. 307, 100 Am. Dec. 165; Malkan v. Hemmung, 82 Conn. 293, 73 Atl. 752; Long v. Hartwell, 34 N. J. Law, 116; Rucker v. Harrington, 52 Mo. App. 481; Bradley v. Harter, 156 Ind. 499, 60 N. E. 139; Jarman v. Westbrook, 134 Ga. 19, 67 S. E. 403; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 593). A recent decision of the House of Lords reviews the English precedents, and declares the rule anew. Morris v. Baron & Co., 1918, A. C. 1, 19, 20, 31. Oral promises are ineffective to make the contract, or any part of it, in the beginning. Wright v. Weeks, 25 N. Y. 153; Marks v. Cowdin, 226 N. Y. 138, 123 N. E. 139. Oral promises must also be ineffective to vary it thereafter. Hill v. Blake, supra. Grant and consideration alike must find expression in a writing. Real Prop. Law, § 259; Consol. Laws, c. 50.

Some courts have drawn a distinction between the formation of the contract and the regulation of performance. Cummings v. Arnold, 3 Mete. 486, 37 Am. Dec. 155; Stearns v. Hall, 9 Cush. 31; Whittier v. Dana, 10 Allen, 326; Hastings v. Lovejoy, 140 Mass. 261, 2 N. E. 776, 54 Am. Rep. 462; Wood on Statute of Frauds, p. 758. The distinction has been rejected in many jurisdictions. See cases cited supra; also, L. R. A. 1917B, 141 note. It has never been accepted by this court, and the question of its validity has been declared an open one. Thomson v. Poor, 147 N. Y. 402, 408, 42 N. E. 13, characterizing as dicta the statements in Blanchard v. Trim, supra. I think we should reject it now. The cases which maintain it hold that oral promises in such circumstances constitute an accord, and that an accord, though executory, constitutes a bar if there is a tender of performance. Cummings v. Arnold; Whittier v. Dana, supra. There seems little basis for such a distinction in this state where the rule is settled that an accord is not a bar unless received in satisfaction. Reilly v. Barrett, 220 N. Y. 170, 115 N. E. 453; Morehouse v. Second Nat. Bank of Oswego, 98 N. Y. 503, 509; cf. Ladd v. King, 1 R. I. 224, 51 Am. Dec. 624; Pollock on Contracts (3d Am. Ed.) p. 822. But there is another objection, more fundamental and far-reaching. I do not know where the line of division is to be drawn between variations of the substance and variations of the method of fulfillment. I think it is inadequate to say that oral changes are effective if they are slight and ineffective if they are important. Such tests are too vague to supply a scientific basis of distinction. "Every part of the contract in regard to which the parties are stipulating must be taken to be material." Per Parke, B., Marshall v. Lynn, 6 M. & W. 116, 117; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 594. The field is one where the law should hold fast to fundamental conceptions of contract and of duty, and follow them with loyalty to logical conclusions.

The problem, thus approached, gains, I think, a new simplicity. A contract is the sum of its component terms. Any variation of the parts is a variation of the whole. The requirement that there shall be a writing extends to one term as to another. There can therefore be no contractual obligation when the requirement is not followed. This is not equivalent to saying that what is ineffective to create an obligation must be ineffective to discharge one. Duties imposed by law irrespective of contract may regulate the relations of parties after they have entered into a contract. There may be procurement or encouragement of a departure from literal performance which will forbid the assertion that the departure was a wrong. That principle will be found the solvent of many cases of apparent hardship. There may be an election which will preclude a forfeiture. There may be an acceptance of substituted performance, or an accord and satisfaction. McCreery v. Day, 119 N. Y. 1, 9, 23 N. E. 198, 6 L. R. A. 503, 16 Am. St. Rep. 793; Swain v. Seamens, supra; Long v. Hartwell, supra; Ladd v. King, supra. What there may not be, when the subject-matter is the sale of land, is an executory agreement, partly written and partly oral, to which, by force of the agreement and nothing else, the law will attach the attribute of contractual obligation.

The contract, therefore, stood unchanged. The defendant might have retracted his oral promise an hour after making it, and the plaintiff would have been helpless. He might have retracted a week before the closing, and, if a reasonable time remained within which to remove the violations, the plaintiff would still have been helpless. Retraction even at the very hour of the closing might not have been too late if coupled with the offer of an extension which would neutralize the consequences of persuasion and reliance. Arnot v. Union Salt Co., 186 N. Y. 501, 79 N. E. 719; Brede v. Rosedale Terrace Co., 216 N. Y. 246, 110 N. E. 430. The difficulty with the defendant's position is that he did none of these things. He had notified the plaintiff in substance that there was no need of haste in removing the violations, and that title would be accepted on deposit of adequate security for their removal in the future. He never revoked that notice. He gave no warning of a change of mind. He did not even attend the closing. He abandoned the contract; treated it as at an end, held himself absolved from all liability thereunder, because the plaintiff had acted in reliance on a consent which, even in the act of abandonment, he made no effort to recall.

I do not think we are driven by any requirement of the statute of frauds to sustain as lawful and effective this precipitate rescission, this attempt by an ex post facto revocation, after closing day had come and gone, to put the plaintiff in the wrong. "He who prevents a thing from being done may not avail himself of the nonperformance, which he has, himself, occasioned, for the law says to him, in effect: 'This is your own act, and, therefore, you are not damnified.' " Dolan v. Rodgers, 149 N. Y. 489, 491, 44 N. E. 167, quoting West v. Blakeway, 2 M. & Gr. 751. The principle is fundamental and unquestioned. U. S. v. Peck, 102 U. S. 64, 26 L. Ed. 46; Gallagher v. Nichols, 60 N. Y. 438; Risley v. Smith, 64 N. Y. 576, 582; Gen. El. Co. v. Nat. Contracting Co., 178 N. Y. 369, 375, 70 N. E. 928; Mackay v. Dick, 6 App. Cas. 251; New Zealand Shipping Co. v. Societe des Aletiers, etc., 1919 A. C. 1, 5. Sometimes the resulting disability has been characterized as an estoppel, sometimes as a waiver. Gallagher v. Nichols; Gen. El. Co. v. Nat. Constr. Co.; Thomson v. Poor, supra. We need not go into the question of the accuracy of the description. Ewart on Estoppel, pp. 15, 70; Ewart on Waiver Distributed, pp. 23, 143, 264. The truth is that we are facing a principle more nearly ultimate than either waiver or estoppel, one with roots in the yet larger principle that no one shall be permitted to found any claim upon his own inequity or take advantage of his own wrong. Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 22 N. E. 188, 5 L. R. A. 340, 12 Am. St. Rep. 819. The statute of frauds was not intended to offer an asylum of escape from that fundamental principle of justice. An opposite precedent is found in Thomson v. Poor, 147 N. Y. 402, 42 N. E. 13. In deciding that case, we put aside the question whether a contract within the statute of frauds could be changed by spoken words. We held that there was disability, or, as we styled it, estoppel, to take advantage of an omission induced by an unrevoked consent. Cf. Swain v. Seamens, supra, 9 Wall. at page 274, 19 L. Ed. 554; Arnot v. Union Salt Co., supra; Brede v. Rosedale Terrace Co., supra; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 595. A like principle is recognized even in the English courts, which have gone as far as those of any jurisdiction in the strict enforcement of the statute. They hold in effect that, until consent is acted on, either party may change his mind. After it has been acted on, it stands as an excuse for nonperformance. Hickman v. Haynes, L. R. 10 C. P. 598, 605; Ogle v. Lord Vane, 2 Q. B. 275; 3 I. B. 272; Cuff v. Penn, 1 Maule & S. 21; Morris v. Baron & Co., 1918 A. C. 1, at page 31. The defendant by his conduct has brought himself within the ambit of this principle. His words did not create a new bilateral contract. They lacked the written form prescribed by statute. They did not create a unilateral contract. Aside from the same defect in form, they did not purport to offer a promise for an act. They did, however, constitute the continuing expression of a state of mind, a readiness, a desire, persisting until revoked. A seller who agrees to change the wall paper of a room ought not to lose his contract if he fails to make the change through reliance on the statement of the buyer that new paper is unnecessary and that the old is satisfactory. The buyer may change his mind again and revert to his agreement. He may not summarily rescind because of the breach which he encouraged. That is what the defendant tried to do. When he stayed away from the closing and acted upon an election to treat the contract as rescinded, he put himself in the wrong.

I concur in the conclusion that the judgment must be reversed.

⁹⁴ "The corn, by the original contract, was to be delivered at Cairo by the 15th of March, 1865; and, by correspondence and agreement with the plaintiffs, in view of the difficulties of which the defendants complained, the time of delivery was extended to the 1st of April, again to the 10th, and then to the last day of April. It would be strange law, indeed, if the defendants were allowed to say that, inasmuch as you gave us further time in which to perform our contracts, and we did not comply, you have no right to an action against us on our original contract; and this is the burden of many of the instructions, and a large part of the theory of their case. There is no merit in this plea of a new contract, or of variance in the one declared on." Breese, C. J., in Bacon v. Cobb, 45 Ill. 47, 56, 57 (1867). See Hickman v. Haynes, L. R. 10 C. P. 598 (1875); Neppach v. Oregon and Cal. R. Co., 46 Ore. 374 (1905).

In Hickman v. Haynes, the leading English case in accord with the principal case, the court emphasized the fact that the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform on time under the original contract and that there was not a substitution of one agreement for another but merely a voluntary forbearance to perform on plaintiff's part at the request of the defendant, or a waiver by the defendants of a delivery by the plaintiff at the time specified in the contract. Where the plaintiff could not or would not have performed under the original contract, the statute may be relied upon to obviate the oral extension or variation agreement. See Walter v. Victor G. Bloede Co., 94 Md. 80 (1901), where the plaintiff, being unable to perform on time, asked for the delay. So in Plevins v. Downing, L. R., 1 C. P. 220 (1876), the written contract was to sell and deliver 100 tons of pig iron, 25 tons at once and 75 tons in July next. By the end of July only 75 tons were delivered, but in October defendant orally requested delivery, plaintiffs claimed, and then refused to accept it. It was held, that as the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to perform in time under the written contract they could not recover on that, and they could not recover on the alleged oral request because "a substituted time of delivery" is "an altered contract or a new contract" and cannot be enforced if merely verbal and within the statute of frauds.

"There is no reason, in our opinion, why a party to a contract within the statute of frauds may not be estopped by his conduct from disputing a sub-

SEYMOUR v. OELRICHS ET AL.

(Supreme Court of California, 1909. 156 Cal. 782, 106 Pac. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154.)

Action by John Seymour against Theresa A. Oelrichs and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

ANGELLOTTI, J.^{} An opinion was filed on this appeal on July 6, 1909, and judgment given thereon. * * *

We adhere to the views expressed in the former opinion as to the questions determined therein, and as to such questions adopt the same as the opinion of the court. For the reasons stated therein, the judgment and order denying a new trial must be reversed, but for the purposes of a new trial that must follow, we will determine the question of estoppel.

In our discussion we shall assume, of course, that Mr. Oelrichs was duty authorized in writing to enter into such a contract on behalf of the defendants as is alleged to have been made by him with plaintiff. If he was so authorized, it is apparent that defendants are bound by his acts, conduct and statements to the same extent that they would have been had they been personally present and personally had done just what he did. So assuming, the facts that plaintiff's evidence tended to show are substantially as follows: Plaintiff was captain of detectives in the police department of the city and county of San Francisco, at a salary of $250 per month. Under the law, he held practically a life position as captain of police, being removable therefrom only for good cause, after trial. All this was known to the defendants and to Charles L. Fair, to whose property they have succeeded. Under these circumstances they offered him a position, wherein he was to render personal services in connection with their property in San Francisco for a compensation in money. The terms of the contract were finally agreed upon before Mr. Fair left for Europe, Mr. Fair acting for himself and Mr. Oelrichs representing the defendants. Plaintiff told them that he then had a life position, with a right to a pension if he remained long enough in the police department, and that he could not afford to leave the place and go into anything else unless he was certain of steady employment, and they then told him that they would give him a 10-year contract at $300 per month. This was assented to by plaintiff. The day before Mr. Fair left for Europe, to be absent a few weeks, being very busy in closing up certain business affairs that had to be attended to before he left, he told plaintiff: "Now, in regard to this contract, you leave that stand until I get back, and I will give you the contract." Plaintiff asked him why it could not be done "now," and Fair told him not to be afraid, it would be all right, everything would be all right. It was understood that he was to go to work at once. On leaving Mr. Fair, plaintiff met Mr. Oelrichs and told him about his conversation with Fair, and Oelrichs said: "As far as I am concerned I will give you my part of it now if you want it. I represent Mrs. Oelrichs and Mrs. Vanderbilt and there will be no trouble about it at all, but you might just as well leave it go until Fair returns," and plaintiff said, "All right." This was about June 1, 1902. Plaintiff relied absolutely upon the understanding that he was to have a written contract for 10 years at $300 a month, and would not otherwise have resigned his position in the police department or entered the employ of the defendants and Fair. The morning Fair went away, he asked plaintiff when he was going to resign, and plaintiff said, "Today," and Fair said, "All right, you go ahead, it will be all right, everything will be all right on my return." He did resign at once and his new employment commenced June 1, 1902. Fair was killed near Paris, France, August 14, 1902, without having returned to America. Plaintiff continued to perform all services agreed to be rendered and received $300 a month therefor to July 1, 1904, when defendants, having determined to sell all their San Francisco property, discharged all of their employees, including plaintiff, and have ever since refused to recognize him as an employee or pay him any portion of the salary agreed upon. Plaintiff had no intimation that either Mrs. Oelrichs or Mrs. Vanderbilt did not know all about the terms upon which he entered their employ until November, 1903, when an attempt, which was not persisted in, was made to reduce his salary; Mrs. Oelrichs on November 30, 1903, told him that Mr. Oelrichs had no right to make such an arrangement. There was nothing to indicate that Mrs. Vanderbilt personally had any knowledge that plaintiff was an employee at all until after Fair's death, or that she personally knew anything about the alleged contract. It is not claimed by plaintiff that either Mr. Oelrichs or Mr. Fair did not act in perfect good faith in this matter, it being conceded that each of them fully intended to execute the written contract.

The claim of plaintiff is not that mere part performance of a contract for personal services which by its terms is not to be performed within a year, "invalid" under our statute because not evidenced by writing, renders the same valid and enforceable. Such a claim would, of course, find no support in the authorities. Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 448. He necessarily is compelled to rely solely on the claim that the defendants by their conduct and promises, on which he was entitled to and did rely, having induced him to give up his life position in the police department in order to enter their employ for a term of years at $300 a month, on the assurance from them that they would give him a written contract for such time and amount, and it being impossible for him to be placed in statu quo, are estopped from now setting up the statute of frauds as a defense to his action on the contract. Under this claim, the fact of part performance by plaintiff plays no part whatever. It was the change of position caused by his resignation from the police department upon which his claim wholly rests, and this resignation was, of course, no part of the performance of the contract of service, but was something that must be done by plaintiff before he could begin to perform, as was known to the defendants. Plaintiff's case, in this regard, would be just as strong if after his resignation he had been prevented by defendants from beginning to perform.

The right of courts of equity to hold a person estopped to assert the statute of frauds, where such assertion would amount to practicing a fraud, cannot be disputed. It is based upon the principle "thoroughly established in equity, and applying in every transaction where the statute is invoked, that the statute of frauds, having been enacted for the purpose of preventing fraud, shall not be made the instrument of shielding, protecting or aiding the party who relies upon it in the perpetration of a fraud or in the consummation of a fraudulent scheme." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 921. It was said in Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 85, 3 Am. Rep. 418: "The fraud most commonly treated as taking an agreement out of the statute of frauds is that which consists in setting up the statute against its enforcement, after the other party has been induced to make expenditures, or a change of situation in regard to the subject-matter of the agreement, or upon the supposition that it was to be carried into execution, and the assumption of rights thereby to be acquired; so that the refusal to complete the execution of the agreement is not merely a denial of rights which it was intended to confer, but the infliction of an unjust and unconscientious injury and loss. In such case, the party is held, by force of his acts or silent acquiescence, which have misled the other to his harm, to be estopped from setting up the statute of frauds." This statement has been accepted as setting forth a plain and satisfactory ground for equitable jurisdiction, together with a clear indication of the proper limitation of its exercise. See Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 457a. In the section last cited, Mr. Browne says: "A plaintiff * * * must be able to show clearly * * * not only the terms of the contract, but also such acts and conduct of the defendant as the court would hold to amount to a representation that he proposed to stand by his agreement and not avail himself of the statute to escape its performance; and also that the plaintiff, in reliance on this representation, has proceeded, either in performance or pursuance of his contract, to so far alter his position as to incur an unjust and unconscientious injury and loss, in case the defendant is permitted after all to rely upon the statutory defense. After proof of this, the court may well be justified in using its undoubted power, in cases of equitable estoppel, to refuse to listen to a defendant seeking to deny the truth of his own representations previously made."

We can see no good reason for limiting the operation of this equitable doctrine to any particular class of contracts included within the statute of frauds, provided always the essential elements of an estoppel are present, or for saying otherwise than as is intimated by Mr. Pomeroy in the words already quoted, viz., that it applies "in every transaction where the statute is invoked." It is a general equitable principle, a part of the broader equitable doctrine stated in Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 580, 25 L. Ed. 618, and quoted therefrom in Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 687, 47 Pac. 697, as follows: "The vital principle is that he who by his language or conduct leads another to do what he would not otherwise have done shall not subject such person to loss or injury by disappointing the expectations upon which he acted. Such a change of position is sternly forbidden. It involves fraud and falsehood, and the law abhors both."

The question, then, is whether the facts of this case bring it within the principle we have discussed. It is clear that there was such a change of position on the part of plaintiff in his irrevocable surrender of his office in the police department, induced in fact by his reliance on the promise of defendants and Fair that a written contract for 10 years at $300 a month would be given, that he will incur great injury and loss in case the defendants are permitted to rely upon the statute of frauds as a defense. That there would necessarily be such a change of position on his part in the event that he relied upon their promise and accepted their offer was known to them, and the promise was given with this knowledge and with the intent that it should be relied on by him and the change in his position thereby induced. The injury done plaintiff by a repudiation of the promise by defendants under these circumstances would certainly appear to be "unjust and unconscientious." Is it permissible to them, in view of the well-settled principle stated to so repudiate it by interposing the fact that the contract has not been reduced to writing, as promised, as a defense to his action?

Learned counsel for defendants say that no fraud on the part of defendants is shown, and that there can be no estoppel in the absence of fraud on the part of the person estopped. The presence of fraud is, of course, essential. It is established by a multitude of cases that to constitute fraud sufficient to serve as a foundation for estoppel by acts or conduct an actual intent to mislead is not essential. Mr. Pomeroy in his work on Specific Performance says that the fraud essential in such cases is not necessarily an antecedent fraud, consciously intended by a party in making the contract, but a fraud inhering in the consequence of thus setting up the statute. Section 104. In Anderson v. Hubble, 93 Ind. 570, 576, 47 Am. Rep. 394, it was aptly said: "It is not necessary, in order to the existence of an equitable estoppel, that there should exist a design to deceive or defraud. The person against whom the estoppel is asserted must, by his silence or his representations, have created a belief of the existence of a state of facts which it would be unconscionable to deny; but it is not essential that he should have been guilty of positive fraud in his previous conduct. * * * All that is meant in the expression that an estoppel must possess an element of fraud is that the case must be one in which the circumstances and conduct would render it a fraud for the party to deny what he had previously induced or suffered another to believe and take action upon. * * * There need be no precedent corrupt motive or evil design." See, also, 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 805. It is unnecessary to cite other authorities upon this well-settled doctrine in regard to equitable estoppel. We do not understand it to be disputed by counsel for defendant. Their claim, as we understand it, is that there is nothing more in this case than a mere promise on the part of defendants to give the written contract, made honestly and in good faith, and that a refusal to comply with such a promise so made cannot serve as a basis for the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel; the contention being that the mere failure to keep an oral promise to reduce an oral contract to writing cannot suffice to constitute the fraud essential to the application of such doctrine, and that there must be some other fraud shown, such as an actual fraud to prevent the contract being reduced to writing. This claim presents the most doubtful question in this case. The authorities all recognize the proposition that the acts, conduct, or statements relied on as constituting ground for the estoppel must generally be acts, conduct, or statements amounting to a representation of fact, as distinguished from mere expression of opinion or intention, or mere promise of something to be done in the future. It has, therefore, been said many times that the mere refusal to make a writing, as agreed, is not such fraud as will take a case out of the operation of the statute of frauds under the doctrine of equitable estoppel. This, undoubtedly, is ordinarily true, even where a party, relying simply on the honor, word or promise of the other, has changed his position to his injury because thereof. But is it applicable to such a state of facts as we have before us? Practically, defendants said to plaintiff: "We want you to enter our employ at once. We know that to do so you must give up your life position in the police department and that you are not willing to do this unless you are assured of employment for ten years at $300 a month. A written contract is, under our statute, essential to guarantee you such employment. We will execute this contract just as soon as Mr. Fair returns from Europe. Go ahead and resign your position now and commence work with us at once, and it will be all right. The written contract will be given as promised." Here, certainly, in the language of a note to section 877 of Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (volume 2), was a representation of a future intention absolute in form, deliberately made for the purpose of influencing the conduct of the other party, and it is stated in such note that, notwithstanding the rule set forth in the text that a statement of intention merely cannot be a misrepresentation amounting to fraud, such a representation of intention as last set forth, if acted upon by the other party, is generally the source of a right, and may amount to a contract enforceable as such by a court of equity. Mr. Bigelow, in discussing the essentials of estoppel by conduct, and particularly the necessity of a representation or concealment of a fact, says that where the statement or conduct is not resolvable into a statement of fact, and does not amount to a contract, the party making it is not bound unless guilty of clear moral fraud, or unless he stood in a relation of confidence toward him to whom it was made. Bigelow on Estoppel (5th Ed.) p. 572. The same learned author further says that situations may arise in which a contract should be held an estoppel, as in certain cases where only an inadequate right of action would, if the estoppel were not allowed, exist in favor of the injured party, citing the case of Faxton v. Faxton, 28 Mich. 159, in which a mortgagee was held estopped from enforcing his mortgage, where he had induced the son of a mortgagor, contemplating removal, to remain on the mortgaged land and care for it and support the family of the mortgagor, to whom the mortgagee was related, on a promise, honestly made, that the mortgage would never be enforced if he did so. Page 577. In Harris v. Brooks, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 195, 32 Am. Dec. 254, it was held that a parol declaration by the holder of a note to a surety that he would look to the principal only was a good defense for the surety, on the ground that it lulled the party into security and prevented him from obtaining his indemnity, and that it would be a fraud on the part of the holder to subsequently call upon the surety contrary to such assurance. In White v. Walker, 31 Ill. 422, a somewhat similar case, it was said that while a promise to forgive a debt or forbear its collection, unsupported by any consideration, was ineffectual as a defense viewed merely as an agreement, yet if the surety has been induced by such assurance to neglect any of the means which might have been used for his indemnity, the "promise may have that effect as an estoppel, which it wants as a contract, and amount to a defense in any subsequent action brought by the creditor." These authorities are cited simply to show that the mere fact that there was no misrepresentation of fact, but only a promise of future action, is not always a bar to equitable relief. The cases to be found in support of the doctrine that the mere omission or refusal to make a writing, as promised, is not such fraud as will take a case out of the operation of the statute of frauds, are generally cases where the promise was not made under such circumstances as would warrant the conclusion that it constituted, in the eye of equity, a contract, the repudiation of which would be a manifest fraud on the other party. For instance, in stating the rule, the Supreme Court of Indiana said, in Caylor v. Roe, 99 Ind. 1, that never has it been held that the simple failure or refusal to reduce a verbal contract to writing, unaccompanied by elements of estoppel or other circumstances invoking the equitable powers of the court, is such a fraud as will authorize the courts in excepting the contract from the operation of the statute of frauds. The case of Equitable Gas, etc., Co. v. Baltimore, etc., Co., 63 Md. 285, cited by defendants, was a case of an oral contract for the sale of personal property which, according to its terms, was not to be performed within one year. It was intended by the parties that it should be put into writing. The action was by the vendee to obtain an injunction preventing the disposition of the property to others and for specific performance. There were allegations showing the irreparable injury that would be suffered by the plaintiff in view of its action had in reliance on the contract. The court recognized it to be a settled rule "that the equity of part performance to entitle a plaintiff to specific execution of a contract within the statute does not relate to contracts for personal service not to be performed within a year." But they further said that here the parties intended a written contract, and that if such contract was fraudulently withheld, if executed, or, if not, signed, if the execution be fraudulently and without justifiable cause delayed, a court of equity may require its production or enforce proper execution. It is obvious that "the application of the rules as to equitable enforcement must, to a considerable extent, be governed by the circumstances of each case." Browne on Statute of Frauds (5th Ed.) p. 586.

While the question is by no means free from doubt, we believe that it should be held that there were sufficient facts in this case to support a conclusion that the promise here to give such a written agreement as was required by the statute was made under such circumstances that the irrevocable surrender by plaintiff of his position in the police department in full reliance thereon made it, in the eye of equity, a binding contract, the subsequent repudiation of which by defendants would constitute such a manifest fraud as would justify the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel.⁹⁶

For the purposes of a new trial it may further be properly said that we are entirely satisfied with the opinion filed in this case by the district court of appeal of the third district, written by Justice Hart of that court, so far as the question of measure of damages is concerned.

In Clement v. Rowe, 83 So. Dak. 499 (1914), the defendant agreed with the plaintiff that if the plaintiff would, as plaintiff accordingly did, convey certain land to a certain corporation in exchange for a stated amount of preferred stock in the corporation, and if the corporation failed to pay annually a 7 per cent dividend on the stock, which failure occurred, the plaintiff might transfer the stock to the defendant at the expiration of two years and the defendant would pay him the par value of the stock with 7 per cent interest. It was held that the contract was one not to be performed within a year, but it was also held that although the land was conveyed to the corporation and not to the defendant, the plaintiff should recover from the defendant the value of the land conveyed to the corporation. Gates, J., for the court, said (p. 507): "In the present case the defendant himself did not receive the land which was the partial consideration for the invalid promise. * * * But it went to the Medicine Company at the direction of the defendant. So far as the relations between plaintiff and defendant are concerned, the situation was the same as though the land really became the property of the defendant, but by his direction the title was taken in the name of a third person. In such a case the law will presume that the benefit of the transaction inured to the defendant." While the decision technically merely holds that in a code state a quasi contract recovery may be had against one who pleads the statute of frauds to the contract but is enriched as the presumed resulting trust cestui of the property obtained from plaintiff under the contract, it is believed that recovery should be allowed even if the presumption of a resulting trust for the defendant is rebutted. See George P. Costigan, Jr., Implied in Fact Contracts and Mutual Assent, 33 Harv. L. Rev. 376, 387 n, 392-393. The court in Clement v. Rowe went even farther, for the court added (p. 507):

"If, however, under the pleadings and evidence offered, it should be thought that the contract whereby the farm was traded for the shares of stock was really made between plaintiff and the Medicine Company and that defendant's oral promise to repurchase was the inducement which led the plaintiff to make the trade, the defendant should still be held responsible to plaintiff for the value of the property which plaintiff parted with because of that inducement. While defendant might assert the statute as a defense to the carrying out of the oral contract he could not assert such defense in an action on quantum valebat if he had received the farm. Nor should he be permitted, because he did not receive the farm, to assert the statute as against a claim for the recovery of the value of the property at the time of the trade. The plaintiff had irrevocably surrendered the farm relying upon defendant's promise. Defendant must therefore put him back as nearly as possible in statu quo. For a discussion of the doctrine of equitable estoppel as applied to this subject we refer to the case of Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 732, and the excellent note by Mr. Freeman in 134 Am. St. Rep. 171."

See also Fabian v. Wasatch Orchard Co., 41 Utah 404 (1912).

In Safe Deposit & Trust Co. v. Diamond Coal & Coke Co., 234 Pa. 100 (1912), the court held that a contract for the sale of land would be reformed on parol evidence but would not be enforced specifically because of the statute of frauds, the whole contract being in contemplation of law reduced to an oral agreement which the legislature has said shall not be enforced. But see Carson v. Davis, 171 Ill. 497 (1898); Olson v. Erickson, 42 Minn. 440 (1890).

CHAPTER X.

THE DISCHARGE OF CONTRACTS.¹

KING v. GILLETT.

(Court of Exchequer, 1840. 7 M. & W. 55.)

To assumpsit for breach of promise of marriage, the defendant pleaded that before breach the plaintiff wholly absolved, exonerated, and discharged the defendant from his promise and the performance of of the same. Special demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

ALDERSON, B.² In this case we are of opinion that the plea is good, and that the demurrer must be overruled.

The question before the court was this, whether to an action founded on mutual promises to marry within a reasonable time the defendant could plead that, before any breach of contract on his part, the plaintiff wholly exonerated him from the performance of that contract. And it was contended that the proper plea was, that before breach, the plaintiff and defendant by mutual agreement had rescinded the contract previously made between them. No doubt such a plea would be good, but on looking into the precedents to which we have been referred, we find that the form of the present plea has been adopted and held good in several cases. There are precedents in several of the books of entries [Rast. Entr. 685; Brown's Entr. 67 (fol. edit.); Hern's Pleader, 31], and there are two decided authorities, Holland and Conier's Case, 2 Leon, 214, and Langden v. Stokes, Cro. Car. 383. And we think this latter case explains the matter, and reconciles the present plea with general principles. It seems to have been treated there as a mere question of the form of plea—and so we think it is, for although we are of opinion that this plea is good in point of form, yet we think the defendant will not be able to succeed upon it at Nisi Prius, in case issue be taken upon it, unless he proves a proposition to exonerate on the part of the plaintiff, acceded to by himself; and this in effect will be rescinding of the contract previously made.

We think, therefore, that judgment must be given for the defendant, but the plaintiff should have liberty to amend on payment of costs.

Leave to amend accordingly.³

NATHANIEL S. COLLYER & CO. v. LEWMAN MOULTON AND ANOTHER.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island, 1868. 9 R. I. 90, 98 Am. Dec. 370.)

POTTER, J.⁴ The plaintiffs made a verbal contract with the defendants, then partners, to build a machine. The work was charged as fast as done, and the materials when furnished. After a small part of the work had been done, the firm was dissolved; and the defendant Moulton, the same day, gave notice of it to the plaintiffs; and told them he could be no longer responsible for the machine. The defendant Moulton claims that the plaintiffs released him and agreed to look to the other partner for payment; but this the plaintiffs deny. The plaintiffs went on and completed the machine, and then sued Bromley alone for his claim, but discontinued the suit, and now sue both the former partners, the writ having been served on Moulton only.

Where two parties contract, one to do a particular piece of work and the other to pay for it, the latter may, at any time, countermand the completion of it, and in such case the former cannot go on and complete the work and claim the whole price, but will be entitled only to pay for his part performance, and to be compensated for his loss on the remainder of the contract. Clark v. Marsiglia, 1 Denio, 317; Durkee v. Mott, 8 Barb. S. C. 423; Hosmer v. Wilson, 7 Michigan, 294.

In the present case the two defendants, although the partnership was dissolved, still remained joint contractors so far as the plaintiff was concerned; and we think that either of them had a right to countermand the order before completion, and then the joint contractors would have remained liable as before stated. But the defendant Moulton claims that he was verbally released by the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs agreed to look to the other defendant, Bromley, alone for their pay.

There is some apparent inconsistency in the language used in the seems a mistake. The court simply said that mutual assent was necessary to make out the defense, but this is not saying that consideration was necessary.

* * * The English law seems still to be that [in the case of a unilateral contract] exoneration before breach is good without consideration." 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1830, pp. 3151-3152. See Hathaway v. Lynn, 75 Wis. 186 (1889), supporting the English view. But see Metcalf v. Kent, post, p. 1402, contra.

"The doctrine of exoneration or discharge of a contract before breach without consideration never applied to sealed instruments." 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1836, p. 3159. Under the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law it applies to negotiable instruments providing the exoneration is in writing. As to these instruments it applies after breach, i. e., maturity, as well as before.

On consideration for new agreements abrogating, altering, supplementing or supplanting prior contracts, see L. R. A. 1915 B, 1, note.

⁴ The statement of facts is omitted.

reports and text writers, as to the manner in which a simple contract may be annulled. We think the rule is, that so long and so far as the contract remains executory and before breach, it may be annulled by agreement of all parties; but that when it has been broken and a right of action has accrued, the debt or damages can only be released for a consideration; and even so far as it remains executory it may be said that the agreement to annul on one side may be taken as the consideration for the agreement to annul on the other side. Dane 5, 112; Johnson v. Reed, 9 Mass. 84; Cummings v. Arnold, 3 Met. 486-489; Richardson v. Hooper, 13 Pick. 446; Blood v. Enos, 12 Vermont, 625.

So far, therefore, as the contract in the present case remained unfinished on February 10th, 1865, when the notice was given and the alleged waiver was made, we may consider, either that the contract was annulled or waived by consent, in which case (the machine, so far as completed, being tendered or delivered) the plaintiff could claim only for work and materials to that date without further damages,—or that the work was countermanded by the defendant Moulton, without the assent of the plaintiffs, in which case the defendant would be liable for the part performed and for loss on the part unperformed.

We consider the present case to fall under the first head, the notice to, and declarations and conduct of the plaintiffs amounting to a waiver of the fulfilment of the contract as first made—that is, to a release of the defendant Moulton for the part still unperformed.

But the claim for payment for the part performed, stands, as we have seen, on a different ground. Was there any agreement to release Moulton from liability for this—that is, the part performed; and if so, was there any agreement to take the other partner's individual promise in lieu of the promise of the firm, or anything which would amount to a consideration for the release of the firm?

If, by mutual arrangement between the plaintiff Collyer and the two defendants, Moulton had been released from his liability for the work already done, and a new promise made by Bromley, the other defendant, to pay for it, this would have been a valid release for a valuable consideration, one debt would have been substituted for the other. Thompson v. Percival, 5 B. & A. 925.⁵

But we cannot find sufficient evidence of any promise on the part of the other partner, Bromley, to assume the liability; and if there was none, then the release of liability for the work already done was without consideration, as it is not claimed that there was any other consideration.

We cannot find, however, any count in the declaration upon which, upon this view of the case, we can allow for anything except labor done before February 10th, the day of the giving of the notice.

Judgment for plaintiffs for amount so found due.

REDDING v. VOGT ET AL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1906. 140 N. C. 562, 53 S. E. 337.
6 Ann. Cas. 312.)

Special proceeding by Lillian Redding against Lucy R. Vogt and others for dower. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

WALKER, J.† The plaintiff seeks to have dower allotted in the lands described in her petition, and her right to the relief depends upon the construction and legal effect of the contracts and deeds mentioned in the statement of the case. * * * "To give a right of dower, the estate of the husband must confer a right to the immediate freehold. This is an essential requisite at the common law. Dower is not allowed in estates in reversion or remainder expectant upon an estate of freehold; and hence, if the estate of the husband be subject to an outstanding freehold estate, which remains undetermined during the coverture, no right of dower attaches." Houston v. Smith, 88 N. C. 312; 1 Scribner on Dower, 217.

Under this settled rule of the law the defendants contended that the plaintiff is not entitled to dower in the lands in question, because there is an outstanding freehold estate in Mrs. Redding by virtue of the deed of J. P. Redding and wife to Lizzie C. Redding, dated June 5, 1899, the contract between Lizzie C. Redding and S. A. Redding, dated June 5, 1899, and the deed of E. A. Brown and wife (formerly Lizzie C. Redding) to S. A. Redding, dated Nov. 18, 1901. The plaintiff, on the other hand insists that she is entitled to dower for either of two reasons: First, because by the agreement between Lizzie C. Redding and S. A. Redding dated October 3, 1898, the latter acquired an equitable estate in fee in so much of the land as is described in that agreement and that as, under our statute, a widow is now dowable in an equitable estate, contrary to the rule of the common law (Fortune v. Watkins, 94 N. C. 314), she is entitled to have her dower set apart in those lands; and, second, because the reservation of the life estate in the agreement of June 5, 1899, and the deed of Nov. 18, 1901, is to persons who were strangers to the contract and deed, and therefore void. In this conflict of views, as to the law of the case, our opinion is with the defendants. If the contract of October 3, 1898, had not been followed by that of June 5, 1899, and by the deed of the same date made in execution of it, there would be force in the plaintiff's contention, but it is apparent to us that the latter contract and deed were made as substitutes for the contract of October 3, 1898, and that, by the transactions between them, the parties clearly intended to rescind that contract and to give full force and effect to the latter contract and the deed made under it. That parties may rescind a contract, either expressly or by substituting another in its place which is so inconsistent with it that the two cannot well coexist and operate at one and the same time, cannot be doubted. Rights acquired under a contract may be abandoned or relinquished, either by agreement or by conduct clearly indicating such a purpose. Falls v. Carpenter, 21 N. C. 237, 28 Am. Dec. 592; Faw v. Whittington, 72 N. C. 321; Miller v. Pierce, 104 N. C. 389, 10 S. E. 554; Holden v. Purefoy, 108 N. C. 163, 12 S. E. 848; Taylor v. Taylor, 112 N. C. 27, 16 S. E. 924; Gorrell v. Alspaugh, 120 N. C. 368, 27 S. E. 85; May v. Getty (at the last term) 53 S. E. 75; Lipschutz v. Weatherly (at this term) 53 S. E. 132. A contract may be discharged by the substitution of a new contract, and this results (1) where a new contract is expressly substituted for the old one; (2) where a new contract is inconsistent with the old one; (3) where new terms are agreed upon, in which case a new contract is formed, consisting of the new terms and of the terms of the old contract which are consistent with them; and (4) where a new party is substituted for one of the original parties by agreement of all three. Clark on Contracts, p. 610, § 260. The authorities are numerous to the same effect. It was held in Cochecho Bank v. Perry, 52 Me. 293, that where parties make two contracts upon the same subject-matter, which cannot be reconciled without rejecting some of the material stipulations in one or the other or both, the court will not enter upon this work of expurgation, but will endeavor to give effect to the one contract or the other, as the intention of the parties shall seem to require. Substantially the same ruling was made in Stow v. Russell, 36 Ill. 18, and Chrisman v. Hodges, 75 Mo. 413. The principle is thus stated in Harrison v. Polar Star Lodge, 116 Ill. 287, 5 N. E. 546: "When the parties to a contract come to a fresh agreement of such a kind that the two cannot stand together, the effect of the second agreement is to rescind the first. This is one form of novatio in the Roman law. When an agreement is thus rescinded by novation, the contract in existence prior to the novation loses its individuality, and becomes merged in the new contract. Any circumstances or course of conduct from whence can be clearly deduced an agreement to put an end to the original contract will amount to a rescission of it." Fry on Specific Performance (3d Am. Ed.) 998, 1009 et seq. In Patmore v. Colburn, 1 C. M. & R. (Exch.) 65, Lord Lyndhurst said that, when the provisions of two contracts are inconsistent and the second cannot be operative if the first is still in existence, the first is no longer a subsisting agreement. Hart v. Lauman, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 410; Paul v. Meservey, 58 Me. 419. Many other decisions of the same import might be cited. If upon the facts of our case, therefore, we can gather that the parties intended the two contracts not to coexist, and the second was designed to take the place of the first, the former must be taken to embody the entire and final agreement of the parties. Mather v. Butler County, 28 Iowa, 253. * * *

It was impossible for the first and second transactions to stand together. By the first contract S. A. Redding acquired absolutely the entire interest and estate in one-half of the land; according to the very terms of the instrument, and by the second he was given only a remainder in one-half of that and other land; that is, a one-half interest therein subject to the life estate. His acceptance of the last contract is conclusively established by his taking the deed from his sister and thereupon entering into possession of the land and conveying a part of it to another. The first and second contracts could not, therefore, stand together, because the two estates conveyed are radically different; one being the entire fee, and the other only a remainder. If he claimed under the first contract, he must necessarily have rejected the second, and, if he claimed under the second contract and the deed made in fulfillment of it, he must just as surely have rejected the first contract. He acquired additional land under the second contract and the deed which he could not in good conscience keep and at the same time repudiate the provisions of the deed by virtue of which he asserted his right to it. If he had claimed under the first contract, the life estate excepted in the second contract and the deed to him would necessarily fail. When he claimed under the second contract and the deed, he thereby as fully recognized the existence of the life estate as if he had expressly done so by an instrument in due form of law, and those claiming under him will not be allowed to assert a right or title totally inconsistent with his deliberate choice so clearly manifested and in contravention of the just rights of others who must be held to have acquired interests, by virtue of his election which induced them to part with their land upon the faith of the rectitude of his conduct. The last contract and the deed made to S. A. Redding must be regarded as a substitute for the first contract and as a rescission of it; the two transactions being wholly irreconcilable. * * *

It follows that the plaintiff cannot have dower for want of the seisin of her husband; for the right of dower, as we have said, can attach only when the husband has the immediate estate of freehold, as well as the inheritance, and here the tenant for life was living at the death of the husband and at no time during the coverture could the latter have had the requisite seisin. Weir v. Humphries, 39 N. C. 264. * * *

Upon the consideration of the whole case, we conclude that S. A. Redding had no equitable estate in the land under the first contract.

at the time of his death, and no seisin sufficient to support the plaintiff's claim of dower. * * *

ADAMS v. BATTLE ET AL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1899. 125 N. C. 152, 34 S. E. 245.)

Action by Len H. Adams against R. H. Battle and J. N. Holding, executors of W. H. Pace, deceased. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J.⁷ On January 22, 1890, the plaintiff, by deed, conveyed a large amount of real and personal property to W. H. Pace, in trust to pay plaintiff's debts in the manner described, with power to collect, sell the property at private or public sale, and to do the usual duties of a trustee in such cases. Pace died in April, 1893, and this action was brought October 16, 1896; and it is agreed that the trust was closed in the lifetime of the trustee, except as to the matter controverted in this action. The deed provided that the trustee might retain 4 per cent. commissions on receipts and disbursements; that is, 8 per cent. on the total amount, which was $2,461.01. The defendants are the personal representatives of the trustee. The plaintiff was allowed to prove by parol that, some days after the deed was executed, Pace agreed with plaintiff that, if there was no litigation in the courts respecting the trust, he would charge only 2½ per cent. on receipts and disbursements. He also proved that there was no suit brought, and there is no evidence of any unusual trouble in executing the trust.

⁶"A subsequent contract completely covering the same subject-matter, and made by the same parties, as an earlier agreement, but containing terms inconsistent with the former, so that the two cannot stand together, rescinds, supersedes and is substituted for the earlier contract, and becomes the only agreement of the parties on the subject." Sanbern, J., in Housekeeper Pub. Co. v. Swift, 97 Fed. 290, 294 (1899).

In Taylor v. Hillary, 1 Cr. M. & R. 741 (1835), before breach of a contract of guarantee of the payment of goods to be supplied to one Holt, the plaintiff and defendant agreed to change the time of payment for the goods, and, the defendant having set up the new agreement as a defense to an action on the original contract, the court said:

"Before the breach of the first agreement a new agreement is entered into, varying the contract in an essential part, the time of payment. The latter, then, is a substituted contract, and is an answer to an action upon the former. The plea is not a plea of accord and satisfaction, and does not therefore require an averment of performance."

On rescission of contract by substitution of new contract between same parties, see 6 Ann. Cas. 315, note.

⁷Part of the opinion and all of the dissenting opinion of Furches, J., are omitted.

The defendants excepted to the admission of this parol evidence, and to the charge of the court in respect thereto. The verdict was for the plaintiff.

The defendants' contention is that the evidence is incompetent to prove that the parties agreed subsequently that the commissions should be less than specified in the deed, unless done in as solemn a manner as the deed was made; that is, under seal, under the maxim, "Eo ligamine quo ligatur." It seems that no verbal agreement contemporaneous with the execution of an instrument under seal will be heard to contradict or vary its terms. The effect of a subsequent agreement by the same parties has been much discussed by different courts, and in some of the states the matter is put to rest by legislation. But we are informed by counsel that the question has not yet been decided in our state, and we find no such decision.

It was an old, ironclad maxim of the common law that an obligor would only be released by an instrument of as high dignity as that by which he was bound; that is, being obligated by a seal, he could be released only by an instrument under seal. Technically this is the rule of modern times unless changed by statute, but practically it is seldom enforced.⁸ To this rule the exceptions were and are so numerous that seldom can the rule be applied. In an action on the bond or other sealed instrument, the debtor pleads and proves the actual receipt of the money by the obligee. No court could hesitate to hold this to be a release and discharge of the bond. Suppose the debt secured by a mortgage; a release and discharge need not be under seal. Suppose the principal of a note under seal pays the debt, and the sureties are sued on the same; would any court require them to show that their principal had been discharged under seal? Suppose, again, that a landlord leases land for a term of years under seal, and during the ⁸ "Where a contract under seal is altered by parol, it all becomes parol. Vicary v. Moore, 2 Watts 451. But a mere additional parol agreement, not changing or modifying the one under seal, will not have this effect. Ellmaker v. The Franklin Fire Ins. Co., 6 W. & Ser. 439. Nor will a stipulation by parol releasing or waiving performance of part of the covenant. McComb v. McKennan, 2 W. & Ser. 217. 'The test of collision,' said Chief Justice Gibson in Ellmaker v. The Insurance Co., 'was the capacity of the two contracts to be executed together. Where that can be done, the one is not substituted for the other, and where there is in fact substitution it operates as abandonment, the specialty being relinquished, except as matter of reference, for the terms of the parol contract which has supplanted it.'" Knox, J., in Lawall v. Rader, 24 Pa. St. 283, 285 (1855).

"Verbal or written, or in part verbal and in part written, a contract not attested by seal is only parol, but the written part, being the better evidence, excludes spoken words contradicting the written part or contrary to it." Jenks, J., in Schwartzman v. Pines Rubber Co., 179 N. Y. Supp. 284, 286 (1919).

On subsequent parol agreement to vary a writing, see 56 Am. St. Rep. 659, note.

term the premises are greatly damaged without any fault of the lessee, or that they have greatly depreciated in value, or have become partially unfit for the purpose intended, and the landlord, conscious of these and similar facts, agrees verbally with the lessee that for the balance of the term he will take less rent than is stipulated in the deed; would not the lessee be protected by such agreement? If proof of payment will discharge, why should not an agreement to discharge have the same effect between the same original parties?

It seems difficult to find a case where the parties, bound to each other by an instrument under seal, will not be discharged by parol proof of facts, if they are sufficient in themselves to constitute a discharge. In such matters the defenses are performance in pais, and are probably of more value to business men than the dignity of being sheltered by a seal. The chief reasons for the sacredness of the seal have ceased since statutes and courts of equity have been liberally removing the hard places of the common law. The dignity of the seal is due more to the original form of the instrument than to the real interest and intention of the parties.

Whether the trustee intended to retain 8 per cent. commissions we are not informed, as he had recently before his death closed the other trust matters; nor is this very material now. He was a practicing attorney, and understood technicalities of the law, and we must assume that when he made the parol agreement he did so in good faith. We are led to the conclusion that the evidence was admissible, and that the charge of the court was not erroneous. The result seems to be full justice, without the infringement of any sound principle of law. * * *

*Affirmed.*⁹

"The rule that a sealed contract cannot be varied by a subsequent parol agreement is of great antiquity, the maxim on which it rests, unumquodque dissolvitur eodem modo quo ligatur, being one of the most ancient in our law. * * * But in this country it has become a well settled exception to the rule that a sealed contract may be modified by a subsequent parol agreement, if the latter has been executed, or has been so acted on that the enforcing of the original contract would be inequitable." Young, J., in Stees v. Leonard, 20 Minn. 494, 508-509 (1874).

"It is a necessary consequence of our changed system of procedure that whatever formerly would have constituted a good ground in equity for restraining the enforcement of a covenant, or decreeing its discharge, will now constitute a good equitable defence to an action on the covenant itself. It was one of the subtle distinctions of the common law as to the discharge of covenants by matter in pais, that although a specialty before breach could not be discharged by a parol agreement, although founded on a good consideration, nor even by an accord and satisfaction, yet after breach the damages, if unliquidated, could be discharged by an executed parol agreement, because,

THACKERAY v. KNIGHT ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Utah, 1926. 192 Pac. 263.)

Suit by George Thackeray against Elizabeth A. Knight and others. From a judgment and decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

CORFMAN, C. J.¹⁰ Plaintiff brought suit against the defendants in the district court of Morgan county, Utah, for the specific performance of a written agreement entered into by defendants Elizabeth Ann Knight, Mary Jane Wickle, and Agnes Irene Adkins with the plaintiff for the conveyance of real estate and water stock which the said defendants had subsequently thereto contracted to convey to the defendant Gibson A. Condie. * * *

It appears beyond dispute that by the terms of the contract between the parties the plaintiff was entitled to a conveyance of the property by a warranty deed. That was to impliedly say a title free and clear of all incumbrance. It is an admitted fact that the property was incumbered by a pipe line owned or claimed by John E. Condie, a third party. The defendants failed to have the pipe line removed from the premises. Thereupon, although there is some conflict in the evidence on this point, the plaintiff asserted he would not take the property, and on at least two occasions, March 20th and April 7th, demanded the money back which he had paid under the contract. The court so finds, and we think the great weight of the testimony justifies this finding.

Acting on the plaintiff's representation that he would not take the property and the demand made for a return of the money, the defendants Knight, Wickle, and Adkins thereupon proceeded to negotiate with, and entered into a contract on April 10th for the sale of the property to Gibson A. Condie for $1,500. That this contract was entered into in good faith by the defendants Knight, Wickle, and Adkins, they believing and relying on the representations of the plaintiff that he would not take the property, and that he wanted his money returned, there can be no doubt from the facts and circumstances as detailed by the record.

as was said, in the latter case the cause of action is founded 'not merely on the deed, but on the deed and the subsequent wrong.' Broom's Legal Maxims, 848, and cases cited. * * * The technical distinction between a satisfaction before or after breach seems to have been disregarded in this state, and a new agreement by parol, followed by actual performance of the substituted agreement, whether made and executed before or after breach, is treated as a good accord and satisfaction of the covenant. Fleming v. Gilbert, 3 John. 530; Lattimore v. Harsen, 14 id. 330; Dearborn v. Cross, 7 Cow. 48; Allen v. Jaquish, Cowen, J., 21 Wend. 633. So, also, a new agreement, although without performance, if based on a good consideration, will be a satisfaction, if accepted as such. Kromer v. Heim, 75 N. Y. 574, and cases cited." Andrews, J., in McCreery v. Day, 119 N. Y. 1, 8-9 (1889).

Immediately after the contract had been entered into with Gibson A. Condie the said defendant advised the plaintiff that they had raised the necessary funds to return to him his money; that it had been deposited in a Salt Lake City bank, where he could call and get it upon surrender of his contract. Not until after the defendants had thus placed themselves in a position, by reason of their acting on plaintiff's representation that he would not take the property and a demand for the return of his money, did the plaintiff announce his purpose of requiring performance of the contract of sale with him.

As a legal proposition, there can be no doubt but that an executory contract with respect to real property may not be rescinded nor discharged, unless by act or operation of law, where neither party is in default, without some form of written agreement entered into between the contracting parties. Our statute (section 4874), supra, is to that effect, and the following cases, cited and relied on by plaintiff, so hold: Barrett v. Durbin, 106 Ark. 332, 153 S. W. 265; Woolen v. Sloan, 94 Wash. 551, 162 Pac. 985; Grunow v. Salter, 118 Mich. 148, 76 N. W. 325; Finner v. McVay, 37 Mont. 306, 96 Pac. 340, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 879, 15 Ann. Cas. 1175; Carr v. Williams, 17 Kan. 575; Bennett v. Harrison, 115 Minn. 342, 132 N. W. 309; Brown v. Brown, 194 Mich. 578, 161 N. W. 823; Cutwright v. Savings & Inv. Co., 33 Utah, 493, 94 Pac. 984, 14 Ann. Cas. 725. But where there is a breach or abandonment of a contract by either party, the rule as held by the great weight of authority is otherwise. There can be no question but that the defendants had defaulted under their contract in failing to remove the incumbrance of a pipe line upon the real property. The plaintiff had a right to demand its removal because the defendants had contracted to transfer to him the property unincumbered and without defect, when they agreed to convey by warranty deed. The defendants being in default in that regard, the plaintiff had a legal right to rescind the contract without the consent of the defendants in writing or otherwise. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 643; 39 Cyc. 1408, 1404; 2 Black on Rescission, § 560; 13 C. J. 601, § 624; Pool v. Motter, 185 Pac. 715; Obrecht v. Neilson Land & Water Co., 44 Utah, 270, 140 Pac. 117.

We cannot conceive of a more effective way for a party to rescind a contract than that used by plaintiff in the present instance—asserting that he did not intend to take the property and demanding a return of his money. Then, again, under the facts and circumstances, there are equitable principles involved that we think estop the plaintiff from insisting on a specific performance of the contract now under consideration.

As pointed out, the defendants, Knight, Wickle, and Adkins, in contracting with and by accepting the defendant Condie's money, placed themselves in a position whereby they are now unable to perform their contract with the plaintiff. This was done without knowledge on the part of the defendant Condie, and by reason of the plaintiff leading them to believe that he would not take the property and by making a demand for a return of his money. As a matter of equity one party may not induce another by his representations and demands to act to his prejudice, and then complain of the other's conduct, when he has thus performed in good faith and with good intentions.

The law applicable to the facts and circumstances of this case was quoted with approval in the opinion of Mr. Justice Frick in Cutwright v. Savings & Inv. Co., supra, from 2 Warvelle on Vendors (2d Ed.), which reads:

"It has been held in some of the earlier cases that an agreement to rescind is as much an agreement concerning land as the original contract, and hence should be in writing; but all the later cases, both in England and the United States, are unanimous in affirming that a contract in writing, and by law required to be in writing, may in equity be rescinded by parol, and this even though the contract may have been under seal. Such rescission may be effected, not only by an express agreement, but by any course of conduct clearly indicating a mutual assent to the termination or abandonment of the contract. It may consist either of words or acts, and all the circumstances attending may be shown to prove intention; but if evidenced by acts alone they must be such as leave no doubt as to such intention."

For the reasons stated, we are of the opinion that the conduct of the plaintiff was such as a matter of law to amount to a rescission of the contract sued upon. The defendants Knight, Wickle, and Adkins in good faith acted upon and treated plaintiff's conduct as a rescission, and thereupon placed themselves in a position in which they were unable to perform. The defendant Condie entered into his contract with the defendants, and paid his money to them also without knowledge that the plaintiff would demand performance of his contract, all resulting from the acts of the plaintiff in declaring that he would not take the property, and by demanding a return of his money. Under these circumstances the trial court was, in our opinion, fully justified in withholding from the plaintiff a decree of specific performance.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment and decree of the district court be affirmed, with costs to the defendants.

BLAKE'S CASE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1605. 6 Coke, 43 b.)

Eden brought a writ of covenant against Blake, assignee of Price, and the breach was for not repairing of the house; the defendant pleaded an accord between him and the plaintiff, and execution thereof in satisfactione and exonerations decasus reparationum predict',¹¹ upon which the plaintiff demurred. * * *

But it was resolved¹² by the whole court that the defendant's plea was good in the case at bar; for there is a difference, when a duty accrues by the deed in certainty, tempore confectionis scripti, as by covenant, bill, or bond, to pay a sum of money, there this certain duty takes its essence and operation originally and solely by the writing; and therefore it ought to be avoided by a matter of as high a nature, although the duty be merely in the personalty; but when no certain duty accrues by the deed, but a wrong or default subsequent, together with the deed, gives an action to recover damages which are only in the personalty for such wrong or default, accord with satisfaction is a good plea; as in the case at bar, the covenant doth not give the plaintiff at the time of the making of it any cause of action, but the wrong or default after in not repairing of the house, together with the deed, gives an action to recover damages for default of reparations. And forasmuch as the end of the action is but to have amends and damages in the personalty for this wrong, therefore amends and satisfaction given the plaintiff is a good plea. For the action is not merely grounded on the deed, but also on the deed and the wrong subsequent, which wrong is the cause of the action, and for which damages shall be recovered. * * *

ELIZABETH CASE v. JAMES BARBER.

(Court of King's Bench, 1681. Thomas Raymond, 450.)

The plaintiff declares in an indebitatus assumpsit for £20 for meat, drink, washing, and lodging for the defendant's wife, provided for her 11 "Accord is an agreement between two at the least, to satisfy an offence that the one hath made to the other, when a man hath done a trespass or such like unto another; for the which hee hath agreed with him to satisfy and content him with some recompence, which if it bee executed and performed, then because that this recompence is a full satisfaction for the offence, it shall be a good barre in the law, if the other after the accord performed, should sue againe any action for the same trespass.

"Note, that the first is properly called an accord, the other a contract." Les Termes De La Ley (1629 Ed.).

Professor Ames has shown that accord in that sense, i. e., accord and satisfaction of a tort, has existed "from time immemorial." Ames, Lectures on Legal History, pp. 110-111, citing a Year Book case as early as 1273-1274. As it existed long before bilateral contracts were recognized and enforced, accord was used in the sense of an offer, sealed or unsealed, to give or receive the designated satisfaction. Today the ordinary accord consists of mutual promises, and the unsealed and therefore revocable offer as to satisfaction, which is like the accord of days before bilateral contracts were recognized and enforced, is no longer deemed worthy of being called an accord. See 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1838. As to a sealed offer, however, see Young v. Jones, reported post, p. 1403 and note.

¹² Part of the report is omitted.

at the request of the defendant, and lays it two other ways. The defendant pleads that after making the said promise, etc., and before for exhibiting the said bill, viz., such a day, it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant, and one Jacob Barber his son, that the plaintiff should deliver to the defendant divers clothes of the defendant's wife then in her custody, and that the plaintiff should accept the said Jacob, the son, for her debtor for £9, to be paid as soon as the said Jacob should receive his pay due from his Majesty, as lieutenant of the ship called the "Happy Return," in full satisfaction and discharge of the premises in the declaration mentioned; and avers that the plaintiff the same time did deliver to the defendant the said clothes, and that she accepted the said Jacob, the son, her debtor for the said £9, and that the said son agreed to pay the same to the plaintiff accordingly; and that the said Jacob afterwards, and as soon as he received his pay as aforesaid, viz., 27 April, 32 Car. 2, was ready, and offered to pay the said £9, and the plaintiff refused to receive it; and that the said Jacob hath always since been, and still is ready to pay the same, if the said plaintiff will receive it. Et hoc paratus, etc. The plaintiff demurs.

And it is alleged by the defendant's counsel that the plea is good; for though in Peyto's case, and formerly, it hath been held that an accord cannot be pleaded unless it appears to be executed, 9 Co. 79 b, 3 Cro. 46, pl. 2, yet of late it hath been held that upon mutual promises an action lies, and consequently, there being equal remedy on both sides, an accord may be pleaded without execution as well as an arbitrament, and by the same reason that an arbitrament is a good plea without performance; to which the court agreed,¹³ for the reason of the law being changed, the law is thereby changed; and anciently remedy was not given for mutual promises, which now is given; and for this reason, Mich. 18 Car. B. R. Palmer v. Lawson, ante. In indebitatus assumpsit against an executor upon a contract made by the testator, the defendant pleads judgment in debt upon simple contract against him for the debt of the testator, and after argument resolved a good plea; because, though in debt against an executor upon a simple contract the defendant may demur, yet when he admits the demand, and executors are now liable to pay such debts in action upon the case, the judgment so obtained was pleadable; so Vaughan, Rep. Dee v. Edgcomb.

But in this case at bar judgment was given for the plaintiff for two reasons:

1 Because it doth not appear that there is any consideration that

¹³ But in Allen v. Harris (1701), reported ante, p. 428, though this case was cited to the court, it was held that an arbitrament differed from an accord, "For, per curiam, if arbitrament be pleaded with mutual promises to perform it, though the party has not performed his part who brings the action, yet he shall maintain his action; because arbitrament is like a judgment, and the party may have his remedy upon it. But upon accord no remedy lies."

the son should pay the £9, but only an agreement without any consideration.

2. Admit the agreement would bind, yet now by the statute of frauds and perjuries, 29 Car. 2, this agreement ought to be in writing, or else the plaintiff could have no remedy thereon; and though upon such an agreement the plaintiff need not set forth the agreement to be in writing, yet when the defendant pleads such an agreement in bar, he must plead it so as it may appear to the court that an action will lie upon it, for he shall not take away the plaintiff's present action, and not give him another upon the agreement pleaded.

C. R. METCALF v. W. M. KENT, APPELLANT.

Action upon a written contract to recover commissions for the sale of real estate. Defendant answered, admitting the execution of the contract, and alleging that it was without consideration, that plaintiff failed to perform his part, and that a full settlement had been made with plaintiff. At the conclusion of the evidence, the court, on a motion of the plaintiff, directed a verdict for plaintiff for the amount claimed, and rendered judgment thereon. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

GIVEN, J.¹⁴ * * * II. As to the alleged settlement, the defendant testifies as follows: "I met Mr. Metcalf the day I sold the farm after the contract was drawn up; met him in front of the First National Bank in Sac City; and I told him that I had sold my farm. 'Now,' I says, 'you had better come up, and give me up my contract.' He says: 'That don't amount to anything. I don't charge you any commission.' I says, 'All right, I will set up the cigars and call it square.' He says, 'That is all right, sir.' Mr. Tom Riddinough was present at this conversation. Since that time there has been no conversation between Mr. Metcalf and myself concerning this matter; nothing more than I spoke to him here some time ago, after he had sued me, and I asked him what he done it for, was all the conversation we had." Riddinough testifies: "Mr. Kent says to Mr. Metcalf, 'I sold my farm.' Mr. Metcalf says, 'Is that so?' and he says, 'Yes, and I thought I would get my contract.' Mr. Metcalf says: 'That contract is no account. I don't charge anything for it.' Mr. Kent pulled out a cigar, 'If that is all you charge, I will treat you, and call it square.' Mr. Metcalf says, 'That is all right.'" We have seen that under the contract and the fact of the sale to Gregory defendant was liable to plaintiff for the commission named on the $8,400.

¹⁴ Parts of the opinion are omitted.

In this case there was a mutuality, and hence a contract, irrevocable except by consent of the parties. The cases cited by plaintiff's counsel sustain the claim that the release of an existing indebtedness is a new contract, and, to be binding, must be based upon a consideration. It is not seriously contended that the cigar was given or received as a consideration for the claimed release. Surely, such a trifle as that could not have been so intended. In determining whether the court erred in ordering a verdict, we do not consider plaintiff's evidence denying that there was any settlement or release. Accepting the evidence for defendant as true, it fails to show any consideration for the alleged release. Therefore, though made as claimed, it is not binding, and is no bar to plaintiff's right to recover. There was no error in sustaining plaintiff's motion for a verdict, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.¹⁵

YOUNG v. JONES.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1875. 64 Me. 563, 18 Am. Rep. 279.)

APPLETON, C. J.† This is an action of assumpsit upon an accepted draft. After the plaintiff had made out his case the defendant offered to prove an agreement under the hand and seal of the plaintiff, after the maturity of the draft, to accept a certain percentage less than the amount of the draft, in payment thereof; and to transfer to some third person his debt, on receipt of the same within a certain space of time; that the percentage agreed upon was tendered within the time limited, and that the plaintiff refused to accept the same, and brought this action. [This evidence the trial court held to be inadmissible.]

The material question in whether these facts, if proved, would constitute a defense to this suit.

It is manifest they would not show payment. The plaintiff was to transfer his debt to a person agreed upon. The debt to be assigned must exist. If the debt was to be regarded by the parties as paid or discharged, it would cease to be a debt, and consequently would cease to be transferable. But as it was to be transferred, it is manifest that ¹⁵ In Thurber v. Sprague, 17 R. I. 634 (1892), a father made, as trustee for his minor son, a deposit in a savings bank. After coming of age in 1885, the son demanded the deposit of his father, who said: "I never want to hear of this matter again. I made the change of investment supposing that it was for the best, but it was not. * * * If you are not satisfied and want the $500, take it and go; but if you remain here I do not want to hear of it again." The son, after this, remained at home and was supported by his father until the father's death in 1888. In an action for the five hundred dollars, brought by the son against the father's executors, it was held that the facts showed a complete accord and satisfaction.

† The statement of facts is omitted.

neither its payment nor its discharge was in the contemplation of the parties. It was to be held by the assignee for ulterior purposes.

Neither do the facts offered to be proved show accord and satisfaction. The agreement relied upon was executory. In Hawley v. Foote, 19 Wend. 517, it was held not a good plea of accord and satisfaction that the plaintiff agreed to accept the note of a third person in discharge of the demand in suit, which on being tendered him, he refused to accept, "There has been no satisfaction," observes Bronson, J., "the accord has not been executed and the action is not barred." Russell v. Lytle, 6 Wend. 390; Com. Dig., B. 4. It has been said that a different rule was laid down in Coit v. Houston, 3 Johns. Cas. 247, but the remark is not well founded. The question there was one of evidence, not of pleading. Thompson, J., said, "There were circumstances from which the jury might infer an actual acceptance at the place where the coal lay and that they were there at the risk of the plaintiff." The plea of accord to be good, must show an accord not executory at some future time, but one executed. Cushing v. Wyman, 44 Me. 121. A mere readiness to perform the accord, or tender of performance, will not suffice, and a plea of accord tendered has been held bad on demurrer.¹⁶ A plea of accord and satisfaction must allege not only a clear agreement or accord, but that it was executed by the acceptance of the matter agreed upon in satisfaction. Hearn v. Kiehl, 38 Pa. 147. The facts do not show a consummate payment. Mansure v. Keaton, 46 Me. 346.

The tender, if there was one, cannot avail the defendant as it has not been brought into court.

The remedy of the defendant is upon his contract, if the plaintiff has failed to perform it.¹⁷

*Exceptions overruled.*¹⁸

¹⁶ "Mere readiness to perform the accord, or a tender of performance, or even a part performance and a readiness to perform the rest, is not sufficient. Prest v. Cole, 183 Mass. 283, 67 N. While that remark was made in successfully combatting the use of the word "accord" to apply to a revocable offer of a creditor to accept, or of a debtor to give, something as

DAY v. McLEA.

(Court of Appeal, 1889. 22 Q. B. D. 610.)

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of contract. The defence was that the plaintiffs had agreed to accept and had accepted £102 18s. 6d., in full satisfaction of all demands in respect of the breach. It appeared that, after the breach, the plaintiffs made a claim on the defendants, who thereupon sent them a check for £102 18s. 6d., being less than the amount claimed, stating that it was "in full of all demands," and enclosing a receipt in that form for signature by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs wrote in reply that they took the check on account, and had placed it to the defendants' credit, at the same time enclosing a receipt on account, and asking for a check for the balance of the claim. In answer to this letter the defendants wrote stating that the payment was made in full of all demands, and asking for a receipt in full. It was contended on behalf of the defendants that the keeping of the check by the plaintiffs was in law an accord and satisfaction of the claim. Charles, J., held that there was no accord and satisfaction, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

LORD ESHER, M. R. This was an action to recover damages for breach of contract. The plaintiffs were claiming a considerable sum as damages, and, before action brought, the defendants sent them a check for £102 18s. 6d., being less than the amount claimed, with a form of receipt, to be signed by the plaintiffs, that this sum was accepted in full satisfaction of the claim. The plaintiffs kept the check but refused to accept it in satisfaction, and sent a receipt on account. It was contended that the keeping of the check so sent was, as a matter of law, an accord and satisfaction of the claim, and that the plaintiffs were bound either to take it in full satisfaction or to return it. The contention, therefore, was that the plaintiffs having kept the check must be taken in law to have accepted it in satisfaction. Upon the other side it was contended that the keeping of the check could only be evidence of accord and satisfaction, and that whether or not it was taken in satisfaction was a question of fact to be determined according to the circumstances of the case. That argument raises the question whether the fact of keeping a check sent in satisfaction of a claim for a larger amount is in law conclusive that there has been an accord and satisfaction. It is said that that inference of law must be satisfaction, it seems to go too far in excluding unilateral sealed contracts by the creditor to accept something as satisfaction from the debtor where the debtor is not bound to give it, as seemingly was true in the principal case. Such sealed offers, though unilateral rather than bilateral contracts, seem fairly entitled to be called accords.

drawn even though the person receiving the check never intends to take it in satisfaction and says so at the time he receives it. All I can say is that if that is a conclusive inference it would be one contrary to the truth. I object to all such inferences of law. This very question, however, came before this court in [1879 in the unreported case of] Miller v. Davies. In that case the action was upon a solicitor's bill of costs for £50, and there was a plea of accord and satisfaction. Before action the defendant sent the plaintiff a check for £25, with a letter stating that, in order to put an end to the matter, he sent the check for £25, on the terms that the plaintiff would receive it in settlement. The plaintiff kept the check and cashed it, and wrote to the defendant that he declined to accept it in settlement and that he required a check for the balance. The defendant thereupon wrote in reply requesting the plaintiff to return the check if he would not accept it in satisfaction. The jury found that there was no accord and satisfaction. It was contended there as in the present case that the fact of the plaintiff keeping the check was conclusive in law that he had taken it in accord and satisfaction of the claim, inasmuch as it had been sent in satisfaction and the plaintiff was bound either to keep it upon the terms on which it had been sent or to return it. This court, however, held that the fact of keeping the check was not conclusive in law, that the question was one of fact, and that the jury having found that there was no accord and satisfaction the court would not interfere. That case is clearly in point. The question, therefore, whether there has been an accord and satisfaction is one of fact. It was for the judge to decide whether the plaintiffs agreed to take £102 18s. 6d., in satisfaction of their claim. The learned judge has found that fact in favor of the plaintiffs, and consequently this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L. J. I am of the same opinion. It seems to me, as a matter of principle as well as authority, that the question whether there is an accord and satisfaction must be one of fact. If a person sends a sum of money on the terms that it is to be taken, if at all, in satisfaction of a larger claim; and if the money is kept, it is a question of fact as to the terms upon which it is so kept. Accord and satisfaction imply an agreement to take the money in satisfaction of the claim in respect of which it is sent. If accord is a question of agreement, there must be either two minds agreeing or one of the two persons acting in such a way as to induce the other to think that the money is taken in satisfaction of the claim, and to cause him to act upon that view. In either case it is a question of fact. Therefore, upon principle, as well as upon the authority of the case of Miller v. Davies, which has been brought to our notice, the judgment of Charles, J., must be affirmed.

FRY, L. J. I also agree that the case of Miller v. Davies is conclusive upon the point of law.

*Appeal dismissed.*¹⁹

WHITTAKER CHAIN TREAD CO. v STANDARD AUTO SUPPLY CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1913. 216 Mass. 204, 103 N. E. 695, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 315, Ann. Cas. 1915 A, 949.)

LORING, J. The plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant goods to the amount of $80.03. The defendant undertook to return a part of the goods sold, of the value of $50.02. The plaintiff disputed its right to do so and refused to receive the goods from the teamster through whom the defendant undertook to make the return. While matters were in this condition the defendant sent the plaintiff a check for $30.01, which was admittedly due and which the defendant stated was in full settlement of the account. The plaintiff cashed the check and on the following day notified the defendant that it had done so, and demanded payment of $50.02, the balance claimed by it to be due after crediting the amount of the check as a payment on account. The judge found that the defendant had no right to return the goods which it attempted to return, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the $50.02 due from them unless it was barred by cashing the check.

Cases in which debtors have undertaken to force a settlement upon their creditors by sending a check in full discharge of a disputed ¹⁹ "We were pressed with Day v. McLea, 22 Q. B. D. 610, where the debtor himself sent a cheque for an amount smaller than that of the debt to the creditor on the terms that it should be in satisfaction of the debt. In that case, there being no consideration for the discharge of the balance of the debt, it was held that the creditor could retain the money, and sue for the balance. The same reasoning does not apply where the money is sent by a stranger, in which case it can only be accepted on the terms upon which it is sent. In the former case the creditor can reply to the debtor, 'you owe me more than this, and, if you sue for a return of this, I shall set off my larger claim against it.' In the latter case, the creditor has no excuse or justification for retaining the stranger's money, unless he complies with the condition on which it was paid. I agree with Fletcher Moulton, L. J., that the plaintiffs cannot be heard to say that they have acted dishonestly when an honest construction can be put upon their conduct by treating their acceptance and retention of the money as being upon the terms on which it was offered." Farwell, L. J., in Higachand Punamchand v. Temple, [1911] 2 K. B. 330, 342. In that case the father of the debtor sent a draft for less than the amount of the son's debt, offering it in full settlement. The creditor cashed the draft but merely credited it on account. He was denied recovery of the balance of the debt. See Sigler v. Sigler, reported post, p. 1412.

account have given rise to more than one question upon which there is a conflict in the authorities.

In Day v. McLea, 22 Q. B. D. 610, it was decided by the Court of Appeal in England that a creditor who cashes a check sent in full settlement is not barred from contending that he did not agree to take it on the terms on which it was sent if at the time he accepts it he says that he takes it on account. The ground of that decision was that to make out the defence of accord and satisfaction the debtor must prove an agreement by the creditor to take the sum paid in settlement of the account, and that if the creditor in taking the check notifies the debtor that he accepts it on account and that he refuses to accept it in full settlement, the debtor as matter of law has not proved an agreement on the part of the creditor to accept the check in satisfaction of the claim, but that that question must be decided by the jury. This doctrine is upheld in 17 Harvard Law Review, at p. 469, and in the case of Goldsmith v. Lichtenberg, 139 Mich. 163. See also in this connection Krauser v. McCurdy, 174 Penn. St. 174; Kistler v. Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad, 88 Ind. 460.

But the true rule is to the contrary. The true rule is put with accuracy in Nassoioy v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326, 331, in these words: "The plaintiff could only accept the money as it was offered, which was in satisfaction of his demand. He could not accept the benefit and reject the condition, for if he accepted at all, it was cum onere. When he indorsed and collected the check, referred to in the letter asking him to sign the enclosed receipt in full, it was the same, in legal effect, as if he had signed and returned the receipt, because acceptance of the check was a conclusive election to be bound by the condition upon which the check was offered." And to that effect is the weight of authority. Nassoioy v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326; Washington N. Gas Co. v. Johnson, 123 Penn. St. 576; Partridge Lumber Co. v. Phelps-Burruss Lumber & Coal Co., 91 Neb. 396; Neely v. Thompson, 68 Kan. 193; Hull v. Johnson, 22 R. I. 66; Cunningham v. Standard Construction Co., 134 Ky. 198; Canton Union Coal Co. v. Parlin, 215 Ill. 244; Petit v. Woodlief, 115 N. C. 120; Pollman & Brothers Coal & Sprinkling Co. v. St. Louis, 145 Mo. 651; Potter v. Douglass, 44 Conn. 541; Cooper v. Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad, 82 Miss. 634. Barham v. Kizzia, 100 Ark. 251; Thomas v. Columbia Phonograph Co., 144 Wis. 470; Sparks v. Spaulding Manuf. Co., 158 Iowa, 491. See also in this connection McDaniels v. Bank of Rutland, 29 Vt. 230; Hutton v. Stoddard, 83 Ind. 539; Creighton v. Gregory, 142 Cal. 34.

Indeed the decision in Day v. McLea, ubi supra, was explained by the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Hirachand Punamechand v. Temple, [1911] 2 K. B. 330, and made to rest not on the lack of agreement, but on the lack of consideration.

But in cases (like the case at bar) where there is a dispute as to the amount due under a contract and payment of an amount which he (the debtor) admits to be due (that is to say, as to which there is no dispute) is made by the debtor in discharge of the whole contract, further and other questions arise.

The question whether the creditor who under these circumstances accepts such a payment, protesting that he takes it on account, is or is not barred, is a question upon which again the authorities are in conflict. It was held in the following cases that a creditor in such a case is barred: Nassoiv v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326; Ostrander v. Scott, 161 Ill. 339; Tanner v. Merrill, 108 Mich. 58; ²⁰ Neely v. Thompson, 68 Kans. 193; Treat v. Price, 48 Neb. 875; Hull v. Johnson, 22 R. I. 66; Cunningham v. Standard Construction Co., 134 Ky. 198; Pollman & Brothers Coal & Sprinkling Co. v. St. Louis, 145 Mo. 651. See also in this connection Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway v. Clark, 178 U. S. 353.²¹ But in the following cases it was held that he was not barred: Demeules v. Jewel Tea Co., 103 Minn. 150;† Seattle, Renton & Southern Railway v. Seattle-Tacoma Power Co., 63 Wash. 639; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Cottingham, 103 Md. 319. See also in this connection Chrystal v. Gerlach, 25 So. Dak. 128; Robinson v. Leatherbee Tie & Lumber Co., 120 Ga. 901; Watson v. F. D. Calkins Co., 119 Iowa, 150; Weidner v. Standard Life & Accident Ins. Co., 130 Wis. 10; Louisville, N. A. & C. Railway v. Helm & Bruce, 109 Ky. 388.

The decision in most of these cases was made to turn upon the question whether payment of the amount admitted to be due without dispute did not constitute a valid consideration for the discharge of the balance of the debt about which there was a dispute. If that were the only question involved in the case at bar it would be necessary to consider whether Tuttle v. Tuttle, 12 Met. 551, is in conflict with the well settled law of the Commonwealth that a promise to pay one for doing that which he was under a prior legal duty to the promisee to do is not binding for want of a valid consideration. The cases are collected in Parrot v. Mexican Central Railway, 207 Mass. 184, 194.

Tuttle v. Tuttle, ubi supra, was a case in which the holder of a note made an express agreement to forego a claim which he had made to interest on the note in consideration of payment of the balance of the principal then unpaid. It was a question whether he was entitled to interest, but there was no question of his right to the principal. It was held that this agreement was a bar to any claim for interest on the note. There was no discussion in the opinion as to the lack or validity of a consideration. But the point was involved in the decision.

²⁰ Tanner v. Merrill is reported ante, p. 416.

²¹ That payment of an admittedly due part of a disputed claim in full settlement, will satisfy the claim if the dispute is in good faith, see also Janci v. Cerny, 287 Ill. 359 (1919). See, further, note 160, page 418, ante. But "the payment of an admitted liability is not a payment of or a consideration for an alleged accord and satisfaction of another and independent alleged liability." Chase, J., in Mance v. Hossington, 205 N. Y. 33, 36 (1912).

† Demeules v. Jewel Tea Co. is reported ante, p. 418.

In the case at bar there was no express agreement by the creditor to forego the balance of his claim on receiving payment of the amount admitted without dispute to be due. The only way in which such an agreement can be made out in the case at bar is on the ground that the plaintiff had to take the check sent him on the condition on which it was sent, and that by cashing the check he elected to accept the condition and so took the part admittedly due in full discharge of the whole debt.²² But while the doctrine of election is sound where ²² "The check was tendered on condition it, and the notes which accompanied it, should be accepted in satisfaction of the unliquidated disputed claim. The acceptance and retention of the check involved the acceptance of the condition upon which it was offered, and the law will not permit the appellees to escape that conclusion so long as they retain the check. Ostrander v. Scott, supra, [161 Ill. 339] exemplifies this doctrine. In that case appellants enclosed by mail to appellees a check, and in an accompanying letter advised them the check was tendered in settlement of the account in full and should be so accepted or returned. Appellees (in that case) replied that they retained the check as a payment in the amount thereof, and demanded remittance of the balance of such account. The doctrine of the case is that the legal effect of the act of retaining the check was an acceptance of the same on the conditions upon which it was tendered. In Fuller v. Kemp, 138 N. Y. 238, which involved the same principle, it was said: 'The tender and the condition could not be dissevered. The one could not be taken and the other rejected. The acceptance of the money involved the acceptance of the condition, and the law will not permit any other inference to be drawn from the transaction. Under such circumstances the assent of the creditor to the terms proposed by the debtor will be implied, and no words of protest can affect the legal quality of this act.' And in McDaniels v. Bank, 29 Vt. 230, the court said: 'When a party makes an offer of a certain sum to settle a claim, when the sum in controversy is open and unliquidated, and he attaches to his offer the condition that the same, if taken at all, must be received in full satisfaction of the claim in dispute, and the party receives the money, he takes it subject to the condition attached to it, and it will operate as an accord and satisfaction. * * * The mere act of receiving the money is an agreement to accept the same on the conditions upon which it was offered.' The doctrine of these cases is applicable here." Boggs, J., in Lapp v. Smith, 183 Ill. 179, 184-185 (1899).

On part payment as satisfaction of a disputed claim, see Ann. Cas. 1915 A, 951, note.

See Wilcox, Ives & Co. v. Rogers, 13 Ga. App. 410, 79 S. E. 219 (1913), where cotton was sent to the holder of a note on condition that if he sold the cotton under certain circumstances, the note must be deemed paid in full, and where a plea of accord and satisfaction to the action on the note, the sale having occurred and the proceeds being less than the amount of the note, was held good on the ground that the defendant "had a right to dictate the conditions upon which it [the cotton] should be received, and the plaintiffs were bound to comply with his terms upon their acceptance of the cotton." See also the machinery case of Walters v. Glendenning, 87 Wis. 250 (1894), to the same effect.

a check is sent in full discharge of a claim no part of which is admitted to be due, it does not obtain where a debtor undertakes to make payment of that which he admits to be due conditioned on its being accepted in discharge of what is in dispute. Such a condition, under those circumstances, is one which the debtor has no right to impose, and for that reason is void. In such a case the creditor is not put to an election to refuse the payment or to take it on the condition on which it is offered. He can take the payment admittedly due free of the void condition which the debtor has sought to impose. Take an example: Suppose the defendant had agreed to deliver to the plaintiff a stipulated quantity of iron for a stipulated price during each month of the year, and after six months the market price of iron was double that stipulated for in the contract. Suppose further that the defendant on the seventh month sent the stipulated amount of iron but on condition that the plaintiff should pay double the stipulated price, can there be any doubt of the plaintiff's right to retain the iron without paying the double price? That is to say, can there be any doubt that the condition which required the plaintiff to pay double the contract price for the instalment sent was void and that the plaintiff under those circumstances is not put to an election but can keep the iron under the contract? There can be no doubt on that question in our opinion; and in our opinion the principle of law governing that case governs the case at bar, where the debtor undertook without right to impose upon a payment of what was admittedly due a void condition that it be received in full discharge of what was in dispute.²³

²³ In addition, for a condition that the payment is in full satisfaction to be effective, it must be understood by the creditor to be such a condition.

"The defendant claims that the understanding by the creditor of the offer made by the debtor is to be determined by the standard of what a reasonable man would have understood under like circumstances. To a great degree this claim is well founded, but there still remains the duty and obligation to prove, by direct or implied testimony, what the debtor's intention was, and that the creditor, or the ordinarily reasonable man, under the circumstances, should have understood that intention. But understanding the intention of the debtor and acceptance by the creditor so as to constitute accord and satisfaction are not necessarily one and the same thing, as we have seen in cases already cited. True, if the debtor adds to his intention a condition that, if the creditor accepts, he does so in full settlement of the claim, and, fully understanding both the intention and the condition, the creditor does accept, then accord and satisfaction are established as a bar to subsequent suit upon the claim. But the proof should be clear and convincing that the creditor did understand the condition on which the tender was made, or that the circumstances under which it was made were such that he was bound to understand it." Horigan v. Chalmers Motor Co., supra, [111 Me. 111, 114]."

It follows that in accepting the check in the case at bar as a payment on account, the plaintiff was within its rights and that it has not agreed to accept it in full settlement of the balance of the account. By the terms of the report judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff in the sum of $50.52, with interest from the twentieth day of October, 1911; and it is so ordered.

SIGLER v. SIGLER.

(Supreme Court of Kansas, 1916. 98 Kans. 524, 158 Pac. 864,
L. R. A. 1917 A, 725.)

Action by Ode Sigler against his brother Joseph Sigler on a promissory note. Before the action was brought defendant employed one R. C. Wilson to purchase the note and mortgage for defendant as cheaply as possible. Wilson, concealing from plaintiff that he was acting for the defendant, paid the plaintiff $400, for which plaintiff delivered the note and mortgage to Wilson together with a blank assignment of the mortgage in which later Wilson wrote the name of one Hutchison as assignee so that Hutchison might make a formal release of the mortgage. Plaintiff insisted that the whole transaction amounted in law to nothing more than the payment of $400 on the note, and sued for the balance. Judgment was entered for the defendant, and plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

PORTER, J.²⁴ * * * The plaintiff relies upon the rule that an agreement to accept part in satisfaction of the whole of a liquidated demand is invalid because without consideration. Bridge Company v. Murphy, 13 Kan. 35; St. L., Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. Davis, 35 Kan. 464, 11 Pac. 421. The reason for the rule is that there is no consideration for the release of the remainder of the debt, as the debtor gives no more than he is bound to give and the creditor accepts no more than he is entitled to receive. * * * In a number of states it has been entirely abrogated or modified by statute. Courts generally refuse to apply the rule where the technical reasons for doing so do not exist (Brooks and Another v. White, supra; Harper v. Graham, 20 Ohio, 105, 115), and have recognized numerous exceptions to it, for instance, the payment of a part before due, or at a place other than that where the obligor was legally bound to pay, or a payment in property, regardless of its value, or by the debtor in composition with his creditors generally by which they agree to accept less than is due them, is held to create a consideration which is sufficient. The rule quite generally followed is that any additional consideration, however small, will support the new agreement, provided only it be such that in law it is sufficient to support an ordinary contract and consist of something which the debtor was not legally bound to do or give. Bryant v. Proctor, 53 Ky. (14 B. Mon.) 451. * * * One established exception to the rule is that payment by a third person of a sum less than the amount due, with the understanding that it shall be in full payment, is held to be an accord and satisfaction.

A very thorough discussion of the subject of accord and satisfaction will be found in an elaborate note in 100 Am. St. Rep. 390-456. The author of the note, referring to the technical distinction drawn by the earlier cases, says:

"The strictness of the rule undoubtedly worked many hardships in preventing a creditor, who needed the money, from making an accord and satisfaction with his debtor or in preventing a debtor who might be temporarily embarrassed from settling with his creditor for less than the fixed amount of his debt. Hence the courts, though bound by precedents, from time to time enlarged the exceptions to the rule, so that now the exceptions might almost be said to form the rule itself." Page 430 of 100 Am. St. Rep.

There was great lack of harmony in the earlier decisions on the question whether part payment made by a stranger to the transaction to which it relates could be pleaded as accord and satisfaction. The English and many of the early American cases held that a satisfaction given by a stranger is not good because he is in no respect a privy to the original contract. The leading English cases to that effect are Grymes v. Blofield, 1 Croke's (39 Eliz.) 541, and Edgecombe v. Rodd and Others, 1 Smith, 515, 5 East, 294. The doctrine of Grymes v. Blofield, was followed in the United States by Clow v. Borst, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 37, and by a number of other courts.

In Leavitt and Lee, Executors of Hans Wilson, Dec'd, v. Morrow, 6 Ohio St. 71, 67 Am. Dec. 334, the doctrine that a satisfaction is no defense if it accrue from a stranger is discussed, and the older cases are criticized. In the opinion it was said:

"But mere precedent alone is not sufficient to settle and establish forever a legal principle. Infallibility is to be conceded to no human tribunal. A legal principle, to be well settled, must be founded on sound reason, and tend to the purposes of justice. * * * Precedents are to be regarded as the great storehouse of experience, not always to be followed, but to be looked to as beacon lights in the progress of judicial investigation, which, although at times they may be liable to conduct us to the paths of error, yet may be important aids in lighting our footsteps in the road to truth. * * * The rule laid down is purely technical; and the reason assigned, that the stranger is not privy to the condition of the obligation, loses all its reality when we consider that the satisfaction must have been accepted by the plaintiff, and assented to or ratified by the defendant. It would seem, therefore, that a rule which in its tendency is calculated to foster bad faith and defeat the purposes of justice ought not to be adhered to simply on account of its antiquity." Pages 78, 80, of 6 Ohio St., 67 Am. Dec. 334.

The Ohio case was approved in Harvey v. Tama County, 53 Iowa, 228, 233, 5 N. W. 130, and cited in Wellington v. Kelly et al., 84 N. Y. 543, 547, as having materially criticized and limited Grymes v. Blofield, supra. In Snyder v. Pharo (C. C.) 25 Fed. 398, it was held that:

"Satisfaction of a debt by the hands of a stranger is good when made by the authority of or subsequently ratified by the defendant; and the fact of pleading it will be sufficient evidence of ratification." Head-note, par. 2.

In Jackson v. Pennsylvania, R. R. Co., 66 N. J. Law, 319, 49 Atl. 730, 55 L. R. A. 87, it was held that an accord between the plaintiff and a third person and satisfaction moving from such third person to the plaintiff, who accepts and retains it, are available as a defense if the defendant has either authorized or ratified the settlement. After a full consideration of the early authorities, English and American, on the question of accord and satisfaction entered into by a third person, it was said in the opinion:

"The tendency of the American decisions is strongly in favor of supporting a satisfaction moving from a third person, when such person either had authority to make it, or the act was followed by ratification. and the article received in satisfaction was retained. * * * The reason of the rule is simple. On the one hand, no party can be deprived of a right by mere payment by a volunteer. On the other hand, since a party is entitled to only one satisfaction, his acknowledgment that he has received it, and his retention of it, operate to extinguish his right." Pages 325, 326 of 66 N. J. Law, page 732 of 49 Atl. [55 L. R. A. 87].

In Crumlish's Adm'r v. Cent. Imp. Co., 38 W. Va. 390, 18 S. E. 456, 23 L. R. A. 120, 45 Am. St. Rep. 872, there is a review of the English cases and the early New York cases, as well as the later American cases, and attention is called to the fact that in Wellington v. Kelly et al., 84 N. Y. 543, the old cases were doubted. In the opinion it was said:

"It seems utterly unjust and repugnant to reason that a creditor accepting payment from a stranger of the third person's debt should be allowed to maintain an action against the debtor pleading and thereby ratifying such payment, on the technical theory that he is a stranger to the contract. The creditor has himself, for this purpose, allowed him to make himself a quasi party, and consents to treat him so, so far as payment is concerned. To regard the debt paid, so far as he is concerned, is but to hold him to the result of his own act. Shall he collect the debt again? In that case can the stranger recover back? What matters it to the creditor who pays? As the Supreme Courts of Wisconsin and Ohio in cases above cited said, this doctrine is against common sense and justice." Page 396 of 38 W. Va., page 458 of 16 S. E. [45 Am. St. Rep. 872, 23 L. R. A. 120].

In Harrison v. Hicks, 1 Port. (Ala.) 423, 27 Am. Dec. 638, it was said:

"The payment of a debt, although it be made by one who is not a party to the contract, and although the assent of the debtor to such payment does not appear, is still the extinguishment of the demand." Syl. par. 2.

No cases have been cited in the brief which involved facts at all similar to the case at bar. Our own research has resulted in finding but two cases which are at all analogous. In Shaw v. Clark, 6 Vt. 507, 27 Am. Dec. 578, where a judgment debtor furnished the money to a third person to purchase a judgment from the creditor who accepted a less sum than the face of the judgment, it was said in the opinion:

"As the sum paid was really the money of the debtor and paid over by his agent it is the same as if paid by himself." Page 508 of 6 Vt. 27 Am. Dec. 578.

The court held it to be quite obvious that the act of a debtor in furnishing funds to a third person to buy up his debts at a discount is so far fraudulent as to render the sale voidable at the election of the creditor. This case was decided in 1856.

A case to the contrary is Gordon v. Moore, 44 Ark. 349, 51 Am. Rep. 606, where the facts were in some respects similar to those in the present case, and it was held that an agreement by a creditor to accept from a third person, in behalf of the debtor, a smaller sum in satisfaction of the whole is valid and binding and will discharge the debt. In the opinion it was said that the consideration is that the creditor gets, or is assured of getting, what perhaps the debtor might never pay, and that "it cannot alter the nature of the case that the debtor repaid the advance." Page 355 of 44 Ark., 51 Am. Rep. 606. In R. C. L. 182, it is said:

"The modern and better rule is that an accord and satisfaction, made with one who is a stranger to the transaction to which it relates, is good, and will bar an action on the claim involved, if the person against whom the claim was made has either authorized or ratified the settlement."

The author concedes that there are authorities which hold to the contrary supported by some of the earlier American cases and the English authorities, but adds that:

"It requires powers of discrimination looking far beyond the justice of the case to see the reason of this rule. The reason assigned by some of the early adjudications is that the person from whom the accord and satisfaction comes is not privy to the contract giving rise to the debt. This reason might give just cause to the creditor to refuse to receive the satisfaction from a stranger, or third person, not known in the transaction of the parties, even as agent of the debtor, but, when the creditor has actually received and accepted the contribution in satisfaction of the debt, to allow him to maintain an action on the same debt afterward would seem to shock the ordinary sense of justice of every man." Page 182.

In 1 Cyc. 317, it is said:

"But in order that the act of the stranger operate as a satisfaction of the debt or demand it must have been authorized by the debtor or subsequently ratified by him."

Formerly an exception to the rule was always made in a case where a release under seal was given with part payment on the theory that a release under seal implies a consideration. But this exception to the rule finds no room for application in those jurisdictions where, as in this state, the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments has been abolished. Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1643; 1 C. J. 543.

From the foregoing authorities it seems firmly established that a debtor may authorize and employ a third person as his agent to make a satisfaction of his debt; that where he does so, and the money is advanced by the third party and accepted by the creditor in satisfaction of the debt, it is a good accord and satisfaction. This is so even where the third party makes the payment without the debtor's knowledge, if the latter afterward ratify the action.²⁵

Did the concealment by Wilson of the fact that he was acting for the defendant destroy the effect of the payment, or, in other words, must there be knowledge on the part of the creditor that the payment is made on behalf of the debtor before it will constitute an accord and satisfaction? It was held that an accord and satisfaction is:

"The result of an agreement between the parties, and, like all other agreements, must be consummated by a meeting of the minds of the parties, accompanied by a sufficient consideration. If the creditor is to be held to abate his claim against the debtor, it must be shown that he understood that he was doing so when he received the claimed consideration therefor." Harrison v. Henderson, 67 Kan. 194, 200, 72 Pac. 875, 62 L. R. A. 760, 100 Am. St. Rep. 386.

²⁵ "It may be laid down as incontestible, as a general thing, that where one man is indebted to another and a third person steps in and pays the debt, in the absence of all circumstances tending to show the contrary, the rational inference would be that the act done, being for the debtor's benefit, was done with his consent, or, if without his knowledge at the time, that it would, as a matter of course, be ratified by him afterward. If in such a case the creditor should subsequently bring suit against the debtor, and the debtor should appear in the action and plead the satisfaction in discharge of his liability, I cannot conceive upon what just and rational ground the creditor could be allowed to reply that his debt was not discharged because the satisfaction which he had accepted in discharge of it was without the consent of the defendant. The very fact of the satisfaction being set up in the action by the defendant in discharge of the debt would, of itself, seem sufficient to conclude the plaintiff from denying that it had received the defendant's consent or ratification." Bartley, C. J., in Leavitt v. Morrow, 6 Oh. St. 71, 76-77 (1856).

And in Matheney v. El Dorado, 82 Kan. 720, 109 Pac. 166, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 980, it was ruled that:

"To constitute an accord and satisfaction, the agreement that a smaller sum shall be accepted in discharge of a larger one originally claimed must have been entered into by the parties understandingly and with unity of purpose." Syl. par. 1.

But the extent of the doctrine there declared is merely that the smaller sum must not only have been offered, but it must have been accepted with the understanding that it was in full satisfaction of the larger amount claimed. The plaintiff certainly understood that he was accepting the $400 in full satisfaction of all his interest in the note and mortgage. It is difficult to see how his rights were affected in the slightest by his failure to know and understand that Wilson was acting as the agent of the debtor, because, as we have seen, the weight of authority is that a payment of a part by a stranger, who may have acted without the knowledge or consent of the debtor, will, if accepted by the creditor and afterwards ratified by the debtor, constitute a full accord and satisfaction.

Section 126 of the negotiable instruments law (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5372) enumerates the various ways in which negotiable instruments may be discharged, among which is "(5) when the principal debtor becomes the holder of the instrument at or after maturity in his own right." The phrase "in his own right" has been construed to exclude a case where a maker acquires the instrument in a purely representative capacity. Bank v. Dryden, 91 Kan. 216, 137 Pac. 928. There it was held that the note is not discharged when the maker acquires it as agent for another. Nor is it discharged when the maker becomes the holder, for example, as executor or administrator. See Crawford's Ann. Neg. Inst. Law (Revised Uniform Ed.) p. 195, and cases cited. Did not the debtor in this case become the holder of the instrument after maturity in his own right? Whether we consider the transaction as one in which he furnished the money in the first instance to purchase the note through his agent, Wilson, or as one in which Wilson first purchased it with his own funds and subsequently, upon being reimbursed by defendant, transferred it to him, it would seem to be clear that the maker became the owner in his own right, unless there be some principle of law which forbids a debtor to purchase his own debt. The holder of the note was willing to part with all his interest in it upon payment of $400, and accepted in full consideration for his interest that sum from one whom he believed to be the purchaser and surrendered the note and security. How are his rights as a holder affected in any manner by the subsequent transfer of the note to the maker? Promissory notes, both before and after maturity, are negotiable and transferable, and the exigencies of business and trade demand the extension rather than the restriction of these qualities.

We fail to find any showing of fraud in the transaction by which plaintiff was induced to transfer the note to Wilson, unless it must be said as a matter of law that the transaction was fraudulent because it amounted to a purchase by the defendant of his own debt, and because the plaintiff supposed he was dealing with Wilson. * * *

It certainly does no violence to the presumed intention of the parties to hold him [plaintiff] to the result of his own act in accepting the $400 with the understanding, at least, that he was parting with all his interest in the note, and that, so far as he was concerned, the sum he received was to be in full payment of his claim. So far as shown by the evidence or findings, the money actually received by the plaintiff was advanced by the third party. Plaintiff, therefore, received something he might not otherwise have received; and applying the rule that any benefit or advantage accruing to the creditor, however slight, is a sufficient consideration to support the agreement, we think it must be held that a consideration was shown in this case. The rule that a payment of a lesser sum, accepted with the understanding that it shall be in full discharge of the entire debt, will not bar an action to recover the balance unless made upon a new and distinct consideration rests rather upon technical considerations than upon common sense, and the strict adherence to it has often resulted in preventing justice and the enforcement of the real intent of the parties. As we have seen, the modern tendency of the courts is to enlarge the exceptions to the rule in order to avoid its harshness, and to enforce settlements, adjustments, and compromises. It is always necessary that the minds of the debtor and creditor meet upon the proposition that the receipt of the lesser sum shall extinguish all right on the part of the creditor to exact further payment. Harrison v. Henderson, 67 Kan. 194, 72 Pac. 875, 62 L. R. A. 760, 100 Am. St. Rep. 386; Matheney v. El Dorado, 82 Kan. 720, 109 Pac. 166, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 980. When it is shown that the minds of the parties, whether acting by and for themselves as principals, or through others as agents, have met and agreed upon this point, the courts should reach out and seize upon any possible or probable benefit to the one, or loss or inconvenience to the other, which may be said to constitute a consideration for the new agreement, and thus carry into effect the understanding of the parties. * * *

So far as the record shows, the $400 was advanced by a third party. It was entirely satisfactory to plaintiff until he learned subsequently that Wilson had been acting in behalf of his [plaintiff's] brother, when he attempted to repudiate the transaction, but retained the payment.

Property of all kinds, real and personal, is purchased every day by agents for undisclosed principals. Why may not an individual purchase and become the owner of the evidence of his indebtedness? It is a common practice for the state, for cities and other municipalities, as well as for private corporations, to purchase their own bonded indebtedness. We have been cited to no principle of law, and are not aware of any, which would prevent an individual from going into the market and purchasing, at a discount or otherwise, securities upon which he is indebted and which he has put in circulation. If he may do this himself, he may accomplish the same thing by an agent who acts without disclosing the agency.

We think * * * that upon the facts plaintiff cannot maintain the action to recover on the note. * * *

*The judgment will be affirmed.

FORD v. BEECH.

(Court of Exchequer Chamber, 1848. 11 Q. B. 852.)

PARKE, B.† This is a writ of error brought to reverse a judgment of her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench. The declaration is in assumpsit, and contained five counts. The first count is upon a promissory note, dated 28th May, 1839, made by the defendant, for the sum of £140 and interest, payable to the plaintiff twelve months after date; the second count is also on a promissory note, made by the defendant, for the sum of £200, payable with interest to the plaintiff, two years after date. It is unnecessary to advert to the other counts in the declaration, or to the pleadings connected with them. Judgment has been given upon them for the defendant; and no question arises in respect of that judgment.

The defendant pleaded to the first count that he did not make the note therein mentioned, and the like plea to the second count. Upon these pleas issues were joined, and verdicts have been found upon them for the plaintiff. The defendant also pleaded, to both the first and second counts, that, after the making of the notes in those counts respectively mentioned, and after the same notes respectively became due, it was agreed between the plaintiff, the defendant, and one Alfred Beech that the said Alfred Beech should and would, at the request of the plaintiff, pay to the plaintiff, in trust for Elizabeth Beech, the sum of £200, for her own sole use and benefit, or the sum of £25 per annum so long as the sum of £200 should remain unpaid, which sum of £25 should be paid quarterly as therein mentioned; and that the rights and causes of action of the plaintiff upon and in respect of the said two several notes should be suspended so long as the said A. B. should continue to pay the said sum of £6 5s. every quarter; the payments to commence as therein set forth. The plea proceeds to aver that the said A. B. duly paid the annual sum of £25 quarterly according to the agreement. The plaintiff in his replication to this plea traversed the allegation of the payments alleged to have been made by Alfred Beech of the annual sum of £25; and a verdict was found for the defendant upon the issue joined upon that traverse. And judgment having been given by the Court of Queen's Bench for the defendant upon the verdict so found, the present writ of error has been brought to reverse that judgment, upon the ground that, non obstante veredicto upon the matters in that plea, judgment ought to have been given for the plaintiff upon both the first and second counts. The plaintiff has brought his writ of error, praying for a reversal of this judgment.

And, upon the argument before us, the learned counsel for the plaintiff has contended that the plea of the defendant to the first and second counts of the declaration is bad, and sets forth no matter which is in law a bar to his right of recovery upon those counts. Upon the part of the plaintiff, the validity of the agreement mentioned in the plea is not denied; but it has been insisted in the argument before us, that the agreement does not in point of law operate as a suspension of the plaintiff's right of action or power to sue for the recovery of the notes mentioned in the first and second counts in the declaration; and that the plea which sets up the agreement in bar of the present action is bad, and furnishes no answer to the action, although such an agreement may give the defendant a claim to damages by reason of the plaintiff suing in breach of it. The defendant, on the other hand, has contended before us that the legal operation of the agreement is to suspend the plaintiff's right of action so long as A. B. shall continue to make the quarterly payments; and such agreement has therefore been well pleaded in bar. The question for the decision of the court is, therefore, what is the legal effect of the agreement between the parties set forth in the plea,—that is, whether the agreement operates as a legal suspension of the plaintiff's right to sue upon the notes so long as A. B. shall continue to make the quarterly payments, or whether the effect of the agreement is limited to the rendering the plaintiff liable to an action for damages in the event of his suing contrary to its terms.

In adjudicating upon the construction and effect in law of this agreement, the common and universal principle ought to be applied; namely, that it ought to receive that construction which its language will admit, and which will best effectuate the intention of the parties, to be collected from the whole of the agreement, and that greater regard is to be had to the clear intent of the parties than to any particular words which they may have used in the expression of their intent. And applying this rule, the question is, what sense and meaning must be given to the word "suspended," used by the parties. It is quite clear that it was not the intention of the parties that the agreement should have the effect, from the moment of its being signed, of utterly and forever and in all events extinguishing the plaintiff's claim and demand upon the notes, and of ever maintaining an action for the recovery; or, in other words, that it should operate as a release of the money due upon them. This is plain from the words which import that the plaintiff might sue upon the notes when A. B. should cease to make the quarterly payments mentioned in the agreement.

It is a very old and well-established principle of law that the right to bring a personal action, once existing and by act of the party suspended for ever so short a time, is extinguished and discharged, and can never revive. It is said in Platt v. The Sheriffs of London, Plowd. 35, 36: "And if a personal thing is once in suspense, or the person of a man once discharged for a personal thing, it is a discharge forever." And in Lord North v. Butts, 2 Dyer, 139 b, 140 a, (39), it is said: "A thing personal or suspended, or action personal suspended for an hour, is extinct and gone forever, when it is by the act and consent of the party himself who has the thing suspended." And in Woodward v. Lord Darcy, Plowd. 184, it is said: "For a personal action once suspended by the act or agreement of the party is always extinct; and then if a personal thing cannot be had but by action, if the action is extinguished, the thing itself is extinguished." The principle thus laid down is repeated throughout the text-books of authority, and recognized and applied through a long course of decision. And in Cheetham v. Ward, 1 Bos. & P. 630, 633, it is said by Lord Chief Justice Eyre that the principle is "now acknowledged that where a personal action is once suspended by the voluntary act of the party entitled to it, it is forever gone and discharged."

To construe the agreement, therefore, to operate as a legal suspension or bar of the plaintiff's right to sue until the quarterly payments should cease, would have the effect of precluding him from ever suing at all, and of giving to the agreement the effect of an immediate release of the demand upon the notes, and an extinction of the debt. It follows that giving such meaning and effect to the word "suspended," used in the agreement, would be contrary to the intention of the parties; and it is a well approved rule of law that, where parties have used language which admits of two constructions, the one contrary to the apparent general intent and the other consistent with it, the law assumes the latter to be the true construction. * * *

Applying the rules of construction before referred to to the present case, and in order best to effectuate the intention of the parties, it is necessary to construe the agreement to mean that the plaintiff agreed to forbear his suit until the quarterly payment should cease to be made; and that the effect of such agreement on his part was, not to suspend his right of action in the meantime, but to subject him to an action for damages in the event of his suing contrary to his agreement.

The general doctrine of suspension of personal actions appears to be applicable to cases where persons have, by their own acts, placed themselves in circumstances incompatible with the application of the ordinary legal remedies; the cases generally referred to in the books being where the party to pay and to receive have become identical, or where the same person was necessary to be joined at once both as plaintiff and defendant, which by law cannot be; such as a creditor making his debtor his executor, or debtor making his creditor executor, or debtor and creditor marrying, or similar cases of incapacity to sue, as to which the authorities are numerous. See Co. Litt. 264 b, also Butler's note, ib. 209; Woodward v. Lord Darcy, Plowd. 184; Sir. J. Nedham's case, 8 Rep. 135 a; Dorchester v. Webb, Cro. Car. 372; Wankford v. Wankford, 1 Salk. 299; Freakley v. Fox, 9 B. & C. 130; 2 Williams on Executors, 1124 (4th Ed.).

The only case in which a covenant or promise not to sue is held to be pleadable as a bar, or to operate as a suspension, and by consequence a release or extinguishment of the right of action, is where the covenant or promise not to sue is general, not to sue at any time. In such cases, in order to avoid circuity of action, the covenants may be pleaded in bar as a release (note (1) to Fowell v. Forrest, 2 Wms. Saund. 47 gg), for the reason assigned that the damages to be recovered in an action brought for suing contrary to the covenant would be equal to the debt (Smith v. Mapleback, 1 T. R. 441, 446) or sum to be recovered in the action agreed to be forborne. Accordingly, in Deux v. Jefferies, Cro. Eliz. 352, in debt on obligation, the defendant pleads that the plaintiff covenanted that he would not sue before Michaelmas; it was resolved, upon demurrer, for the plaintiff, for that it was only a covenant not to sue, and should not enure as a release, nor could be pleaded in bar, but the party was put to his writ of covenant, if sued before the time. "But if it had been a covenant that he would not sue it at all, there peradventure it might enure as a release, and to be pleaded in bar, but not here; for it never was the intent of the parties to make it a release." And there are other authorities to the like effect. The agreement in the present case, though not under seal, being founded upon a good consideration, may be argued to be equivalent in effect to a covenant, but cannot have a greater effect; and, in the modern case of Thimbleby v. Barron, 3 M. & W. 210, it was held that a covenant not to sue for a limited time for a simple contract debt could not be pleaded in bar to an action for such debt. In that case the plaintiff had covenanted that he would not before the expiration of ten years demand or compel payment of certain sums of money, nor would take any means or proceedings for obtaining possession or receipt of the same. Lord Abinger, C. B., said: "The breach of the agreement to forbear suing renders the party liable in damages, but it is not pleadable in bar;" and Parke, B., said: "The books are full of authorities" against the defendant, and referred to Ayliffe v. Scrimshire, Carth. 63 s. c. 1 Show. 46: judgment for plaintiff. In 1 Roll, Abr. 939, tit. Extinguishment (L), pl. 2, it is said that, if the obligee covenant not to sue the obligor before such a day, and if he do, that the obligor shall plead this as an acquittance, and that the obligation shall be void and of none effect, this is a suspension of the debt, and by consequence a release. It must be observed that in that case it was expressly covenanted that, in the event of the covenantor suing upon the obligation contrary to his covenant, the obligation should be void, and that the obligor or covenantor should plead the covenant as an acquittance, which, by consequence, was a release; the covenant in that case therefore went much beyond a mere covenant not to sue.

By holding the plea in question a valid bar, injustice would be done to the plaintiff, who would lose his demand upon the notes, contrary to the intention of the parties; but, by construing the agreement not to operate as a suspension of the plaintiff's right of action upon the notes, but as giving a remedy to the defendant by a cross-action to recover damages to the extent of the injury sustained by the defendant by the plaintiff suing in breach of the agreement, no injustice is done to the defendant.

Nor is such a construction inconsistent with the class of authorities in which matters were allowed to be pleaded in bar in order to avoid circuity of action, because such decisions are limited to cases in which, from the nature of them, the damages to be recovered must be supposed to be equal in both actions: Smith v. Mapleback, 1 T. R. 441, 446; which does not apply to the present instance, as the damages to which the defendant could be entitled as against the plaintiff, by reason of his suing upon the notes before a discontinuance of the quarterly payment, can in no view be assumed to be equal to the plaintiff's demand.

Neither is the decision in this case inconsistent with the several cases in which it has been held that a party accepting a negotiable security payable in future for and on account of an antecedent demand cannot, until after such negotiable security has become due and been dishonored, sue for such antecedent demand; because, independently of the consideration of how far the acceptance of such negotiable security may be deemed payment for the time, all such decisions seem to be grounded upon the peculiar nature of the negotiable instruments, and are deemed to be necessary exceptions to the general rules of law, in favor of the law-merchant. See note (c) to Holdipp v. Otway, 2 Wms. Saund. 103 b (6th Ed.).

The case of Stracey v. The Bank of England, 6 Bing. 754, was cited on the defendant's behalf, as an authority to the effect that a right to bring a personal action may be suspended by agreement, without operating as a release or extinguishment. But, upon examination, it will be found probably not to be an authority bearing upon the point. The action was brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of a public duty in not making a transfer, upon request, of certain stock to which the plaintiffs were entitled; and the defendants insisted that the plaintiffs had for good consideration agreed not to make such request until they had themselves done certain acts; and alleged that the plaintiffs, contrary to their agreement, made the request, for the noncompliance with which they brought their action, before they had done those acts; the defendants therefore contended that such noncompliance was no breach of duty on their part. There was no right of action suspended by the agreement, as it is clear from the case that no request had ever been made to the bank to transfer the stock, and no means had ever been given to enable the bank to do so, no name of a transferee having been given at the time when the agreement was made, nor for a long time afterwards; consequently the only right of action the plaintiffs ever asserted was a right founded upon a request made long after the agreement. The decision, therefore, was, not that any existing right of action was suspended by the agreement, but that the plaintiff suspended his right to call upon the defendants to make a transfer until after he had done the acts mentioned in the agreement. And, although the expression of suspending an action was used, perhaps inaccurately, yet it is plain that they referred to the right to call for the transfer of stock, and to that only. At all events, as a decision upon the point for which the case was cited, it could not be supported, as it would be inconsistent with an undoubted principle of law and an undeviating course of authority.

In the result, we are of opinion that the plea in question is bad in substance, and that the judgment which has been pronounced upon it in favor of the defendant must be reversed, and a judgment entered for the plaintiff, non obstante veredicto, upon the confession and insufficient avoidance in the plea.

Judgment accordingly.

STEEDS AND ANOTHER v. STEEDS AND ANOTHER.

(High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, 1889. 22 Q. B. D. 537.)

WILLS, J.²⁷ The plaintiffs in this case sue for a sum of money alleged to be due for principal and interest on a bond made in their favor by the two defendants.

One of the defendants pleads that he delivered to one of the plaintiffs certain stock and goods which were given by him and accepted by the said plaintiff in satisfaction and discharge of the money due upon the bond. The other defendant pleads that he executed the bond as surety and was discharged by the transaction set up by the first defendant.

The plaintiffs apply to have this defence struck out, as being no answer to their claim. The same question arises as to both defendants, and is shortly whether in respect of a bond given by C. to A. and B., accord and satisfaction made by C. to A. after the cause of action had arisen, and accepted by A., is an answer to the claim of A. and B.

On behalf of the plaintiffs two objections are raised. 1. That in respect of a specialty debt, accord and satisfaction of the cause of action by the person or persons liable is no more an answer to the action in equity than it is at law. 2. That even if it would be so, were the bond made in favor of A. alone, accord and satisfaction with A. is no answer in equity to the action by A. and B.

It is clear that at law accord and satisfaction of a debt due upon a bond is no bar to the action. This is, however, purely the result of a technicality absolutely devoid of any particle of merits or justice, viz., that a contract under seal cannot be got rid of except by performance or by a contract also under seal; so that supposing it had really been the case that in satisfaction of an overdue bond for £1,000 the person liable had given property worth £2,000, which had been accepted in discharge of the obligation, still at law the obligee of the bond might recover his £1,000 without returning the property.

One would have thought that if the Courts of Equity ever interfered at all to prevent a man from enforcing an unconscientious and dishonest demand to which there was no answer at law, they would perpetually restrain an action brought under the circumstances described. Mr. Wood, however, who is an equity lawyer, contended before us that this was a case in which equity would follow the law, and would refuse to interfere, and he laid great stress upon a case of Webb v. Hewitt, 3 K. & J. 438, which he said established that proposition. We are glad to say that we are unable to agree with him, and that we think he has done injustice to a system of which one recommendation has been supposed to be that it was, sometimes at all events, competent to correct some of the worst and most odious technicalities of the common law. The case cited appears to us to lead to the opposite conclusion to that contended for, and we think it perfectly clear that the ratio decidendi of the learned Vice-Chancellor was, that when the plaintiff had accepted money's worth in place of money in discharge of the bond, the debt in equity was gone and there was an end of it.

Upon the first point, therefore, we are against Mr. Wood, [counsel for the plaintiffs,] and have no doubt that if payment to one of the plaintiffs would have been an answer, the delivery to him and acceptance by him of goods in satisfaction of the debt would be equally an answer.

But Mr. Wood is, we think, right in saying that, as the defence is an equitable one, it is equally necessary to establish that payment by C., the obligor, to A., the latter being joint obligee with B., would in equity be an answer to the claim by A. and B. on the bond. We cannot follow Mr. Bullen's argument [as counsel for the defendants] that as equity would treat the satisfaction as equivalent to payment, having got so far, he is at liberty to discard any further reference to equity, and say that as at common law payment to or release by A. would prevent A. and B. from suing, he is now in a position to treat A. as having been paid, and say that as this is a common law action there is the equivalent to a common law defence. If he is obliged to resort to equity for his defence, he must take the equitable principles applicable to the circumstances in their entirety; and we must therefore inquire what is the rule in equity with respect to payment to one of two co-obligees or co-creditors.

The reason why the defence is a good one at law is that the two creditors are treated as having a joint interest in the debt, with its incident of survivorship, and the satisfaction to one of the parties of a joint demand due to himself and others puts an end to the joint demand, and he cannot afterwards, by joining the other parties with him as plaintiffs, recover the debt; nor can a right of action be supposed to exist which, if it existed, might survive to the very person who had already received full value. Wallace v. Kelsall, 7 M. & W. 264.

In equity, however, it would appear as if the general rule with regard to money lent by two persons to a third was that they will prima facie be regarded as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, both of the debt and of any security held for it. Petty v. Styward, Eq. Ca. Abr. 290; Rigden v. Vallier, 2 Ves. Sen. 258, cited in the notes to Lake v. Craddock, 1 White & Tudor, 5th ed. 208. "Though they take a joint security," says Lord Alvanley, M. R., "each means to lend his own money and to take back his own." Borley v. Bird, 3 Ves. 631. Where a mortgage debt has been paid to one of the mortgagees, accordingly, it was held that the land was not discharged, and that the concurrence of the other mortgagees was necessary to make a good title. Matson v. Dennis, 10 Jur. (N. S.) 461, 12 W. R. 926. This is on the ground that the debt is held by the two in common and not jointly, and the principle seems to us equally applicable whether the debt is secured by a mortgage or is merely the subject of a personal contract. The principal right of a mortgagee is to the money, the estate in the land is only an accessory to that right.

It is obvious, however, that this proposition cannot be put higher than a presumption capable of being rebutted. If the money, supposing it to have been lent, were trust money, the presumption of a tenancy in common on the part of the two trustees could not, as it seems to us, arise. Survivorship is essential for the purpose of trusts, and so there may be a variety of circumstances which may settle the question either one way or the other. In the present case we do not even know whether the bond was for money lent, or what was the groundwork of the obligation, and it is clear that if the presumption is that the interest in this obligation belonged in equal portions in severalty to the two plaintiffs, the plaintiff who was settled with by the accord and satisfaction has been paid his half, at all events, and it cannot be recovered again in this action.

We think, therefore, that we cannot strike out this defence as we are invited to do. It seems to us that it must be good for a part of the claim at all events. But we think the statement of defence defective, and that Mr. Bullen [as counsel for the defendants] ought to amend by a further statement of the material facts, and our order is that the statement of defence be amended accordingly, and if that be not done within ten days, the plaintiff be at liberty to sign judgment for half the amount claimed. We trust that upon the amended pleading being delivered the plaintiffs will, if possible, meet it by any necessary addition to or correction of the facts alleged, and not repeat a motion of this kind, which asks the court to do what is to the last degree unsatisfactory, give judgment for a defect of pleading and in ignorance of all the facts which ought to be known before the rights of the parties are definitely adjudicated upon. Both parties are partly responsible for the present motion, and the costs of this appeal will be costs in the cause.

*Order accordingly.*²⁸

²⁸ In Upjohn v. Ewing, 2 Oh. St. 13, 18-19 (1853), Thurman, J., said: "But we are not prepared to say that one or more of several joint creditors, between whom no partnership exists, can release the common debtor so as to conclude their co-creditors who do not assent to such release. It is true, they may defeat an action at law, but it does not follow that a recovery in equity cannot be had. At law, joint creditors must join in the action; and all must recover, or none can. Hence, if part of them are barred, all are. But the forms of equity procedure require no such joinder when justice would be defeated by it. It may be admitted, that, as a general rule, joint creditors cannot, by a division between themselves, acquire a separate right of action against the debtor, either at law or in equity; but where the debtor himself procures the release of a part of them, we do not see how he can object to the others proceeding against him in equity."

On the other hand, in Powell v. Brodhurst, [1901] 2 Ch. 160, 164, Farwell, J., said: "In my opinion, the old rule of common law that payment to one of two joint creditors is a good discharge of the joint debt still remains good. There was no possible conflict of any equitable rule with this, because no bill would lie in Chancery to recover a mere money demand. Equity, no doubt, had to deal with debts in the administration of the estates of deceased persons and in the liquidation of companies, but in determining whether claims for debts had been discharged or not equity followed the law, and indeed, in cases of difficulty before the Chancery Procedure Act, 1852 (15 and 16 Vict. C 86) ss. 61, 62, sent cases for the opinion of the common law courts. There is nothing inconsistent with this in Steeds v. Steeds, 22 Q. B. D. 537. The question there was whether it was so clear that the debt claimed was joint, that the defense should be struck out and it was held that there was a conflict between law and equity as to the presumption to be drawn from the existence of a security to two without words of severance, and that the rule of equity as to such presumption now prevails. But this was a conflict of presumption whether there was or was not a joint tenancy, and had no relation to the legal consequences flowing from the existence of an admitted joint tenancy. In the present case both sides agree that this is a joint debt, and * * * I take this to be correct.

"But the joint debt in this case was not paid to either of the joint creditors, but to the firm of which one of them was a member. Now, payment of a private debt, due to a member of a firm, to the firm of which the creditor is a member will not, in my opinion, support a plea of payment in the absence of evidence, express or implied, that the creditor has authorized the receipt of the money by the firm as his agents."

WILLIAM M. GRIFFIN v. JOHN H. CUNNINGHAM.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1903. 183 Mass. 505, 67 N. E. 660.)

Contract to recover for lumber furnished by Griffin, the plaintiff, to one Griffiths, a contractor, for the purpose of making alterations on a house owned by Cunningham, the defendant. Griffin proposed to bring a suit against Griffiths, and the three parties entered into an agreement by which Cunningham promised to pay Griffin the amount of his bill against Griffiths, if Griffiths approved the bill, payment to be made direct to Griffin. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepta. Exceptions overruled.

BRALEY, J. If the promise made to the plaintiff by the defendant was nothing more than an oral agreement on his part to pay any balance due to Griffiths that remained after a settlement of liens for labor, the undertaking was collateral, as the original debt owed by Griffiths to the plaintiff was not extinguished. And as it is not claimed that the defendant derived any benefit from the arrangement, the statute of frauds on which the defendant relies would be a full defense. Curtis v. Brown, 5 Cush. 488; Manley v. Geagan, 105 Mass. 445; O'Connell v. Mount Holyoke College, 174 Mass. 511, 514, 55 N. E. 460. But there was something more. What the parties agreed to was in dispute. And as the case is before us on a refusal to rule that upon all the evidence the plaintiff could not recover, it becomes necessary to determine whether there was any evidence to sustain the verdict.

The plaintiff puts his case on a substitution of debtors, and his evidence in substance tended to prove that Griffiths, who was owing him a large amount for lumber that had been used in reconstructing a house belonging to the defendant, with whom Griffiths had a contract to furnish materials and do the work, agreed that the balance coming to him under the contract should be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff in settlement of his bill for the lumber, and that the defendant, at whose suggestion the arrangement was made, assented to the substitution, and promised to pay the plaintiff the balance remaining due under the contract after the settlement of any liens for labor. Relying on this agreement, and in consequence of it, the plaintiff released Griffiths, his original debtor, and looked to the defendant solely for the payment of his bill. The question is, what was the intention of the parties? and, in order to determine the character of the transaction, all the circumstances are to be considered.

The substitution sought to be accomplished was a change of debtors to the extent of the plaintiff's claim against Griffiths, and it was not necessary that the whole indebtedness of the defendant to Griffiths, if it exceeded the amount of the plaintiff's bill, should have been discharged. But the arrangement between the parties was enough under the evidence in this case to fully discharge the defendant from any liability under the building contract, as there was no contention that the amount due the plaintiff from Griffiths was more than the sum finally paid to him by the defendant in the settlement made between them. There was also evidence from which the jury might find that the original debt of Griffiths to the plaintiff had been discharged, though this follows if mutual consent to the substitution is proved. Walker v. Sherman, 11 Metc. 170. If the claim of the plaintiff against him had been converted into a claim of the plaintiff against the defendant, it is not necessary to consider the transaction as a possible assignment of a part of the claim of Griffiths against Cunningham, and that in such a case the plaintiff could have relief only in equity. See James v. Newton, 142 Mass. 366, 374, 8 N. E. 122, 56 Am. Rep. 692; Holbrook v. Payne, 151 Mass. 383, 384, 24 N. E. 210, 21 Am. St. Rep. 456. Under the plaintiff's evidence, the defendant, by accepting the order of Griffiths, who signed it with the understanding that the bill of the plaintiff was to be paid by the defendant, contracted not only to pay the debt, but also, as a part of the transaction, undertook that the debt should be paid to the plaintiff, while the plaintiff at the same time agreed to accept the defendant as his debtor in place of Griffiths. It would not be enough that the defendant accepted the order; he must go further and promise to pay the plaintiff. The consideration for the promise is that the plaintiff, as a part of the completed arrangement, became bound to look solely to the defendant for the money owed him, instead of to Griffiths. If the original debtor did not remain liable, the defendant's promise was not to answer for the debt of another, and it was not within the statute. Furbish v. Goodnow, 98 Mass. 296; Richardson v. Robbins, 124 Mass. 105. For these reasons, the case does not fall within Curtis v. Brown, ubi supra, as argued by the defendant, but is to be governed by Caswell v. Fellows, 110 Mass. 52, 54; Hden v. Chaffee, 160 Mass. 225, 35 N. E. 675; Trudeau v. Poutre, 165 Mass. 81, 42 N. E. 508; and Plummer v. Greenwood, 169 Mass. 584, 48 N. E. 782; and is to be distinguished from the line of decisions in which this court has held that a stranger to a simple contract, and from whom no consideration moves, cannot sue on it, or enforce a promise made to another for his benefit. Exchange Bank v. Rice, 107 Mass. 37, 9 Am. Rep. 1; Borden v. Boardman, 157 Mass. 410, 32 N. E. 469, and cases cited; Aldrich v. Carpenter, 160 Mass. 166, 35 N. E. 456.

In the case at bar the plaintiff was the promisee, and the contract between him and the defendant gave all the contractual rights provided for his benefit, and had an ample consideration to support it by the release of the original debtor. If there had been no conflict of testimony, and the terms of the alleged substitution of debtors was not in dispute, whether enough had been made out to establish the claimed novation would have been a matter of law for the court. But there were two possible conclusions on the evidence: If the defendant was believed, the plaintiff could not prevail; while if the plaintiff's testimony was accepted as true, a complete substitution had taken place, and the defendant was liable. Obviously it could not be ruled as matter of law that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover; and, as the case was submitted to the jury under instructions not excepted to, the presumption is that they were full and accurate, and the order must be Exceptions overruled.

MOTT GLEASON v. DAVID FITZGERALD, SURVIVOR, ETC.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1895. 105 Mich. 516, 63 N. W. 512.)

GRANT, J. July 18, 1889, the defendants made a contract with the Chicago & West Michigan Railroad Company by which they agreed to lay and ballast the track between Baldwin and Traverse City. The work was to be done under the instruction and supervision of its chief engineer, whose decisions were to be final and conclusive on all matters of dispute. The defendants sublet this work to the firm of Lambert & Van Norman. The contract contained the following provision:

"That the said parties of the second part reserve the right to pay off the laborers who work for said first party under this contract, and the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar, hereby sells, releases, and assigns unto the party of the second part all moneys and sums of money due to laborers under this contract, and in execution of the same; but it is expressly agreed that the party of the second part assumes no liability to the laborers who do work in execution of this contract, over and above the amount assigned by the party of the first part to the party of the second part, and not over and above the amount due and payable to the party of the first part."

Lambert & Van Norman continued for some time to work under the contract. A dispute arose between them, and Lambert & Van Norman finally abandoned it. Lambert & Van Norman, through their time-keeper, gave time checks to their workmen, certifying the number of days' work performed, the rate per day, the deductions, and balance due, and made payable at Hannah, Lay, & Co.'s Bank, at Traverse City, Mich. Lambert & Van Norman had no money at the bank with which to pay these checks. Plaintiff insists that he purchased these time checks, and made an arrangement by which the defendants agreed to pay them; that he released Lambert & Van Norman from liability; and that a complete novation was effected. It is insisted on the part of the defendants that a novation was not proven, and that before a novation could take place a valid indebtedness must be shown to exist between Lambert & Van Norman and the defendants.

It is not necessary, under the facts of this case, to determine whether the defendants were in fact indebted to Lambert & Van Norman.

They had assigned to the defendants all moneys due from them to their laborers. If, therefore, the defendants had agreed to pay the plaintiff, and he had released Lambert & Van Norman, it is entirely clear that they could not defend upon the ground that they had in fact overpaid Lambert & Van Norman. The statute of frauds has no application to such case. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff tended to show that he made the agreement with defendants and Lambert & Van Norman, that defendants made the promise to pay with notice that Lambert & Van Norman were to be released, and that these time checks were in fact charged up against Lambert & Van Norman in an account rendered by the defendants. It is unnecessary to review the evidence at length. The question was fairly left to the jury, under proper and explicit instructions, and there was ample evidence to support their verdict. The case is controlled by Mulcrone v. Lumber Co., 55 Mich. 622.

²⁹ See James Barr Ames, Novation, 6 Harv. L. Rev. 184, Lectures on Legal History, 298.

"Novation by a change in the form of the obligation, as by the substitution of a specialty for a simple contract, has existed in English law from time immemorial under the name of merger. But our novation by a change of parties, whether by the intervention of a new creditor (novatio nominis) or by the substitution of a new debtor (novatio debiti) is a modern institution. The earliest judicial recognition of the doctrine seems to be the oft-quoted opinion of Mr. Justice Buller in 1759:

"Suppose A owes B £100, and B owes C £100, and the three meet, and it is agreed between them that A shall pay C the £100: B's debt is extinguished, and C may recover the sum against A.'" Ames, Lectures on Legal History, 298.

While Mr. Justice Buller spoke of novation where there are two debts, there need be only one, as the principal case shows. The essential thing is to get by the agreement a new debtor or a new creditor in place of the old.

In Perry & Walden v. Gallagher (Ala. App.), 82 So. 562, 563 (1919), Samford, J., said:

"The complaint alleged a previous valid indebtedness due from the original debtor to plaintiff, an agreement of all the parties to the new contract or obligation, an agreement that it was an extinguishment of the old contract or obligation, and a new contract or obligation binding between the parties thereto. It was not necessary to allege a consideration passing to the defendants other than the release by plaintiff, at the instance of defendants, of the claim which he held against the original debtor. This was not a promise of the defendants to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, but was an original undertaking by them, where, on account of their promise, the plaintiff released the claim which he had theretofore held. The complaint was not subject to demurrer interposed. Perry & Walden v. Gallagher (Sup.) 75 South. 396; Hopkins v. Jordan (Sup.) 77 South. 710; McDonnell v. Ala. Gold Life, 85 Ala. 414, 5 South. 120; 20 R. C. L., pp. 367, 368, § 10; Underwood v. Lovelace, 61 Ala. 155; Howard v. Rhodes, 81 South. 362.

"As has already been seen, it was not necessary to a novation that the defendants should have been actually indebted to plaintiff's original debtor."

In Mills v. McMillan (Fla.), 82 So. 812, 813 (1919), Ellis, J., said: "A neces-

CORBETT v. COCHRAN.

(Court of Appeals of South Carolina, 1836. 3 Hill, 41.)

CURIA, per EARLE, J.³⁰ The case made on the trial below seems to be this: Mrs. Pellott being indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $407.69, on a book account for merchandise, and the account being presented to her for payment, the defendant came to the plaintiff, produced the account, and assumed to pay it in consideration that she should be discharged from the debt. Her account was accordingly credited in full, and the amount was charged to the defendant by his own direction. In the argument here a question has been raised whether Mrs. Pellott was privy to the arrangement by which the defendant assumed the payment of her debt, and whether the credit discharging her was entered with the knowledge and by the direction of the defendant. Both these were questions for the jury. It was only on proof of both that the liability of the defendant arose. And I think that the jury were warranted in the conclusion, that the defendant, when he exhibited Mrs. Pellott's account, and assumed the payment of it, came from her and with her assent for that purpose. And also that the credit given to her on the books was by the direction of the defendant, and in pursuance of the agreement with him, for his undertaking was to pay her debt in consideration that she should be discharged. * * *

In relation to the class of contracts we are now considering, where the promise is to pay another's debt, in consideration of his being discharged, it seems to be well settled now, that there need be no consideration moving between the person promised for and the person who promises. * * *

But the exception mainly urged here is that the promise of the defendant was without consideration, as, in point of fact and law, the debt of Mrs. Pellott was not discharged. * * * But it is surely competent for the creditor to accept of whatsoever he will, in discharge or satisfaction of a debt. If he may accept the promissory note of the debtor, he may also accept that of a stranger. And if he may accept the note of a stranger, he may also accept his promise without writing. The validity of the substitute, the note or promise, depends on the express agreement to discharge the original debt. * * * There is no form of words or writing necessary to give effect to these mutual undertaksary element in novation is that the original debt is by the agreement extinguished, and the debtor is absolutely released. If novation is pleaded, this element must clearly and definitely appear by averment or necessary inference from the facts averred. If by the agreement the parties intended to keep alive the old debt and accept the new as a sort of security, novation is not accomplished." The burden is on the original debtor to show a novation releasing him. Thomas v. George (Neb.), 181 N. W. 646 (1921).

On assent of creditor as essential to novation by substitution of debtors, see Ann. Cas., 1914 A, 339, note.

ings. * * * But in the case at bar there is something more than a mere verbal agreement, if more be necessary. The plaintiff it is true has not given a receipt, or other written discharge, to the former debtor. But he has entered satisfaction in writing in the books, which constituted the evidence of his demand; and has declared by such entry that he has no further claim upon Mrs. Pellott, in whose stead he has accepted the defendant as his debtor and although he cannot be said to have cancelled the books, the entry furnishes written evidence of his agreement to discharge Mrs. Pellott, in consideration of the defendant's promise. Such agreement, whether proved by writing or parol, was an effectual legal discharge; and, after this agreement, the plaintiff could not have recovered on the original demand from her. * * *

The motion [by defendant for a new trial after verdict for plaintiff] is refused.⁸¹

J. I. CASE THRESHING MACH. CO. v. ROAD IMPROVEMENT
DIST. NO. 3 OF PULASKI COUNTY, ARK.

(United States District Court, E. D. Arkansas, W. D., 1914. 210 Fed. 366.)

At Law. Action by the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company against Road Improvement District No. 3 of Pulaski County, Ark. On demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court. Demurrer overruled.

⁸¹ That the original debtor must also be a party to the agreement, see Rose v. Million (Ark.), 228 S. W. 376 (1921).

Professor Ames was of opinion that a valid novation might be made between only the old creditor and the person intending to take his place. He said, that "To convert a claim of C against B into a claim of C against A, it is only necessary for C and A to enter into a bilateral contract in which C promises never to sue B and A promises to pay C the amount due from B. C's promise operating as an equitable release, now pleadable as a defense at law, the claim of C against B disappears, while A's promise creates in its place the new claim of C against A." Ames, Lectures on Legal History, pp. 300-301.

Professor Williston suggests that the agreement would not be an equitable defense to B in a jurisdiction not recognizing the right of a beneficiary of a contract to sue upon it, though he concedes, "That an agreement with C for sufficient consideration to discharge A should be at least an equitable defense to A, need not be denied." Apart from the fact that the theory of Professor Ames is founded on the right of a beneficiary to enforce a promise, Professor Williston's chief objection to it seems to be "that a novation was valid at law as a discharge" of the debtor's liability "long before equitable defences were allowed at law." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 114, p. 238, n.

The troublesome question, however, is not what constitutes a novation, but the question of fact in the given case whether the parties agreed upon one either absolutely or conditionally.

It would seem that a novation could take place with the old debtor at once discharged, in consideration of a conditional promise by the intending new debtor, although the event never occurs on which the new promisor would have to pay. Compare note 165, p. 423, ante.

The complaint, in so far as it is necessary to set it out for the purpose of understanding the jurisdictional questions involved, states that the plaintiff is a corporation existing under the laws of the state of Wisconsin, and the defendant is a corporation created by the state of Arkansas, having its domicile within the jurisdiction of this court; that the defendant and one Mary V. Wiegel, the latter doing business under the firm name of Pulaski Stone Company, entered into a contract whereby Mrs. Wiegel was to build a certain road for the defendant; that the payments were to be made by the defendant to her on estimates of the engineer in charge as the work progressed; that 10 per cent. was to be retained until the contract was completed and accepted by the defendant, whereupon that sum was to be paid; that she performed the work, which amounted to $32,561.40, of which 90 per cent. has been paid, and 10 per cent., amounting to $3,256.14, is still unpaid; that while the work was being performed by Mrs. Wiegel, she being indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $3,800, as evidenced by her note, assigned to it all of the 10 per cent. retained estimates to the extent of $3,800 and the interest on the note; that upon presentation of this assignment to the defendant it consented in writing thereto and agreed to pay the same to the plaintiff. This agreement is as follows:

"We hereby consent to the within assignment to the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company by the Pulaski Stone Company and Mary V. Wiegel, and agree to pay the said assignee such part of the 10 per cent. retained by us in accordance with our contract with said assignors as may be due upon final settlement with the said assignors after the completion of the work called for by said contract up to the amount due upon the $3,800.00 note, with interest at the time of payment.

"[Signed]

O. P. Robinson, President."

The contract having been completed by Mrs. Wiegel, and accepted by the engineer, the plaintiff demanded payment of the 10 per cent. retained sum, which was refused.

The defendant demurs to the jurisdiction of the court on the ground that the complaint fails to allege that Mrs. Wiegel, plaintiff's assignor, was a citizen of a state other than that of the defendant, and that she could have maintained an action for this money in this court.

TRIEBER, J.²² It is conceded by counsel for the plaintiff that, if this action is merely upon an assigned chose in action, the failure of plaintiff to allege in its complaint that its assignor, Mrs. Wiegel, could have maintained the suit in this court would have been fatal; but it is claimed that the defendant made an express promise to pay this sum of money to the plaintiff, and that this action is upon that express promise, and for that reason the citizenship of Mrs. Wiegel is immaterial.

²² Part of the opinion is omitted.

If this is a new promise to pay to the plaintiff this specific money due from the defendant to Mrs. Wiegel, agreed to by all the parties, it extinguished the liability of the defendant to Mrs. Wiegel, and created an obligation on the part of the defendant to the plaintiff. This is clearly a novation of the original indebtedness, and in such a case the jurisdiction of this court is controlled by the citizenship of the plaintiff and the defendant, regardless of that of Mrs. Wiegel.

"Novation" has been properly defined as:

"The substitution by mutual agreement of one debtor or of one creditor for another, whereby the old debt is extinguished, or the substitution of a new debt or obligation for an existing one which is to be extinguished. The requisites of a novation are: (1) A valid prior obligation to be displaced; (2) the consent of all the parties to the substitution; (3) a sufficient consideration; (4) the extinguishment of the old obligation, and (5) the creation of a valid new one."²³ In re Ransford, 194 Fed. 658, 662, 115 C. C. A. 560, 564, and authorities there cited.

In the instant case all of these requisites exist. It is true that Mrs. Wiegel's indebtedness to the plaintiff has not been extinguished, and will not be until the defendant makes the payment, as the plaintiff has accepted the assignment from her as collateral security only. But the defendant, when it accepted the order of Mrs. Wiegel, was exonerated from liability to her to the extent of the $3,800 and interest thereon, and, as it appears from the complaint that its liability is less than the indebtedness due plaintiff from Mrs. Wiegel, her claim is entirely extinguished, and she cannot maintain an action for the recovery of the retained 10 per cent. The contract between the plaintiff and the defendant is a new contract between them; the consideration for the promise to pay plaintiff being the extinguishment of Mrs. Wiegel's claim to this retained 10 per cent. The agreement of the defendant to pay this money to the plaintiff was, in effect, an acceptance of an order on it, and from the moment of acceptance it became the primary debtor, and Mrs. Wiegel only contingently liable in case of nonpayment by the defendant. Derby v. Sanford, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 263.

In Superior City v. Ripley, 138 U. S. 93, 11 Sup. Ct. 288, 34 L. Ed. 914, the facts were very much like those in this case. In that case the city had entered into a contract with S. K. Felton & Co. for the construction of a system of waterworks for the sum of $25,000; Felton & Co. built and completed the waterworks, which were accepted by the city and a part of the contract price paid. Felton & Co., being indebted to plaintiffs Ripley and Brunson in the sum of $5,750, gave them an order which read as follows:

²³ For a criticism of such statement of the requisites of a novation as being inaccurate, see 3 Williston on Contracts, §§ 1869-1872.

"Upon final completion and acceptance of waterworks by the city of Superior, Nebraska, pay to the order of Ripley and Brunson $5,750.00, and charge same to contract price and on contract for erection of said waterworks.

"S. K. Felton & Company.

"To the Mayor and City Council of the City of Superior, Nebraska."

This order was presented to the city council and accepted. The acceptance indorsed on the order was as follows:

"The city of Superior, Nebraska, hereby accepts the within written order, provided the waterworks are fully completed according to plans and specifications and are duly accepted by the city, and then, in that event, the city of Superior will withhold from the final payment of contract price that may be due S. K. Felton & Company the amount of this acceptance or such part thereof as may be due said S. K. Felton & Company thereon, and will pay over such amount in city warrants to Ripley and Brunson in lieu of S. K. Felton & Company, such amount to be credited on said contract price for said waterworks as if the same was paid to S. K. Felton & Company.

"Dated Superior, Nebraska, December 24, 1888.

"By order of the City Council:

"[Seal of the City.]

C. E. Davis, City Clerk.

"C. E. Adams, Mayor."

The waterworks having been completed and accepted by the city, and the amount due S. K. Felton & Co. being in excess of the sum for which the order was drawn, Ripley and Brunson demanded payment, which was refused, and thereupon they instituted an action against the city in the federal court. The complaint failed to allege the citizenship of Felton & Co. On behalf of the city it was claimed that the court was without jurisdiction, as the complaint failed to show that Felton & Co., the drawers of the order, were citizens of a state other than that of the defendant; but this contention was overruled, the court saying:

"This acceptance was a contract directly between the city and the plaintiff below, upon which the city was immediately chargeable as promisor to the plaintiff. Nothing is better settled in the law of commercial paper than that the acceptance of a draft to order in favor of a certain payee constitutes a new contract between the acceptor and such payee, and that the latter may bring suit upon it without tracing title from the drawer. From the moment of acceptance the acceptor becomes the primary debtor, and the drawer is only contingently liable in case of nonpayment by the acceptor."

It will be noticed that the order was not an instrument negotiable under the law merchant, as the date when it was payable was not certain, nor was the acceptance an unconditional one. It was practically the same as the order in the case at bar. * * *

In Castle v. Persons, 117 Fed. 835, 838, 844, 54 C. C. A. 133, 136, 142, it was held by the Circuit Court of Appeals for this circuit that even a verbal request is sufficient, when accepted, to constitute a novation. The court said:

"We see no difference between a verbal order or request and a written order or request, there being no law requiring either to be in writing. Neither need the acceptance be in writing. If the defendant in error owed Thomas Persons, and Thomas Persons requested him to pay the debt to Maria Persons, and he, upon such request, promised to pay it to Maria Persons, thereby extinguishing his debt to Thomas Persons, Maria Persons could sue and recover upon the promise, and, if this could be done, then all control over the chose in action would be in Maria Persons. She had complete power to reduce it to possession."

In that case Judge Sanborn, in a concurring opinion, said:

"If a creditor orally directs his debtor to pay his debt to a third party, and the debtor verbally agrees with the third party to do so, the latter is substituted for the first party as his creditor, the first party is estopped from collecting the debt, the debtor is released from paying to him, and is legally bound to pay it to the third party. A complete novation and assignment have been effected."

As this is an action upon an express promise of the defendant to pay to the plaintiff the retained money due on the contract to Mrs. Wiegel, and the requisite diversity of citizenship of the plaintiff and defendant exists, the demurrer to the jurisdiction is overruled.

COSTNER v. FISHER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1889. 104 N. Car. 392, 10 S. E. 526.)

The plaintiff brought his action before a justice of the peace, for recovery of $135.35 due by account and note under seal. When the cause was called for trial the plaintiff entered a nolle prosequi as to the cause of action upon the note. The plaintiff testified in substance that the bond was given for the amount due upon the account, and that he accepted it on condition that the defendant would pay him $10 a month; that the bond was intended merely as a security; and that he did not receipt the account. The court held that "the cause of action upon the account was merged into the note, and that, the same not being due, the plaintiff could not recover." There was a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

SHEPHERD, J. His honor was clearly right in holding that the account was merged in the bond. Gibson, C. J., in Jones v. Johnson, 3

Watts & S. (Pa.) 277, says: "Extinguishment by merger takes place between debts of different degrees, and lower being lost in the higher; and, being by act of the law, it is dependent on no particular intention. * * * No expression of intention would control the law which prohibits distinct securities of different degrees for the same debt; for no agreement would prevent an obligation from merging in a judgment on it, or passing in rem judicatum. Neither would an agreement, however explicit, prevent a promissory note from merging in a bond given for the same debt, by the same debtor; for to allow a debt to be at the same time of different degrees, and recoverable by a multiplicity of inconsistent remedies, would increase litigation, unsettle distinctions, and lead to embarrassment in the limitation of actions," etc. This high authority fully sustains the ruling of his honor.

Even if there were no merger, the taking of the bond payable at a certain time implies an agreement to suspend his remedy on the account for that period. 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst., § 1272; Putnam v. Lewis, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 389; Frisbie v. Larned, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 450, and other cases cited in Bank v. Bridgers, 98 N. Car. 67.

²⁴ But if the remedies are not inconsistent, the intention will prevail.

"There can be no doubt, as a general rule, that the taking of a bond and mortgage or other security of a higher nature extinguishes a debt arising from mere matter of account; yet this will depend on the intention of the parties. If the higher security was given as the future evidence of the debt, to which the party was to look for payment, then the less security would merge in the greater; but, if the higher security was to be merely additional or collateral to the less, showing that the intention of the parties was to keep the latter open, to be looked to for payment in any event—then the less is not extinguished by the greater security. This doctrine is familiar, and may be found in most of the elementary works and cases that treat upon this subject, particularly in Chit. Cont. 607, and authorities there cited. The defendant's counsel admitted the position, but insisted that it must appear upon the face of the instrument itself, that it was an additional or collateral security, and the works that treat on this subject and cases adduced, seem to give countenance to this idea; for in the former it is usually stated as an exception to the general doctrine of merger, that if it appear upon the face of the instrument that it is intended to be a further or collateral security, then the rule of merger does not apply, and the cases referred to by counsel, are of the description where the matter appeared upon the face of the instrument. But these authorities, although they show very clearly that when the matter does so appear the general rule of extinguishment does not apply, yet they do not therefore prove that when it does not so appear the rule does apply; and if such cases do exist the labors of counsel and the researches of the court have failed to produce them. Deciding the case then upon principle rather than precedent, the question of extinguishment or not is one of intention. What did the parties mean by the transaction? Did they intend that the old security should remain open and the new one be merely collateral or additional; or did they intend to extinguish the former? This intention is of course to be collected from the face of the instrument itself, where it so appears; and, if it does not so appear, then from the next best evidence: the only difference being,

W. A. CAROTHERS v. JAMES STEWART & CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1920. 179 N. C. 693, 102 S. E. 615.)

Action by W. A. Carothers against James Stewart & Co., Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff was an employé of defendant as a carpenter foreman receiving 87½ cents an hour. The defendant became a contractor of the United States government to do construction work that in the former case the security itself proves the exception to the rule, and also the intention of the parties, whilst in the latter, the party alleging the exception must prove it. And in this no evil can arise, there is no parol contradiction of a written instrument, but only an explanation as to the object for which it was given. A contrary doctrine would prohibit parol proof of the payment of a collateral security, by the payment of the original claim, unless it appeared upon the face of the collateral that it was such." Randolph, J., in Van Vliet v. Jones, 20 N. J. L. 340, 342-343 (1845).

In Settle v. Davidson, 7 Mo. 604 (1842), a bond given by one of several debtors for a simple contract debt was held to extinguish the debt leaving the bond debt as the only one and, therefore, the sole debt of the one who executed the bond.

"The substantial question in the case is, therefore, whether the agreement is merged in the subsequent mortgage, or whether the mortgage was taken merely as collateral security for the performance of the agreement. There is no doubt that the acceptance of a security of a higher nature in lieu of or in satisfaction of one of an inferior nature operates as an extinguishment or merger of the latter; but where such security is accepted merely as an additional or collateral security for a pre-existing debt, it is equally clear that the doctrine of extinguishment or merger does not apply. Brengle v. Bushay, 40 Md. 141, and the cases there cited. The question whether the mortgage in this case was taken merely as collateral security is therefore one of fact, and the burden of proof is upon the appellee to show that such was the case. Taking the whole evidence, we think the appellee has made out his case with reasonable certainty." Stone, J., in Rees v. Logsdon, 68 Md. 93, 96-97 (1887).

"The execution of a deed in pursuance of a contract of sale of real estate where the conveyance of the property is the entire subject-matter of the contract extinguishes the contract, but not so where the contract provides for the performance of other acts than the conveyance. In such case the contract remains in force as to such other acts until full performance." Dunn, J., in Brewer v. Mueller, 254 Ill. 316, 321-322 (1912).

"Even though the original engagement [to marry] was absolute, and not coupled with an express or implied understanding as to the marriage settlement, the parties by the subsequent written contract are taken as a matter of law to have entered into new promises, including the engagement of marriage, and the original agreement must be treated as rescinded, or absorbed and embodied in the new. Lattimore v. Harsen, 14 Johns. 330." Brown, J., in Appleby v. Appleby, 100 Minn. 408, 428 (1907), citing, also, McNutt v. McNutt, 116 Ind. 545 (1888), a similar marriage settlement case.

"The execution of a note in renewal of a previous one is not a payment of such prior note, nor the creation of a new indebtedness, unless there is an express agreement to that effect by the parties." Ellis, J., in Cheves v. First Nat. Bk. of Gainesville (Fla.), 83 So. 870 (1920).

in France. The government was to furnish all tools, equipment, etc. The necessary labor and superintendent was to be secured by the defendant. The defendant through its superintendent, E. N. Pratt, induced plaintiff to go to France. He signed the contract to work for the government at 70 cents per hour. This contract is also signed by defendant as agent of and on behalf of the government. Plaintiff alleges that, while in the employment of defendant, and before signing the contract to work for the government at 70 cents, he had an agreement with Pratt for defendant that, if he would go to France and sign the contract with the government, he should receive at least 87½ cents an hour. Plaintiff sues to recover the difference between 70 cents per hour and 87½ cents per hour, admitted to be $553.46. At conclusion of evidence the defendant moved to nonsuit the plaintiff.

We think there is abundant evidence to establish the agreement to pay 87½ cents an hour. The plaintiff testifies to it, and also that in his formal application for employment he inserted in it a condition that he was to receive 87½ cents an hour and gave it to Pratt for defendant.

There is evidence that defendant knew of Pratt's contract and never repudiated it. This is shown by Pratt's letter to defendant of June 22, 1918, in which Pratt informs them of his agreement with plaintiff. This letter is a strong testimonial to the efficiency of the plaintiff. We think there is abundant evidence of the agreement to pay the 87½ cents to plaintiff if he would sign up with the government at instance of defendant and go to France, and that defendant knew of the agreement and ratified it.

It is contended that the agreement to pay 87½ cents is a violation of the rule which prohibits the contradiction of a written contract by parol evidence. We do not think the rule applies here.

The contract in writing was made with the government, and in it plaintiff agreed to accept 70 cents per hour from the government. The contract for the 87½ cents per hour was in parol and a separate and distinct contract entered into by plaintiff with defendant before the contract with the government was signed.

The consideration for the parol, the first contract, was that, if plaintiff would enlist with defendant for the government as a workman, the defendant would see to it he received at least 87½ cents per hour. This was a separate and distinct contract and preceded the one in writing with the government. It constituted a condition precedent to the plaintiff's entering into and executing the written contract with the government, and is separate and distinct from it. Under the authorities there is no contradiction, and parol evidence was competent to prove such condition precedent. Elliott on Contracts, §§ 1629-50; Typewriter Co. v. Hardware Co. 143 N. C. 97, 55 S. E. 417; Taylor, Evidence, § 1038; Basnight v. Jobbing Co., 148 N. C. 357, 62 S. E. 420.

Nor do we think the parol contract to pay 87½ cents is merged into the written contract to pay only 70 cents, for the very good reason that the latter was made with the government. The parol contract was made with the defendant and guaranteed to plaintiff wages while in France of not less than 87½ cents per hour.

We think the rulings of the court upon the questions of evidence were correct, and that the charge presented the matter to the jury fairly and fully.

We find no error.

BACON v. REICH.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1899. 121 Mich. 480, 80 N. W. 278,

Assumpsit by Elbridge F. Bacon against William Reich for goods sold and delivered. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

HOOVER, J.²⁶ The defendant recovered a judgment against the Architectural Iron & Wire Works for a breach of a contract. He was afterwards sued by the assignee of the iron works for the price of the articles furnished to him under the contract, the assignment being made before his action for damages was instituted. In this action he sought to set off or recoup his damages, which was permitted by the trial court. The plaintiff has appealed the case, contending that the claim for damages is merged in the defendant's judgment, and therefore will not again support an action or defence, and that the judgment cannot be set off against the plaintiff, for the reason that there is a want of privity. It is also claimed that the plea was insufficient to warrant the admission of this proof.

It must be admitted that the plaintiff is not privy to the judgment, because he acquired his rights, whatever they are, before defendant began his action. Bartero v. Bank, 10 Mo. App. 76; Powers v. Heath's Adm'r, 20 Mo. 319; Mathes v. Cover, 43 Iowa, 512; Todd v. Flournoy's Heirs, 56 Ala. 99 (28 Am. Rep. 758); Marshall v. Croom, 60 Ala. 121; Cook v. Parham, 63 Ala. 456; Coles v. Allen, 64 Ala. 98; Winslow v. Grindal, 2 Greenl. 64; Weed Sewing-Machine Co. v. Baker, 1 McCrary, 579; Bigelow, Estop. 135, 136. He is privy, however, to the injury upon which defendant's judgment rests. It is also true that the claim of the defendant was merged in the judgment against the iron works, and the judgment would be a bar to another action, or an attempt to recoup the damages, against the Architectural Iron & Wire Works. But the judgment could be set off in an action brought by the iron works, or an action might be brought upon it. We deem it unnecessary to cite authorities in support of these principles, which are elementary.

It is nevertheless true that the plaintiff took this claim subject to the equitable right of the defendant to have his damages applied upon it, and all that can prevent is the technical rule that they are merged in a judgment against plaintiff's assignor. Theoretically, this may be said to be no hardship, because, if the defendant shall pay the plaintiff's claim, he would yet have the right to collect his judgment for damages, which would work out exact justice to all. Practically, however, that is not so, because he cannot collect his judgment. The iron works is insolvent, and was at the time the plaintiff, who was a stockholder in the concern, took his assignment, and the defendant cannot collect his judgment in any other way than to set it off against his contract obligation. Furthermore, the record contains evidence that he was ignorant of the assignment at the time he took his judgment, and had a right to suppose that, by obtaining the judgment, he had settled the question of his liability on the contract, and was led to do so to avoid liability in a garnishment suit, which was adjourned for the purpose. But for the previous assignment, this would have been so, because the judgment would have bound all persons afterwards acquiring title to the claim from the iron works.

"According to more recent cases, the doctrine that claims become merged in judgments is supported on the grounds that the allowance of a new suit is a superfluous and vexatious encouragement to litigation, injurious to the defendant and of no benefit to the plaintiff." 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 339, and cases cited. * * *

In cases where, through mistake or fraud, it would be inequitable to treat such judgments as a bar, the doctrine cannot be invoked. The case of Ferrall v. Bradford, 2 Fla. 508 (50 Am. Dec. 293), is in point. We quote:

"The plaintiffs in the court below took judgment against only one of the joint obligors, and, when that fact is pleaded by the defendants in bar, they reply that they did only do so because their attorney was circumvented, and induced to dismiss the proceedings as to the other defendants, in consequence of the fraudulent representations of one of the defendants. It matters little as to the mode or manner in which fraud is effected. A court must look to the effect, and ask if the result is a consequence of the fraud. Here the defendants seek to avail themselves of a legal defence, arising from a state of facts which they themselves, by their fraud, have produced. They admit, virtually, by their demurrer, that the plaintiffs have been deprived of a legal right by their fraud, and they seek now, by their defence, to take advantage of their own wrong, a defence admitted to arise from their own fraudulent act. The question now is, Will such a defence be available, tolerated, or allowed? Law, reason, justice, and morality unite in a negative response. * * * At the first blush, we thought we discovered some difficulty arising from the fact that only one of the defendants is alleged to have been guilty of the fraud; but it soon disappeared, for we find this principle broadly laid down,—that interests gained by one person by the fraud of another cannot be held by them; otherwise, fraud would always place itself beyond the reach of the court.” * * *

In the case before us, there is evidence from which it might be found that the course taken by the defendant in procuring a judgment for the breach of the contract was due to the concealment on the part of the iron works of the fact of the transfer of the claim, or, at least, of the mistake of the defendant in supposing that it belonged to the iron works at that time. We think the hardship and injustice of a strict application of the rule of merger is so apparent that we are justified in considering the case within the principle of the cases cited, and holding that, although the plaintiff was not strictly in privity as to the judgment, he was as to the cause of action upon which it was based, and that the defence made was proper. We think this conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss the subject of election of remedies raised by the briefs. * * *

The judgment should be affirmed.³⁶

GRANT, C. J. (dissenting) * * * (2) Defendant, claiming damages for violation of contract on the part of the Architectural Iron & Wire Works, had two courses open to him. He could have waited until the iron works or its assignee sued him, and then have recouped his damages, or he could have brought an independent action for damages. He chose the latter. The tort became merged in the judgment, which became a new debt, unaffected by the claim upon which it was based. Judgments are contracts, and are subject to set-off in actions of assumpsit. 1 Freem. Judgm. § 217; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 338, 339. The latter authority states the rule as follows:

“And the present rule undoubtedly is that no second suit can be maintained on the same cause of action, irrespective of the question whether the judgment in the first suit was of a higher or lower nature than the cause of action; the reason for the rule being that the judgment is a judicial determination of the rights of the parties, into which the plaintiff has voluntarily elected to transform his claim.”

The authorities in support of this are cited in note 7.

The general rule, as above stated, is admitted, but it is urged that there are exceptions to it, and that the present case forms one of the exceptions. * * *

I find no evidence of fraud or deception on the part of Bacon or his ³⁶ In some jurisdictions, a judgment in an action on a judgment is deemed to merge the judgment sued upon, but other jurisdictions allow both judgments to stand. But in any event both should stand where one is rendered in one state and the other in another state. Lilly-Brackett Co. v. Sonneman, 163 Cal. 632 (1912).

assignor in the assignment of this claim, or any evidence that it was assigned for the purpose of defeating Reich. The rule of law involved cannot, in my judgment, be changed by the fact that the iron works has become insolvent. The original cause of action in Reich against the iron works has, in the language of Eastern Townships Bank v. Beebe, 53 Vt. 177 (38 Am. Rep. 665), become so merged in the judgment "that the record itself has become a cause of action." The only office which that judgment can now serve is as a set-off. Huntoon v. Russell, 41 Mich. 316. Judgment should be reversed and new trial ordered.

Judgment affirmed.

FREEMAN v. BERNARD.

(Court of King's Bench, 1702. 1 Lord Raymond, 247.)

Assumpsit upon an agreement for the delivery of a certain quantity of hops, etc. The defendant pleads that the plaintiff and he had submitted this matter to the arbitration of J. S., ita quod the award should be made, and ready to be delivered, by such a day, etc., and the defendant shows that J. S. made an award before the day that the defendant or his executors or administrators should give a general release to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff should give a general release to the defendant; and the defendant pleads that he was always ready, and yet is, to sign and seal a release. The plaintiff demurs.³⁷ * * * But judgment was given by the whole court for the plaintiff; for the arbitrator has awarded nothing in satisfaction, but only has ordered means to discharge the action. He has not awarded a horse or money in satisfaction, but only mutual releases. Where an award creates a new duty instead of that which was in controversy, the party has remedy for it upon the award; and therefore if the party resorts to demand that which was referred and submitted, the arbitrament is a good bar against such action. Contra where the award does not create a new duty, but only extinguishes the old duty by a release of the action.

COMMINGS v. HEARD.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1869. L. R., 4 Q. B. 669.)

Declaration containing indebitatus counts for work done and materials provided, for money paid, for the conveyance of goods, for interest and money due on accounts stated, and claiming 400*l*.

admitted or received to claim or allege that at the commencement of this suit any more than the sum of 145*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* was due from the defendant to the plaintiff in respect of the causes of action in the declaration mentioned, because the defendant says that after the accruing of the causes of action in the declaration mentioned, and before this suit, a dispute arose between the plaintiff and the defendant as to how much was due from the defendant to the plaintiff in respect of the causes of action, and thereupon by agreement made between them before this suit they referred the question of how much was due from the defendant to the plaintiff in respect of the causes of action to the award of William Wills, and agreed to be bound by his award as to such amount; and that afterwards, and before this suit, the said William Wills, having taken upon himself the burden of the arbitration, and having heard and considered all that the plaintiff and defendant respectively had to allege, and all the evidence which they had to produce relating to the premises so referred, made his award in writing of and concerning the premises so referred to him as aforesaid, and thereby awarded that the amount due from the defendant to the plaintiff in respect of the causes of action was 145*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.*

Demurrer and joinder.

LUSH, J.³⁸ This was a demurrer to a plea. It is to be observed that the plea does not profess to be an answer to the entire claim, but to the excess over and above the amount of 145*l.* The question is, whether the plaintiff is concluded by the award from alleging that the entire amount was due to him. I am of opinion that he is concluded, and that the award is binding between the parties in all matters which it professes to decide. It was contended that an award is not an estoppel, that the parties are not concluded by an award, and that it is distinguishable from a judgment which it is admitted, would have bound the parties. The contention was that it was so distinguishable because an award was an adjudication by a tribunal appointed by the parties, and not one constituted by the sovereign power within the realm. It is impossible, to my mind, to suggest any good ground of distinction between these two, when we consider that the reason why a matter once adjudicated upon is not permitted to be opened again is because it is expedient that there should be an end to litigation. When once a matter has been decided between parties, the parties ought to be concluded by the adjudication, whatever it may be. I am at a loss to suggest any reason that would be applicable to the one, that would not be applicable to the other tribunal.³⁹

³⁹ At common law a bond for the payment of money or a record was not ended by award, but today each probably is. 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1926.

"After an agreement to arbitrate has been executed or consummated by the making of an award following a submission by both parties, which was unrevoked when the final action of the arbitrators was taken, the award so made Several cases were cited which it was supposed were authorities in favor of the plaintiff, but which, I think, may be contended to be clearly authorities in favor of the defendant. It is not a new doctrine that an award is a bar. That is found in Comyn's Digest, Tit. Accord, D. 1; and there are several instances of it to be found in the books. The case of Allen v. Milner, 2 C. & J. 47, was relied on, on the part of the plaintiff. When that case is examined it will be found to differ from the present in a most essential particular. There the money demand had been referred to arbitration. The arbitrator has found a given sum to be due from one to the other. That case was a money demand, as this is; the action was brought on the original consideration, but the plea, unlike the plea in this case, set up the award as a bar to the entire action. The plea was held bad, and for this reason, that an award upon a money claim does not alter the nature of the original debt; it leaves it remaining due. The amount which the arbitrator found to be due was for the original consideration. The award did not change the nature of the debt, consequently a plea which professed to answer the whole of the debt, and admitted a part of it was due, was a bad plea. That is the ground of that decision.

On the other hand, it is settled, where the claim is one for unliquidated damages, an award which settles the amount may be pleaded in bar to the entire action, although the plea, on the face of it, shows that the money is not paid. In the case of Gascoyne v. Edwards, 1 Y. & J. 19, there was a general plea pleaded to the whole declaration, by which it was alleged that the parties had agreed to refer the amount of the damages to arbitration, and an award had been made, by which it was awarded that the defendant should pay the plaintiff 5*l.* to put the premises in repair. The plea, although it did not aver that the 5*l.* was paid, was held to be a good plea because an award, fixing the amount and creating a debt between the parties, extinguished the original demand for unliquidated damages. The principle upon which this was held a good plea is, that an award, professing to determine the matter, is binding upon both parties, and it as much precludes the parties from alleging anything contrary to the award as a judgment would, on the ground that it is res judicata. If this action had been brought upon the award, it is clear the defendant would be precluded from saying the 145*l.* was is not deprived of binding effect by the circumstance that before it was made the arbitration agreement did not stand in the way of either party resorting to the courts for the settlement of the controversy. Where parties submit matters in controversy to arbitration, and an award is made pursuant to the agreement of submission, such award is final and binding on the parties, unless the arbitrators are guilty of fraud, partiality, or other improper conduct in making it. Gardner v. Newman, 135 Ala. 522, 33 South. 179; Williams v. Branning Mfg. Co., 154 N. C. 205, 70 S. E. 290, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 337, and note; 5 Corpus Juris, 43, 163; 2 R. C. L. 366." Walker, J., in N. P. Sloan Co. v. Standard Chemical & Oil Co., 256 Fed. 451, 455 (1918). But see Conant v. Arsenault, 118 Me. 281 (1919).

not due, because the arbitrator found it was. Why is not a plaintiff equally prohibited from alleging that more is due when the amount has been found by the arbitrator? Each must be concluded by the finding. It is elementary knowledge that an award, good on the face of it, is binding and conclusive upon both parties to it until it is set aside. Nothing appears on the face of this plea to show that the award is not perfectly good. It professes to adjudicate upon all matters referred, and it has decided finally the whole matter. In answer to the argument that the award may be bad, it is enough to say that if the award is bad it might be shown by a replication setting it out. If it is not bad on the face of it, then the parties not having moved to set it aside, it stands, and each party is prohibited from objecting to it. The plea is a perfectly good plea, and our judgment must be for the defendant.

The plea, no doubt, is in an unusual form, because it is pleaded by way of estoppel. It begins in the ordinary way of a plea of estoppel, that the plaintiff ought not to be admitted or received to say so and so. That I consider immaterial. The award is a bar, and it concludes the parties.

Judgment for the defendant.⁴⁰

WHITE EAGLE LAUNDRY CO. v. SLAWEK.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1921. 296 Ill. 240, 129 N. E. 753.)

DUNN, J.⁴¹ The White Eagle Laundry Company brought suit in the municipal court of Chicago on October 18, 1920, against Joseph Slawek for damages to the plaintiff's automobile, caused by a collision on a public street in the city of Chicago with the defendant's automobile, alleged to have resulted from the defendant's negligence.

On October 29, 1920, the parties entered into a written agreement for the submission of the cause to arbitration and appointing an arbitrator. The agreement provided that judgment should be entered on any award that was made and it was filed in the municipal court. The arbitrator, after taking the oath prescribed by law, heard the cause and the arguments of counsel, and at the close of the argument counsel for the plaintiff stated that the plaintiff then and there withdrew from the submission to arbitration and asked the arbitrator to suspend further proceedings until the plaintiff could move the court for a nonsuit. Thereupon the arbitrator took no further action in the matter, and the plaintiff moved the court for a nonsuit, but the court overruled the motion and ordered the arbitrator to file his final award instantler. On November 9 the arbitrator filed his award, finding that the defendant was guilty of negligence, and that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, the negligence of both parties being the primary cause of the accident, and finding that there was no right of recovery in favor of the plaintiff. Objections were filed to the award, but the court entered judgment that the plaintiff take nothing by his suit and that the defendant recover his costs. The plaintiff appealed directly to this court, claiming that the case involves the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Arbitration Act as amended in 1919, Laws of 1919, p. 216. * * *

⁴⁰ "It is not necessary that a party should have a legal cause of action to authorize a submission and award and to bind the parties by the award. * * * That there is a dispute, controversy, or honest difference of opinion between them concerning any subject in which they are both interested is enough, nor indeed is it necessary that they should have come to the actual point of dispute; for a matter simply in doubt may be submitted. It is sufficient to sustain the arbitration if the appellee's claim was made in good faith, that it was disputed by appellants, and that it was submitted to arbitration. Downing v. Lee, 98 Mo. App. 604, 73 S. W. 721; Findly v. Ray, 50 N. C. 125; Morse on Arbitration & Award, p. 36." McMahan, J., in Milhollin v. Milhollin, (Ind. App.), 125 N. E. 217, 218 (1919).

The appellant contends that it had a right to revoke the submission to arbitration and take a nonsuit at any time before the arbitrator had indicated his finding in the controversy. At common law the rule was well established that either party might revoke the submission at any time before the award was made, thus rendering the submission wholly ineffectual and taking from the arbitrator all power to make a binding award. 2 Parsons on Contracts, *710; Paulsen v. Manske, 126 Ill. 72, 18 N. E. 275, 9 Am. St. Rep. 532; People v. Nash, 111 N. Y. 310, 18 N. E. 630, 2 L. R. A. 180, 7 Am. St. Rep. 747.⁴² Section 3 of the Arbitration Act provides that a submission to arbitration shall, unless a contrary intention is expressed therein, be irrevocable. The legislature has the right to enact such a provision unless it is prohibited by the constitution from doing so.

The appellant contends that the provision is unconstitutional because it deprives parties of property without due process of law and confers judicial powers on individuals not recognized by the constitution. It is true that arbitration is in the nature of a judicial inquiry, but the statute confers no judicial powers on arbitrators. It is not compulsory, but is "Where the parties agree upon the number of arbitrators, they are entitled to the judgment of each, and neglect or refusal of any one to act will render an award made by others invalid. American & English Encyclopedia of Law, vol. 2, p. 641 et seq.; C. J., vol. 5, "Arbitration & Award," §§ 137, 204; Security Insurance Co. v. Kelly, 196 S. W. 874." Huff, C. J., in Beirne v. entirely voluntary. If parties choose to submit their controversies to arbitration, they have the right to do so. The object of arbitration is to avoid the formalities, delay and expense attending litigation in court, and it has been recognized from a very early period by the common law as a method of settling disputes. At common law an agreement could be entered into by parol to arbitrate any cause of action which did not involve the title to land, and an award was a full and final adjustment of the controversy, having all the force of an adjudication and effectually concluding the parties from again litigating the same subject. Smith v. Douglass, 16 Ill. 34. The statute, in making the agreement irrevocable, confers no new power and takes away no inalienable right. It simply recognizes the agreement of the parties and enforces it. Before the statute was enacted the court would not specifically enforce the agreement to arbitrate, but left the parties to their remedies at law for a breach of the contract. The effect of making the agreement irrevocable was merely to provide for the specific enforcement of the contract, and it violated no constitutional rights. It conferred no power on individuals, but provided for the method of carrying into effect the contract of the parties.

It is also objected that the act is unconstitutional and void as being an attempt to oust the courts appointed by the Constitution of their jurisdiction. There is no constitutional provision against the settlement of controversies out of court or the submission of them to the judgment of arbitrators who may be agreed upon by the parties, and no constitutional provision is referred to under this head of the appellant's argument. It has been held that an agreement in an executory contract to submit any controversy which may arise under it to arbitration is an effort to divest the courts of their jurisdiction and is invalid because contrary to public policy. Stephenson v. Piscataqua Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 54 Me. 55; Hurst v. Litchfield, 39 N. Y. 377; Fox v. Masons' Fraternal Accident Ass'n, 96 Wis. 390, 71 N. W. 363. This principle applies only where there is a general agreement to submit all controversies to arbitration. It does not apply to cases where a controversy has arisen and an agreement is made to submit the particular controversy to arbitration or to agreements to arbitrate special questions, such as the amount of the loss under an insurance policy as a condition precedent to maintaining an action. Niagara Fire Ins. Co. v. Bishop, 154 Ill. 9, 39 N. E. 1102, 45 Am. St. Rep. 105; Hamilton v. Liverpool & London & Globe Ins. Co., 136 U. S. 242, 10 Sup. Ct. 945, 34 L. Ed. 419; Scott v. Avery, 5 H. L. Cas. 811. The statute does not require any causes to be submitted to arbitration, and nobody is any more bound now to submit causes to arbitration than before. It merely recognizes the right, already existing, of parties to submit their causes to arbitration and regulates the method in which the arbitration may be conducted.

The judgment of the municipal court will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

CALVIN ROBINSON, 2ND. v. FERDINAND HAWKINS.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1866. 38 Vt. 693.)

PECK, J.⁴³ The action is trespass in which the plaintiff seeks to recover for the taking and conversion of a cow. The defendant justifies, as deputy sheriff, the taking and sale of the cow under a writ of attachment in favor of Josiah Gilson against the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed before the referee that at the time of the attachment and sale the cow was [exempt from levy because it was] the plaintiff's last and only cow, and so the referee finds the fact. * * *

The defendant relies on a submission and award of an arbitrator between the plaintiff and Gilson, as a bar to the action. It appears that in 1858, while the suit in which the cows were attached was pending in the county court, to which it had been appealed, Calvin Robinson, 2d, and his father, William Robinson and Gilson executed mutual bonds of submission to arbitration, in pursuance of which an award was made in May, 1859. The arbitration bonds specify as a matter of difference submitted, a "disagreement relative to the sale and purchase, or rent and occupancy, of certain premises, wherein the said Gilson claims damages of said Calvin Robinson, which disagreement has resulted in a suit at law" (referring to the suit already mentioned), and also specifying a claim on the part of the said William Robinson, that Gilson has, by deputy sheriff Hawkins, attached a certain cow claimed by William Robinson as his property, for which Robinson has a suit pending against Gilson. To this particular description of the matters submitted is added a general clause of all matters existing between Gilson and William Robinson, and between Gilson and Calvin Robinson. The defendant's counsel insists that, under this general clause, the plaintiff was bound to present the claim embraced in this suit before the arbitrator and have it there adjudicated, and that if he neglected to do so he is barred of all remedy, not only as against Gilson but as against this defendant. We recognize the principle established by the cases cited in argument, that under a general submission of all matters existing between the parties, if a party withholds a part of his claims from the arbitration he cannot, as a general rule, afterwards enforce it against the other party to the submission. Whether this rule is limited to cases where a party, in bad faith and intentionally in violation of his contract, withholds a claim, it is not necessary to decide. Nor is it necessary to decide what exceptions there are to this rule as between the parties to the submission. It is sufficient to say that, in the opinion of the court, the neglect of the plaintiff to present this claim before the arbitrator does not operate to bar him from his remedy against the defendant, who was no party to the submission. The cases on this subject, in which it is held that the party is concluded, proceed upon the ground that the party was bound, by his contract of submission, to present the claim and have it adjudicated by the arbitrator. We think in this case the plaintiff was not bound by the submission to present the claim before the arbitrator, but had a right to look to the officer who actually committed the trespass. It is true he might have made Gilson liable for the acts of the officer if he could have shown that Gilson directed the officer to attach and sell the particular cow in question, but he was not bound to resort to him instead of the officer for remedy. The submission and award is no bar to a recovery, without showing that the matter was submitted to and adjudicated by the arbitrator, and this the referee says he does not find.

The defendant's counsel claims that the presumption is that it was presented to, and adjudicated by, the arbitrator, unless the contrary is shown. This would be so if by the terms of the submission it became the duty of the plaintiff to present it to the arbitrator, but not so in this case. * * *

Judgment [for the defendant] reversed and judgment for the plaintiff on the report.

GIBBONS v. VOUILLON.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1849. 8 C. B., 483.)

WILDE, C. J.⁴⁴ This question arises upon a plea which sets forth an agreement under seal between the defendant of the first part, three individuals named, as trustees, of the second part, and the plaintiff and certain other persons, creditors of the defendant, of the third part; and the plea, which is pleaded either as a bar to the action generally, or, in bar of the further maintenance of the action, states that the defendant had carried on the business of a silk-mercier; that the several debts due to the parties of the second and third parts, which were set opposite to their respective names, had accrued; that the defendant was unable immediately to satisfy those debts; that, for the purpose of realizing his effects, it has been deemed advantageous to all the parties interested, that the defendant should, for five years, be permitted to carry on the business, under the inspection of the trustees; and that it was agreed that the business should be so carried on for the said term of five years. The plea then goes to state, that, in pursuance of the agreement, the several persons parties thereto of the second and third parts, by that indenture gave and granted unto the defendant until May 17th, 1848 (the indenture bearing date May 17th, 1843), full and free license and authority to pass and repass, etc.; and that it was further provided, that, if any of the said persons parties thereto of the second and third parts, should, at any time thereafter during the continuance of the license thereby granted, molest or interfere with the defendant, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said indenture, the defendant should be released, exonerated, acquitted, and forever discharged of and from all debts and demands whatsoever which were then due unto, or then could be made by, the creditor or creditors respectively by whom the said letter of license thereinbefore contained, should in any such respect be contravened, and of and from all manner of actions, suits; etc., by reason, on account, or in consequence of the same debts or demands respectively, and that the said indenture should or might be pleaded in bar to such respective debts or demands accordingly. The molestation or interference herein mentioned must be intended to mean such sort of molestation and interference as the parties lawfully might resort to, having relation to their situation as creditors and debtor. The question is, whether or not effect may be given to this agreement of the parties. Now, the first part of the deed operates as a letter of license, with a covenant on the part of the creditors not to sue within a limited time. This, it is contended, on the part of the plaintiff, cannot be pleaded in bar; but it is said, upon the supposed authority of Ford v. Beech, that the only remedy of the covenantee is, by a cross action for damages. Nothing, however, fell from the Court in Ford v. Beech, to countenance that supposition. Why is it that a covenant not to sue for a limited time cannot be pleaded in bar? By reason of the rule that the right to a personal action once vested, and suspended, by the voluntary act of the party, for however short a time, is precluded and gone forever. It could only be pleaded in bar; for, that is its legal operation. To have allowed the agreement in Ford v. Beech to be pleaded in bar as a release, would have been obviously contrary to the intention of the parties; and no injustice followed from holding that the defendant's remedy for a breach was to be found in a cross action. But how does that apply where we have to deal with express and unequivocal words, and in a case where there are circumstances to warrant our concluding that the parties intended to give a totally different effect to the contract from what is before stated? Here, we have to deal with a contract entered into in express terms between a debtor and a body of twenty or thirty creditors, each of whom, for the benefit of the general concern, agrees that the debtor shall for a given period continue to carry on the business without molestation, and that, if that contract should be contravened by any creditor molesting or interfering with the debtor, such molestation or interference should operate an extinguishment of the debt, and that the indenture might be pleaded in bar to such debt. How would it be possible to secure the object the parties had in view, if effect could not be given to the agreement in the terms in which they have framed it? The intention is beyond doubt. A covenant not to sue for a given time enures as a release, not by the mere agreement of the parties, but by operation of law.

Then it is said that that which has occurred here is not a molestation within the meaning of the deed. Looking at all the circumstances, it is impossible to doubt that suing the debtor was the very species of molestation which the parties sought to guard against, and no other. They clearly could not have had anything else in their contemplation. When, therefore, this action—which in the ordinary course would go on to judgment and execution—was brought, the defendant had a right to assume that it was brought for the purpose of molesting or interfering with him, and so preventing him from carrying into effect the contract he had entered into. In the absence, therefore, of anything to control it, it seems to me that the parties contemplated a molestation by suing out a writ.

The cases referred to in Rolle's Abridgment appear to me to afford distinct authority on the present occasion. We are to consider what is the effect of this deed, taking the whole of it together. On the part of the defendant, it is contended that the deed, taken altogether, operates as a release; and accordingly he pleads it in bar. The plaintiff's counsel, on the other hand, argues with much ingenuity, that if we hold it to be a release, we must hold it to be a release from the moment of its execution; and that is manifestly contrary to the intention of the parties. To extinguish the debt, would manifestly be to defeat the whole intention of the deed. But upon what assumption is that ground taken? Upon the assumption that every release, to have any operation at all, must operate from the moment at which it is given. I must confess I do not assent to that proposition. I do not see why parties may not agree that a certain instrument shall operate as a release, from the happening of such an event. The passage in Co. Litt. referred to by my brother Maule, seems to show that they may. There is, then, a clear and manifest intent, to be collected from the deed, that it shall operate as a release, from the happening of the event which the parties contemplated, viz., the molestation which has happened. It is no reason why effect should not be given to the clear intention of the parties, that, in so doing, we necessarily carry its operation somewhat beyond what was contemplated.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

⁴⁵ Of the notion in Newington v. Levy, L. R., 5 C. P. 607 (1870), L. R., 6 C. P. 180 (1870), denied in Tyson v. Dorr, 6 Whart. (Pa.) 256 (1841), that

DAVIDSON, PUBLIC OFFICER, &c. v. COOPER & BRASSINGTON.

(Court of Exchequer Chamber, 1844. 13 Meeson & Welsby, 343.)

LORD DENMAN, C. J.⁴⁶ This was a declaration in assumpsit on a written guarantee, to which one defendant pleaded, that, while the guarantee was in the plaintiff's hands, it was, without the defendant's consent or knowledge, materially altered by the addition of two seals opposite the names of the defendant and the other party to it, whereby its apparent nature and effect were wholly altered. Issue being taken on this plea, the jury found it was so altered; and judgment has been given by the Court of Exchequer for the defendant, after having discharged a rule for judgment, non obstante veredicto, upon argument.

After much doubt, we think the judgment right. The strictness of the rule on this subject, as laid down in Pigot's Case, 11 Coke 26b,⁴⁷ can only be explained on the principle that a party who has the custody of an instrument made for his benefit, is bound to preserve it in its original state. It is highly important for preserving the purity of legal instruments that this principle should be borne in mind, and the rule adhered to. The party who may suffer has no right to complain, since there cannot be any alteration except through fraud, or laches on his part. To say that Pigot's Case has been overruled, is a mistake; on the contrary, it has been extended: the authorities establishing, as common sense requires, that the alteration of an unsealed paper will vitiate it. Upon the doubt whether this instrument is altered, because it remains a release may be given subject to a condition subsequent, Professor Williston, while insisting that the old cause of action once discharged is gone forever, suggests that "The intention of the parties can be effectuated in great measure, however, by construing the so-called condition subsequent as a promise to pay the released claim in a given event. The creditor's right of action on the happening of that event would then be on the new promise contained in the release, not on the original cause of action. The seal on the release would support the promise, wherever seals still retain their efficacy." 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1824, pp. 3142, 3143.

⁴⁶ The statement of facts is omitted. For a full statement, see 11 M. & W. 778.

⁴⁷ In Pigot's Case, 11 Coke 26b (1614), which was an action of debt on a bond, "these points were resolved:

"1. When a lawful deed is rased, whereby it becomes void, the obligor may plead non est factum, and give the matter in evidence, because at the time of the plea pleaded, it is not his deed.

"2. * * * When any deed is altered in a point material by the plaintiff himself, or by any stranger, without the privity of the obligee, be it by interlineation, addition, rasing, or by drawing of a pen through a line or through the midst of any material word, * * * the deed thereby becomes void. * * * So if the obligee himself alters the deed by any of the said ways, although it is in words not material, yet the deed is void: but if a stranger, without his privity, alters the deed by any of the said ways in any point not material, it shall not avoid the deed."

exactly as it was when signed, but only something is added near to the signatures of the defendants, we may observe, that that addition gives a different legal character to the writing, and would, if made with the consent of all interested, completely change the nature of the relation towards each other of the parties to it, and the remedies upon it. The observation that a deed is not made by sealing, but by delivery, does not appear to touch the argument, for no addition, erasure, or interlineation, after execution, makes the actual instrument different in legal effect from what it was; the original document may be perfectly visible through the attempt to disguise it, but a different appearance is produced. The truth cannot be known from inspection, but would require to be established by evidence, and this through some default of the person to whose care it was consigned, and who would be possessed of a superior legal remedy if the altered writing could be imposed on the contractor as genuine. We are therefore of opinion, both upon principle and authority, that this judgment must be affirmed.

*Judgment affirmed.*⁴⁰

⁴⁰ While the doctrine that recovery would be denied in the case of alteration at first applied only to sealed instruments, it was extended to negotiable instruments and then to written contracts and written memoranda not under seal. With the extension has gone more liberality toward the party seeking to recover on the altered instrument or on the original debt or consideration for which the instrument was given.

Spoilation, which is alteration by a stranger, will not discharge an obligation in general in the United States, except so far as § 124 of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law (quoted below), may have made a change. Spoilation, however, does discharge an instrument in England by the rule of the principal case of Davidson v. Cooper, if the instrument at the time was in the custody of the obligee.

In general today, immaterial alterations and innocent material alterations, made in each case by the obligee, do not discharge the obligation. And in a jurisdiction where a material alteration, though innocently made, will prevent a recovery on the obligation—see, for instance, Merritt v. Dewey, 218 Ill. 599 (1905),—recovery will be allowed on the original debt or consideration which it evidences. See Hayes v. Wagner reported next, post. If the material alteration is fraudulently made by the obligee, in general no such recovery will be allowed except so far as § 124 of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law gives recovery on the negotiable instrument as it was before alteration.

§ 124 of the Negotiable Instruments Law reads: "Where a negotiable instrument is materially altered without the assent of all parties liable thereon, it is avoided, except as against a party who has himself made, authorized or assented to the alteration, and subsequent indorsers. But when an instrument has been materially altered and is in the hands of a holder in due course, not a party to the alteration, he may enforce payment thereof according to its original tenor."

On discharge by alteration, see 5 Page on Contracts, 2 ed., §§ 3072-3123; 3 Williston on Contracts, §§ 1888-1917. See also Samuel Williston, Discharge of Contracts by Alteration, 18 Harv. L. Rev. 105, 165. On unauthorized alteration of written instruments, see 86 Am. St. Rep. 80, note.

DENNIS H. HAYES v. J. G. WAGNER.

CARTWRIGHT, C. J.† • • • The contract was in writing and in duplicate, and the judgment of the Appellate Court has settled the fact that it was executed by the parties. One of the originals so executed was kept by the plaintiff and was afterward altered in material respects by changing the amount to be paid for the work from $52,000 to $54,700, changing the date of the completion of the work, and making other alterations in the agreement. The trial court, after receiving evidence as to the circumstances under which and the intent with which the alterations had been made, admitted in evidence the altered duplicate, and also admitted secondary evidence of the contents of the duplicate retained by the defendant. It is contended that the court erred in overruling the objections of the defendant to such evidence. The changes in the contract made by the plaintiff made it different, in legal effect, from what it was when executed by the parties, and were therefore material. A material alteration of an executory written contract destroys it as a basis of recovery by the person making the alteration, and the changes in this contract invalidated it as against the defendant, who did not consent to such changes. No recovery could be had upon the contract, either in its altered form or in its original condition, and it was wholly void. (Pankey v. Mitchell, Breese, 383; Gillett v. Sweat, 1 Gilm.) 475; Benjamin v. McConnel, 4 Id. 536.) This was conceded to be the law, and the altered instrument was not offered in evidence as a basis for a recovery of damages but only to show all the facts in relation to its execution as a part of the original transaction, and the changes made in it, in connection with all the facts and circumstances. The question whether there has been an alteration in a contract and the intent with which it has been made are questions for the jury, to be determined from all the circumstances. (2 Elliott on Evidence, § 1,516.) The intent with which alterations are made may be, and in this case was, material. If any alteration is innocently made, without fraudulent intent, it destroys the instrument by changing it into one to which the parties never agreed. But if there is an original debt or obligation which was not satisfied or extinguished by the instrument, a recovery can be had in such a case on such original debt or obligation. (Vogle v. Ripper, 34 Ill. 100; Elliott v. Blair, 47 Id. 342, 2 Cyc. 183, 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 200.) The court did not err in admitting in evidence the altered instrument for the purpose for which it was offered.

The objection of counsel for the defendant to the secondary evidence of the unaltered duplicate was, that the alteration of one rendered the other nugatory and void, and had the same effect upon the other duplicate that it had upon the one altered. A duplicate is defined as a document which is the same, in all respects, as another instrument from which it is indistinguishable in its essence and operation. (10 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 318.) Instruments are executed in duplicate so that each party may have an original, and one is not a copy of the other, but both are primary evidence. In order to introduce an original duplicate it is not necessary that the other should also be produced, but to admit secondary evidence of the contents of one it is necessary to show the loss of both. (1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 558.) If one of the duplicates is unaltered there is original primary evidence of the contract as agreed to by the parties, although the other duplicate has been destroyed, by alterations or otherwise. We see no good reason why the same principle upon which a recovery is allowed on the original consideration in case of an alteration without fraudulent intent should not be applied in a case where one of the duplicates has been innocently changed without fraudulent intent. The evidence for the plaintiff was that the alterations were made in contemplation of making a new and different contract, and that they were innocently made, without fraudulent intent, in the expectation that such new contract would be executed in the altered form, and were intended as notations or memoranda for making the new contract. We think it was proper to allow proof of the contents of the unaltered duplicate as the basis for recovery. * * *

*Judgment [for the plaintiff] affirmed.*⁴⁰

FREEMAN H. ELLSWORTH v. FOGG & HARVEY.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1862. 35 Vt. 355.)

Assumpsit on five promissory notes signed by Fogg & Harvey, but which had been surrendered to Harvey, one of the makers, on part payment by him. Verdict and judgment for defendant Harvey, who alone was served.

ALDIS, J.⁴⁰ * * * II. Does acceptance of a part of the amount due on a promissory note in satisfaction and discharge of the whole note, and a surrender of the note by the owner to the maker, to be cancelled, bar a writ brought by the owner for the recovery of the unpaid portion?

We are not disposed to disturb the rule as stated in Wheeler v. Wheeler, in the 11th Vt. 60, that payment of a part of a debt upon an agreement that it shall be satisfaction of the whole, even though the agreement and payment are shown by a receipt, will not extinguish the whole debt. It is claimed here that besides the part payment and the agreement, there is another element—the surrender of the notes to the maker—which operates as a complete discharge of the whole amount due upon them. * * *

⁴⁰ The statement of facts is omitted, the foregoing brief summary being substituted, and parts of the opinion are omitted.

But we must abide by the old decisions, which have long since determined that payment of part in discharge of the whole does discharge the whole, if shown by a release under seal; but if shown by a written agreement, or a receipt, or any proof short of a release, it does not. * * *

It is sufficient for us to hold that the surrender of an instrument to be cancelled by the party to whom it belongs, is equivalent to a release. A release is the act of a party by which he does what he has agreed to do. Before the release is executed, his liability stands upon agreement merely, and if the agreement is without consideration, he may legally refuse to do what he has agreed. He may back out from his agreement but not from his release. The surrender of the instrument in which the party's rights appear is also the act of the party. Giving it up would seem literally to be dissolving the contract "eo ligamine quo ligatur."

We think the surrender of the notes by the owner to the maker may well be put upon the same ground as a release,—as being an act of the highest significance and clearest import to show the deliberate and well understood agreement of the parties. It is their agreement executed;—a release in practical operation. It is free from liability to mistake or fraud. The deliberate surrender of notes by the owner to the maker, to be cancelled, is an act which no man of prudence, or of the least knowledge of business, would do, unless he intended to discharge the debt. A release, as well as the surrender of notes may be procured by deceit and fraud,—but when they are made according to the intent of the parties, they should be sustained. * * *

*Judgment affirmed.*⁵⁰

⁵⁰ "The effect of cancellation or surrender upon written contracts which are not formal contracts must depend somewhat upon the particular circumstances of the case. Surrender or cancellation frequently forms part of and is evidence of a parol agreement to discharge the contract. The validity of such an agreement depends upon rules previously considered. Even though it is impossible to make out a binding parol contract of discharge, the rules of evidence may save the original promisor from liability upon his contract; for the voluntary cancellation of the writing by the promisee may have deprived him of his only legal evidence. General Film Co. v. Sampliner, 252 Fed. 443, 448, citing Ingersoll v. Crocker, 228 Fed. 844, 852. If the writing is still in existence the mere fact that it has been surrendered will not however, it seems, prevent its use in evidence, or prevent the admission of secondary evidence of its contents if the holder of it refuses to produce it." 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1879.

"But the cancellation of a bond, or its delivery to the obligor, or even to a stranger, with the intent that it shall be cancelled, amounts to an extinction of the debt." Knox, J., in Albert's Execrs. v. Ziegler's Execrs., 29 Pa. St. 50, 58 (1857).

So of bills and notes, but if the surrender is before maturity and the bill or note is payable to bearer or is indorsed in blank and is afterwards lost or stolen and before maturity is transferred to a holder in due course, the maker's liability reattaches under § 16 of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, which provides that "where the instrument is in the hands of a holder in due course, a valid delivery thereof by all parties prior to him so as to make them liable to him is conclusively presumed."

On the destruction of a bill or note with intent to discharge the debt, see note 50, p. 548, ante.
